But do not become impatient because cannot see the curve of events, and there conclude that God's government is going break down. History tells us that in the m ing of the Pyramids it took two thousand two years to drag one great stone from quarry and put it into the Pyramids. now, if men short-lived can afford to work slowly as that, cannot God in the building of eternities afford to wait? What though should take ten thousand years to draw a cir Shall we take our little watch, which we hav wind up every night lest it run down, and h it up beside

THE CLOCK OF ETERNAL AGES?

If, according to the Bible, a thousand years in God's sight as one day, then accordin that calculation the six thousand years of world's existence has been only to God as f Monday to Saturday. But it is often the that the rebound is quicker, the return is n quicker than that. The circle is sooner c pleted.

You resolve that you will do what good can. In one week you put a word of couns the heart of a Sabbath-school child. Du that same week you give a letter of introduc to a young man struggling in business. Du the same week you make an exhortation prayer-meeting. It is all gone; you will n hear of it perhaps, you think.

A few years after a man comes up to you says, "You don't know me, do you?" say, "No, I don't remember ever to have you." "Why," he says, "I was in the Sabl school class over which you were the teac one Sunday you invited me to Christ; I ac ed the offer; you see that church with two ers yonder?" "Yes," you say. He says, " is where I preach," or, "Do you see that ernor's house? That is where I live."

One day a man comes to you and says, " morning." You look at him and say, " you have the advantage of me: I cannot you." He says, "don't you remember t years ago giving a letter of introduction young man—a letter of introduction to M H. Grinnell?" "Yes, yes, I do." He "I am the man; that was my first step to a fortune; but I have retired from bus now, and am giving my time to philanthr and public interests. Come up to Yonker see me."

Or a man comes to you and says, "I wa introduce myself to you. I went into a pr meeting in Brooklyn some years ago; back by the door; you arose to make an e tation; that talk changed the course of my and if I ever get to heaven, under God owe my salvation to you." In only ten, tw or thirty years, the circle swept out and back again to your own grateful heart.

But sometimes it is a wider circle, and not return for a great while. I saw for burning Latimer and Ridley. The b expenses says:

A BILL OF EXPENSES

One load of firs fagots..........	3s. 4a
Cartage for four loads of wood...	2s.
Item, a post,......	1s. 4a
Item, two chains	3s. 4a
Item, two staples..............	6a
Item, four laborers............	2s. 8

That was cheap fire, considering all the ci stances; but it kindled a light which sho around the world and aroused the martyr and out from that burning of Latimer an ley rolled the circle wider and wider, st other circles, convoluting, overrunning, c scribing, overarching all heaven—a circle.

A CIRCLE OF SLANDER.

But what is true of the good is just as t the bad. You utter a slander against neighbor. It has gone forth from your teet will never come back, you think. You hav the man all the mischief you can. You r to see him wince. You say, "Didn't I giv him!" That word has gone out, that sl your word, on its poisonous and blasted way. You think it will never do you any harm.

But I am watching that word, and I see it beginning to curve, and it curves around, and it is coming at your heart. You had better dodge it. You cannot dodge it. It rolls into your bosom, and after it rolls in a word of an old book which says, "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

You maltreat an aged parent. You begrudge him the room in your house. You are impatient of his whimsicalities and garrulity. It makes you mad to hear him tell the same story twice. You give him food he cannot masticate. You wish he was away. You wonder if he is going to live forever. He will be gone very soon. His steps are shorter and shorter. He is going to stop. But God has an account to settle with you on that subject.

After a while, your eye will be dim, and your gait will halt, and the sound of the grinding will be low, and you will tell the same story twice, and your children will wonder if you are going to live forever, and wonder if you will never be taken away. They called you "father" once; now they call you the "old man." If you live a few years longer, they will call you the "old thing."

What are those rough words with which your children are accosting you? They are the echo of the very words you used in the ear of your old father forty years ago. What is that which you are trying to chew, but find it unmasticable and your jaws ache, and you surrender the attempt? Perhaps it may be the gristle which you gave to your father for his breakfast forty years ago?

A gentleman passing along the street saw a son dragging his father into the street by the hair of the head. The gentleman, outraged at his brutal conduct, was about to punish the elder, when the old man arose and said: "Don't hurt him; it's all right; forty years ago this morning I dragged out my father by the hair of his head!" It is a circle.

RETRIBUTION IN A CIRCLE.

My father lived into the eighties, and he had a very wide experience, and he said that maltreatment of parents was always punished in this world. Other sins may be adjourned to the next world, but maltreatment of parents punished in this world.

The circle turns quickly, very quickly. Oh! what a stupendous thought that the good and the evil we start come back to us. Do you think that the judgment day will be only the good and the bad we have done coming back to us unless divine intervention hinder—coming back to us with welcome of delight or curse of condemnation.

THE POINTS AT WHICH THE CIRCLES JOIN,

Oh! I would like to see Paul, the invalid missionary, at the moment when his influence comes to full orb—his influence rolling out through Antioch, through Cyprus, through Lystra, through Corinth, through Athens, through Asia, through Europe, through America, through the first century, through five centuries, through twenty centuries, through all the succeeding centuries, through earth, through heaven; and at last, the wave of influence having made full circuit, strikes his great soul. Oh! then I would like to see him. No one can tell the wide sweep of the circle of his influence, save the One who is seated on the circle of the earth. I should not want to see the countenance of Voltaire when his influence comes to full orb. When the fatal hemorrhage seized him at eighty-three years of age his influence did not cease. The most brilliant man of his century, he had used all his faculties for assaulting Christianity; his bad influence widening through France, widening out through Germany, widening through all Europe, widening through America, widening through the one hundred and one years that have gone by since he died, widening through earth, widening through hell; until at last the accumulated influence of his bad life in the surge of omnipotent wrath will beat against his destroyed spirit, and at that moment it will be enough to make the black hair of eternal darkness turn white with the horror. No one can tell how that bad man's influence girdled the earth save the One who is seated on the circle of the earth—the Lord Almighty.

"Well now," say people in this audience, "this in some respects is a very glad theory, and in others a very sad one; we would like to have all the good we have ever done come back to us, but the thought that all the sins we have ever committed will come back to us, fills us with affright." My brother, I have to tell you and will do so at your call. I can bring twenty passages of Scripture to prove that when God for Christ's sake forgives a man, the sins of his past life never come back. The wheel may roll on and roll on, but you take your position behind the cross and the wheel strikes the cross and is shattered forever. The sins fly off from the circle into the perpendicular, falling at right angles with complete oblivion.

GOD CAN BREAK THAT CIRCLE,

FORGIVEN! FORGIVEN!

The meanest thing a man can do is, after some difficulty has been settled, to bring it up again; and God will not be so mean as that. God's memory is mighty enough to hold all the events of the ages, but there is one thing that is sure to slip His memory, one thing He is sure to forget, and that is pardoned transgression. How do I know it? I will prove it. "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." Come into that state this morning, my dear brother, my dear sister. "Blessed is the one whose transgressions are forgiven."

THE CIRCLE IN HEAVEN.

But do not make the mistake of thinking that this doctrine of the circle stops with this life; it rolls on through heaven. You might quote in opposition to me what St. John says about the city of heaven. He says it "lieth four square." That does seem to militate against this idea; but you know there is many a square house that has a family circle facing each other, and in a circle moving, and I can prove that this is so in regard to heaven.

St. John says: "I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne, and the beasts and the elders." And again he says: "I saw round about the throne four and twenty seats." Again he says, "There was a rainbow round about the throne." The two former instances a circle; the last, either a circle or a semicircle. The seats facing each other, the angels facing each other, the men facing each other. Heaven an amphitheatre of glory. Circumference of patriarch and prophet and apostle. Circumference of Scotch Covenanters and Theban legion and Albigenses. Circumference of the good of all ages. Periphery of splendor unimagined and indescribable. A circle! A circle!

But every circumference must have

A CENTRE,

and what is the centre of this heavenly circumference? Christ. His all the glory. His all the praise. His all the crowns. All heaven wreathed into a garland round about Him.

Take off the imperial sandal from His foot, and behold the scar of the spike. Lift the coronet of dominion from His brow, and see where was the laceration of the briers. Come closer, all heaven. Narrow the circle around His great heart. O Christ, the Saviour! O Christ, the man! O Christ, the God! Keep Thy throne forever, seated on the circle of the earth, seated on the circle of the heaven.

"On Christ, the solid rock, I stand;
All other ground is shifting sand."

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it, and for its weekly circulation of more than 150,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

The Thug's Penances.—The Thugs are a horrible Indian sect, the chief feature in whose "religion" consists in joining parties of travellers and seizing an opportunity of strangling them all. Miss Drake, a missionary from India, tells the following story of one who by robbery and murder had made a good deal of money: "As he grew old he thought he must do something to prepare for death. He consulted an aged Brahmin, and was told he should pay a quantity of money to some shrine. He did so, but felt no peace. He asked again, 'What shall I do?' and was advised to go to some holy tank and drink the water (green, stagnant, and filthy). He did it, but found no relief in his mind. Again he consulted the Brahmin, and was advised to walk so many hundred miles on sharp iron points. This done he was no better than before. Once more he went to the Brahmin, and was told to wear an iron cage on his head, so fixed as never to be removed, and simply with a hole to admit food. This he did, and bore it for about a year. Then he visited a village where a missionary was preaching, and he listened, thinking it was some other god of whom he had never heard. After the service he questioned the missionary, and told him that he was such a sinner and could get no peace.

"The missionary explained the way of life, and told him that 'the blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, cleanseth from all sin.' The Thug had heard of men giving their blood for their gods, but never of God giving His blood for men. He eagerly inquired if this blood would cleanse from the sin of murder. 'Yes,' he was told, 'it will.' 'But will it of two murders?' 'Yes.' And again the text was repeated. Fearing to disclose the dread amount of his sins, yet eager for this salvation, he gradually mounted higher and higher. 'Will it cleanse from the sin of five, ten, fifteen,' and at last he cried, 'of fifty murders?' 'Yes,' he was assured, 'it will.' He dropped down, and then and there, with true repentance and faith, yielded himself to God, and found that peace and pardon he had so long vainly sought. His iron cage was thrown aside, and he went, like a flame of fire, preaching from village to village the story of salvation through Christ."

Stockwell Girls' Orphanage.—On October 1st, in the afternoon, about three thousand persons assembled in the large play-hall of Mr. Spurgeon's Boys' Ophanage, Stockwell, to take part in proceedings connected with a new girls' orphanage, which will comprise ten houses, to be built on the extensive grounds known as The Hawthorns, and which is only separated now by a small meadow from the boys' institution. The whole sum for the purchase of The Hawthorns (4000*l.*) has been subscribed, and there now only remains to be contributed a further amount of 1300*l.* so as to enable the trustees to acquire the piece of meadow already alluded to. The foundation-stone of the girls' orphanage will be laid in the spring, but in the mean time children are to be admitted temporarily to the house just acquired. When the orphanage is complete it will contain 250 girls, all of whom will be taught to be domestic servants, a commodity at the present day as scarce as good mistresses. In the evening a large meeting was held in the grounds, which were brilliantly illuminated. During the afternoon and evening the total number of persons present was nearly ten thousand.

An Eastern Philosopher made a Large Mirror, in a beautiful frame, and hung it up in his parlor. A dog went before it, and ruffled up his hair, growled and showed his teeth. The cat came in and immediately went and looked behind to find the other cat. A simpleton came in, and seeing the mirror, began to congratulate the artist on his good luck. "What a happy accident!" said he. "Now you can see how you look; and can shave without cutting your face." "Friend," said the artist, "it was not an accident. It was to see my face in it that I made it." The mirror is material creation that reflects its Maker. The simpleton is he who thinks it became what it is accidentally.

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE.

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

A Thrilling Story by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from p. 823.)

Arthur Lemaire brings News of Percival's Position to his Friend Alick—Alick uses strong Language concerning the Informer—He discovers Mickey Haley's Treachery—Rowley Quinn travels in a Steam Coach for the first Time—Rowley and Alick visit Jimmy Mehaffy in Prison, in Dublin—Jemmy has a Gentleman's Life in Gaol—His Ingenuity called forth to beguile his Solitude—The Lesson of Jemmy's Experience—He devotes his Attention to Music—He attracts the Warder's Notice.

the floors and walls of granite, dimly lighted by a small window far above his head, which was well secured by strong stanchion bars of iron. Percival threw a rapid glance around the cold, bare dungeon, and not until then did his imagination fully take in his change of circumstances.

"A PRISONER!" thought Percival. "Am I really so, or is it all only an unpleasant dream—a vision of the night?" Was this solitary cell, chill, silent, and desolate, a mere phantom of the mind, or was he in truth a lonely prisoner? Was he no longer at liberty, as he had been from childhood, to go and come as he pleased, and pass into the open air, and enjoy the freshness and beauty of God's world, but was his person in the inexorable hold of others?—these narrow stone walls the limit of his freedom, and the low arched roof of his cell the substitute forced upon him for the azure and spangled vault of heaven? Was he severed as one dead from his home and the companionship of those he loved, and, above all, deprived of the presence of one dearer than life?—and had he instead only this utter isolation, where his heart had no fellowship but with its own burning thoughts and outraged feelings?—for he had been flung into this gaol under some gross mistake, or in the belief of some malignant falsehood.

He sank upon his rude prison pallet, and, in an overpowering sense of the heinous wrong done him, felt for some moments as though his heart would break; but, soon recovering his manhood, he sprang to his feet, saying, "Hold! is this my fortitude?—this my submission to what, for some wise purpose, Heaven has allowed? It is true I am in this dungeon under some unrighteous plea; but am I the first that has thus wrongfully suffered? No, nor the first after ten times ten thousand. O Saviour Divine," he added, raising his eyes upward, "Thy whole life on earth was an experience of suffering wrongfully, and Thou didst not resent Thy lot nor revile Thy injurers. Give me, Thou holy and gentle Saviour Jesus, something of Thy meek patience and long-suffering. Resting on Thy sympathy and love, may I have strength to bear this evil, and in Thy own good time may I come forth from the furnace of trial disciplined for Thy service, and purified. I know I am sinful and unworthy, but then, Lord, however undeserving I may have been as regards Thee—and I acknowledge my guilt—Thou knowest, Saviour Divine, I have given no cause of offence to my country or her laws that this heavy cloud which now so oppresses should pass over me. O Lord, Head over all, Thou art the vindicator of the injured and the oppressed. Bring forth, then, my righteousness as the light, and my judgment as the noonday."

What would the greatly wronged and falsely accused do in this world of mistake and injustice if there were no Divine ruler to appeal to, if the universe had no God, and that all above and around us were cold fate and iron destiny? Atheism may do, perhaps, in times of ease and quietness, though we hardly think it, but it would appal and crush the heart in times of oppression and trouble. He who under any pretence seeks to deprive mankind of their faith in a prayer-hearing God, and would teach men that this poor jangled world, with its burden of sorrow and woe, has no divine purpose in it, deserves not only the ridicule but the hatred of mankind; and were it possible for Atheism to become rampant for a season, we believe, with a modern writer, that soon, unable to endure it, "mankind would rise in their godlike might and tear its flimsy arguments to tatters, and sweep it like a hideous nightmare from the earth."

Percival, at all events, without a living trust in God, would have had but a forlorn and wretched time of it in his lonely cell. He would, we doubt not, have resisted as a fiery dart of Satan any suggestion to unbelief; but sustained by faith, though for a moment his heart had sunk within him as overcome by human wrong, he soon recovered his equanimity when he took his cause to Christ and poured his tale of sorrow into the ear of his Father in heaven. After all he felt he was not alone; there was one with a heart of infinite love near him—aye, more near than the dearest on earth could be; not a whisper of his burdened spirit would be lost, not a sigh, though unnoticed by his fellows, would pass unpitied. In prayer he could speak as to a present friend, and sweet repose would come in the experience of a love untold, and a "peace that passeth understanding."

Not only was this Percival's reflection, it was his deeply felt experience; so that, calmed and tranquillized and even blessed, he passed his first night in gaol in long and refreshing slumber, and that upon the not too comfortable bed of his narrow cell.

We must now return for a little to Lucie Lemaire, whom we left standing on the pathway of the road when she parted from Percival, and who, we remember, kept gazing after him, even after his form had disappeared. "O Percival!" she said, "my Percival! may God keep you and comfort you; into His hands in Christ's name I commit thy righteous cause, and I know He can and will deliver thee. But then," she added, still speaking to herself, "I have something to do in this matter—Percival's injunctions must be executed."

Turning her back upon the path her lover had taken, she hastened back to the house of her father.

"Arthur," she said, as soon as she saw her brother, "Arthur, I am so glad you are at home; I have a request from Percival to you. He asks you to tell Alick Gogharty what has happened."

It is said that as a rule brothers do not take a very absorbing interest in those who pay what goes by the name of "special attentions" to their sisters, and it may be that this partly accounts for the somewhat cool manner in which Arthur received his sister's eager intimation. It is true Percival was more than a wooer of Lucy Lemaire—was engaged to her; but in addition to the general declared indifference of young men to those who would be their brothers-in-law, another thing operated to make Arthur careless of Lucie's request.

During her absence Mr. Lemaire had poured into his son's ears what he had read in Mickey Haley's sworn deposition, and had told him how those special charges were confirmed by detective Fox's additional statements. Arthur Lemaire, of a proud spirit, had, as a matter of course, a sensitive regard for the honor and reputation of his father's family; and believing there must be, at all events, some foundation for the charges made against Percival, he felt some considerable umbrage that the fair fame of the Lemaires should be compromised by its connection in any way with a denounced disloyalist and rebel.

"Upon my word," said he to his father, "I don't like the look of this business at all—not a bit. That fellow Percival's escapade will make it not at all pleasant for us, and it is most unfortunate that my sister Lucie has had any thing to do with him. It is true there are several nice things about Percival—I don't deny that—and not the least that he will be soon famously rich; and yet, again, there were some of his ways and doings and sayings that, for my part, I could never altogether comprehend. One thin never could understand, his love for those dre ful Confederate songs—the poetry and musi which I admit were fair enough—that he used often to get Lucie to play and sing, nor his ad cacy of what he called the rights of Irish tena The whole mystery of this is now, howe quite plain. His heart all through was w John Mitchell and his wicked faction, and h no person to be so familiar as he has been w the Lemaires.

"Where's Lucie, father? I must see h and insist upon her breaking off from this forth all connection with this, to say the le most politically mistaken and imprudent fell It would never do, father, for you, a Ca official, to seem to sanction any connection w him, and we must, as a family, completely promptly break from him."

He was told by Mr. Lemaire that Lucie gone out he knew not whither, but he stron suspected that it was to seek an interview w Percival Montaigne. "Indeed," he said, remember she told me she would warn him the warrant out for his arrest."

Arthur Lemaire, leaving the room in s dudgeon at Lucie's conduct in clinging to cival, had been waiting impatiently for his ter's return home, that he might impose u her, with a brother's high authority in suc case, his stern request—almost his comma to have no more to do with Percival. He therefore, in no very amiable condition of m when Lucie, laying hold of his arm, eag communicated to him the request of which was the bearer.

"When did Mr. Montaigne give you message?" asked Arthur, rather haugh "Why didn't he come with it himself? Ah knew a trick worth two of that, Lucie! H you, like a silly girl, been to him to give the hint—I mean, securing for him a good s of the police? It was wrong of you; it was deed, Lucie. Your duty rather was to help authorities to seize him. Loyal Irishwo you know, dear girl, should not give aid or c fort to rebels."

Lucie at these words threw from her hold brother's arm, and drew back from him, the of anger flashing in her eyes.

"Arthur!" she cried, "Arthur! this you!—lying charges against Percival from —cruel defamation of the innocent and from you!—belief of perjured falsehood you! I could not have believed it, and your desertion of Percival fills me, Arthur, shame and anger."

"But, Lucie," said Arthur, persuasively his sister's protest had somewhat subdued "if Mr. Montaigne be so innocent as you to make me believe, why has he beaten a retreat, and at your intelligence made off himself? Innocent men don't act, my dear in that way. This cowardly flight is as goo a confession of his guilt."

Lucie at this speech saw how completely had been Percival's resolve to deliver hi up to the authorities, and she experienced s remorse at a little secret displeasure she had that Percival would not fly as she had entre him. But, putting aside every feeling of kind for the present, she employed with po ful effect the arguments which her brot erroneous supposition had furnished her.

"Who told you, Arthur," she asked, s fully, "that Percival had fled, and refuse meet face to face his accusers? Who told I repeat, that he has absconded? Nothing prompted the idea, Arthur, but your own worthy estimate and alse judgment of whose nobility of character, permit me to you have not had the discrimination or ciousness to perceive. I can tell you, Ar you are altogether and miserably mistaken that you are only the victim of your own sh ful delusions!" and there was a ring of tumely and scorn in her words that made A quail. "I can inform you that Percival ha sought safety in flight; that Percival di grew pale with alarm, did not play the coward, as, perhaps, sir, you would, when I told him of the pursuers after him! No, he did not hesitate in his resolve for a single moment; he has gone to meet his false accusers that you tell me be as shunned, and, like the brave, innocent man that he is—which makes me more than I can tell you proud of him—he has gone to fling back into their faces the infamous charges of his enemies.

"I therefore call upon you, Arthur," she added, to retract every base insinuation that you have levelled at my Percival. Your own reasoning, Arthur, should, in decency and honor, compel you to this, for, according to your own argument, if flight would prove guilt, the bold and prompt surrender which Percival has made should be a demonstration even to you of his entire innocence. But, Arthur, I have no time now for further controversy. Will you carry to Mr. Alick Gogharty or not the words of Percival? It would be but a small compensation for the wrong which, in your own unworthy thoughts, you have done him. Will you, Arthur, start for Trinity, and at once? for if not, I will bear the message myself. College rooms, I know, are no place for a young lady to visit; but risking, for the sake of him I love, a little unamiable talk, perhaps, from busy and censorious tongues, if you, my brother, will not be the bearer of this message, I will deliver to Mr. Gogharty what Percival has told me."

Arthur Lemaire was considerably shaken by his sister's remonstrances, and his hasty verdict of Percival's guilt began to work in him some remorse. He felt, too, that by his erroneous idea of Percival's flight, and his remarks upon it, he had committed himself, and his sister's reasoning, therefore, was an argumentum ad hominem which it was impossible for him effectually to parry.

He saw, however, that if he would not take the message to Alick Gogharty his sister was resolved to be herself the bearer, and he felt with her that there would be something unseemly in such an act—something to offend Mrs. Grundy's sense of propriety and set unnumbered tongues at work; so, with a show of conferring a great favor, he agreed to do what Lucie had asked him.

(To be continued.)

HELP FOR WORKERS.

An Address to the Students and Faculty of Brooklyn Lay College, delivered Oct. 13th, 1879, by Rev. James A. Spurgeon.

A Useful Exercise—Thinking on the Legs—The Pastor's College—The Way to treat Doubters—Benefit of Thinking for Themselves—The Uses of the Class Room—The Pulpit not the Place for Discussion—Sowing Thistle Seed—Two Grand Objects—A Hatful of Eyes Spoiled—An Anxious Time—Good Workshops Necessary for Good Work.

I FIND myself in a predicament which reminds me of what I have often seen in our Lay College at the Tabernacle in London. We have there an exercise for the students which is by no means the least interesting and even amusing of the departments of work; it is that of speaking not only extemporaneously, but without premeditation.

The students assemble in the lecture-room, knowing that each one must deliver an address, but not knowing on what subject the address will be. At the opening of the proceedings a subject is announced; sometimes it is of a theological character, sometimes with a social or even a political bearing. But whatever the subject be, every student is expected to rise in his turn and express his views upon it. As no time is allowed for preparation, there is often considerable embarrassment, and not a little blundering, especially among those new to the exercise.

The blundering, however, receives very kindly treatment, and the exercise is altogether of great advantage. It teaches the young men how to do their thinking on their legs. We never lose sight, and we never allow them to lose sight, of the fact that to preach good and useful sermons it is necessary to spend much time in preparation. But we also desire that they should be able if an unexpected opportunity occurs for them to say any thing for the Lord, that they may be able to say it without preparation, and to say it effectively.

I have during the past few days had little time for preparation, scarcely any time even for thinking, so that now beyond wishing you very heartily God-speed in your work, I am in very much the same predicament as some young men I have seen standing up in our college class, with scarcely a word to say.

THE PASTOR'S COLLEGE.

You will, however, I am sure, be glad to learn what we are doing in London in the same department as you are doing here. We have in our college 110 students, entirely sustained by the College, and preparing for the work of the Lord. We have about 300 more who devote themselves to general literary training and instruction, and fitting themselves for religious work as teachers in Sunday-schools and other Christian labors. These students are engaged in secular occupations, and have consecrated themselves in evenings and other odd hours to special Christian work.

The training of the Lay College puts better weapons into the hands of young men. The man who comes to his training with dull and clumsy implements will soon become disgusted with his tools, but he should be trained to use them well until he is able to use more effective ones. Then he comes out altogether a better man, better fitted for his work, and able to do double the quantity he was doing before.

Most men too can do a better work if you can show them a better way of doing it. Young men will think—and I hope all American young men do think—young men will think themselves into a fog, into a snarl, and then because they see no way of escape they are apt to think there is no way. Young men of that stamp do not stand in need of scolding or harsh treatment of any kind. I have seen young men in this condition driven into scepticism and infidelity by lecturing and scolding. They want some one who will take them by the hand and say, "I can sympathize with you; I know that doubt; I have had it, and I fought with it, and I can tell you how I conquered it. There is nothing in it."

Young men who are the subject of discipline of this nature, who are the prey of doubts, often turn out the best men afterwards. I dislike that sort of young man who says, "Yes, yes, I am of your opinion." I like to hear a man say, "I do not see with you there; I am not clear about that; I should like to hear your reasons for your opinion." I have some hopes of a young man who thinks things out for himself. The young man who has been through a discipline of severe mental struggle is a better man than if he had not gone through it.

Then of course there are always rising up certain questions of the day which will be discussed, whatever hesitation there may be in many quarters about discussing them. Now the class-room of a college like this, is the very place for those discussions. There they can be ventilated, looked at in the face fearlessly, and set at rest. Do not fear that the faith is going to be thrown down by bubbles of that sort. These things become dangerous only as they are feared and as discussion of them is repressed and free thought stiffed.

At the same time I think the pulpit is not the place for such discussion. I believe much evil has been done by bringing difficult and abstruse questions into the pulpit and discussing them briefly and partially before a mixed congregation. It is like sowing thistle seed for the purpose of showing how well you can cut off thistle heads. In doing this you may be doing Satan's work instead of your Master's.

Those most likely to be affected by these questions are your young men. They move about in the world, and meet sceptical men who bring their doubts before them; it is therefore wise that they should be prepared by previous consideration and discussion to deal with them intelligently and faithfully. A discussion in the class-room reveals the weak places in an objection, and gives a knowledge of its bearings which could not be easily obtained in any other way. I think that is one of the objects of this college as it is of the Pastor's College.

But the objects are not detective and preventive only: a part of the design is to increase the number of workers, and to increase their capacity for work. I remember hearing of a celebrated oculist who was complimented on the skill with which he performed a difficult operation. He said, "Yes, I do it well now, but I remember I spoiled a whole hatful of eyes before I learned how to do it." Many a congregation has been spoiled by having experiments tried upon it which should have been performed in private and out of sight.

Another object of the Lay College is to reveal to the young men their latent abilities, and to develop those abilities. This is a grand work for any band of men to undertake. I hesitate to say any thing in this country about education. Your system is far in advance of ours, and your public schools are vastly superior to ours. But in this particular line it is possible we may be in advance of you. We have carried on our pastor's college for twenty years, and it has become a grand success.

We have found no difficulty in securing young men as students, and of late years we have had no difficulty in obtaining the necessary funds. I remember the time when we had often to call the students together for prayer and not for study. We had to say to them, "The funds in hand are only sufficient for a few days, and we must pray for them to be replenished." Well, the needed help always came, and lately there has never been a time when the funds were so low as to cause anxiety. But we do not forget the time when money was a pressing question with us.

I understand you are sometimes in a similar condition. I am surprised at that. I thought that whatever was lacking in America it was not money. Everybody here seems so prosperous, and there seems such an abundance of money, that there ought to be no difficulty in placing the Brooklyn Lay College on a successful and permanent basis. I heartily hope that you may be able to secure your new building and to proceed successfully with your work.

But for success in this and any work it is essential that you have fit appliances. I am very fond of flowers, and I know if I am to have them I must give my gardener flower-pots. I may give him seeds, and I may give him soil, but if I do not give him flower-pots I shall not have the flowers. He must have the necessary appliances. I notice that in your houses you have all the newest improvements and contrivances for saving work. Now in the old country we are content to do the ordinary work of our homes in the same way as it was done a hundred years ago, but you positively revel in your wealth of invention for increasing comfort and saving labor. Now it should not be said that while your homes are models in this respect, the Lord's house is neglected. Our friends here would no doubt go on with their work anywhere, even if they did it in a cellar. But it would not be good work. The churches want good work, and if you are to supply it, you must have a good workshop. Well, I hope you will get your good workshop, and the best appliances for the Lord's work here. They cannot be too good in this case, and I have no doubt you say sometimes as I do, "The best is good enough for me." May you succeed in the noble enterprise in which you are engaged, and may the hand of the Lord be manifested in carrying on the work to the glory of His name!

A work by one of the professors of the college was then presented to Mr. Spurgeon by Dr. Ingersoll, and Dr. Lord, on behalf of a number of ladies, presented him with a handsome bouquet of flowers.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

The subscription-price is $1.50, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, October 15th, at 4.50 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Elections in Ohio have Issued in a Decisive Republican victory. So far as has been ascertained, Mr. Foster, the Republican candidate for Governor, appears to have been elected by a majority of about twenty thousand votes. Democrats are astonished at the result, and even Republicans are surprised at the large total of the vote. This is an unequivocal answer to the questions at issue between the two parties so far as Ohio is concerned. The defeated candidate was a popular man, whose war record recommended him to the electors in that State, and his general personal character rendered him a more acceptable candidate than his victorious rival. The elements, therefore, which have gone to make up the result must be sought for elsewhere than in the two contestants themselves, and it is clear that those elements are to be found in the principles of which the men were the local representatives. The Republican party appears to be thoroughly organized in Ohio, and if that State is in any way representative, Democrats must make up their minds that they will obtain little support from bolters in the forthcoming elections. If any advantages are to be snatched from the Republican party, it will be necessary in the Democratic conventions to select men of unimpeachable record, universally acceptable to every branch of the party, and to rely entirely on internal support, and not balancing Democratic losses against possible gains from disaffected branches of the opposite forces.

The Indian Problem.—At the Episcopal Missionary Conference, October 17th, the solution of the Indian problem was the theme of several very severe criticisms on the United States Government. The Rev. Dr. Samuel H. Giesy, of Connecticut, took the ground that the idea of making a treaty with races within the jurisdiction of the United States was simply absurd. He thought something might be learned from the success of the British Government in the treatment of alien races, and a great deal from its mistakes, which had been many, and sometimes disastrous. First of all, it was necessary to disregard the community system among the Indians and to cease treating with them as powers. Each individual must be made to understand his responsibility to the laws as an individual. He must learn that if he committed murder he would be punished just as the white man is punished—tried by the same laws, sentenced in the same manner, and hanged upon the same gibbet. The speaker argued against the reservation system. Instead of this, he would give each Indian a definite tract of land in fee-simple, but held in such a manner that it could not be alienated except by written permission from the Department of the Interior. This would prevent dishonest whites from taking advantage of his credulity, his vices, or his necessities, and secure him also from the tyranny of the tribal authority, which could sell him out at any time, no matter what improvements he made, and leave him without remedy or redress. Above all, the idea that the Indian race was fast vanishing from the face of the earth must be abandoned. So far from true was this, that during the last fifteen years the Indian tribes had rapidly increased in numbers. Fate was not solving the problem of their treatment by extinguishing them; on the contrary, the problem of their permanence had to be met, and honestly met. Dr. Giesy animadverted with severity upon the bad faith of the Government in its treatment of the Indians.

Bishop Whipple said, the one cause of wars and bloodshed had been the bad faith of the United States in disregarding treaties, and compacts solemnly entered into. He imagined that the Indian problem had at last beome a serious one, and that the country was on the eve of its solution. The Government was, he thought, about tired of spending millions of money and sacrificing the lives of four whites for every Indian exterminated, that being about the ratio during the last fifteen years.

A New Danger to the Well-being of the community is attaining ominous proportions. As if the intoxicating drinks already in use were not more than sufficiently varied, the French liquor called absinthe has been imported and is extensively used. A good many deaths in different parts of the country already are directly traceable to the use of absinthe. The New York Times describing its effects says: "It is much more perilous, as well as more deleterious, than any ordinary kind of liquor. Its encroachments are scarcely perceptible. A regular absinthe drinker seldom perceives that he is dominated by its baleful influence until it is too late. All of a sudden he breaks down; his nervous system is destroyed; his brain is inoperative; his will is paralyzed; he is a mere wreck; there is no hope of his recovery. Victims of intemperance of the common sort frequently reform, but the absinthe drinker, after he has gone to a certain length, very rarely does or can throw off the fatal fascination. The more intellectual a man is, the more readily the habit fastens itself upon him." Only a few years since, absinthe could not easily be got in this country, save in big cities; now it can be had almost everywhere, and it is called for with alarming frequency.

A Terrible Voyage is Reported by the Montana, a steamer of the Guion line, which arrived at New York from England last week. The worst day of the voyage was Saturday, October 11, on which day two lives were lost, those of a passenger and a sailor, who were swept overboard and drowned. The scene is thus described by a passenger:

"The wind had shifted to the north-east and was blowing a hurricane. The sea was running mountains high and the wind was blowing with terrific force. The captain had been obliged to put the ship before the wind as a measure of safety. She was fairly flying over the waves, but seemed to ride beautifully and safely over them. I managed to get up on the bridge with the second officer, and while holding on for dear life I could not but wonder at the terrible fury of the storm. One moment the ship would be lifted up by a gigantic wave, and the next we would drop down into the trough of the sea, imprisoned by walls of water on all sides. Every few moments a terrific wave would strike us with a shock that made the vessel tremble from stem to stern.

"After running before the gale for some time and finding it increase, the captain decided upon going about and heaving to. In a few words he warned the sailors to look out for their lives. He ordered the engines stopped, and then caused the wheel to be put hard down. Then the engines were started slowly, and to turn the ship about was to go directly in the teeth of the g
As the seas struck us, the great ship's course changed, and as she wore around she caree over so that her beam-ends were under. T tell me that even the captain held his breat the ship went through the trough of the
The position at this critical interval was as d gerous as it could be, and had a heavy sea str us at this time we would probably have gone destruction. At this time I and three ct were in the smoking-room, and we though was all over.

"In the saloon a terrible scene was tak place. Panic-stricken passengers were cry and screaming, and ladies were fainting.
make matters worse, a sea was shipped into engine-room, which sent a puff of steam into saloons with a hissing sound. This caused alarm of fire, and for a short time there was rible excitement. Heavy seas continued to b over us, and at a quarter past one a gigantic w washed away a large lifeboat, crushing it in thousand pieces. Later on, others were d aged, until only one seaworthy boat was left.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Latest Sun morning sermons are regularly published in journal, but owing to the delay caused by storm the advance sheets of the sermon preac October 5th, did not arrive in time for publica in this number, we are therefore obliged to part from our custom, and we insert an inter ing and practical sermon delivered by him at week-evening service at the Tabernacle.

A Valuable Institution is the St. Ma
Lodging-house, for the sheltering of girls w seeking employment, and also aiding them their search. It is in want of more bedd
This is one of those useful agencies of the ventive order which are doing a good work the city. Girls arrive here without a home without friends. They do not know wher go, and have vague ideas of the best way prosecuting their search for employment. W aimlessly wandering about the streets they come the prey of vicious men and of women entice them into haunts of vice and ruin th forever. It is impossible to exaggerate the portance of any agency that averts that calan from the girls themselves and from the com nity. There are thirty-five inmates in the lo ing-house now, and the applications outnum the accommodations every day. An opportu is here afforded to the charitable to exer their charity in a worthy way, and the mana will be thankful to receive gifts of that na from sympathizers.

Bishop Whittingham, of the Protest
Episcopal Church in Maryland, died Oct 17h. He was born in the city of New York, cember 2d, 1805. His father, an active busi man, was also a person of literary tastes, and mother was a woman of such unusual acqu ments, that at one time she gave lessons in He to a class of theological students. Young W tingham is said to have had no other instru until he became a student in the General T logical Seminary. In 1831, he became rect St. Luke's Church, in this city. Dr. Whitt ham was afterwards elected Bishop of M land. He was consecrated in September, 1 in St. Paul's Church, Baltimore. His p larity became great, and few bishops have more beloved and respected.

The Rev. George Muller has been Spendi week in Troy, N. Y., leaving last Saturday Albany. He preached every night, addres large audiences, and his sermons and talks been productive of a most healthful and h influence. Much interest was manifeste him, and many expressed a desire to see a who lives a life of trust.

The Ohio Liquor Dealers have Form
State organization, and propose to have a we newspaper to elevate liquor-selling. The c pation is so weighted with the curses of wi and orphans and the responsibility for ru homes, that the achievement of elevating it be regarded as an impossibility.

Mr. Moody's Opening Words at Cleveland, O., as reported by one who was present at his first meeting, at which over 5000 persons were present, were, "Christ is my theme. Nothing else. What is He to you, and you, and you? Don't be too liberal with the sermon. Some give it all away to Mr. A. or Mrs. B. Oh! take it home, brother, home, home, home! I've no time for ornament. Nothing is so important to you as his Christ. What is He to you? I will tell you what He is to me." Then for thirty-five minutes he spoke of Christ as the Saviour, the Deliverer, and the Way, while the vast congregation listened in rapt silence.

"Swamp Angels" is the name ironically iven to a gang of desperate outlaws who have ccupied an impenetrable swamp near Milledgeille, Ga., and who sally out by night committing robberies and murders with impunity. A reat dread of them has fallen upon the adjacent opulation, and a citizen says:

"I doubt if they can be rooted out. The wamp that stretches toward Wilkinson is about npenetrable. I don't think there has been a hite man in it, except these fellows, in twenty ears. Once in there, they can hold their own gainst a thousand men. It will be very hard to lentify them. They would kill a detective as ney would a dog, if they caught him, and they ould make it unsafe for even a suspected person. Their reign is so absolute over the people, hat they will not dare to tell any human being f their knowledge of the gang. They have enty of arms, money, and friends, and it will e fortunate if the detectives can kill them out a month. If they can ever be 'flushed' and n into the swamp the people of the surrounding counties will hunt them down as they would ild beasts." The Governor is resolved to capture the gang, but he thinks it will require a hole regiment of soldiers for the work, as the osition they occupy has so many strategic advantages as to be a natural fastness.

A Spiritualist was Exposed by a Baptist inister at North Adams, Mass., Oct. 13th. onsiderable grief has been caused to the Rev. . Osborn by many of the younger members his church at North Adams allying themselves with Spiritualists, attending their séances, d avowing themselves believers in their pretensions. After some debate in his own mind to the best means of resisting these attacks of tan on his flock, he decided that it was his ty to conquer his aversion to witnessing a ance, and he resolved to attend in person. aving done so, he was convinced that the anifestations were an imposition, which he determined to expose. Having secured the assistance of a friend, he paid a second visit to the exhibition, and upon a spirit being materialized in e darkened room, it was promptly seized and ld by the minister and his friend. Lights re brought, and the captured "spirit of a deceased Indian" turned out to be the disguised y of the medium herself, who loudly called her pistol that she might kill her captor. r pistol was not brought, but a warrant was; d Dr. Osborn has the satisfaction of knowing t Spiritualists are likely to avoid his locality the future, and that Satan has had his weap- wrested from his hands.

A Document Lost for Twenty Years has Recently been found after protracted litigation, which its production would have averted. A wealthy Maryland planter, who was a bachelor, died in the early part of 1859, and a search was made for the will, it was known he had made shortly before his death. As it could not be found, the property was claimed by his nephews a heirs-at-law. Another claim was made by a cousin of the deceased planter. Then began the greatest legal battle this country has seen, and w continued during many years. Appeal was made after appeal, and much money spent in la expenses. The will has just been discovered, and has been forwarded to one of the lawyers engaged in the case. It bequeaths all the property to the testator's cousin. The lawyer in whose hands the will was left went South during the war, leaving instructions with his office boy that if he did not return, the contents of his strong box should be forwarded to the persons to whom they were addressed. The lawyer fell in one of the battles before Richmond; but the boy forgot his commission, and the box remained unopened till a few days ago in an attic of his house..

How happy is the Christian in the fact that his title to "mansions in the skies" can never be lost, but remains safe, sealed with the blood of his Redeemer!

The Ownership of a Pair of Legs is the Subject of litigation in Illinois. Mr. Smith, a resident of McConnellsville, Ill., was two years ago accidentally shot in his legs so severely that both had to be amputated. He provided himself with a pair of cork substitutes, and gave himself no concern about his former limbs. But visiting the local museum of natural history subsequently, he was much annoyed to discover, preserved in alcohol, and properly labelled, his two discarded legs on public exhibition. He indignantly laid claim to them, and on being refused has brought an action for their recovery. The trustees contest the action, and allege that Mr. Smith has no valid title to them, because they were the perquisites of the doctor who amputated them, or if the doctor's claim is invalid, they are the property of the Accidental Insurance Company, who compensated Mr. Smith on them as a total loss. Much amusement is excited by the suit in local circles, and the trial will be watched with interest.

We can sympathize with Mr. Smith on his annoyance; but if he is a Christian man he may console himself with the thought that he will yet possess that spiritual body of which St. Paul writes (1 Cor. 15 : 43), which is sown in dishonor, but is raised in glory.

The Rev. James A. Spurgeon, Preaching at the First Baptist Church in New York on October 12th, made an appeal for help on behalf of Sunday-school work in the South. It elicited a very practical response. Volunteer subscriptions to the amount of over $1000 were pledged by individuals for scholars or classes to send a "Spurgeon Missionary" to the children of the freemen in the South, for whom Mr. Spurgeon pleaded so touchingly.

A Death in a Theatre Occurred at Baltimore, Md., October 14th. It was at the Front Street Theatre, in the last act of the play of Roving Jack, in which a discharge of musketry takes place. One of the muskets had been loaded with ball instead of blank cartridge, and when the discharge was made the ball struck a young medical student and wounded him fatally. The moral dangers of theatres are enough to cause people to avoid entering them; and now it appears physical perils are also to be dreaded.

What Rumsellers Fear.—The Rev. Joseph Cook, writing to a friend at Boston, says: "If there is any thing which rum-sellers fear more than the direct influence of women in determining temperance legislation, it is a combination of woman's influence with that of the pulpit."

A Dying Boston Girl's Vision is thus Narrated by a clergyman in that city: A few hours before she died she said to the one sitting by her bed, "I have seen my heavenly home. I have come back a little while." She could not tell, she said, all she saw, but it was beautiful. She saw "children, and flowers, and angels." "Did you not see Jesus?" inquired the lady. "He was right in among them," said the dying child. So death was shorn of all its terror to the young disciple, and dying to her was "going home."

A Curious Condition is Made in the Will of Dr. Julius Le Moyne, of Washington, Penn., which must be complied with by the legatees before they can receive the large sums bequeathed to them. They must in each case sign an agreement by which they undertake to be cremated after death. Dr. Le Moyne was an enthusiast on this subject, and his own body was turned into ashes by the devouring element, according to his injunctions. Only two of the legatees have so far signed the agreement.

AMONG LIONS.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"My soul is among lions."—PSALM 57 : 4.

Christians who Dwell among Angels—Others Dwell among Lions—They bear Reproach for Christ's Sake—The Drunkard's Wife—The Pious Child—The Godly Workman—Lions or Dogs—I. Comfort for Those who Dwell among Lions—1. They have Fellowship with Christ—With the Prophets and the Martyrs—2. They are Drawn Closer to God—An Irresistible Resistance—3. The Lions are Chained—4. Anothe Lion on Our Side—5. They come out Unharmed—6. After the Lions, Angels—II. Advice to Those among Lions—1. Do not Tease Them—2. Do not Roar Yourself—3. Do not be Cowardly—4. Do not Face them Alone—5. Pray to be Removed to Quieter Quarters—6. Try to Tame Them.

SOME of you cannot say this, and you ought to be very thankful that you are not obliged to do so. Happy are you young people who have godly parents, and who dwell in Christian families. You ought to grow like the flowers in a conservatory, where killing frosts and biting blasts are unknown. You live under very favorable circumstances. Your soul, I might almost say, is among angels; for you dwell where God is worshipped, where family prayer is not forgotten, where you can have a kindly guidance in the hour of difficulty and comfort in the time of trial. You dwell where angels come and go, and God Himself deigns to dwell. Happy young people to be thus circumstanced! How grateful and how holy you ought to be!

I want all who dwell where every thing helps them to recollect the many gracious ones who dwell where every thing hinders them. You who live near the Beautiful Gate of the temple must not forget the many who are sighing in the tents of Kedar. If your soul is not among lions praise God for it; and then let your sympathies go out towards those who mournfully complain—

"My soul with him that hateth peace
Hath long a dweller been;
I am for peace; but when I speak
For battle they are keen."

It is a Christian duty to "remember them that are in bonds as bound with them;" and whenever our own favored circumstances lead us to forget those who are persecuted and tried, our very mercies are working mischief to us. "We are all members one of another." If one member suffers, all the rest should suffer with him; and therefore, we will turn our thoughts towards our persecuted brethren to-night, that our united supplications may sustain them under their difficulties, and, if the Lord be so pleased, may even deliver them.

When may a Christian man truly say, "My soul is among lions"? Such is the case when, either from our being members of ungodly families, or from having to gain our livelihood amongst unconverted and graceless people, we are subjected to reproach and rebuke, and to jest and jeer for Jesus Christ's sake. Then we can say, "My soul is among lions."

Many in this congregation known to me are the only ones in their family whom God has called. I bless His name that He is often taking one of a household, and a lone one of a family, and bringing such to Jesus. Some quite unchristian person who thinks not of God drops in here out of curiosity, and God meets with him and he becomes the first of his kith and kin to say "I am the Lord's."

Frequently when converts come to cast in their lot with us they will say, "I do not know one in all my family who makes any profession of godliness: they are all of them opposed to me." In such a case the soul is among lions, and it is very hard and trying to be in such a position. Well may we pity a godly wife bound to an ungodly husband. Alas! full often a drunkard, whose opposition amounts to brutality. A tender, loving spirit, that ought to have been cherished like a tender flower, is bruised and trodden under foot, and made to suffer till the heart cries out in grief, "My soul is among lions." We little know what lifelong martyrdoms many pious women endure.

Children also have to bear the same when they are singled out by divine grace from depraved and wicked families. Only the other day there came under my notice one who loves the Lord. I thought that if she had been a daughter of mine I should have rejoiced beyond all things in her sweet and gentle piety, but the parent said, "You must leave our house if you attend such-and-such a place of worship. We do not believe in these things, and we cannot have you about us if you do." I saw the grief which that state of things was causing, and though I could not alter it I mourned over it. Woe unto those who tyrannize over my Lord's little ones.

Nobody knows what godly working-men have to put up with from those among whom they labor. There are some shops where there is religious liberty; but frequently the working-men of this city are great tyrants in matters of religion. I tell them that to their faces. If a man will drink with them, and swear with them, they will make him their companion; but when a man comes out to fear God they make it very hard for him.

And pray, sir, has not a man as much right to pray as you have to swear? And has he not as much right to believe in God as you have to disbelieve? It is a wonderfully free country, this! A wonderfully free country! If one serious man sets his face steadfastly to serve God, the baser sort seem as if they must get him under their feet, and treat him with every indignity that malice can devise. It may be all in sport, but the victim does not think so.

Do not tell me that persecution ceased when the last martyr burned. There are martyrs who have to burn by the slow fire of cruel mockings day after day; and I bless God that the old grit is still among us, and that the old spirit still survives, so that men defy sneers and slander and hold on their way. I could tell stories, which would both shock you and delight you, of what is said and done by the common order of English working-men against those who profess religion, and how courageously the righteous and the true bear it all, and, in the long-run, conquer too, and oftentimes win their mates to confess the selfsame faith.

They call us all cants and hypocrites, and the like, but they know better, and if they had a grain of manliness they would cease from such lying. A true Briton gives that liberty to others which he claims for himself, and if he does not choose to be religious himself he stands up like a man to defend the rights of others to be so if they choose. Now, then, ye British workmen, when shall we see you doing this?

The text speaks of a soul among lions. Why did the psalmist call them lions? "Dogs" is about as good a name as they deserve.

WHY CALL THEM LIONS?

Because at times the Christian man is exposed to enemies who are very strong—perhaps strong in the jaw—very strong in biting, rending, and tearing. Sometimes the Christian man is exposed to those who loudly roar out their infidelities and their blasphemies against Christ, and it is an awful thing to be among such lions as those.

The lion is not only strong, but cruel; and it is real cruelty which subjects well-meaning men to reproach and misrepresentation. The enemies of Christ and His people are often as cruel as lions, and would slay us if the law permitted them. The lion is a creature of great craftiness, creeping along stealthily, and then making a sudden spring; and so will the ungodly creep up to the Christian, and, if possible, spring upon him when they can catch him in an unguarded moment. If they fancy they spy a fault in him they come down upon him with all their weight!

The ungodly watch the righteous, and if they can catch them in their speech, or if they can make them angry, and cause them to speak an unguarded word, how eagerly they pounce upon him. They magnify his fault, put it under a microscope of ten thousand power, and make a great thing of it. "Report it! Report it!" they say, "so would we have it!" Any thing against a true-born child of God is a sweet nut for them. Such as are daily watched, daily carped at, daily abused, daily hindered in every thing that is good and gracious, go with their tears before the God they serve and cry to Him, "My soul is among lions."

Now, it is to such that I am going to speak to-night, a little at first by way of comfort, and then a little by way of advice.

I. First, by way of COMFORT.

You are among lions, my dear young friend; then—

1. You will have fellowship with your Lord and with His church. Every Lord's Day, and every time we meet, this benediction is pronounced upon you, that you may enjoy the fellowship of the Holy Ghost. Fellowship with the Holy Ghost brings you into fellowship with Jesus, and this involves your being conformed to His sufferings.

Now, your Lord was among lions. The men of His day had not a good word to say for Him. They called the Master of the house Beelzebub, they will never call you a worse name than that. They said that he was a drunken man and a winebibber; possibly they may say much the same as that of you, and it will be equally false. You need not be ashamed to be pelted with the same dirt that was thrown at your Master; and if it should ever come to this, that you should be stripped of every thing, and false witnesses should rise up against you, and you should even be condemned as a felon, and taken out to execution, still your lot will not be worse than His. Remember that you are the followers of a Crucified Lord, and cannot expect to be the world's darlings.

Nor was your Master alone. Recollect the long line of prophets that went before Christ. Which of them was it that was received with honor? Did they not stone one and slay another with the sword, cut one in pieces with a saw, put others to death with stones? Ye know that the march of the faithful may be tracked by their blood. And after our Lord had gone to heaven, how did the world treat the church? In the streets of Rome, and all large cities, the fierce cry was often heard, "Christians to the lions! Christians to the lions! Christians to the lions!"

At dead of night men cry "Fire!" when a house is blazing; or a mob will cry "Bread!" when they are starving; but the cry of old Rome that was dearest to the Roman heart, and most expressive of their horrible enmity to goodness, was "Christians to the lions!" Of all the gallant shows the Roman Empire ever saw, that which excited the populace beyond all things else was to see a family—a man and his wife, perhaps, and a grown-up daughter and son, and three or four children—all marched into the arena, and the big door thrown up, that out might rush the lion and spring upon them, and tear them to pieces.

You who have to suffer a measure of persecution for Christ's sake ought to be very glad of it, for you are counted worthy not only to be Christians, but to suffer for Christ's sake. Do not, I pray you, be unworthy of your high calling, but endure hardness as good soldiers of Jesus Christ. In these afflictions you are having fellowship with your head and with His mystical body, therefore be not ashamed.

2. Here is another thought. If you are among lions you should thereby be driven nearer to your God. When you had a great many friends you could rejoice in them; but now that these turn against you, and the truth has come home to you—"A man's foes shall be they of his own household"—what ought you to do? Why, get closer to God than ever you were before.

And, getting close to Christ, let me say to you now by way of advice, and by way of comfort too, endeavor to be very calm and happy. Do not mind it. Take as little notice of the scoff as ever you can. It is a grand thing to have one deaf ear. Mind that you keep yourself very deaf to slander and reproach, as the psalmist did when he said, "I was as a man that heareth not, and in whose mouth are no reproofs." One blind eye towards the folly of enemies is often of more use to a man than two that are always looking about with suspicion. Do not see every thing, do not hear every thing.

When there is a hard word spoken, do not notice it; or if you must hear it, forget it as quickly as ever you can. Love others all the more the less they love you: repay their enmity with love. Heap coals of fire upon them by making no return to a hard speech except by another deed of kindness. Very seldom defend yourself: it is a waste of breath, and casting pearls before swine. Bear and bear again.

Recollect that our Lord has sent us forth as sheep among wolves, and sheep cannot defend themselves. The wolf can eat all the sheep up if it likes; but, do you not see, there are more sheep in the world now than there are wolves, ten thousand to one? Though the wolves have had all the eating, and though there never yet was a sheep that devoured a wolf, yet still the sheep are here and the wolves have gone. The sheep have won that victory: and so will Christ's little flock.

The anvil is struck by the hammer, and the anvil never strikes in return, and yet the anvi wears the hammer out. Patience baffles fury anc vanquishes malice. The non-resistance principl involves a resistance which is irresistible. Th steady patience that cannot be provoked, bu which, like Jesus, when reviled reviles not again is certain of conquest. This is what you perse cuted ones need to learn—to get more near you God the more you are among the lions, and s to be the more calm and patient the more me rage against you.

3. A third piece of comfort is this. Please t recollect that, although your soul is amon lions,

THE LIONS ARE CHAINED.

When Daniel was thrown into the lions' den th lions were hungry and would soon have devour him; but you know why it was that they cou not touch him. Ah! the angel came. Just the fierce lions were about to seize on Dani down he came swift from heaven, and stood front of them. "Hush!" said he, and they l as still as a stone. So says the text: "My G hath sent His angel and shut the lions' mouths They had fine teeth, but their mouths were sh

The lions are chained, dear friend; they c go no farther than God permits. In this cou try the most they can do, as a rule, is to ho they cannot bite; and howling does not bre bones; why, then, be afraid? The man who afraid of being laughed at is not half a man, b almost deserves the scorn he receives. Ne mind what is said. Talking will not hurt y Harden your spirit against it, and bear it g lantly. Go and tell your Lord of it if your he fails you; and then go forward, calm as y Master was, fearing nothing, for God will b you through. The lions can roar, but they c not rend—fear them not.

4. Another fact for your comfort is th when your soul is among lions there is ano Lion there as well as the lions that you can Have you never heard of Him? He is the L of the tribe of Judah. How quietly He l How patiently He waits by the side of His s ants! The jest, the jeer, the noise conti and He lies still. If He only would—if thought it wise, if it were not for His superla patience—He has only to rouse Himself for moment, and all our enemies would be destro Fear not the lions then. Our Samson w turn upon them and rend them in a mome their hour were come.

5. Again, I want to comfort you with word: you whose souls are among lions sh recollect that you will come out of the lions unharmed. Daniel was cast into the Darius could not sleep that night, and whe went in the morning he did not expect to f

›ne of Daniel left, and so he began crying out · him. How surprised he must have been hen Daniel replied that his God had preserved m.· How thankful he was to fetch him out of e den. You, too, dear child of God, will come ıt of the den all right.

There will be a resurrection of God's people's ›dies at last, and there will be a resurrection for eir reputations also. The slanderer may belie e character of a true man, but no true man's aracter will ever be buried long enough to rot. ›ur righteousness shall come forth as light, ıd your judgment as the noonday. You need ›t be afraid but that, as Daniel rose from the :n to dignity, so will every man who suffers for ırist receive honor and glory and immortality in that day."

6. Recollect that if you are among the lions ›w, the day is hurrying on with speed when you all be among the angels. Our Lord and Master, after being in the wilderness with the wild :asts, found that "angels came and ministered Him." Such a visitation awaits all the faith- l. What a change those martyrs enjoyed who ok a fiery breakfast on earth, but supped with ırist that very day after riding to glory in a ariot of fire! If you have now to suffer all at can possibly be wreaked of vengeance upon ›u for Christ's sake, you will think nothing of when you have been five minutes in heaven. deed, it will be a subject of congratulation at ever you were permitted in your humble easure to be counted worthy to suffer for ırist's sake. Therefore, be ye comforted, you ›ung people, and march on with heroic step.

II. Now, a few words by way of ADVICE.

Of course this does not deal with all of you ıo are now present—I hope that many of you vell among the godly. Still there are some ıose soul is among lions, and to them I give is counsel.

First, if you dwell among lions do not irritate em. If I happened to be among lions I would t tease them: I would take good care that if ey were cruel and fierce I would not make em so. I have known some, who I hope were ıristians, who have acted very unwisely, and have made matters bad for themselves.

There is such a thing as ramming religion ›wn people's throats, or trying to do so; and ›u can put on a very long face, and try to scold ople into religion. This will not do. Never t was anybody bullied to Christ, and there :ver will be. Some are very stern, and make › allowances for other people: these may be ›od, but they are not wise. What is a rule to ›u and to me may not be a rule to everybody se.

We said the other Sunday that we should not ink of eating what we give to swine; but we › not, therefore, say, "These swine must not ıve their wash." No, no; it is good enough r them. Let them have it. And as to worldly ·ople and their amusements, let them have em, poor things. They have nothing else, let em have their mirth. I would not touch their ys, nor would you, for they would be no pleas- e to you; but do not, as a new-born man, go .d set yourself up as the standard of what the dinary sinner, dead in sin, is to be. He can- ›t come up to our standard.

Do not be perpetually finding fault: that is ulling the lions' whiskers, and the creatures are ry likely to growl at you. If your soul is nong lions, be gentle, be kind, be prudent, be nder. Sometimes be silent: a good word is ı your tongue, but there are times when you ust not say it: for the life of you, you must ›t say it, for it would rouse the lions and make ore sin than need be.

Put your finger on your lips when you are irri- ted. You cannot speak to the purpose when ›u are perturbed, and are likely to be angry. : quiet and bide your time. Many a man ›uld do more good for the cause of God if he ›uld not irritate ungodly people. Let them ›ne: seek their salvation lovingly and ten- rly; but when your efforts to do them good only provoke them to sin, try another way. Do not go on with that which angers them; invent another method. I do believe that some Christians make half the opposition which they get from the world by their own ill tempers and stupidity. They challenge conflict: their actions seem to say, "Who will fight me?" and then, of course, somebody takes up the cudgels. Do not act foolishly; but if your soul is among lions, and they are inclined to be quiet, do not needlessly excite them.

2. Secondly, if your soul is among lions, for that is very easy to be done. We have known some, who we hope were Christians, who have met railing with railing, hard words with hard words, bitter speeches with bitter speeches. The ungodly are lions, and you are not; do not try to meet them in their own line. You will never roar as well as they do. If you are a Christian man, you have not the knack of roaring. Leave them to do it. Your way of meeting them is not by losing your temper and abusing your antagonists, and so becoming a lion yourself; but you must conquer them with gentleness, patience, kindness, love.

DO NOT ROAR YOURSELF,

I pray you, dear brothers and sisters who have to bear a good deal for Christ's sake, do not get soured in spirit. There is a tendency in a martyr age to become obstinate and pugnacious. You must not be so. Love, love, love; and the more you are provoked, love the more. Overcome evil with good. I think it necessary to mention these cautions, because I know many require them.

3. Again, your soul is among lions: then,

DO NOT BE COWARDLY.

Have you never heard that a lion is afraid of a man if he looks him steadily in the face? I am not sure about that piece of natural history; but I am quite certain that it is true with regard to the ungodly world. If a man will bear himself calmly—if he will be unmoved, determined, resolute, steadfast—he will overcome the adversary. "When a man's ways please the Lord He maketh even his enemies to be at peace with him."

Courage is what is wanted. The world, after a while, says of any man, "It is of no use laughing at him; he does not mind it. It is of no use calling him hard names; he only smiles at you. It is useless to be his enemy, for he will not be yours. He will only be your friend." Then the world whispers, "Well, after all, he is not so bad a fellow as we thought he was; we must let him have his own way."

There is a big human heart somewhere down in men if you can but get at it, and after a while, when truth and righteousness have suffered, and been denounced, men turn round and are almost ready to carry on their shoulders with hosannas the self-same person whom a little while before they longed to crucify. Do not be a coward! Do not be a coward!

"Stand up! stand up for Jesus!
The fight will not be long;
This day the noise of battle,
The next the victor's song."

Even if the fight were long, for such a Master as Jesus it were worth while to endure ten thousand years of scorn, and moreover the reward at the end will repay us a thousandfold.

4. If your soul is among lions, then do not go out among them alone. "Then whom shall I take with me?" says one; "there is not a Christian in the shop."

TAKE YOUR LORD WITH YOU.

Be sure that you do that. Now, my dear friend, I know what they said yesterday, and how they bantered you; and you were tart and short with them, because you had not been in prayer in the morning as you ought to have been. If your mind had been more calm and gentle as the result of prayer you would not have minded it one half so much. Take your Master with you, and whenever you have to speak think that He is standing at your side, and try to say what you would like Him to hear; and then, when you have made your defence you will be able to say, "Good Master, I think I have not dishonored Thee, for I have spoken Thy words." Oh! live near to Christ if you live among lions.

Those of you who endure opposition make the best Christians. Many that have been distinguished for Christ in after-life have had to rough it a little at first. "It is good for a man that he bear the yoke in his youth." If I could bring a garden-roller and roll the grass for you all the way from here to heaven do you think that I would do it? Certainly not. A rough place or two is good for you: it tries and strengthens pilgrim feet. A child will never become a man if he is carried about all his life like a baby. You must run alone. You must learn the arts of holy warfare, or else you will not be fit to be a soldier of the cross, a follower of the Lamb. May His good Spirit help you to keep in fellowship with Christ, that He may guard and protect you from every temptation and persecution.

5. Further, let me say to you that if your soul is among lions, and you feel very weak about it, you are permitted to pray the Lord to move you in His providence to quieter quarters. A Christian man is not bound to endure persecution if he can help it: "When they persecute you in one city flee to another." You are quite warranted in seeking another situation. There may be reasons why you should remain under the trial, and if so, take care that you do not overlook them. Prudence may make you avoid persecution, but cowardice must not mingle with the prudence. That prayer which says, "Lead us not into temptation," gives us, as it were, a permit to remove from places where we are much tempted; and sometimes it is the duty of the Christian to seek some other sphere of labor, if he possibly can, where he will not be so much tried.

6. One thought more:

THE BRAVER THING

is to ask for grace to stop with the lions and tame them. "My soul is among lions." Well, if the Lord makes you a lion-tamer, that is the very place where you ought to be. In some of our districts in London as soon as ever a man is converted he feels that he cannot live there any longer, and this makes the district hopeless. My dear friend, Mr. Orsman, working in Golden Lane, as it used to be, told me that his was an endless task, because as soon as ever the people were converted they say, "Would you have me live here any longer, in such a horrible place as this?" They naturally feel that as they have grown sober, and decent, and respectable, they should move into a different locality, and they do so: but the result is that the old spot does not improve.

Sometimes the Christian man should say, "No: God has made me strong in grace; and I will stop here, and fight it out. These are lions, but I will tame them. I believe that God has put me here on purpose to bring my fellow-workmen to the Saviour, and by His grace I will do it."

So stop where you are, my stronger brothers and sisters; if your souls are among lions, tarry and tame the lions. It will be a grand thing for you to come one day to the church-meeting with two or three of your neighbors whom you have been the means of converting to Christ. I like to see a man march, if he can do it, with a tame lion on each side. When a man has by God's grace brought some of those that were drunkards and swearers to the feet of Jesus, oh! it is a grand triumph.

It has been my business for many years to be a lion-tamer, and I delight in it. If there is any lion of the sort here, I wish the Master would tame him, and make him lie down and crouch at his feet. There is the place for us poor sinners, at the feet of Christ. But do not be afraid of sinners, dear friends, for how can you tame them if you tremble at them? Go forth to win them in the strength of the living God, and you shall yet see the lion lie down with the lamb, and a little child shall lead them. Amen and amen.

A NAVAL OFFICER'S SAD CAREER.

From the Narrative of a Clergyman.

Retires from the Navy with $3000 a Year—Marries an Immoral Girl—Commutes His Pension and Spends the Proceeds—His Wife declines Joining Him in the Pledge—He Dies, and She Loses Her All, in the Public-house Business.

Some years ago, when I was conducting the service at a certain military chapel, a gentlemanly-looking man came to the service, who was the son of a colonel in the Indian Artillery, who died at the siege of Mooltan. His father before him was a drunkard, and, like an hereditary disease, the love of drink had descended from the father to the son. He had served as an officer in the Indian Navy for several years, but after the Indian Mutiny the Indian Navy was broken up, and the officers were pensioned off, and he came back to this country with a pension of 283*l.* a year; and being a very clever accountant, and getting a good discharge from the service, he obtained a situation in an Indian house in the city, with a salary of 300*l.* per annum. So this young man started with about 600*l.* a year without encumbrance.

Yet he had an encumbrance, for he had brought back with him from India his evil habits, and so within a few months he lost his situation through irregularity. He married a girl whom he met in the Argyll Dancing Rooms,* and it was shortly after that I came in contact with him. The man was under powerful religious impressions, and was very anxious about his wife, who had never learned to care for any of these things. He asked me to see her, and I found her as self-willed and undisciplined in every respect as you can well imagine, but nevertheless she loved her husband. I impressed upon her how important it was, as she valued his love, to try and sympathize with him in his religious feelings. She made a mighty effort. She cast away from her those evil habits that had clouded her life, and for months in that household it seemed like heaven upon earth.

He was a most regular attendant at the ten minutes' prayer-meeting I always had at eight o'clock in the morning for soldiers. Gradually husband and wife were getting very comfortable, and they gathered about them the nicest of furniture. But in an evil hour one of his old associates in India visited him in Plumstead and persuaded him to commute his pension—that is, to give up the yearly payment for a certain sum down. He received 1100*l.* ($5300). The possession of all this money was too much for him. He left Woolwich for London, and went back into his old habits of dissipation. He led such a life that in less than a year he had got through the 1100*l.* He nearly killed his wife in a fit of drunkenness, and then came back to Woolwich, broken down in character and constitution. I went to him. I spoke to his wife, and we three knelt down and prayed, and I got him to take the pledge. I entreated his wife to join him, but she would not, saying that she had never been a drunkard, and she would not take the pledge. However, he held out manfully for several months, but he had terrible times.

I never met a man who made an honester fight against the drink than did this poor fellow; but the sight of his wife drinking her beer before him day by day, and showing she enjoyed it, was too much for him. The crash came. The furniture was sold for a debt contracted by the wife without the knowledge of the husband. She went to live with her mother, and he was left destitute in Woolwich. I went up to get the remnant of his property (some 48*l.*), and made an arrangement for him to live with an Essex tradesman. We got him a humble outfit, but within a fortnight he had pledged every thing, even to his carpet-bag, for drink, had run away and returned to his old haunts of evil in London.

About a year afterwards his wife called with the sad tidings that he had died of the smallpox in the Hampstead Hospital. His last words were a request that I would bury him. And I buried him in Kensal Green, within a stone's throw of the grave of my beloved friend, William Tweedie. I buried this poor fellow, who only a few years before had started in London without encumbrance, with an income of nearly 600*l.* a year, and as bright prospects almost as any young man could have.

On his death his widow received 1400*l.*—sufficient to secure her a comfortable income for the rest of her life; but within a week she had embarked it all in a public-house, where she was plundered and robbed and ruined by those she employed. She ended her career on the streets of London, an outcast and a degraded drunkard.

OUR LORD'S PROPHECY OF THE END.

By Rev. Frank White, Pastor of the Tabernacle, Notting Hill, London.

A Right Understanding of God's Word Needful—Christ's Final Teachings—The Lord's Promise to His Church, "Lo, I am with you alway,'-not Addressed to Israel – The Question of the Disciples, "When shall these Things be?"—Our Lord Fredicts Two Things, Israel's Desolation and Israel's Restoration—"Take Heed!" Signs of the End and Signs of Christ's Coming—The Man of Sin—The Great Tribulation.

In the celebrated prophecy of our Lord regarding the End of this Age in Matthew 24, we read in the 15th verse of the chapter, "Whoso readeth, let him understand." The right understanding of Scripture is the first essential to the study of divine truth. If the servant does not understand, how shall he obey? If the disciple cannot understand what the teacher says, how is he to act on instructions? How is he to drink in the teaching from the lips of his Master? Now either our Lord has spoken in an unknown tongue or many amongst His people have not been at much pains to ascertain what He has said. Some have been discouraged by difficulties, and there must necessarily be difficulties, but the difficulty does not usually lie in the obscurity of the text so much as in our unwillingness to receive it. We are unwilling to understand, and so we raise difficulties. I have no doubt that an honest, prayerful study of God's Word, a simple and child-like inquiry into its meaning, will at all times be rewarded by the right understanding thereof.

For to think otherwise seems to me to reflect on the wisdom and goodness of Him who inspired this blessed Word. It is not of private interpretation; it came not from private sources, but holy men of God spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost, and our Lord intended that we should understand. And then these teachings

ARE FINAL TEACHINGS

They are final instruction to the Church, for at the end of chapter 28 we find the Lord speaking thus to His disciples: "Go ye therefore and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost; teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you, and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world."

To question for a single instant the application of this truth to the Church is absolutely fatal to its right understanding. Yet some people say that it is not intended for the Church, and so they pass over, unheeded, many of the warnings contained in the chapter. But, if it is not intended for the Church, for whom is it intended? Clearly not for the nation of Israel, for the last words to Israel are in the previous chapter. Our Lord, turning to Jerusalem, and weeping over the city, said, "Behold, your house is left unto you desolate. For I say unto you ye shall not see Me henceforth till ye shall say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord."

So it is not addressed to Israel. Clearly it is addressed to the disciples, and to the Church which they represented. They asked the question, and it is to them He speaks. Look at the second verse: "And Jesus said unto them, See ye not all these things?" And again in the last chapter—"Lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." What would you say to the man who robbed you of that precious promise, and told you it was not for you, but for the Jewish remnant? You would say, "He is my enemy; I cannot afford to lose that promise. I want it every day of the week, and every hour of the day."

Then we have the same word you in other places. In chapter 5 of Matthew we read, "Ye are the salt of the earth," and "Ye are the light of the world." Does that belong to us, or to some one else? And do you remember, when on the Mount of Transfiguration, the voice out of the cloud said, "This is My beloved Son, hear ye Him." It is the same ye all through.

Now the question of the disciples which they put was, "When shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of Thy coming, and of the end of the world?"

When shall these things be? That is, the things which He had told them about the temple, and about Jerusalem, and about the nations and about not one stone being left upon another The question was a proof of wisdom in itself o the part of the disciples. It was wisdom to pu any question to such a Master. After the Master was gone, they might well say to one another "What a pity we did not put more questions t Him." But it was clearly a proof of wisdom t ask such a question as this.

Our Lord's prophetic words are a predictio of two things not always distinguished: first, o Israel's desolation, and, secondly, of Israel's restoration. "Behold, your house is left unto yo desolate." That was a prediction of desolation "Ye shall not see me henceforth till ye sha say, Blessed is He that cometh in the name o the Lord." This is a prediction of restoration Already some had said as our Lord entered Jer salem and the multitude cut down branches ar strawed them in the way, "Blessed is He th cometh in the name of the Lord," but our Lo speaks of its being done in a fuller and more pe fect manner.

Is it any wonder then that the disciples so i terpreting their Lord's words should ask t questions they did? They understood the Lo to mean that the day of blessing to Israel wou be ushered in by His coming, and when that d would be might interest them. It was then natural question, and one readily suggested what our Lord had said. It was also a releva question. Some of their questions were irre vant and trifling, and were therefore not a swered. But our Lord replies to this questi and the answer is a perfect answer, and we m regard it as decisive.

Now, note the tone of the reply, how sole and how tender. Note the words "Take hee Heedlessness is not becoming the servants the Lord. It was not becoming in those da and it is much less so now, for as the time of end draws nigh we must especially guard agai heedlessness. "Take heed that no man dece you." The disciples were in danger of be deceived. They were in danger of being astray and losing themselves. Three reas may be given for this: credulity, curiosity, an want of watchfulness. And there is just same danger lest we should be deceived. Sa knows the importance of prophecy. He kn how full of power it is. It is a tremend power for good or evil, and if you get on wrong lines you will soon be led astray.

You must distinguish between the signs of End and the SIGNS OF CHRIST'S COMING.

The disciples asked, When shall these th be? And what shall be the sign of Thy co and of the end of the world? Our Lord tells them what shall take place during the which shall precede the beginning of the and He speaks of seven or eight things. 1. He speaks first of religious delusion. "Many

---

* A notorious place of amusement in London, now closed, but formerly the rendezvous for immoral persons of both sexes.

ıme in my name, saying, I am Christ, and shall :ceive many." They shall come with the ıme of Christ upon their lips. 2. Of worldide calamities.

3. Cruel persecutions; 4. World-wide or ıurch-wide apostasy; 5. False teaching; 6. bounding iniquity in the world; 7. Decline of ve in the Church; 8, and last, the preaching the Gospel. Praise the Lord that, amidst percutions which it would make you tremble to ink of, there is still to be the preaching of the ospel. There have been persecutions in past mes, and towards the close the saints are to be ıt to death because they refuse to receive the ark of the beast, but amidst all the Gospel is be preached. Our Lord, however, especially arns the disciples that all these things are the :ginning of sorrows, but the End is not yet.

What, then, are the signs of His coming?
ake heed that no man deceive you. Beware of lse interpretations. Our Lord gives us the arning words that these are not the immediate ecursors of His coming. But what are? He ys, "When ye therefore shall see the abomi-ıtion of desolation spoken of by Daniel the ophet stand in the holy place (whoso readeth : him understand)." How dare we pass this 'er without at least trying to understand it?
the second book of Kings, chapter 23, you :ll find abomination used with reference to an ol. So we might read this, "When you see
.e 'idol of desolation.'" Our Lord refers
.em to Daniel, where we will find the abomi-ıtion of desolation spoken of in chapters 11 : 31, ıd 12 : 11. It is said that history repeats it-lf, and how wonderfully Antiochus proved to : a forerunner of that

MAN OF SIN,

ıat Antichrist, whose idol of desolation shall
:t stand in the holy place. Never, since the ords of our Lord were spoken, has there been ıy repetition of Antiochus' doings.

What happened when the Romans compassed
:rusalem? They laid siege to the place, and ter a great slaughter the walls were broken
ɔwn. In the confusion one of the soldiers ıok a burning brand and threw it into the teme, and it took fire and was rapidly consumed.
o idol of desolation was allowed then to stand the holy place. This implies that the Lord's 'ophecy is yet future. And this is proved by ıe twenty-first verse, "For then shall be great ibulation, such as was not since the beginning ' the world to this time, no, nor ever shall be."
ı chapter 12 of Daniel you will find this time ' tribulation connected with the time when the ɔomination of desolation shall stand in the holy ace.

Now this time of tribulation is to be an imme-iate precursor of our Lord's coming. This is ıe sign which the Master gave His disciples.
e knew they would pass away, and that we ıould be in their place, wishing to ask the ıme questions that they had asked, and so He ft these instructions for us.

And let me remind you of this—there are fferent kinds of tribulation. I want to press ıis on you because some stumble at the thought ' it. Our Lord's words cannot pass away, and o one can deny that they refer to the same me of trouble as that spoken of by Daniel.
hen connect this with what the Apostle Paul ıys in 2 Thess. chap. 2. Settle it, then, that ıch a time of tribulation is to be, but such a me must necessarily be associated with Jerusa-
m. It must be in Jerusalem. Remember, in :. John our Lord says, "In the world ye shall ave tribulation." From Abraham to the ɔostle has it not been all the way through a fe of tribulation? Generally speaking, then,
:e the saints exhorted to expect tribulation. It the appointed lot and portion of the Lord's eople until the end, but this special tribulation ıust take place in Jerusalem.

"Then, after the tribulation of those days," nmediately after it, "shall the sun be darkened, ıd the moon shall not give her light, and the .ars shall fall from heaven, and the powers of ıe heavens shall be shaken: And then shall appear the sign of the Son of Man in heaven, and then shall all the tribes of the earth mourn, and they shall see the Son of Man coming in the clouds of heaven with power and great glory." What the time of the coming of the Son of Man is I know not, but I know that my Lord has said, that there shall be the sign of His coming, and then He Himself shall appear. You may say these are no signs to the Church but to Israel; but our Lord refused to give any sign to Israel, but the sign of the prophet Jonas. To His disciples He gives this sign that they may know when He is at hand. I do not want to put the Lord's coming far off. When He comes I shall have done with sin and suffering and trial, and He knows that, and therefore checks an undue expectation of His coming. But I have tried to show that it will be a personal coming, and that it will be a glorious coming.

SPIRITUALISM ANTICHRISTIAN.

By Mrs. Wightman, Authoress of "Haste to the Rescue."

On the subject of Spiritualism I should like to say a few words in confirmation of its anti-christian character. A gentleman who was a sceptic used to visit at the house of a relative of mine when I was a young girl. He was a man of high intelligence, and, having travelled more than was usual in those days, he was an acquisition in society, having a fund of interesting topics for conversation. He never went to church, but amused himself as best he could on Sundays. Thirty years afterwards we heard he had become a Spiritualist, and that he longed to renew his intercourse with his old friends.

Accordingly, one morning, when my husband and I were in the study, a stranger was announced, who declined to give his name. As we gazed upon the most perfect picture of an old English gentleman, with hair white as snow, and fine manly bearing, and face beaming with kindly brightness, he said, smiling, "Ah! I see you have forgotten me! A am Mr. ——, who often dined at your father's at Salford House when you were a young girl." We gradually recollected in the form before us our old acquaintance, and, remembering what he was in those days, we longed to know whether he had become a Christian. We listened with attention as he said, "You know I could not believe in a God, nor in any agency that could not be seen and touched."

We thought how very small such a creed is in a world daily nourished with impalpable air, lighted at night with impalpable gas, its messages sent thousands of miles all day long by impalpable electricity, etc. He told us of tangible proofs which had convinced him of the existence of spirits. "I have felt the grasp of their hands on my hands. I have seen their shadowy fingers. I have heard the music from a guitar whose strings were swept by their fingers." "Stop," I said. "We will listen to it all if you will first answer one question—no, two questions: 1. Do you believe that we are lost sinners by nature? 2. Do you believe that the Son of God was made flesh and died to redeem us?" He evaded my two questions, and said something else. "Oh, no! you must please to answer these questions first." "I wish you had not asked just those questions. I would rather not answer them." I urged him to do so. "Well, then, I do not believe them," was his answer. "Then I cannot hear one word more," was my rejoinder.

He looked uneasy and uncomfortable, the bland expression of his face was gone, an unhappy expression, impossible to describe, took its place. 1 John 4 : 1–5, with its words of solemn warning, came to my memory. Surely, then, "Spiritualism" is anti-christianism. Is it not a forerunner of that "strong delusion," and of those awful days of unprecedented lawlessness and Satanic agency which we are warranted by prophecy to expect just before the Second Coming of Christ? "Watch and pray" should be our watchword, together with Isaiah 8 : 19, 20.

Gurupatham, a Hindoo Wood-Cutter, is a Christian of about twelve years' standing. A short time since a Hindoo met him, and, knowing that he was a Christian, said, "With all your faith in Jesus Christ, will you go to a certain wood and cut down a tree in the Demon-grove?" (These demons, according to native notions, have their dwellings in groves.) The Christian man said he would, as he was challenged, and, taking his axe, went to the supposed sacred spot. A crowd of demon-worshippers had gathered round to witness the scene, evidently expecting some evil would happen to him. The man knelt down and prayed, then rose and began to chop. When he was about half-way through the tree he fell from exhaustion. The demon devotees set up a shout, and, running to a pagoda, asked a Brahmin priest what they should do. The priest gave them sacred ashes, and told them quickly to smear him with the ashes, and made him say he was quite defeated by the demon. But the man recovered, and seeing these ashes upon him, went to a river and bathed; then he came back and completely cut down the tree. It is to be hoped that not a few of those who witnessed this scene would be led to acknowledge mentally, if not audibly, as on Carmel, "The Lord, He is the God; the Lord, He is the God."

A BIBLICAL ALPHABET.

A was a traitor hung by the hair (2 Samuel 18 : 9).
B was a folly built high in the air (Gen. 11 : 9).
C was a fountain overlooking the sea (1 Kings, 18 : 43–45).
D was a nurse buried under a tree (Gen. 35 : 8.)
E was a first-born, bad from his youth (Heb. 11 : 16).
F was a ruler who trembled at truth (Acts 24 : 25).
G was a messenger, sent with good words (Daniel 9 : 21).
H was a mother loaned to the Lord (1 Samuel 1 : 27, 28).
I was a name received of the Lord (Gen. 32 : 21–28).
J was a shepherd in Arabian land (Ex. 3 : 1).
K was a place near the desert of sand (Deut. 1 : 10).
L was a pauper begging his bread (Luke 16 : 20, 21).
M was an idol, an object of dread (Leviticus 20 : 2, 3).
N was an architect ages ago (Gen. 6 : 13–23).
O was a rampart to keep out the foe (2 Chron. 17 : 2, 3).
P was an isle, whence a saint looked above (Rev. 1 : 4–9).
Q was a Christian sainted in love (Romans 16 : 24).
R was obscure, yet a mother of kings (Matt. 1 : 5).
S was a Danite, who did wonderful things (Judges 14 : 5, 6).
T was a city that had a stronghold (2 Samuel 24 : 7).
U was a country productive of gold (Jer. 10 : 8).
V was a queen whom a king set aside (Esther 1 : 10–22).
Z was a place where a man wished to hide (Gen. 19 : 1). Read 2 Timothy 3 : 15, 16.

A Reproof was Administered lately by a lad in Boston who is rather small for his years. He works as errand-boy for four gentlemen who do business there. One day the gentlemen were taunting him about being small, and said to him, "You never will amount to much; you never can do much business; you are too small." The little fellow looked at them. "Well," said he, "as small as I am, I can do something which none of you large men can do." "Ah! what is that?" said they. But they were anxious to know and urged him to tell. "I can keep from swearing," said the little fellow. There were some blushes on four ashamed faces, and there seemed to be very little anxiety for further information on the point.

A French Academy Prize has this Year been awarded to Leontine Nicolle. Her mother became a lunatic twenty years ago, and was sent to the asylum of La Saléptrière. In order to be always with and to watch over her, her daughter Leontine obtained a situation as nurse in the asylum, where she has ever since remained. Last year the mother died, but the daughter still remains devoted to her work. M. Jules Simon, the President, stated that, through the devotion of this living martyr, no less than 500 insane men and women had regained their senses and their liberty.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

(Continued from page 830.)

REUNION.

There were many boats and vessels upon it; but the trained eye of the clerk at once singled out one—it chanced to be the only steamer in sight. In sight? yes; but at such a distance that it looked little larger than the toy of a child, though the foam of its wake might yet be traced, and broad and black was the train of smoke which the vessel left behind it.

"There she goes!" said the clerk.

A smothered exclamation of agony burst from Effie's lips.

Even then Edith was slow to give way to despair. Would it be quite impossible to overtake the steamer? Might she not touch at some other port on her way down the Channel? The lady made anxious inquiries, not only from the clerk, but from nautical men who had gathered around.

Only discouraging replies were received. The steamer was fairly started for Australia, was not likely to touch anywhere on the English coast; if the ladies wished to see some one who had embarked in that vessel, they had come to Southampton too late.

How terrible is that word, too late! Even in the world of misery beyond the grave, will there be any sound more full of anguish to the souls of the lost?

A little crowd was now gathering around the two women, and they felt anxious to escape from the prying eyes of strangers. After gratefully thanking her courteous conductor, and learning from him to what port in Australia the May Queen was bound, Edith led poor heart-broken Effie to a quieter spot.

They were still in view of the sea; still was that fast-receding vessel in sight. Effie stretched out her hands towards it, uttering a faint moan, like the last farewell to hope, and to her lost husband.

As long as Effie could see the steamer she remained as if rooted to the ground. Edith offered various suggestions to rekindle hope, but her companion appeared to hear nothing. Edith could then only silently pray for her wretched companion.

At length Miss Temple gently suggested that they should return to the station, and take the next train to London. Were they to miss it they would scarcely be able to return to Ashley that day, and it would be worse than useless to linger in Southampton now.

Effie submitted to be led away, though moving with slow unwilling step, again and again turning her head to try to make out in the far, far distance, the smoke of the now invisible steamer. The two travellers were soon again in the noisy streets, Effie leaning wearily, heavily on the arm of her gentle protectress.

The station was reached and in good time. Edith left Effie to rest in the waiting-room, while she herself went to procure tickets. The lady regretted that she had not taken return tickets at the London station; the reason for her not having done so was the uncertainty in which she had been as to the length of her stay in Southampton, in England return tickets being available only on the day of issue.

While waiting for her turn at the ticket-counter, Edith put her hand into her pocket to take out her purse, which contained all Effie's little store of money as well as her own. What was the lady's alarm and distress on finding that pocket empty!

She had been repeatedly jostled by suspicious-looking persons whilst passing through the crowded narrow streets, too intent upon one object to give much thought to any thing else.

Edith had been robbed of all the contents of her pocket, and now found herself, with her helpless companion, absolutely penniless, in a town in which neither of them knew a single friend! Disaster had followed disaster, and Edith, with her spirits depressed and her physical strength wellnigh exhausted, felt almost overwhelmed by this new and unexpected misfortune.

Miss Temple's first impulse was to try to recover her lost property, but a moment's consideration convinced her of the hopelessness of such an attempt. Edith remembered that many times while threading her way with Effie, she had been almost mobbed by low men and disreputable-looking women, but she could identify no one individual as being the probable thief.

Edith could not give the police the slightest clue by which to find out who had abstracted her purse. She therefore decided not to lose time by trying to regain what would never be restored; she must make up her mind to the loss. Very serious was that loss to the lady, not only because the sum was what neither herself nor Effie could spare, but because the want of money exposed them both to immediate difficulties of a distressing nature. How was Edith to obtain the means of returning to Ashley?

"What shall I do?" Miss Temple asked herself, in sore perplexity. The silent question instantly received a silent answer. "I must pledge my diamond ring!" What had before only crossed the lady's mind as a painful possibility, had become an act of necessity.

Edith thought of her watch, but it was only a silver one and was of too little value to bring sufficient money to supply immediate need. No; the ring so dearly prized must be given up. Edith dared scarcely hope that she would ever have the means to redeem it.

With a sigh she made up her mind to the sacrifice of the ring, as she would, if needful, have made up her mind to the amputation of the finger on which she wore the jewel.

"It is better not to tell poor Effie of our loss," said Miss Temple to herself, "she has enough of sorrow to bear already."

Edith's voice and manner were unmoved. No agitation betrayed that any thing unusual had happened when she returned to Effie Holland. In her usual quiet way the lady said, "I find that I must go to a store before we start for London. Stay quietly here; I hope to return in a few minutes."

"You may miss the train," said Effie.

"I must take my chance of that," replied Edith, and turning, she hastened out of the depot.

Effie was left again to her own sad thoughts. Many passengers on that busy line, as they hurried in and out of the waiting-room, glanced for a moment with interest at the sweet sad countenance of her who sat unconscious of all that was passing around her, thinking of that steamer and one within it, now tossing on the green waves. Travellers wondered what tale of woe might be told by those pallid lips, which seemed ever and anon to be murmuring words which none could hear.

"Tempted in all points like as we are!" such were the words which Effie was now whispering to her almost bursting heart; "oh! yes, the Holy One knew what it was to be deserted, forsaken, even in the time of His sorest need, even by those whom He loved! And He had never done aught to bring on Himself such desertion; His love had all been unselfish and true.

"My Lord looked for friends but found none; there was no human voice to comfort and strengthen Him in the agony of His soul! And yet He could say to His Heavenly Father, Thy will, not mine, be done!

"Oh! help me, help me, Thou pitying Saviour, Thou who knowest all my anguish, Thou who hast suffered all that I suffer, help me also to say, Thy will be done! Let me not give way to despair, let me not sink under my cross; and oh, in a better, happier world, if not in this, give me back my precious husband!"

Edith, bound on her painful errand, did not enter either the first or the second pawnbroker's shop which she reached. They were low places, and looked to the lady like haunts of thieves, like dens of receivers of stolen goods. The third was of rather more respectable appearance, so here Edith paused, and then, for the first time in her life, the lady entered a pawnbroker's shop.

The sooner the distasteful business was got over the better, so Miss Temple took off her glove, drew off her ring, and showing it to a high-nosed, dark-complexioned man, who appeared to be the owner of the shop, asked him for how much she could pledge it.

The pawnbroker examined the jewel with critical eyes. The ring was very handsome, and of peculiar design. One diamond of great beauty formed the centre of a star of blue enamel, from which diverged seven rays, each containing three brilliants of different sizes, the smallest making the point of the ray. So valuable a ring had not often passed through the pawnbroker's hands, and he now glanced curiously from the gem to its owner.

Edith felt embarrassed under the stranger' glance, for it seemed to her to be one of suspicion. Her position gave her a sense of humi iation, which brought a blush to her cheek.

"My pocket has been picked," said the lad in explanation, "and I wish to pledge my ring t obtain the means of returning to London by th next train."

The pawnbroker cared little for the piece information; it was not his wont to inqui into the circumstances which compelled his cu tomers to pledge their goods; and like th clerk, he had at once decided that Edith was real lady. The man, after some consideratio offered to advance three pounds ($15) on th security of the ring.

Edith knew that the sum was very far belo the real value of the jewel, but it would suffi to supply her present need. The offer was a cepted; Edith took three dull sovereigns a the pawnbroker's ticket, and suppressing sigh, left the shop.

"How selfish am I thus to feel parting with ring, which is, after all, but a thing of eart when my poor companion has had to part, a under circumstances so painful, with one who her all, one whose love was the jewel of her istence!" Such were Edith's reflections as s retraced her way to the station.

"I ought to have read to myself a lesson fr the very articles hung up in that pawnbroke shop. With what heavy hearts must ma have entered that place—the ruined workman pledge his tools, the sick man his blanket, p haps the widow her wedding-ring, to get br for her starving children! If one could real half the burden of distress pressing on the s poor, one would blush that even a murmur thought should arise at one's own little pri tions."

The aspect of a customer who entered pawnbroker's shop a few minutes after Ed had left it, would have formed a striking co ment on her reflections.

This customer was a woman still young years, but with a frame bent under a crush burden of sorrow; gray was in the hair, and rows in the face, with which age had nothing do. This much-afflicted woman also approac the counter to pledge some article which valued, perhaps, like Edith's jewel—a thing m precious by memories of a departed friend.

The pawnbroker was at the moment ot wise engaged, so his customer beguiled the t of waiting by looking at some articles in a covered with strong plate-glass. The clerk startled by the woman's suddenly uttering a clamation with almost the shrillness of a cry

"The ring! the ring! how came you by ring?" exclaimed the woman, violent excite working every muscle of her face.

"It was put in pawn here, not five min ago, by a lady," was the pawnbroker's reply

"No lady, but a thief—she never came estly by that ring!" cried the woman, her a tion increasing. "Where is she? where c find her? I will give her in charge of police!" In her excitement the speaker gra the pawnbroker's arm.

"Softly, my good woman, softly," said pawnbroker, releasing himself from her h "the lady told me that she was going to don; if you walk in the direction of the d rhaps you may overtake her before she starts. e is dressed in black silk, and wears a straw nnet trimmed with blue ribbon."

"I'll find out one who shall make her explain clear—restore—" what more the woman said e pawnbroker could not hear, as she rushed rth from the shop before she had ended her ntence. Curiosity made the man follow his stomer as far as the door.

In the mean time, quite unconscious of the sult which had followed her pledging the ring, ith had rejoined Effie at the depot. Effie had itted her seat in the waiting-room, and with xious eyes was watching for the lady's return.

"Oh, Miss Temple, I thought you were never ming back!" exclaimed Effie. "Again the ain has started without us."

"It cannot be helped, we must wait for the xt," said Edith quietly. "In the mean time, fie, you must require some refreshment." ith herself felt hardly able to stand, but she d no thought to give to herself when she oked at the wan features of her poor young mpanion.

Scarcely had the two quitted the waiting-room, en Effie gave a start so violent, that Edith rned in surprise to see the cause. But Effie s no longer by Edith's side; with a spring ich, had she been bound, might have snapped r cords asunder, the young wife had bounded rwards, and now she was sobbing like a child, th her arms around the neck of her husband!

"Effie, my poor lass! Effie, look up!" mur- ured Robert, his feelings of affection and re- rse struggling against the Englishman's dis- ke of any thing resembling a scene.

Edith, by a gesture of the hand, drew the Hol- nds with her into the waiting-room, which she d just quitted, and which was then empty, as train had so lately departed. Effie still clung her husband, holding him tightly, as if fear- l that he would yet escape from her grasp; and olland, whose eyes were moist, had not the art to put her from him.

"And so you flew after me all this long way, y poor little dove!" said the husband fondly. I did not deserve it, after deserting you so. did not think, darling, that you'd take my go- g so much to heart." Robert was holding th the hands of his wife, as he gazed tenderly, d with keen self-reproach, into her face, down ich streamed tears of mingled sorrow and joy.

"I thought that you had gone—gone from me rever!" sobbed Effie; "I thought that you d sailed in the May Queen to-day."

"I had half a mind to do so," said Robert, king a seat, and drawing his arm around Effie, that her head rested against his breast. "I ined Ellen at Southampton, and—but you've t spoken a word yet to poor Ellen!" cried e farmer, and turning to look for his sister, ho had followed him into the room.

But Ellen, with clasped hands, lips apart, and ok of rapt attention, was so earnestly engaged listening to Edith as to be heedless of all be- de. The moment that Edith had caught sight the woman who had dogged her steps from e pawnbroker's shop, she had recognized in her e attendant of her late aunt, Mrs. Vernon.

Ellen, on her part, saw with surprise and joy at the supposed thief, whom she had been pur- ing, was Miss Temple, whose character she ell knew, and from whom she was certain to eet not only justice but kindness.

Leaving Robert and Effie to each other, Edith ad drawn Ellen to another part of the room, d with delight, only exceeded by that of her tener, was telling the faithful attendant that e lost ring had been found, and that her inno- ence of the crime for which she had suffered was ow made clear as the day.

Robert caught the lady's words as he turned look for Ellen; he started up, and drawing ffie with him, joined his sister, listening with terest almost as intense as her own, to the ac- ount given by Edith of Mr. Vernon's surprise seeing on her hand the ring bestowed by his ife.

(To be continued.)

THE PERFECT PATTERN.

S. S. Lesson for Nov. 2, 1 Pet. 2 : 11–25. Golden Text, ver. 22. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Our lesson for to-day is entirely addressed to Christians. The Apostle Peter, in ver. 21, reminds us that "Christ also suffered for us, leaving us an example that we should follow His steps." Here then we see that a life of holiness, no less than Christ's, is our high calling; footsteps no other than His own are the blessed possibility for us. And with this call we find the provision also made, "who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we, being dead to sins, should live unto righteousness."

And as to those who understand such a call, the appeal of the Apostle comes, "Dearly beloved, I beseech you as strangers and pilgrims, abstain from fleshly lusts, which war against the soul." Our beloved Lord was a stranger: "O the hope of Israel, the Saviour thereof in the time of trouble; why shouldest Thou be as a stranger in the land?" (Jer. 14 : 8). The answer is a sad one. "He came unto His own and His own received Him not" (John 1 : 11). When our blessed Lord was upon earth, He saw, spoke of, and dealt with all things in the light of His great mission to reconcile the world unto His Father; the lilies of the field, the foxes, the birds of the air, the tribute money, all had for Him a significance which bore upon the relations of men with His Father. To the world in itself He was a stranger, and in it He was a pilgrim.

And we, as His followers, are called upon to "abstain from fleshly lusts," from all the world of self where the flesh reigns, to ignore all that once played upon our natural sensitiveness, to refuse in the Name of Christ to be wounded by any word or deed which is directed against us, for if we allow that our flesh was justly dealt with on the cross of Jesus, we are inconsistent to shrink from any humiliation which God may permit to come upon it from others. Then the lusts of self-gratification in the ministering to our tastes and desires, is to abandon the pilgrim life and the pilgrim spirit. Let us live as they who are but passing through the world, which has nothing in us, nor we in it.

But we are called to have our "conversation honest among the Gentiles;" and the next verse applies this principle to the duty of submission "to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake;" to the king, to governors, etc. The same principle applies in family life. When, for instance, a wife is converted, but has not grace enough to submit to her husband, she leaves room for the unconverted to say that the Gospel encourages strife between man and wife. If a daughter has not grace enough to obey her mother, when she is converted, in a full confidence that where it is a question of conscience the Lord will show her how to act, the inference will naturally be drawn that Gospel piety encourages insubordination. "For the Lord's sake" is the scriptural incentive to obey "every ordinance of man."

"For so is the will of God, that with well doing ye may put to silence the ignorance of foolish men," as in chap 3 : 17: "For it is better, if the will of God be so, that ye suffer for well doing than for evil doing." Let us be ready to suffer for well doing, but never for an instant give occasion, by ill doing, for men to reproach our God through us. It glorifies God that where men speak against our faith, they shall be unable to find a flaw in our practice. "This is the will of God," "As free," i.e., not by constraint, but out of the heart-whole jealousy for the glory of God, which becomes those who are His children; not from duty, but from love. And not using your liberty as a cloak of maliciousness, but as the servants of God. We are set free only that we may serve.

Then we are to honor all men, love the brotherhood, fear or reverence God, honor the king, so that in our relations to all no fault may be found in us. "Servants, be subject unto your masters with all fear; not only to the good and gentle, but also to the froward." A great principle is here involved, i.e., that we are called to be blameless in our relations with others, altogether independently of their relations to us. Their frowardness is not to make us froward. A beautiful example of this is contained in the conduct of a dear Swiss lady, an earnest worker for the Lord. Three times her house was set on fire by the same man, and when the third time the offender was discovered, finding she had no power to prevent his being punished, she sought out his aged mother, placed her in one of her own cottages, rent free, and provided for her as though she had been one of her own relations.

"For this is thankworthy, if a man, for conscience toward God, endure grief, suffering wrongfully. For what glory is it if, when ye be buffeted for your faults, ye shall take it patiently? but if, when ye do well, and suffer for it, ye take it patiently, this is acceptable with God." Let us bear in mind that we are called to newness of life, not improvement of life, to be new and not mended creatures. Now it is utterly impossible to endure grief suffering wrongfully, while we are living unto ourselves; all that is of self in us rebels against injustice; it is only as we live Christ, and as we refer every detail of our life to Him instead of to ourselves, that what He wills is our joy and happiness, what He permits our gladly accepted portion.

And yet how few there are who understand and who respond to this high calling! The general level of Christianity knows nothing of this. Men accept of Christ's redemption from eternal death, but continue the vain attempt to live their own life and eternal life together; to make their own interests and Christ's interests coincide; it is a vain, miserable attempt, which can never succeed; and this lies at the root of so much of the powerless, unhappy, unsatisfactory religious life around us. We cannot live a life which has two centres. If our thoughts, words, and deeds do not centre around Christ, they do centre around us. But the Holy Ghost, who worketh in us both to will and to do of God's good pleasure, glorifies Jesus and not us; and while we are seeking our own satisfaction or our own glory, we grieve the Spirit and hinder His working. This, too, is the secret of much unanswered prayer. "If ye abide in Me, and My words abide in you, ye shall ask what ye will, and it shall be done unto you (1 John 15 : 7). While we abide in ourselves, in our own atmosphere and current of thoughts and desires, God cannot give us this power in prayer.

We are called then to follow His steps: "Who did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth." This is as distinct a call to live without sin as that of the Apostle John (1 John 2 : 1): "My little children, these things write I unto you, that ye sin not." Oh! in the light of these two passages let us never again excuse ourselves for sin, or think that there is no possibility of living free from sin. It is true that as we acknowledge this call, the sensitiveness of our conscience will increase, and we shall continually discern that to be sin which we have not hitherto suspected; but God in loving mercy discovers it to us, that we may learn to renounce it as soon as known in the name and in the power of the Lord Jesus.

"Who when He was reviled, reviled not again; when He suffered, He threatened not; but committed Himself unto Him that judgeth righteously." Our Lord did not undertake His own defence, but left it in His Father's hands without fear, without reserve. If we believe that our heavenly Father careth for us, why doubt so much that our interests are safe in His hands as to seek after them ourselves? The very instinct of the life of Christ in us is confidence in our Father. "Ye were as sheep going astray," says the apostle, "but are now returned unto the Shepherd and Bishop of your souls." Let us not pain our Shepherd by doubting Him; but be ready to do any thing or suffer any thing rather than distrust Him, and let us follow in His steps all the way through, following the Lamb "whithersoever He goeth."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Capture of Cabul by the British Forces was effected October 12th. During the night of Wednesday, October 8th, the enemy confronting General Baker fled, abandoning twelve guns. The British cavalry pursued for several miles, but the enemy dispersed in so many directions that only small parties were overtaken. General Roberts proceeded immediately to occupy the city. He issued a proclamation in which he said : "It will be necessary to inflict severe punishment. Buildings of the Bala-Hissar and of the city interfering with proper military occupation will be destroyed. A heavy fine will be levied on the citizens. A military governor will be placed over the city and country within a radius of ten miles. All the inhabitants under his jurisdiction will be required to surrender their arms within a week, on pain of death if they fail to do so. Rewards will be paid for the denunciation and conviction of any person concerned in the massacre of the British Embassy."

A telegram to the New York Herald states that the Russian Ambassador has made proposals to the English Foreign Minister with a view of bringing about a partition of Afghanistan between England and Russia. Lord Salisbury declined in the most emphatic, even harsh, terms, saying that England would not allow Russia to meddle in any way whatsoever in the matter. He said that the future of Afghanistan has to be settled by England exclusively.

In a speech at Manchester, October 17th, Lord Salisbury spoke of Russia in a manner indicating a decided feeling of hostility to that power, whose treachery and general want of principle seems at last to have disgusted every member of the European family.

Apprehensions of Coming Trouble in Ireland are still rife. Five hundred tenants of the Marquis of Sligo and the Earl of Lucan met near Westport, in the County of Mayo, Connaught, and solemnly pledged themselves to pay no rent until a reduction should be granted proportionate to the great fall of prices of all kinds of agricultural produce. If the tenants are evicted, it will be difficult to supply their places, as incoming tenants will be liable to be assassinated. A notice was posted at Warrenpoint, County Down, Ulster, that any man coming into the county to pay more than £1 an acre for land, "may bring his coffin with him."

There has been an anti-rent demonstration at Belfast, at which Messrs. Parnell and Biggar spoke. Fifteen thousand persons were present, and resolutions were passed declaring that at no time in the history of Ireland was the want of a native Parliament more clearly demonstrated than by the present alarming distress, and that the establishment of a peasant proprietary was the only practical and final solution of the land question. Disturbances were expected at the meeting in consequence of the strong feeling of Orangemen against Mr. Parnell, but no trouble is reported.

The Drink Traffic in England will be brought under the consideration of Parliament at its next session. A committee of the House of Lords has, during the past two years, made careful investigation into the effect of the present system, and has come to the conclusion, at which every one but interested persons had arrived long ago, that it is in need of radical reform. The report of the committee states that "individual and national ruin is threatened by the already excessive and rapidly-increasing consumption of alcoholic liquors." We may therefore conclude that any alteration of the law will be made with the object of checking that consumption.

The committee considers that the consumption of liquor may be reduced by restricting its sale and reducing the number of places at which it is sold. The effect of that measure, the committee is aware, will be to create a monopoly ; but it proposes to correct that evil by causing the monopoly to operate for the benefit of the entire community. To effect this object it suggests a modification of the Gothenburg system, by which the traffic shall be confided to municipal bodies who shall derive no profit from the sale, and who will therefore have no motive to encourage it. The glittering and attractive gin-palaces and the cosey ale-houses, which now allure men from their homes, and the fierce competition for customers, will, the committee hopes, come to an end under the system, and the morality and sobriety of the community be promoted. It remains to be seen what Parliament in which there are a considerable number of brewers, will say to such a measure.

Misleading Paragraphs Professing to Describe the advantages of emigration to this country are appearing in English journals. They paint in glowing colors the salaries paid and the prospects of obtaining employment here, and misrepresent the cost of living. Such paragraphs are liable to cause much misery to emigrants, and to swell the already enormous crowd of unemployed persons who throng our streets. It ought to be unmistakably explained to the European public, that the only classes of persons likely to be benefited by emigrating to the United States are producers and artisans. Professional men, clerks, and tradesmen find competition as keen here as in the Old World, and the cost of living higher here than there.

Dr. Talmage in an address delivered October 10th, speaking on the condition of the country in reference to the expected tide of emigration, said : "The men we need are producers. We must subtract from the number of manufacturers and add to the producers. The trouble is that where in this country there is one garment needed, there are three people anxious to manufacture it, and five people anxious to sell it. We want to evoke more harvests and fruits for the feeding of the world's population, and more flax and wool for the clothing." The emigrants who landed in New York during two days last week numbered 2494.

The Salvation Army has Secured an Apparently strong foothold in Great Britain. Already it has an annual income of nearly $100,000, and its organization includes 120 corps, 180 officers, and 3256 speakers. It holds 50,000 meetings in the course of a year in 143 theatres and music halls, besides about 40,000 open-air meetings. An estimate of the aggregate of the audiences places it at 2,000,000 persons.

The Lawsuit over a Hair, of which mention was made in the CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 24th, has been decided. The quarrel was over the Sacred Hair of the Prophet Mahomet's Beard, and it ended in an exciting lawsuit. This hair is called "Aussaree Shareef," and a small pension, besides great honor, is attached to the possession of it. There were six persons claiming this inestimable treasure. Three withdrew from the contest ; one, a woman, it was decided by the judge, could not fulfil the necessary ceremonies connected with the heirloom ; and it was decreed that as the third claimant is the elder brother of No. 4 he shall have the custody of the hair, perform the necessary ceremonies, and divide the profits with his two relatives.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon has Given a Statement of his political opinions to a newspaper which declared that he had openly prayed for a rapid change of government. "I pray daily," he says, "that the Lord would change the policy of our Nation from that of blustering and invasion to peace and righteousness. If this means a change of government so let it be ; but I do not remember putting it in that form. My politics are not bound up with party ; but I love righteousness and peace."

A Fatal Flower Blooms on the Swiss Alps. It is called the Edelweiss, and is in great request among ladies as an ornament for the hair. Every traveller in Switzerland is familiar with the tender, star-shaped flowers of this curious plant, whose sage-green blossoms are stuck into the hat of every guide. It is found in the Engadine, and has particular corners and mountains that it loves to affect. Its scarcity and partiality has given to the Edelweiss a somewhat unhealthy notoriety. The rarer it became th more ambitious were the excursionists to obtai a sprig. Young ladies went so far as to appea at fancy balls in the character of "The Alps,' smothered in Edelweiss. The demand for th flower became so enormous and so many at tempts were made to obtain roots, that it be came increasingly scarce, and at length coul only be found in places dangerous and almos inaccessible. So the search of the Edelweiss be came as attractive a source of danger as any t be found in Switzerland. Unaccompanied b guides, and straying from the beaten tracks more than one tourist has risked his life, an several have been already killed in the quest They who thus put their lives in peril in th effort to gain possession of a perishable flowe are often unattracted by Him who is the Rose c Sharon and the Lily of the Valley (Cant. 2 : 1)

Killed by Terror.—A Terror Remembered i sometimes more dangerous than the same terro actually experienced. One Sunday, a fortnigh ago, as a young woman was crossing the Ru St. Honoré, Paris, she was suddenly knocke down by a high-wheeled cart known as a spider Her peril was imminent, but she retained he self-possession and relieved the anxiety of th spectators by regaining her feet and reaching th sidewalk very little the worse for her mishap As soon as she reached home she began to relat the incident to her friends, and while doing s was seized with a violent attack of nervous ag tation, and sank fainting on the floor and died.

The Greek Church Claims Infalibillity for it head.—The Archbishop of Moscow has publicl taught that the Emperor of Russia is the vica of God, inspired and infallible in his utterance and to be obeyed as God Himself.

A Whale that Paid a Chapel Debt.—A Larg sperm whale was seen floating in the sea ne the island of Eleuthera, in the West Indies. I was discovered by a party of sixteen fisherme who belonged to the Wesleyan body, and wa secured with the resolution that its value shoul be appropriated to the payment of a debt on on of their mission chapels. They obtained fro the carcass a large quantity of sperm oil an ambergris, a valuable substance, which was ser by a merchant to London, where it realized abo 2l. an ounce. The merchant did not charge an commission on the transaction. The amour obtained was sufficient to pay the remainin liabilities, and to leave a nice little balance t the credit of the trust of the mission chape Thus it was, in a time of need, God sent a wha from the vasty deep to pay off a chapel deb He once before sent a smaller kind of fish t supply the tribute money demanded of the I carnate Lord and His apostles, thereby showin how all resources are absolutely at His comman Spurgeon's Autograph Album ; containing th Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's and Mrs. Spurgeon's aut graphs, may be obtained at 63 Bible House, through any bookseller. Price 75 cents. The Swo and Trowel says : "Our young friends delight possessing birthday albums, and here is one which fit for a queen. We will say nothing of the content but the binding is simply gorgeous. . . . This a dainty birthday present, and is equal to any th have gone before it ; we think we might venture say that it is second to none. Facsimiles of the a tographs of the pastor and his wife are given in the proper places."

The following works by the same eminent preach may also be obtained at the CHRISTIAN HERAL Office, 63 Bible House :

"The Treasury of David." Containing an Orig nal Exposition of the Book of Psalms ; a Collectic of Illustrative Extracts from the whole range of Lite ature ; a series of Homiletical Hints upon almo every verse ; and list of writers upon each Psaln Five volumes. Price, per vol., $3.

"John Ploughman's Talk ; or, Plain Advice f Plain People." Price, cloth, 60 cents ; paper co ers, 40 cents.

"The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit." Fif Sermons. Preached and revised during the ye 1878. Price $2.50.

"Twelve Sermons on Various Subjects." With Portrait. Price 35 cents. A remittance must accon pany every order.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Pulshed at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

is Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. AI AGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, or some other mint Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc. The Circulation is 165,000 Copies.

e, Single Copies, Three Cents.
scription, $1.50, including Postage.

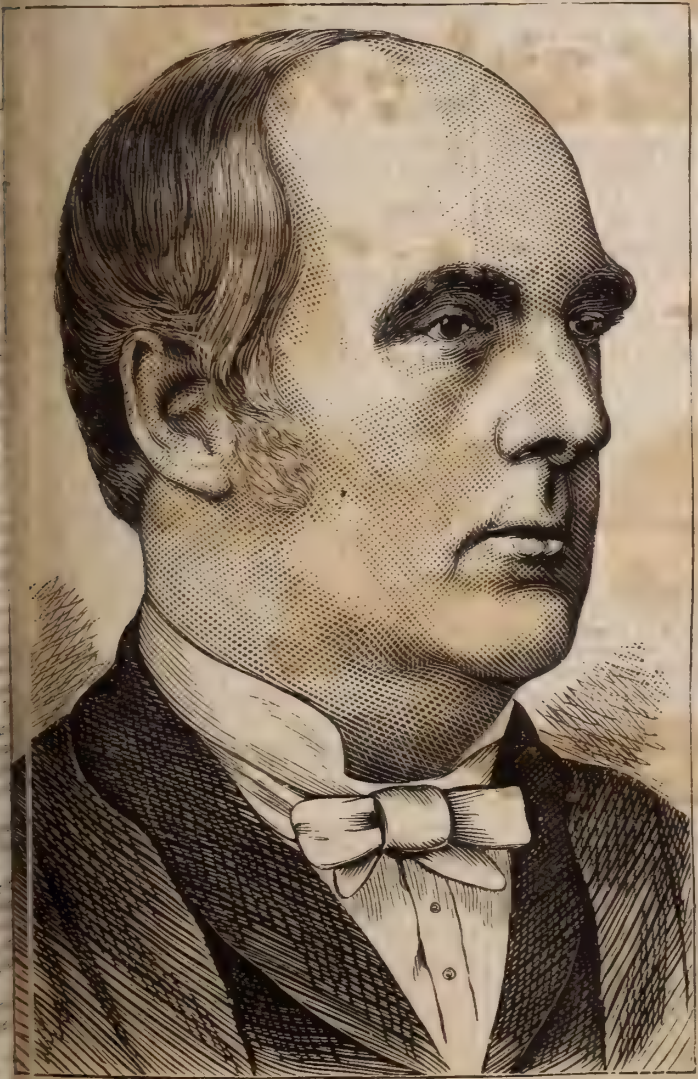
THURSDAY, OCTOBER 30, 1879.

13th Year. No. 54—New Series.

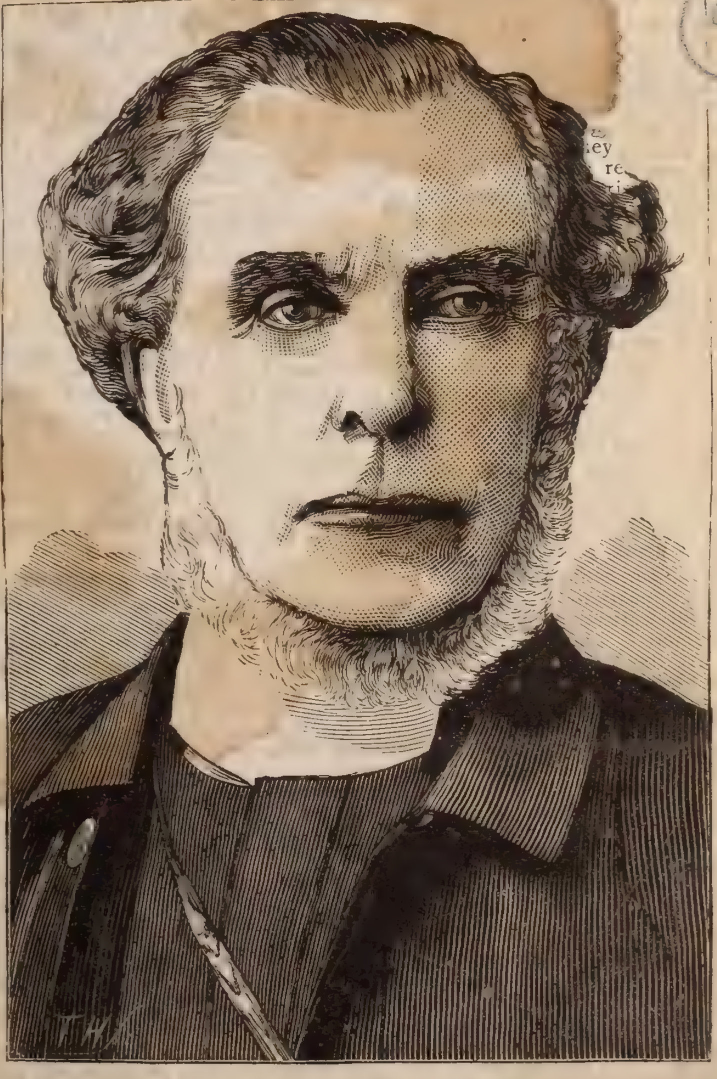
CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

OI RAITS OF THE REV. JOHN GRAHAM and R/. A. MORTON BROWN, LL.D., with Sketches of heir Lives.
H HERO OF THE AGES. A New Sermon by Dr. T mage.
he ord's Day on the Contivent—The largest Mouth.
R LD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE. A Thrilling al Story by the Author of "Felicia Cuffe."
y the Book—Mr. Spurgeon on Woman's Place i larriage.
JESUS IN THE SYNAGOGUE. Rev. JAMES A. SPURGEON'S Sermon in New York.
CURRENT EVENTS: The New York Campaign—The Ladies and Children Carried off by the Indians—A Ship on Fire—Dr. Talmage on Politics—Defrauded Immigrants—A Temperance Test in the Army—An Odd Wedding Fee—The Bishop and the Baby—Prospects of the Churches—Unwelcome Immigrants—A New Use for Monkeys, etc.
PROPHETIC SIGNS OF THE TIMES. An Address by Col. Rowlandson.
SELF-RIGHTEOUSNESS — A SMOULDERING HEAP OF RUBBISH. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
Gospel Work in Barracks, by Major Malan.
THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND (Continued).
The Perfect Saviour. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Abdication of Yakoob Khan—Missionaries Prohibited by an European—A Snake-Tamer's Death—The Liberal Leader in England on the Situation—Disastrous Floods in Spain—A Mysterious Disappearance, etc.

cul



T late Rev. JOHN GRAHAM, Drowned at Cape May, N. J., August 1st, 1879.



The late Dr. A. MORTON BROWN, the Popular English Congregational Minister.

THE LATE REV. JOHN GRAHAM.

His First Charge—His Work in Australia—His Settlement at Brighton—His Characteristic as a Preacher, Lecturer and Writer—His Sudden Death—Funeral Sermon.

THIS eminent minister of the Gospel, so well known in England as an earnest preacher, was a native of Ireland, and born in 1822. After completing his education for the ministry, his first pastoral charge was at Craven Chapel, London, to the pulpit of which he was appointed on the retirement of the Rev. Dr. Leifchild.

After laboring there for some years he proceeded to Sydney, New South Wales, and accepted the ministerial charge of the Pitt Street church, where he continued with much acceptance for ten years. During his ministry there he was instrumental in collecting no less than $84,500 for chapel, schools, and other buildings connected with that church.

Being desirous of superintending the education of his son, he relinquished that pastorate, and returned to England, and in September, 1876, became the pastor of Clifton Road Church, Brighton, in succession to the Rev. H. Quick, who had been compelled by ill-health to retire. He found a debt amounting to $24,500 upon the church, which was erected in 1811 at a cost of $54,000, but this had been reduced to $10,000 before Mr. Graham left with the purpose of taking a holiday tour in Canada.

From the pen of a friend who was intimately acquainted with this honored brother we have the following estimate of his character: "As a preacher, Mr. Graham, especially when at his best, was eloquent and impressive, having the gift of varying his style of address, and of introducing forcible illustrations. His sermons, although evidently prepared with great care, were delivered almost or entirely extempore. One feature was very noticeable in all his discourses, and that was his thorough acquaintance not only with the spirit, but the letter, of Holy Writ. Chapter after chapter, verse after verse, would be quoted, especially when seeking to establish some controverted point, with remarkable readiness.

"On the platform Mr. Graham seemed even more at home than in the pulpit. Here his style was more unrestrained and vivacious, apt illustration and clever anecdote never failing to enliven a meeting or give point to some useful lesson. As a lecturer, too, he was very happy, especially in his lectures on Rome and on Australia. His remarkable memory was particularly noticed whilst delivering these lectures, a number of dates, facts, etc., being given without any assistance from notes. Mr. Graham was, in every sense of the word, a public-spirited man. His views were broad and catholic. He did not confine his sympathies or exertions to his own church, but exhibited practical sympathy with all denominations of Protestant Christians and with all works of a missionary or philanthropic character.

"At the laying of the foundation-stone of a new place of worship, at anniversary services, missionary meetings, Sunday-school gatherings, and at similar reunions, Mr. Graham was constantly to be found. Besides attending these meetings, in common with his brother ministers in Brighton, he took a peculiar interest in the gatherings which had for their object the promotion of what is called the 'Higher Christian Life.' He also conducted and supported special services designed to attract and influence those persons uninterested in the ordinary services of the church.

"At the conference of the Sussex Home Mission and County Association, held in Brighton in May last, and at London Road Congregational Church, he read a paper upon 'Special Services,' which was not, however, discussed, because of the limited time at the disposal of the meeting. The importance of the suggestions made and the ability displayed in the paper were specially acknowledged by the chairman and by the ministers present. Early in the present year he held a week's special services at Cheltenham, at Dr. A. Morton Brown's church.

"Mr. Graham was favorable to the Band of Hope movement, and encouraged the formation of a society of that kind at Clifton Road Church. He was the author of a work entitled 'Eternal Life in Prospect and Possession,' and edited a book detailing 'Twenty-five Years of Bush Life,' a volume which has been favorably noticed by the Australian press. In person Mr. Graham was rather tall and commanding, with a powerful voice. He was affable in manner and ready in conversation. He was universally respected by all who knew him."

His lamented death took place at the age of fifty-seven years, on the 1st of August this year, from apoplexy, while bathing at Cape May, New Jersey, during a visit to his nephew, Dr. James Graham, of Philadelphia. It seems that on the morning in question Mr. Graham went to the bathing-ground in company with his nephew, Archibald Graham, of Philadelphia, and his two nieces, Misses Bessie and Gussie Graham.

The current beneath a pier is always strong, and Miss Gussie found that she was being carried out to sea, and, ascertaining that she was beyond her depth, she struck out resolutely for shore. Her brother, appreciating her danger, hastened to her rescue, but their united efforts were unable to make headway against the tide. A young man, a stranger, for a time also lent his aid, but, finding the situation one of great peril to himself, sought his own safety in shallow water.

It was then that Mr. Graham's attention was attracted to what was going on, and swimming to the rescue succeeded in grasping the hand of his niece. A large wave which struck the brother carried him away, leaving the young lady and Mr. Graham to battle with the current, which soon carried them to the pier. Here help was afforded by Mr. C. H. Ames, of Boston, who, by means of a rope, was lowered into the water, where he found the young lady struggling to keep her uncle above water. All her efforts only sufficed to keep the top of his head above the waves. They were both brought to land; but in the case of Mr. Graham animation could not be restored.

Thus suddenly was a career full of usefulness brought to a close. We say not, prematurely; for God who rules all the affairs of men knows what instruments are needed for the conduct of His work on earth. It is for Him to say when His servants shall receive the summons, "Come up hither;" and it is ours to bear the severance with cheerful acquiescence, knowing that "He doeth all things well." The progress of God's work here depends on no man's efforts, but He raises up men to carry it on as He sees the need of them.

REV. A. MORTON BROWN, LL.D.

His Birth in 1812, and College Life—Entry upon Pastoral Work at Overton and Poole—Settlement at Cheltenham—His Ministrations to Earl Fitzhardinge—His Death and Funeral.

MORTON BROWN—his friends seldom called him by any other name—was a native of Newmilns, Ayrshire, Scotland, and was born March 6th, 1812. He was a member of a stanch Scotch Presbyterian family, one of whose forefathers had fought at Drumclog, and is said to have been subsequently shot in cold blood by Claverhouse, in the presence of his wife.

At the execution of that fearful tragedy, Claverhouse said to Mrs. John Brown, "What do you think of your husband now?" She replied, "I think more of him to-day than ever I did; but how will you answer to God for this morning's work?" Claverhouse, as he rode off, replied, "Woman, I shall take God at my own time." This scene has been the subject of historical pictures.

Morton Brown had godly parents, who, if they had any ambition ever troubling the simple current of their quiet lives, ardently desired that their son should take a good place in society. He had fair abilities as a boy at school, and when the time came that it was needful for hi to choose a calling or profession, his inclination at first strongly turned towards that of the ba rister. Even in his younger years he was a flu ent speaker, and could hold his own in an argu ment, and such qualifications, in the judgmen of some, naturally pointed to the Scottish la courts. Whatever wishes he may have che ished in this direction, however, were complete laid aside when it pleased God to bring him to knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus. The his highest hopes were centred upon becoming minister of the Gospel, and his prayers, an those of his beloved parents, were without cea ing that if it were the will of God his way migh be made clear. Those prayers were answere and, full of ardent hopes, the youth set out f the University of Glasgow.

College life, which sometimes proves fatal t the simple, earnest piety of too many youn students, whatever it may do in the way strengthening their intellectual powers, had n influence connected with it which Morton Brow was ever heard to regret. He worked har and in course of time took his M.A. He the proceeded to the University of Edinburgh, an upon the termination of his career there, entered the ministry. At first his views we Presbyterian, but he afterwards connected hi self with the Congregationalists.

He did not immediately take the oversight a Congregational church, but for some mont preached at Overton, in Hampshire, Englan and elsewhere. Eventually, in 1837, he was i vited to the co-pastorate at Poole, Dorsetshi He was ordained, and upon the death of Rev. Durant he became sole pastor of the church f a period of about five years. These early da of ministerial life had many pleasant associatio connected with them, for although the sphe of work was small in comparison with th which he subquently filled, he had many choi friends here, to whom it was a delight to him refer in after years.

It may be mentioned that at Overton a mestic entered his service who remained faithful retainer until his death, and whose fo years of service we may be forgiven for reco ing here to her honor, not less than as an stance of personal attachment which it peculiarly a trait of the deceased minister's ch acter to win from those with whom he brought in daily contact.

In 1843 he entered upon what proved to b long and useful

PASTORATE AT CHELTENHAM.

This town is an inland watering-place, chie tenanted by invalids and by families who for rious reasons desire to lead a quiet genteel life a healthy locality. In such towns the Engl Established Church has a firm hold on the p ple. It is fashionable to go to church; th who go to a Nonconformist chapel are regar as unfashionable nobodies, low people who out of the pale of good society.

People in this country can scarcely conceiv the breadth of the line which in England se rates a Churchman from a Baptist, a Congre tionalist, or a Methodist. It is not long since vicar of a Parish refused to allow a tombston be placed over the grave of a Methodist minis because in the inscription the deceased styled "Rev." At no places does this sectar jealousy attain such proportions as at hea resorts and small watering-places. Mr. Bro therefore, in accepting an invitation to Chel ham as an Independent minister, knew that would have to contend against serious obstac and would not receive from the people am whom he labored a just recognition of his w

The Congregational church there was at t time vacant, for the Rev. Samuel Martin just left it to commence the labor of his lif Westminster. The chapel was a small one, even Mr. Martin's ministry had not told ex sively upon so fashionable a place of reso Cheltenham. The church did not numb hundred members, and Nonconformity was dently looked upon as something altogether was to them the spot of all spots on earth, ie Redeemer was there!

d that presence is to-day the great need of hurch. The noblest structure, consecrated shops, is a failure if Christ be not there. is presence has not hallowed it, you may write on the walls Ichabod, the glory is ted. There are services imposing and magnt from which the Christian departs in w, saying, "They have taken away my Lord, know not where they have laid Him." But also necessary that you go to the house of with a prepared heart, lest you have to leave g, "The Lord was in the place, and I knew t." A service without Christ is starvation e soul; it is a fast, and not a feast.

I. THE PLACE.

as the other day in the house of one of your merchants, and I noticed there that he had ephone fixed, so that he might communicate his place of business, and might answer ions addressed to him. While I was there ld communications with an invisible quesr, and then proceeded with his conversation those about him. It seemed to me an illuson of our communion with our Father in en. We see Him not, but our petitions ve gracious answers of peace.

t if you would receive the blessing, you must for it. Can you complain that He is not found ou if you have not sought Him? Was He away when you have sought Him?

you desire to get the blessing of Christ's ence, seek Him with a purpose. If I wanted cure the presence of a physician, I should need to find a patient and ask him to come display his skill in the healing art. And if I the Good Physician to come I have only ll Him of a soul in need, and He will come eal all its infirmities.

gain, if you desired to get the presence of a r, you have only to secure the presence of vife and of his children, and you may rely he father soon following. If you seek the ence of Christ, go where His disciples meet, e His friends are, and there you will find Lord in the midst to bless.

II. THE PERSON.

think if I had entered that synagogue I ld have known my Master. I think I could picked Him out from among the crowd. vas a Prince of the royal House of David, I have no doubt He looked every inch a king. writes its tale on the countenance, and so virtue; what then must have been the face ie All-holy? It must have been conspicuous s matchless purity; and as the face of Moses n he descended from the mount shone with reflection of heavenly light, so must the iour's face have been peerless in its beauty. ve no doubt He bore the look of the Man of ows, that His brow was touched with the s He had borne, for here He had served and ered.

cannot tell you how you can detect the ter's presence in your sanctuaries, but I know if He is here, and you are seeking Him, will know that He is here.

s a boy I have flown my kite far away beyond sight. I could not see it, but there was a g attached, the other end of which I held in hand, and I knew by the pulling of the string the kite was there, though I could not see So there are chords of love in our souls which ate at the touch of the Master's hand.

e cannot explain how we know of the pres of our Lord, but we do know it. Can you ain why the magnetic needle points always he pole? But it always does point there; I cannot tell you how I find out the nearness Christ, but I feel His presence and He draws to Himself. I cannot tell you how the bird s its way for miles to its destination, but I w it does find it, and I know that so my soul s out towards its Lord. I feel His presence, ar a voice the world cannot hear, I touch a d the world does not see.

ut let it not be that we come to the sanctuary re Jesus is and do not get His blessing. In the old country, if one told us that he had been in the next room to the Queen, we should ask, Did you see her? Did you hear her voice? And we should think it strange if he had done neither. Nor can we understand it if one says he has been near to Jesus and yet has not received the blessing. Never let it be said that we have touched the hem of His garment and yet have not felt virtue come out of Him.

III. THE OBJECT.

Why was Jesus in the synagogue? If we went back to the place of our early associations there would be many things to arouse sad memories—thoughts of early sins and youthful follies; but with Jesus there were none of these as He returned to the place "where He had been brought up." As He went into the synagogue the purity of His childhood and youth and the sinlessness of His manhood sustained Him in the presence of His Father. But if we cannot enter the house of God with unstained souls as Jesus did, we can leave it as He did, clothed with the Lord our Righteousness.

Jesus went to the synagogue to worship His Father. I fear too many Christians go to hear the preacher or to listen to the music. God deliver us from the worship of man, and when we go to His house may it always be to worship Him and to meet with His people!

The main characteristic of Jesus' words to the people was the honor He paid to the Word: "This day is this Scripture fulfilled." What other things might He not have preached on! Here was the Creator of the world: what might He not have told of the secrets of geology! Yet on that subject there was perfect silence. Here was He who knew all the secrets of souls, and "needed not that any should testify of man; for He knew what was in man." What a sermon he might have preached on metaphysics! Yet on this subject too there was perfect silence. What might He not have told us of history, what about the future, for He could read it as He could the past. Yet not a single word about this. What a wonderful oration He might have delivered on many subjects on which He alone could have given us trustworthy information! But He makes His deliberate choice, and He chooses as His subject the Gospel of the Grace of God.

Let this be a lesson for all: the true work of the preacher is not oratory, not science, not history; it is to deliver the old message, the Gospel of the grace of God. I hope it is so with you to-day; with all your new discoveries and inventions I trust you will stand fast in the old paths, and your pulpits will ever send forth the old message. To swerve one inch from this is to swerve from God and His commission. Remember there is no new thing needed in the pulpit, and the only need we have is for more earnestness.

Notice the personal way in which Christ addressed His hearers, "This day is the Scripture fulfilled in your ears." We want to speak to every man as if he stood alone before God, saying as Nathan said to David, "Thou art the man."

Notice, too, the pressing character of Christ's message, "This day." Thank God for the past; hope in Him for the future; but this day and this hour you must deal with the Most High. Why should you come to God with that old doubt, that old anxiety hanging over you? Deal at once and directly with God; beg Him once for all to relieve you; ask Him for a present blessing, and this day will the Scripture be fulfilled in your ears.

Then Jesus went on to speak of doctrine, and in doing so, like His servants in these days, He excited wrath among the people. He spoke of God's election and the Divine sovereignty, and His hearers were filled with wrath. He quoted instances of selection well known to them in their own history. There was the great famine in the days of Elias, when there must have been many widows in the land, but, as Jesus pointed out to His hearers, "Unto none of them was Elias sent, save unto Sarepta, a city of Sidon, unto a woman that was a widow." Again there were many lepers in Israel in the time of Elisha, "but none of them was cleansed; saving Naaman," and he was a Syrian.

"And all they in the synagogue, when they heard these things, were filled with wrath, and rose up, and thrust Him out of the city." They did not believe in a discriminating God. I hope you believe in God as He is revealed to you by Jesus, as willing to save all who come to Him, but yet a King whose will is all-powerful; who sends out His ministers to preach the Gospel to all nations, but who says "it shall accomplish that which I please, and shall prosper in the thing whereto I sent it." God is a Royal God; honor Him as such, His purposes of love past your finding out, and He doing all things well.

The doctrine of God's sovereignty did not stand alone in Christ's sermon any more than it stands alone in the Scripture. The very instances He quoted were marked cases of individual responsibility. The widow gave her all, but not until she had received the assurance of Elijah that the barrel of meal and the cruse of oil would be replenished. Naaman was cleansed, but not until he had conquered his jealousy about Jordan's poor stream and complied with the conditions.

If you are not prepared like the widow to surrender your all to Christ, you will find no place in His kingdom. If you are not content to accept His salvation with humility, as a little child, your soul will be uncleansed. It rests with you to accept or reject the offer, and this truth of individual responsibility stands side by side with the other truth of God's selection, and both truths it is necessary to enforce

IV. THE RESULT.

Mark, describing the scene, tells us the people were astonished. At least they understood what was said. They were moved by what they heard, although they were moved in the wrong direction. They rejected the message, and even tried to kill the Preacher, but they were in no doubt as to His meaning. The responsibility rested with themselves after Christ had explained to them that even as He spoke the Scripture was fulfilled in their ears.

I know the imperfections of the ministry. Critics should remember that none are so conscious of those imperfections as ministers themselves. If you could hear their confessions when they are alone with Jesus in their closet, you would see that they need no criticism to open their eyes to their own weaknesses. I smile at criticism. I say to the critics, You do not say one half of what you might say of us; you do not know us as we know ourselves.

But with all our imperfections we at least seek to put before you the whole truth—so to present the Saviour to you that you may behold Him, believe and live. I dare to call you to witness this day, as you will be called to witness at the last day, whether your pastor has not done his duty by you in this respect. And what have you done? You have wondered, and that is all.

These Nazarenes "rose up, and thrust Him out of the city, and led Him unto the brow of the hill whereon their city was built, that they might cast Him down headlong." You say, "We would not have done that." We do not know. In all that is essential you have done as they did, when you have not welcomed the Saviour offered to you. You have rejected Him, you have cast Him out of your hearts, and in that your sin is of the same kind as theirs.

How can you reject the salvation which week by week is offered in your hearing? How can you bear the eternal burden of your sin? Have you not heard of the worm that never dies? and of the fire that is never quenched? I beseech you this night to consider your position. We shall never meet again in this world, and I beg of you very solemnly and very earnestly to come to Christ now, and not to turn away, saying, "We will not have this man to reign over us." "Seek, and ye shall find; ask, and ye shall receive." Then shall you say, "I have looked to Christ and I am saved."

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

The subscription-price is $1.50, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, October 22d, at 4.40 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Public Interest in Politics Since the Result of the Ohio election has been made known, has been transferred to the triangular contest in progress in the Empire State. In that contest the two rival sections of the local Democratic party, whose candidates are, respectively, Governor Robinson and Mr. John Kelly, are waging as fierce a war on each other, as against their Republican opponents, whose candidate is Mr. Cornell. The usual fate of the house divided against itself is dreaded by the Democratic party throughout the nation, and fears are entertained that, should the division result in seating the Republican candidate in the Gubernatorial chair, not only will the State be lost to the party, but that all hopes of carrying the Presidential election next year must be abandoned. Repeated attempts have therefore been made to effect a reconciliation between the hostile leaders; and Senator Hill, of Georgia, has paid two visits to New York in the hope of mediating, but the result, so far, is not considered to be of an encouraging character.

The Republicans are prosecuting the campaign with energy, encouraged by the division in the camp of their opponents. Enthusiastic meetings are being held throughout the State, and on October 22d, a large gathering, under the presidency of the Hon. Levi P. Morton, at Cooper Union, was attended by Mr. Secretary Evarts and Senator Blaine, who delivered stirring addresses, and expressed sanguine hopes of success.

The Ladies and Children Carried off by the Indians in the attack on the agency at Milk River on September 29th, have been given up. The gravest apprehensions as to their fate had been entertained, and were not dispelled by the assurances of the Indians that they were safe and unharmed. A telegram from Special Agent Adams to Secretary Schurz, dated October 25th, states that "the Utes are now encamped at Plateau River, and, with the aid of Indian couriers, Chief Ouray is in constant communication with them. They are said to be poorly provided with ammunition with which to continue the war, and therefore not so obstinate in their expectations of the Government condoning their offence. Having released the captives, it is thought they will naturally expect to give up conditionally."

The Indians gave to Agent Adams a detailed account of what they regarded as their grievances. and the reasons which influenced them in taking the war path. From their statement it is evident that if our troops had pursued the Utes they would have massacred the women and children, not being able in that mountainous country to provide them with ordinary comforts.

The telegram also announces that Mrs. Meeker and Miss Josephine Meeker, Mrs. Price and the two children, have been surrendered, and are now in General Merritt's camp. They say that they were well treated by the Indians, but the impression is that had it not been for Ouray's orders they would all have been massacred.

The understanding still continues that the troops shall not move from the White River Agency until further orders. Secretary Schurz and General Sherman both agree that the information at hand indicates a speedy termination of the campaign.

A Ship on Fire.—Details of a Horrible Disaster have been forwarded from New Orleans. An English vessel arrived at that port October 23d, carrying seventeen men supposed to be the sole survivors of the Spanish steamer Nuevo Pajaro del Oceano, which was burned at sea early in the morning of Saturday, October 18th. Even in the terrible annals of marine tragedy it is rare to find such a combination of horrors as accompanied and followed the burning of the steamer. Fire catching among boxes of petroleum and running swiftly through the vessel just at dawn; a hurried rush of the passengers from their beds; the swamping of most of the boats; the floating of the survivors all day long, and many of them through the night and into the next morning, on planks, to which they clung with scorched hands, naked, in the tropical sunshine, while the salt sea washed their burns; and the appearance of sharks, which devoured some of the unhappy wretches before the eyes of their companions—make up a picture the horrors of which it is almost impossible to realize. The captain of the rescuing steamer appears to have executed his duty of searching and saving most faithfully, but he succeeded in picking up only seventeen of the sixty passengers and crew.

The fire broke out at four o'clock in the morning, and from the inflammable nature of the cargo which consisted principally of brandy, wines, rum, and petroleum, soon gained complete possession of the ship. The sailors worked at the pumps until the flames surrounded them and then there was a mad rush for the boats, all discipline being forgotten in the eagerness of every man to secure his own safety. It is supposed that if order could have been maintained many more might have been saved, but two boats were swamped by the rush which took place as soon as they were lowered. Great credit is due to the English captain for the trouble he took in searching the scene of the disaster for hapless survivors who had succeeded in keeping themselves afloat.

The Yellow Fever at Memphis has, it is hoped, finally disappeared. The following welcome announcement was issued by the Board of Health on Saturday, October 25th.

"Owing to the fall of temperature within the past three days, there having been two good frosts, with a prospect of a continuation of cold weather, the Board of Health hereby declares the epidemic of 1879 at an end, and announces that there is little danger to be apprehended from yellow fever by absentees or other persons coming into the city. It takes this occasion to advise the people on their return to avoid infected places. There are a few cases of yellow fever yet in the city, and a few cases may yet develop; but by ordinary prudence there is no danger of the disease now spreading from that source.

The Duties of Christian Citizens in the Forthcoming election formed the subject of Dr. Talmage's lecture to his people on Friday, October 24th. After referring to the peculiarities of the Brooklyn elections, he made the following remarks, which are as applicable to other cities as to Brooklyn:

"Standing, as we do, as citizens and philanthropists and Christians, at this crisis, let us decide the moral fate of our city in the right direction. The more population the worse, if they have no moral restraint. The sea-breeze cannot purify an atmosphere breathed on by dissipation and sin. Better halt where we a now than march to the doom of that city whi will not have God in its councils, and whi mistakes the bloat of unhealthy growth for p manent advancement. We must keep our C Hall clean. That is the point where you m feel the moral pulse of the city. Dishonest jo must be hurled down the marble steps befo they get a fair foothold. Water boards, havi so much to do with the cleansing of the ci must themselves be clean. Street commissic ers must make a highway for justice. Heal officers must understand that they have mu to do with the moral disorders as well as w the physical condition of the city. The co stabulary must be alert and appreciative of th high responsibility. Let our Park Comm sioners rightly expend the moneys of the peo in the bloom and the foliage and the rose, a the bridle paths and the lawns, which shall education and life to all classes of citizens. I our public schools have able instruction, and morals as well as the intelligence of the you be considered, remembering they are to Brooklyn after we have passed off. Let jails be well ventilated and reformatory, turn out the incarcerated better than when they w in, and let our churches of all denominations forth a gospel that will make men better for t world as well as the next. And let us all aro to more public-spiritedness, and not only at ballot-box week after next, but in every possi way, toil for the welfare of the city and the Stat

Immigrants are being Defrauded by scrupulous men pretending to arrange for th settlement in Texas. An English farmer has cently returned from Texas with the story o fraud that has been practised upon him and companions in enticing them to a barren desolate country without wood or water. tended Texas colonization agents have been active in the North, particularly in New E land, during the past year. One of them indu half a dozen families in a little New Hamps village to listen to his glowing accounts of richness and fertility of the Texas soil, and form a little colony. He assured them churches, schools, and academies would spi up in the new land, and in a few years its so advantages would equal those of New Engla He collected $200 from each family and camped. His victims are unable to learn present whereabouts. None of them c afford to lose the money. Most of them poor, and hoped to better their condition. was not only poor, but an invalid, and was l into the scheme by the expectation of impro health. A scheme so utterly cruel deserves emplary punishment, which, for the sake of national reputation, we hope will be meted promptly.

A Church Built by Faith is to be Dedica early next month at Amherst, Mass. The Edward P. King first conceived the idea erecting a Methodist church in that locality, when he proposed its erection the wonde people inquired from whence the money coming with which to build it. The belie minister thought he knew. Much praying been done about it, and very much honest self-sacrificing toil. It is the work of lo charity and holy faith from foundation top-stone. The humblest friends have con uted their mites, and it is supposed that single dollars have been given toward the than ever went to make up a similar sum bef A small amount is still required to clear total cost, and as soon as that is raised, and place can be opened free of debt, the cerem will take place.

A Temperance Test in the Army.—Hon. McCrary, the United States Secretary of Wa a temperance man, and was, for years, a pr nent officer in the Grand Lodge of Good T plars in his State. He has ordered that an a cant for an appointment in the army shall after be asked, "Are you addicted to the us intoxicating liquors as a beverage?"

The Obelisk Given by the Late Khedive of gypt to be erected in this city was on Thurs- y delivered to Captain Gorringe, the officer nt to receive it and superintend its removal. is similar to the one acquired by England and cently erected on the Thames embankment in ondon. An important point has been gained in e business now that the American officer is tually in the possession of the monument, and ly the seas and other physical obstacles are to overcome, for these, though great, are such science knows how to deal with. As the la- rs incident to removal were begun promptly, so ey will doubtless be pushed rapidly forward.

Mormon Immigrants from England to Utah e being warned of the risk they run in leaving eir native land to live a life of immorality. ajor Greig, the head constable of Liverpool, ngland, has issued a notice by way of warning, citing that there is "reason to believe that a stem of soliciting persons to join the faith and nigrate to America prevails extensively, and minding such persons that by American law lygamy is prohibited, and that those who actise it are liable to heavy fines and long terms imprisonment."

An Odd Wedding Fee was Tendered a few ys ago at St. Louis. As a justice of the peace s sitting in his office a man covered with char- al grime tumbled over the chair nearest the or and asked how much it would cost to be arried. The price was too high. The poor t honest bridegroom said that he lived in fferson County, that he and his intended had me to the city peddling charcoal and wanted go back as man and wife. A barrel of char- al was still on hand, and this was offered as e marriage fee. The kind-hearted justice con- uded that it would be a good thing to make em man and wife, and the barrel of charcoal s dumped into the cellar according to agree- ent.

A Child's Dying Request.—A Few Years o a little girl, Fannie Smith, aged seven years, Philadelphia, sent for her pastor, Rev. Dr. S. . Muchmore, who found her dying. She handed Dr. Muchmore all her little savings, and said, I want you to take this money and build a urch for poor people like us. Now," said she, promise me; so I shall know when I am in aven that it is done." The promise was ade, efforts to supplement the little girl's sav- gs were successful, a place was selected on ghteenth Street near Montgomery Avenue, d a frame building, known as the Free Colle- ate Church, with a seating capacity of 400 per- ns, was erected, and dedicated without debt the first Sunday of June, 1876. The Sunday- hool has increased from forty-five to three ndred; over one hundred persons have united th the church, and the frame building has en replaced by a large stone church to accom- odate over two thousand persons. There is doubt the little girl knows what has come of r gift.

The Moody and Sankey Hymns have been blished in many languages. Friends of Mr. nkey have recently sent him copies of the mns from Spain, China, and the Sandwich ands, and printed in the languages of those untries. He has four editions of them in inese, and believes each edition is by a differ- t publisher.

The Bishop and the Baby.—Dr. Selwyn, shop of New Zealand, was noted for his kind- ss of heart. The following incident related himself illustrates the gentleness which dis- guished the follower of Him who took little ildren in His arms and blessed them, saying, Suffer little children to come unto me." It as simply told in illustration of the possibility a naturally helpless man overcoming the diffi- lties of suddenly finding himself placed in arge of young children. During one of the peditions along the coast of New Zealand, Dr. lwyn had given a passage to a woman who had th her a baby just weaned. The voyage was ugh, and she became absolutely prostrate with a-sickness. The baby remained preternaturally lively, and the question, "what to do with it?" became of serious concern for the officers and crew. Dr. Selwyn solved the question by taking the child under his own care. There was an apprentice named Tom on board who took naturally to children, and he was installed as under-nurse. "The voyage lasted eleven days," the Bishop said, "during which time the mother was wholly incapable of doing any thing, but with the assistance of Tom we got along splendidly."

A Massacre of Protestant Missionaries is Reported to have taken place in Mexico. It occurred at Toluco, about fifty miles from the City of Mexico, in the Presbyterian Mission. How many were killed is not stated, but one man, after being badly cut, was dragged through the streets and then hung up to a tree, where his body remained all night. The Rev. John Butler, a Methodist missionary in the City of Mexico, has written a letter to friends in New York reporting the outrage.

Prospects of the Churches.—A Boston Journal says: "We have never heard, at the opening of a new season, more encouraging reports from the churches than at the present time. Special evangelical labors have been commenced quite generally. Reports from all portions of New England assure us of a revived condition of the churches, and of numerous conversions. Large attention is properly given to the young people and children."

Unwelcome Immigrants are Expected to arrive shortly in New York. Two of the principal detectives in London were convicted about two years ago of receiving large bribes to induce them not to arrest wealthy swindlers who were duping the public of England and France. They were sentenced to a term of imprisonment which has now expired. Intimation has been forwarded that they are on their way to this country, where they hope to obtain employment. Our needs are varied, but certainly this class of immigrants are not required here.

Mrs. Amanda Smith, a Colored Evangelist, formerly a slave, well known as a successful Christian and temperance worker in this country, and who has recently been conducting meetings acceptably among the higher classes in England and Scotland, started in October by the overland route for Bombay, India. She was called there by the Rev. William B. Osborn, who has charge of the missions established by the Rev. William Taylor in that city some years ago.

A New Use for Monkeys.—In one of the school districts in London too many parents reported no children in their families, and in order to ascertain the real number of children in the district the school officers resorted to an ingenious measure. Two monkeys were gayly dressed, put in a wagon, and, accompanied by a brass band, were carried through the streets of the district. At once crowds of children made their appearance. The procession was stopped in a park, and the school officers began their work; distributing candies to the youngsters, they took their names and addresses. They found out that over sixty parents kept their children from school. The ingenious measure brought to the schools about 200 boys and girls.

A Witness from the Grave Against the Inquisition was found recently in the corpse of a Prince of the Imperial family of Montezuma. The Prince had been condemned to death by the Spanish Inquisition, and had been seized and forced into the niche of a wall and built in. The exclusion of the air had preserved the body during the many years which have since elapsed, and the perfect remains witness to the horrible cruelty of the inquisitors. The body, which resembles a wooden statue, was sold by auction and purchased by the trustees of an English museum.

The First Volume of the "Christian Herald and Signs of Our Times," handsomely bound in cloth, is now ready, and may be had on application to the office, 63 Bible House, New York. It contains Nos. 1 to 36, being the issues from October 24th, 1878, to June 26th, 1879, inclusive. Price, including postage, $2.50.

SELF-RIGHTEOUSNESS.—A SMOULDERING HEAP OF RUBBISH.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Which say, Stand by thyself, come not near to me; for I am holier than thou. These are a smoke in my nose, a fire that burneth all the day."—Isaiah 65: 5.

The Sins of Israel—First Idolatry, then Self-righteousness—The Sin of Self-righteousness—I. It grows up among Religious People—II. It Flourishes where other Sins Abound—III. A Great Sin in Itself—It is Blasphemy, Idolatry, and Profanity—IV. The Fruit of Man's own Thoughts—V. It Leads to Despising Others—VI. It is Abominable in the Sight of God—VII. It Bars a Man from all Hope of Salvation—The Remedy.

The Apostle Paul shall be our interpreter here. You remember how in the tenth chapter of his Epistle to the Romans he quotes from this chapter and says, "Esaias is very bold, and saith, I was found of them that sought me not; I was made manifest unto them that asked not after Me. But to Israel he saith, All day long I have stretched forth My hands unto a disobedient and gainsaying people."

Isaiah was very bold to speak the Gospel so plainly, when a legal spirit prevailed, and very bold to defy the enmity of his own nation by declaring that they would be rejected for their sins, while the far-off heathen would be brought in by sovereign grace. He was bold to denounce hypocrites to their faces, and to smite a proud nation with the threatenings of the Lord. Perhaps it was for this boldness that he suffered a cruel death by the hands of Manasseh.

The application of the passage to Israel is just thus. Year after year God dealt with great patience towards His chosen people, but they seemed to be desperately set upon idolatry in one form or another. Sometimes they worshipped Jehovah, but then they did it under figure and symbol, whereas He has expressly forbidden that even His own worship should be thus celebrated. He who said in the first commandment, "Thou shalt have no other gods before Me," said also in the second, "Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, or that is in the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth: thou shalt not bow down thyself to them, nor serve them."

At other times they altogether rejected Jehovah, and worshipped Baal and Ashtaroth, and whole troops of the gods of the heathen, and thus they provoked the Lord exceedingly. They also practised necromancy, or pretended communion with the dead, and witchcraft and sorcery, and all manner of abominable rites, like the depraved nations around them. When this open rebellion was given up, as it was after the captivity—for the Jews have never been guilty of idolatry since that day—they fell into another form of the same evil, namely, self-righteousness: so that when our Lord came He found self-righteousness to be the crying sin of Israel, the Pharisees carrying it to such a pitch as to render it utterly ridiculous. They reckoned that the touch of a common person polluted their sacredness, so that they needed to wash after walking down a street. When they traversed the ways they took the edge of the pavement, so that they might not brush against the garments of the passers-by, and even in the temple in prayer they stood by themselves lest they should be defiled. Their whole spirit is expressed in the words of the text—"Stand by thyself, come not near to me; for I am holier than thou." This God declares to be as obnoxious to Him as smoke in a man's nose. He could not bear it. He was no more able to tolerate their self-righteousness than to endure their idolatry.

It is this last form of the evil of the Israelitish heart which I am going to speak about this morning, because it is a phase of evil which is now common among us. Self-righteousness is rampant in our own day. There be many who come up to the courts of the Lord's house and mingle amongst the followers of Christ who still say, "Stand by, for I am holier than thou."

Our sermon is meant to be

A CANNONADE

against self-righteousness, that righteousness which a man makes out of his own doings, his own feelings, his own alms, prayers, or sacraments—all such righteousness is to be utterly despised.

I. The first point is this : the sin of self-righteousness grows up among religious people. It is not always the sin of the outside world, for many outsiders do not pretend to any righteousness at all, and I fancy they think all the better of themselves for that. This is an idle plea, which it needs not many words to expose. "I make no profession," says one. This is about as honorable a confession as if a thief should boast when caught at picking pockets, "I do not make any pretence to be honest," or a liar when detected should turn round and cry "I never professed to speak the truth." Would you have men glory in not professing to be honest or true? Yet, surely, they do no worse than one who boasts that he does not profess to fear God. Such a man has gone to a considerable pitch of iniquity before he can brazen his face to make his glory in that which is his shame.

Among those who profess to be religious, self-righteousness very frequently comes in, because they have not truly received the religion of Jesus Christ ; if they were true believers they would be humble and contrite, for self-righteousness and faith in Christ are diametrically opposed. He that is saved by grace finds no room for glorying in himself. What saith the apostle? "Where is boasting, then? It is excluded." The word is, it is shut out, it has the door shut in its face. A sinner washed in Jesus' blood and clothed in Jesus' righteousness, glories only in the Lord. He has done once for all with that particular form of sin which glories in self ; it is detestable in his sight. His cry is "God forbid that I should glory, save in the cross of our Lord Jesus Christ."

Many who mingle with Christians, and are religious in a certain sense because they practise the forms of religion, are wont to put the form into the place of the spirit. With them in baptism the washing in water is every thing, but the burial with Christ which it sets forth is quite unknown ; with them the partaking of the bread and the wine are every thing at the Lord's table, but the spiritual feeding upon the body and blood of Christ is not understood. With them the place of worship is every thing, but the spirit of worship is lacking. The broken heart, the contrite spirit, the soul that trembleth at God's Word, the heart that joys in the Lord—they are strangers to all this, though they can sit as God's people sit, though they can hear as God's people hear, and look as if they were all that saints should be.

These persons, too, even when they do not join the Christian Church, but only worship or seem to worship with Christians, are very apt to think that they must be better than other people because they do so. They are not openly Sabbath-breakers. Is there not something in this? Yes, there is something in it, certainly, and we will not say a word against it ; but there is not every thing in it, and certainly not enough in it to make a perfect righteousness of it. The bed is shorter than that a man may stretch himself on it, and the covering is too narrow for a man to wrap himself in it.

"Oh ! but I have occupied a seat in an orthodox chapel for many years." Yes, that may be, and if you have not received the Gospel, those sermons which you have heard will rise up against you in judgment, to your condemnation. It is true you close your eyes in prayer, but if you never pray do you not mock God with a pretence of doing it, and may it not turn out that your religiousness is only an impudent provoking of God to His face?

II. This is a sin which flourishes where other sins abound. We read of these people that they did evil before the eyes of God, and chose that wherein He delighted not. They blasphemed God, and polluted themselves with unhallowed rites, communing with demons and the powers of darkness, and pretending to speak with departed spirits ; and yet, for all that they said, "Stand by thyself, I am holier than thou."

Self-righteousness is never more ridiculous than in persons whose conduct would not bear scrutiny for a moment. See the Pharisee with his phylactery, and his broad-hemmed garment standing there in conscious perfection ! See him and feel disgust, for the wretched hypocrite has been secretly devouring a widow's house, and his heart is full of ravening and wickedness. In his greediness and lust he makes clean the outside of his cup and platter, but within he is full of extortion and excess. Hear how the devil derides him ! "Ah, ah !" he laughs with satanic glee, "the outside may be as you will. What care I while the inside is foul !"

Moreover, self-righteous men, like foxes, have many tricks and schemes. They condemn in other people what they consider to be very excusable in themselves. They would cry out against others for a tenth part of the sin which they allow in themselves : certain constitutional tendencies, and necessities of circumstances, and various surroundings, all serve as ample apologies.

Besides this, if it be admitted that they are wrong upon some points, yet in other directions they are beyond rebuke. If they drink, they do not swear ; and if they swear, they do not steal : they make a great deal out of negatives : if they steal, they are not greedy and miserly, but spend their gains freely. If they practise fornication, yet they do not commit adultery ; if they talk filthily, yet they boast they do not lie. They would be counted good because they are not universally bad.

They do not break every hedge, and therefore they plead that they are not trespassers. As if a debtor for a hundred pounds should claim to be excused because he does not owe two hundred : or, as if a highwayman should say, "I did not stop all the travellers on the road ; I only robbed one or two, and therefore I ought not to be punished." If a man should wilfully break the windows of your shop, I warrant you you would not take it as an excuse if he pleaded, "I did not break them all ; I only smashed one sheet of plate glass." Pleas which would not be mentioned in a human court are thought good enough to offer to God. Oh the folly of our race !

OH THIS HORRIBLE SELF-RIGHTEOUSNESS !

it is not merely to be found in the man who attends his church regularly and reads his prayers daily ; it is found in the man who will not go to his church nor say his prayers. The harlot has her self-righteousness ; the thief, the drunkard, the profane still have their self-justifications. Yea, and it may be seen even in Atheists who have cast off all fear of God, and then stand in an elevation of self-esteem which hardly any other man can match. Hear him : "I have proved my freedom of thought and nobility of mind ; I am the model man. As for these Christians, they are cants and hypocrites ; and believers in Christ are either fools or knaves. No man has any honest and rational convictions but myself. I can improve upon the Bible and criticise the life of Christ. Stand by thyself. I am holier than thou." This weed of self-righteousness will grow on any dunghill. No heap of rubbish is too rotten for the accursed toadstool of proud self to grow upon.

III. As self-righteousness grows among sins to our surprise, so it is in itself a great sin. One is almost startled to find self-esteem placed after such a list of sins as this chapter records. To the Jew the eating of swine's flesh and broth of abominable things was a great pollution, but self-righteousness is classed with it ; it is even placed with necromancy and witchcraft. Drunkenness and swearing are sin in rags, but self-righteousness is sin in a respectable black coat. It is an aristocratic sin, and does not like to be put down with the common ruck ; and if we call it sin, yet many will plead that it is only so in a very refined sense. But God does not think so : He classes it with the very worst, and He does so because it is one of the worst.

For a man to be self-righteous is in itself a sin of sins. For, first, it is blasphemy. Perhaps you do not see that. Follow me, then. God is holy. Here comes this base impostor and boasts, "And I am holy too." Is not that a ludicrous and contemptible form of blasphemy? It is profanity in its very essence. The cherubim are crying "Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts · heaven and earth are full of the majesty of Thy glory," and amid it all there is heard this squeaking pretender, whining, "And I am holy too."

O wretched egotist, thou dost at once lie and blaspheme ! The heavens are not pure in His sight : He charged His angels with folly, and dost thou, that art born of woman, and defiled from head to foot, dare to talk about righteousness? Righteousness, indeed ! when thou art a mass of sin.

More, this self-righteousness is idolatry, for the man who counts himself to be righteous by his own works worships himself. Practically, the object of his adoration is his own dear, delectable, excellent self ; all his confidence is in himself, his boasting is in himself ; and, though he may sing psalms to God with his voice, yet his heart is really singing hymns to himself, and he is saying unto himself, "Thou hast done well, my soul ; there is something great and bright in thee ; thou deservest much of thy Creator ; thou shalt surely enter heaven on thine own terms. At thy worst thou hast never been so bad as thy fellow-men ; at thy best thou art a right noble being, and a brilliant reward is thy due." What is this but idolatry in its worst form?

Then, again, it is profanity, for it gives God the distinct lie. The Lord declares that no man is righteous. He saith that he looked from heaven and surveyed the sons of men, and he saw that "there is none righteous, no, not one." To this divine assertion self-righteousness gives a flat contradiction, for it claims to be itself holy.

He testifies that God's "No, not one." is false, for he himself is one righteous person, and therefore there may be others. Though God saith that by the works of the law no flesh shall be justified in His sight, yet this man saith, "By the works of the law I shall be justified," and so he profanes the word of the Most High, and questions the truth of God, which is as the apple of Jehovah's eye. It is clear beyond all question that self-righteousness is in itself a great, God-defying sin. May the Lord deliver us from it, and by the Holy Spirit work in us a humble, lowly faith in Jesus Christ, the Lord.

ITS SOURCE.

IV. In the fourth place we would remark that self-righteousness is the fruit of man's own thoughts. Look at the second verse of the chapter—"I have spread out my hands all the day unto a rebellious people, which walketh in a way that was not good, after their own thoughts." Those who have high thoughts of themselves do not walk according to God's commandments but according to their own notions.

If any man thinketh himself to be righteous in himself, he has never derived that idea from God's law. Read the ten commands, understand their spirituality, and know that they concern not only overt deeds, but thoughts and imaginations, and you will see that the law condemns us all without exception. It proves ou guilt, reveals our proneness to evil, pronounce a curse upon us, and gives us over to condemnation. It pays us no respect, but shuts us up i hopeless despair. A man who is self-righteous therefore, did not derive his self-esteem from true consideration of the law.

His proud notions come not from the law and certainly not from the Gospel, for the Gosp knows no man after the flesh as righteous, bu it regards all men as sinners, and comes to the with pardon ; it treats men as lost and comes t save them. If there be a man in the world wh re and perfect by nature the Gospel has ng to say to him, for it was not intended to such a case. Its medicines are not for upon whom the sickness of sin has never , for "the whole have no need of a physi, but they that are sick." Our great Lord ca not to call the righteous, but sinners to re nce. Jesus is the sinner's friend.

C rist came to wash away stains, not to flat en into a notion of their spotlessness ; He to heal the sick, not to applaud the vigor- To such as are righteous in themselves is not a single syllable of promise in the Gospel : why should there be, for they it not? Self-righteousness is a child which er Law nor Gospel will own ; it is born in ouse of folly, and it is nursed by human n .

e to those who make eternal shipwreck they dream that they are steering straight e desired haven. God save you from set- up to furnish yourselves with inspiration. are not oracles, and should never dream of so. Search the Scriptures to know the of your case, and then you will recoil from ery idea of the righteousness of unrenewed Your glory will become your shame, your gled robes will turn to worthless rags, and vill accept with humble gratitude the right- ness which is of God by faith.

This leads us on to our fifth remark, which s : Self-righteousness has this vice about it, it always leads to despising others. That ey said, "Stand by thyself, come not near ; for I am holier than thou." The self- eous think thus of one another : one sinner ls pollution from another, one rebel is ed lest he should be made disloyal by an- . Think of a wretch condemned to die for in, and yet afraid that a fellow criminal t soil his innocence. To what a pitch of ess does pride lift itself! "Do not come me ; I am holy," cries the man steeped in sin Oh! the absurdity of self-righteousness! Th pride is loathsome to the last degree.

THE PITH OF THE TEXT.

is pride is seen to be still more loathsome the proud self-deceiver bids the lowly pen- man stand off. The repenting publican ha his eyes opened to his real state, and he go up to the temple and he prays, "God be ful to me a sinner." He does not dare to up, he is so broken-hearted ; but yonder Ph isee is bold to thank God for his own sur- ng virtues. See how he gathers up his s for fear the fringe of his raiment should h the ground whereon the publican has set his olluting foot!

hy, sirs, that publican was one of God's jew- and this abominable Pharisee was a mere hill, reeking with offensive self-conceit. lid not know it, but his self-righteousness e him despise the very man of whom God said, "To this man will I look, and with will I dwell ; even to him that is poor and of contrite spirit, and that trembleth at My d."

Oh!" says one of my free-thinking but self- teous hearers, "I hate such cant. Confess- sin is all nonsense. I cannot endure to hear talk." We are well aware of that, good but this weighs not with us. We know you well, and recognize in you an old acquaint- of some nineteen hundred years' standing. d Pharisees never can endure penitent pub- s, nor their Saviour either. They are al- saying of the Lord's ministers that which once said of Himself, "This man receiveth ers and eateth with them." They find fault the great Advocate and His clients, with great Physician and His patients, but the R eemer's kingdom waits not their patronage fears not their opposition. If you reject the quet of mercy, and will not come to it, there others who shall, and your refusal shall bring our own head the contempt you now reserve others.

es, and this self-righteous spirit dares to pour its bitterness upon the most gracious men. If you want a thorough-paced persecutor find a self-righteous man. I tell you there is no venom in the heart of dissolute, debauched men against Christianity that is at all comparable to the poison of asps which lies in the heart of the self-righteous man.

VI. But I must pass on to observe that self-righteousness is most ABOMINABLE IN THE SIGHT OF GOD.

What does He compare it to? He says, "It is a smoke in My nose, a fire that burneth all the day." At the bottom of the garden we gather together the dead leaves, and all the rubbish of the garden, and the heap is lighted, and it keeps on burning and smouldering all the day ; and if you go and stand in the eye of the wind your eyes will smart, your nose will be offended, and you will feel that you cannot bear it. As you see the refuse burning, smoking, smouldering all the day, it will tell you what the Lord thinks of man's righteousness.

Moreover, self-righteousness is such a proud thing. God is always provoked with pride. It is one of the evils which His soul hates. He daily fits His arrow upon His string to fetch down the proud in heart. The self-righteous man is proud in himself and proud with a contemptuous sneer at others, and therefore the Lord abhors him.

Self-righteousness also denies the wisdom of God's plan, and is utterly opposed to it. God's present plan of working in the world goes upon the theory that we are guilty ; being guilty, He provides a Saviour for us, and sends us a Gospel full of grace. His whole system is a gigantic blunder if we are or can be righteous in and of ourselves. The work of the Holy Spirit is needless if we can be of ourselves fit for heaven. The whole character of this gracious dispensation is a mistake if man is not guilty.

The man who says "I am righteous," virtually casts a slur upon a work which is meant to be the highest display of the divine love and wisdom. He is like the Greek to whom the cross of Christ was "foolishness." I venture to say that self-righteousness in effect makes Christ Himself to be a superfluity, and this, my brethren, is the unkindest cut of all. This is a stab at the heart of the great Father. Did Jesus come down from heaven and take our nature because we were sinners, and in that nature did He give himself a sacrifice that He might put away sin, and was all this a mistake? Calvary, art Thou a blunder? Bleeding Saviour, wert Thou an amiable enthusiast, putting away sin which did not exist, and filling a fountain for the removal of stains which are not to be found? Yet self-righteousness involves all this.

If one sinner has a right to be self-righteous so has another ; and then it comes to this, that God should deal with us all on quite another theory, and instead of His dear Son coming to the world to die for us as sinners, we might all go to heaven without an atonement or a Saviour. Do you think God can bear such a slur upon Christ, such a trampling on the precious blood of His own Son? Can even long-suffering bear this?

I may be speaking to some who have not before considered what their self-righteousness means, but I hope they see it now. Get rid of it, my dear friends ; put off your ornaments of fancied virtue, and put the dust and ashes of confession on your heads. Go home and tear your finery to pieces, and put on the robe of heavenly righteousness, otherwise you will be as long as you live nothing but that smoking heap of weeds at the bottom of the garden ; and whereas you think you are a bright and shining light, God's thoughts will be the reverse, for He will count you to be a mere smother of smoke in His nose, a fire that smouldereth all the day.

VII. The last point, and one of the most practical, is this, that self-righteousness most effectually bars a man from all hope of salvation. We cannot be saved unless we become truly holy, but, my brethren, no man ever becomes truly holy who is content with

A FALSE HOLINESS.

If he says, "I am holy," he never will be holy. The student who enters college as a wise man will probably remain a fool. You never can win wisdom till you confess your folly. The man who says, "I am rich," but is under a delusion which makes him call counters gold, will never be rich ; it is a first necessity that he be able to estimate his true estate. So that self-righteousness shuts a man out from real righteousness most effectually.

It also prevents the heart from repentance. How can you repent if you have never sinned? How can you mourn your failure to obey while you conceive that you have kept the law? It shut you out, too, from faith. You never will believe in Jesus Christ while you believe in yourself. "How can ye believe," said Christ, "that receive honor one of another?" If you can save yourself you do not want a Saviour, and consequently you will never trust in the Saviour of sinners.

Man, whilst thou art righteous, Christ and Thy heart will never agree. He brings Thee water, but Thou art not thirsty ; He brings thee the bread of life, but thou art not hungry ; He has made for thee a raiment of needle-work, but thou art not naked ; He comes to enrich thee, but thou art not poor ; He comes to give thee pardon, but thou art not guilty ; He comes to give thee everlasting life, but thou art not dead. What is there, then, in Christ for thee? Just nothing, and so thou wilt never have Christ.

Let me warn you who have heard the Gospel continually, that if you are self-righteous the privileges which you enjoy will be all neutralized and cease to be privileges ; for if you do not come to Jesus when He stretches out His hands, He will call others who are not now a people, and He will be found of those that sought Him not. You are first now in point of privilege, but the first shall be last ; while those outside that have not heard the Gospel shall hear it and be saved ; and so the last shall be first.

God will turn the tables upon you : the children of the kingdom shall be cast out into outer darkness, where shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth, while many shall come from the east and from the west, and shall sit down in the kingdom of God. Beware, you who are self-righteous, lest, because you put yourselves to be the head, God should make you the tail, for then all your Sabbath privileges, and Gospel hearings, will be like millstones about your necks to sink you low as the lowest hell.

What is the remedy for all this?

THE REMEDY

is just this. God saith, "Behold Me;" that is to say, He bids thee cease from doting upon thine own fancied beauties and worshipping thine own foolish image. Look first to the holy God and tremble. Canst thou, of thyself, ever be like Him, pure, spotless, glorious?

Then comes the second, "Behold Me." See Christ Jesus on the cross dying, the just for the unjust, to bring us to God. As thou seest Him dying thy self-righteousness will die. Thou wilt say, "He would never have suffered thus for me unless I had sin to repent of. God would never have put Him to this grief for me unless I had been sadly guilty. I should never have wanted such a Saviour if I had not been a great transgressor.

"In the heights and depths of dying love I read the heights and depths of my accursed sin ; in the infinity of the atonement I read the boundless blackness of my guilt, and lie humble before God. At the same time in that perfect righteousness divine, which has put away sin, I see the hope of a sinner, and as a sinner I look to Christ for every thing." If thou doest this, it is well. God bless thee. May every one here be enabled to do this immediately, and unto God shall be the glory forever and ever! Amen.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S SERMONS ARE PUBLISHED AND INSERTED IN THIS JOURNAL WITH HIS CONCURRENCE AND REVISED BY HIMSELF.

GOSPEL WORK IN BARRACKS.

Recollections by Major Malan.

Coming of Age and to a Right Mind at the Same Time—The First Step under the New Commander an Act of Unbelief—He becomes a Gospel Ploughman—Reads to the Soldiers—Look Straight to the Front!—Light came at Last—A Lasting Blessing from a Visit to Beckenham Rectory—An Encouragement to Christian Women—Saved by a Letter.

JUST at the time I attained the age of twenty-one I also obtained the rank of captain. The world was before me. The comforts of an English country gentleman's life were very alluring. But God had brought to bear on me that blessed influence called in His Word "the fear of the Lord." He made me realize that there was responsibility connected with education, position, and means, and that there is an account to be hereafter given to Him for them.

He made me also feel deeply His goodness and love in giving me this education and position, His mercy in sparing my life at Sebastopol, and in preserving me in India, when so many of my comrades were being called away. As regards the life of a country gentleman, the question was, Where could I do most good—settled in England, or as an officer in the army? I decided, by His grace, to remain in the army, there to serve Him, and to seek, by every possible means, the welfare and comfort of my fellow-soldiers.

To God I felt that I owed every thing; and although I did not know how to serve or please Him, His grace and mercy led me to try. Many of my old brother officers had exchanged to the other battalion of the regiment, in England, and all seemed desirous of leaving India; so, thinking it would be easier to begin to serve God in a regiment where I was not known, I exchanged. I expected and obtained quicker promotion by my exchange; but, although I was afraid to tell any one what was then passing in my mind, my real reason for leaving my old regiment was that just given—the desire to lead a new life and to serve God.

I now know and see that leaving my old regiment on the above ground was an act of unbelief. But I did not then comprehend the power of the sovereign grace of God. What words these are! Peace, strength, and salvation when they are rightly understood. The Lord help me to explain them simply! The grace, that is, the love of God, not only, as above noted, freely forgives sin, but gives power against sin, and power to live for and confess Christ.

The instant the soul really sees the Lord JESUS, as revealed by God in His Word, as its living Saviour, exalted at God's right hand in glory, and believes that His blood has washed away its sin, the power of the Holy Spirit takes possession of it, and by His power the soul is able to serve, and not ashamed to own the name of JESUS. This I did not know, for I was very ignorant: so I went on desiring to do what was right before God, all my mistakes being lovingly and graciously overruled for my highest good.

My sense of responsibility as captain of a company led me to consider what I ought to do for God among the men whom He had placed under my command. I knew that there were many of them who could not read, and I felt that my education was a talent which I could use for their benefit and God's glory. If they could not read, they could not read God's Word; and as I believed it to be true, it was plainly my duty, as their best friend, to read it to them if they would listen.

Accordingly having asked leave from the colonel, I told my color-sergeant that I would go to the barracks every Sunday afternoon who could not read, if they were willing to come. To my very great encouragement a good many men came: not only those who could not read, but several of those who could. I did not attempt to explain the Bible, for I did not understand it then; but I read it; and I also read a page or two of Venn's "Complete Duty of Man," selecting such portions as would suit soldiers.

TO READ TO THE MEN

I had obtained this book solely on account of its title; I wanted to learn my duty as a man, and I was glad of any help; I did not know how easy and simple is the whole duty of man, best told in Christ's words, "This is the work of God, that ye believe on Him whom He hath sent" (John 6 : 29).

By the grace of God I had now fairly put my hand to the plough. A very ignorant and clumsy ploughman I was; but His grace, that sovereign grace which begins, carries on, and brings to a glorious end the salvation of every soul which accepts it, kept me trusting in Him. My training as a soldier, my drilling as an adjutant, all helped me. "Look straight to your front," so often before on my lips, now came to my heart; and one of my favorite verses in the Bible has ever been, "Let thine eyes look right on, and let thine eyelids look straight before thee" (Prov. 4 : 25). A capital text for a Christian soldier. "March on a point;" that point, Christ.

It must not be imagined that I was then more than a seeker; I had not yet found Him who is the Pearl of great price. On the contrary, the love of the world held its place in my heart, and the fear of man was strong as ever. I purposed to make myself "a man of letters;" and to this end bought all the British poets. I waded through Chaucer, Spenser, and on to those of Charles the Second's reign. The more I read the more weary I got. What were they? Fiction. What I wanted was fact, truth; yea, eternal truth. Instead of my mind being improved, it was too often injured; and at last I threw them all away, and stuck more and more to my Bible.

At length the light burst upon my soul—that light which brings peace to the conscience, and enables the soul to rejoice in the knowledge of the forgiveness of sins, of the love of God, and of eternal life. I was riding back from mess one night upon my camel, grieving over the uselessness of my life for the glory of God and the good of man, when, as a ray from heaven, there came into my mind the verse of a chapter I had read to my men, "All we like sheep have gone astray; we have turned every one to his own way; and the Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all" (Isa. 53 : 6).

What! THE INIQUITY OF US ALL? Then all MY iniquity—that means all my sins of omission as well as commission, all my sins, past, present, and future—all laid BY GOD ON CHRIST, all borne away, all forgiven. Oh, the joy! Oh, the peace! How I got down from my camel, ran to my room, and, falling on my knees before God, praised and blessed Him and the Lord Jesus Christ! I have often since been grieved and distressed by sin, but I have, thank God! never, never lost that peace—the peace of free, full, and eternal forgiveness of sins through the blood of Christ.

I will mention, as a help to Christians who may read this, some of the other means used of God in my conversion. I was committed by my mother, before she was called to be with the Lord, to the care of a lady, a relative, who was an earnest Christian. I doubt not that her teaching in my early childhood sowed by grace the seeds of God's truth in my heart. During my boyhood my father made me learn many chapters of the book of Proverbs by heart.

I also met two Christian women whose kindness exercised a powerful influence over me amid all the temptations of a soldier's life. But what first drew my heart towards the Lord Jesus was a visit which I paid, only for a few hours, before going to India, to Beckenham Rectory, Kent, well known as the home of Dr. Marsh's son-in-law, the Rev. F. Chalmers, and his dear wife. The Christian joy and peace I there witnessed I had never seen before, and it made me desire to possess such great blessings.

Gladly would I have given up the pomp and pride of my military calling to have remained in this happy home. The consistent Christian life of two of my old brother officers in the Roy Fusiliers was both a rebuke and an example me. I have often thanked God that I serv with them. But above all, the letters of n mother's friend, Mrs. Chalmers, written to r when in India, were most blessed to me. S told me more of the love of the Lord Jes than I had ever heard before.

She urged me to trust Him, to give Him r heart, to serve Him. These letters were t only commentary I had for the Scriptures, a with my daily study of God's Word they w most blessed to me. Various, indeed, were t means used, but, God be praised, the result v my salvation. "He brought me to the banqu ing house, and His banner over me was Lov (Song of Sol. 2 : 4).

In looking back upon these years of my li and especially upon my service in India, I remember, even now, the joy with which I loo for and received the letters of my mother's d friend. And I have felt very deeply that if ev Christian woman sought as earnestly as she to lead the children of her friends to the Savic there would be more motherless children bles with the knowledge of His love.

The heart of a man is most accessible w he is an exile from his home. Letters writte Christian love and commended in earnest pra will rarely fail of their reward. Let my own and that of two other officers encourage writing of such letters. These two owned same name and were serving in the same r ment. A letter written to one was read by other. There was no mistake, for God m it. Both were led to believe by the readin that letter.

PROPHETIC SIGNS OF THE TIME

An Address by Colonel Rowlandson at the phetic Conference in England.

We are Friends and Sons of God—A Surrey tager—Three Courts—The Two Resurrec —A Girl in Bath—Seven Signs of the Sp Advent of Christ.

I WISH at the outset to call attention tc passages of Scripture, John 15 : 11–15 and 2 I 1 : 16–21. The first passage must strike e one as being a remarkable declaration fo Saviour to make to His Apostles, one of w was about to deny Him, and another to b Him, for He necessarily could foresee events. "I call you not servants, but frie It reminds us of another title given to "Sons of God." Who are the Sons of "To as many as believe on Him, to them He power to become Sons of God."

Besides the privilege of sonship, the deigns to employ His redeemed people. He not employ any one till he has become a ber of the family. They must be children and servants afterwards. The way of the is that strangers shall be servants first, anc possibly, after long years of faithful service may be made sons at last. But the Divine of arrangement is the reverse of this.

Now when Christ called His apostles fr they might be ready to say, "What, Peter a friend, who is about to deny you! a friend, who is about to betray you!" B made no exception. His declaration w have called you friends." Well, in every where are infants and grown-up sons, it is eldest and not the youngest that the father he thinks he is going to leave the worl scribes his plans and projects for the ber the family. What would be thought of th est son if, on such an occasion, he treat father's communication with indifferenc said he did not care to listen to the inte his father had as to the future?

But this is what many of the Lord's rec people say about the "sure word of prop to which they are directed to take heed. said, "All things that I have heard of My I have made known unto you," and ye are some who say, "It is a dark subject: thee have me excused." And because the ttle difficulty in understanding the revela- hey decline to avail themselves of the priv- of receiving it. The Christian who puts rom him the doctrine of the second com- the Lord Jesus puts away his strength, and a wounded lark, unable to soar to elevated s. He who looks for his reunion with his nly at the hour of death is like the maimed and cannot sing any thing but Lenten It is a sad thing thus to shut out the rt and joy of this precious hope.

ere were in this village of Surrey a poor r living in great poverty, a mere pauper ad in his little cottage a window looking an estate to which he was heir, which ictly entailed upon him, and must event- ome into his possession, would he not be looking out at it and comforting himself indigence by the sight of his future inher- ? And in like manner the well-instructed an gazes through the window of God's es upon his future inheritance, incorrupt- ndefiled, and that fadeth not away.

THREE GREAT DOCTRINES

prominently forward in the Christian reve- 1. That Jesus once came and died for s of His people, and rose again for our ation. 2. That when Jesus ascended up h the Holy Ghost descended as the Com- 3. That the Lord Jesus is coming again, m this doctrine great comfort will come eliever enjoys sweet fellowship with his rd

e are three courts in which the Christian ed. . The court of conscience, in which no nation is possible, as stated in John 24 the court of heaven, in which also the be- stands acquitted and discharged ; and the f the world, in which he is always con- d, for as the world hated the Master so it er hate His servant.

truth of the Lord's second coming has a aspect, both sides of which must be kept d. It has the aspect of warning to the man, who says, "I know I must die some out when he is in health and strength that ay seem far off. But to him it may be Hold, dear friend, you may not die ; the nay come any day, and will He find you "

o God's dear children the aspect of this e is one of comfort and encouragement. ristian may have a great load on his soul ; be on his conscience ; if it is, let him take e blood of Jesus, and reflect that he will presented faultless before the throne of ev. 14 : 4). Or it may be outward afflic- if so, let him meditate on the near ap- of the Lord, who will soon take him out it, nd he will find comfort.

he subject of the two resurrections the eems wholly to lose sight of one of them, associate the thought of the resurrection th the judgment day of the great assize. the first resurrection, which will consist vely of the blessed and holy (Rev. 20 : 6). ill be for the children of God no condem- or, as the original Greek word signifies, ment. They are already justified in this e Acts 13 : 38, 39), and it is remarkable this and similar passages the present tense have always been used.

r girl in the city of Bath, a short time s lying very ill, and was in great spiritual ss, when a Christian lady visited her, and ed to her the way of salvation. The girl l, but no peace came. She said she be- hat Jesus had died for her, but it gave ssurance of hope. At last the lady took w Testament, and, turning to the pass- s 13 : 39, underscored the word "are" in sage, "By Christ all that believe are jus- om all things," and then left her. At t visit she found the girl full of peace. a'am," she said, "that little 'are' has I see it all now."

as of the first resurrection the Apostle ooke in Philippians 3 : 7–11, which, in ginal, was called the special eclectic resurrection, and is the same which is spoken of Revelation 20 : 6, where a clear distinction is made, for it is expressly stated that "the rest of the dead [the unblessed and unholy] live not again till the end of the millennial thousand years."

The Holy Ghost taught Paul this truth in that grand chapter, 1 Corinthians 15 : 51, where he says, "Behold, I show you a mystery." The mystery consisted in this, that although all men are appointed once to die as their common lot, and all are to rise, yet there is to be a special, a first resurrection of the righteous from among the dead, and a translation of the living righteous, one thousand years before the resurrection of the wicked. This first resurrection will take place at the Second Coming of Christ, which may happen at any time—even to-day or to-morrow.

There are three orders in the resurrection : 1, the dead in Christ will rise first ; then, 2, they that are Christ's at His coming and are alive will be caught up alive to meet him in the heavens ; and then, 3, the rest of the dead will be raised after the millennium of a thousand years.

The hope of the first resurrection is specially pointed out as comfort for the bereaved, and gives the expectation of their speedier reunion in glory. Sir Isaac Newton foresaw the great interest now taken in these subjects. He said that in his time they had not light enough, but he believed a time was coming when God would raise up an extensive school of students of prophecy, to whom He would give light, and to whom much more would be revealed. The interest now taken in prophecy is a sign that the Lord's coming is nigh at hand.

There are

SEVEN SIGNS

of the close proximity of Christ's Second Coming, and it must be remembered that the Lord reproved those who were keen to notice natural signs, and neglected to observe these signs of the times. It may be asked, Why is the coming of the Lord more likely to occur now than it was in the last century? In reply the following facts may be mentioned as indicating the near approach of the end :

1. The world is now covered with a network of Christian Missions. Such institutions as the Bible societies are spreading over the whole earth a knowledge of the truth. They sprang up suddenly at the beginning of the present century, and were the fulfilment of our Lord's prediction in Matthew 24 : 14, "This Gospel of the kingdom shall be preached in all the world, for a witness to all nations, and then shall the end come." This passage shows that it is an error to expect the whole world to be converted before the Second Coming of Christ ; for the words expressly said that the Gospel is only to be a witness to all nations before the end comes, and that the world is to be at that time as wicked as in the days of Noah, or the days of Lot.

Professor Gosse, in a book recently published by him, has shown that there is not a nation on the earth in which there is not a witness either by the Word of God, or by living missionaries.

2. Another sign is the deep interest now taken in God's ancient people the Jews. The Palestine Exploration Fund was organized expressly, as was stated in its prospectus, "to pierce those mounds of dust and stones round Jerusalem," and was a fulfilment of a prediction in Psalm 102 : 14, that "God's servants shall take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof." The Jews are now flocking back to their ancient home in great masses, and four building companies in Palestine are not equal to the task of raising houses fast enough for the incoming people.

3. It was predicted there would be a great running to and fro in Daniel 12 : 4—a sign abundantly fulfilled in this day. The Russian ambassador, it might be read in that day's newspaper, was in London one day and at St. Petersburg almost the next day. In his (Colonel Rowlandson's) boyhood it took him 128 days to go to India, while now 28 days sufficed for the journey.

4. Another sign is the interest now exhibited in education, for was it not prophesied that before that day "knowledge should be greatly increased" (Daniel 12 : 4)? By means of the telegraph the different parts of the world have been brought into near contact, and knowledge is widely diffused by the printing press.

5. Most noticeable also is the decline of the Papal apostasy—Great Babylon. In Daniel 7 : 26 it was prophesied that its dominion would be taken away. By the recent wars between France and Germany, and its loss of temporal power, that was beginning to be fulfilled, and at exactly the time predicted, viz., 1260 years from 622 A.D., which was the reckoning of the words "time, times, and the dividing of a time" in their year-day fulfilment. The dominion was to be taken away, not the existence of the apostasy, and that is just what the world is witnessing.

6. The numerous conferences of God's people were foretold by the prophet Malachi (3 : 16), who predicted that "they who feared the Lord would speak often one to another." And now the fulfilment is evident, for no former days have seen so many conference meetings and congresses.

7. A seventh sign is the withering of the Mohammedan power. This is predicted (Revelation 16 : 12) under the figure of the drying up of the river Euphrates. The Turkish power holds the keys of Palestine, and it is this fact that makes the present position of Turkey a fact so significant to students of prophecy, for as the Turk goes down the Jew will rise up. There has never been in past days such a simultaneous fulfilment of prophecy, and it is not what scientific men called a fortuitous concourse of atoms, but it is a solemn concurrence of providential signs, full of premonition of the Lord's speedy appearance.

I GO BY THE BOOK.

Two men were standing on the deck of a ship, which was on the stocks, and nearly completed, in a ship-yard. One of them was the foreman, and the other was one of the carpenters engaged in building the vessel. "Well, David," said the foreman, "I have been thinking I would like to talk with you a little. I hear you are one of those who say they know for certain that they are saved, and I am curious to learn how that can be." "Well," said David, "I know it is a reality ; and I know, too, that there is such a thing as knowing that one is saved. What is the breadth of this water-way?" "Why, fourteen inches all round, to be sure ; what makes you ask that, when you know?" "But are you quite sure that it is to be fourteen inches?" said David. "Certainly."

"But what makes you so sure?" "Why, I go by the book ;" and as he said so he pulled a small memorandum-book out of his pocket, in which were marked the sizes and position of the various things on the deck. "I'm sure it is fourteen inches, for it is here in the book, and I got the book from headquarters."

"Oh ! I see," said David. "Now, look here, that is just exactly how I know I'm saved ; 'I go by the Book ;'" and as he said so he pulled a New Testament out of his pocket. "I just go by the Book ; it came from headquarters ; it came from God ; and it says here, 'For God so loved the world, that He gave His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life' (John 3 : 16). I took God at His word."

Mr. Spurgeon on Woman's Place in Marriage.—In a speech at the opening of a bazaar, Mr. Spurgeon related an anecdote of a black man and his wife whom he received into his church. When the negro came before the church, Mr. Spurgeon said : "Well, friend, I suppose you can speak well of your wife—she is a Christian woman?" to which the negro made the following remarkable answer : "Yes, I believe she is a good woman ; but even black women are provoking sometimes." But they received her into the church.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

(Continued from page 847.)

RETURNING HOME.

ROBERT HOLLAND'S indignation on learning that Mr. Vernon had been apprised of the injustice he had done Ellen Morris yet had made no attempt to remedy the evil, knew no bounds. He exclaimed :

" And the villain saw it on your finger, knew that it had never been touched by my sister, and yet did not attempt to right the foul wrong he had done her, yet did not proclaim to all the world that he had acted the part of a heartless tyrant, a false accuser !" exclaimed the fiery Englishman.

Such indignation flashed in the eyes of Robert, so fiercely he raised his clinched fist, that Edith Temple felt some alarm for her uncle's personal safety.

" Doubtless Mr. Vernon will make what amends he can," she began, but Robert would not hear the end of the sentence.

" What amends can he make !" cried the farmer, stamping his foot. " The brute thought that he was but crushing a helpless worm, but he shall find that he has to deal with a man, and a man who claims justice, and demands vengeance on the oppressor !"

" Robert, dear Robert !" exclaimed Effie ; " oh ! let us forgive as we hope to be forgiven."

" I wish no evil to my persecutor," said Ellen gravely ; " may he never know one tenth of the suffering which he has inflicted on me !"

" He shall do you justice openly, publicly, and that before another sun goes down !" cried Robert. " We will return to London by the next train, it is too late for us to reach Ashley this evening, but we will be at the farm to-morrow. I will write at once to this Vernon, this philosopher, this friend of mankind, as he calls himself !"

Effie laid her hand pleadingly on the arm of her husband, and glanced towards Miss Temple, but Robert was not to be silenced. " I will tell him," continued the indignant farmer, " that I will be at his door by noon, and call him to an account for the shameful wrong which he has done to my sister."

" Strangers are coming in," observed Ellen ; " let us return to our lodging ; will Miss Temple share our humble meal ?"

Edith gladly availed herself of the invitation, which was proffered with such respect as might have been shown to a peeress ; the lady had much need of a little refreshment and rest.

The party proceeded to a small lodging, a room in which had been occupied by Ellen Morris during her stay in Southampton ; her brother had found accommodation in the same house since joining her at the seaport.

Much had the Hollands to talk over, much to tell to each other, and for much had the husband and wife to exchange mutual forgiveness. Ellen Morris led Miss Temple to her own little room, leaving the husband and wife to themselves, and then went to prepare refreshments for all.

With a heart full of gratitude, Effie now told her husband of the sympathy, kindness, and active help which she in her trouble had received from Edith Temple.

" You will forgive her uncle, if but for her sake," said Effie, as she concluded her story.

" It seems to me, from your account," observed Robert, " that Miss Temple herself may have something to forgive. It appears as if he who threw his wife's faithful attendant into a jail, must have driven his niece from his door. Mr. Vernon may have to settle two scores with me to-morrow."

It was now Robert's turn to relate what had happened to himself since his parting with Effie.

" I acted hardly towards you, Effie, I own it," said the young farmer to his wife ; " but I knew that the tale of Ellen's disgrace, when once found out by our lodger, would run like fire through the village. I couldn't face neighbors that could point at me as the brother of a thief—a jail-bird ! When I got into the train I'd a mind to emigrate with Ellen, and go off to the other side of the world, where none should ever hear of us again !"

" How could you be so cruel," murmured Effie.

" We two, Ellen and I, said I to myself, will weather life together, and stick all the closer the one to the other, because of the stormy winds which beat around us. That was my first thought," said the farmer.

" And had you none for the poor, wretched wife whom you were leaving behind ?"

Robert kissed away a tear from Effie's cheek. " I thought a mighty deal about you, Effie, as the train went rattling along. I seemed to hear your voice calling me back, and to see you looking—just as you look at me now.

" Long before I got to Southampton I'd changed my mind about Australia. I couldn't start in such haste for a place that seems nigh as far off as the moon. No, says I, Canada is quite distant enough for me, and I've two or three friends in that land who would gladly give me a welcome, and help me to make a good start."

" But Ellen had taken her passage in the May Queen," observed Effie.

" Ay, in the steerage," said Robert, with a look of disgust ; " you never saw such a den as she would have had to bide in—the folk crammed like sheep in a pen! No, no ! Ellen had suffered enough on shore, she should never face all these hardships on a long sea voyage ; I made her give up her passage."

" And what were your plans then when I met you ?" asked Effie.

" Ellen and I were going to start by evening train for Liverpool," answered Robert, " and we meant to embark there for the West. I meant to work my way out, as my stock of money was getting low, and of course I had to make up to my sister for what she had lost for my sake. It was a lucky chance, my darling," added Robert, again kissing his wife's pale cheek, " that we had not gone off earlier, and so missed meeting at Southampton."

" Not chance, oh, not chance ! but Heaven's mercy that ordered all for our good," murmured Effie.

" It was odd enough, too, that Miss Temple should be pledging her diamond ring—and in a strange place," observed Robert. " The dear good lady must have been hard up for ready cash, like ourselves. And it is a strange story that you have been telling me of Miss Temple's coming to ask for a lodging in our little farm. Depend on't, that uncle of hers—I won't blister my lips with speaking his name — had turned her out of his house !"

" What a blessing it will be to have her in ours !" exclaimed Effie.

" Well, it's true that an oak can be packed into an acorn-cup," observed Robert, with something of his old jovial manner ; " the lady and ourselves, widow Cross and her imp, and Ellen — who never shall leave us—will make pretty nigh as tight a fit in our little nut-shell at Ashley."

" Mrs. Cross and her boy are away at present," said Effie, who thought this not the least cheering piece of news which she had to give to her husband. " They have gone up to London."

" I wish she would stop there !" muttered the farmer ; " we've had no peace or comfort since that woman came to our home. Were I but clear of that boarding part of my bargain, and had a little capital to lay out in improving my land, I'd never wish to emigrate, and leave old England and the pretty little Salem where we thought to be so happy together. But there is no use in shutting one's eyes to facts," continued Robert, with a sigh ; " better look difficulties straight in the face. As matters stand the farm will not support us ; things will go from bad to worse. We must leave the place, dear Effie, and seek our fortune elsewhere."

" But we will go together, darling !" cried Effie, pressing her husband's hand, and smiling through tears, like the sunbeams through A showers. " I could be happy in Canada, or workhouse, or in a prison, so long as I have husband beside me, and feel that he loves forgives me !"

We will now return to Eureka House, with old sun-dial, its quaint yews, and thick sh beries without, its Museum and its serp within.

Only two nights have passed since Edith T ple left the dwelling of her uncle, but to th mates of the place, at least, the time has peared much longer.

Both Mr. Vernon and Alec Stewart have thoroughly out of spirits ; in the master uncomfortable state of mind has taken the of peevish restlessness, in the man that of s ness and gloom. To Alec every thing seem go wrong.

" I knew how it would be," muttered th servant to himself. " When the door was upon Miss Temple it was like shutting out air, and leaving us nothing to breathe but ter's stifling gases ! And then Effie—my little Effie ! she has gone on a wild chase a good-for nothing husband ! She might as hunt a will-o'-the-wisp, in hopes of catching turning him into a good household ca Effie expected life to be all like the song o birds in spring ; she would not be warned would not be warned ; she would buy her experience, and a heavy price she has had t for it ! The poor child has found, as I she would, that married life is a mixed She knows now that it is not all love and ness. None so fortunate that a time doe come when the heart is wrung, and the undergoes torture. Yes, in single life bears his own trouble alone, but in marri he bears another's as well, and I expect it same with a woman. Each one carrie other's troubles as well as their own, and of them gets the burden lightened."

So the misanthropic old widower, rea from his own unfortunate experience, held appointed ordinance responsible for cala which were the result of sin.

Mr. Vernon's reflections, philosopher was, were no deeper than those of Alec. uneasy, peevish, restless, but he did no the cause of his trouble to his own sin Vernon missed the attentions of Edith very hour of the day. The man whose great was learning, he to whom science was needful food, took up his book, and was in half an hour to close it again, his painfully ached, the words had become before them.

Mr. Vernon asked Alec to read aloud, sound of the butler's slow drawl, and his rendering of long scientific words, were ble to the irritable man. Angrily the pher bade his servant put down the volu leave him alone.

" It was not to be expected that I sho like Miss Temple," muttered Alec, as he the room ; " no spurring would make pack-horse clear hedge and ditch like a

" No one reads like Edith," thought " silly and bigoted as she is, I made a a great mistake, when I sent her away."

The pure, high-minded Christian girl the esteem and affection of her uncle thoroughly than he or she knew. She on quietly working for him, doing her d the Lord, and she had grown to be to th opher as valuable as his right hand.

Edith had felt acute and bitter pain ma a time when her uncle jeered at religion ; his s had wounded her pure soul, but they had vented her doing her best to serve the who thus grieved her. She had borne her tiently, " looking unto Jesus," and th result had been that her light had shone befor that house, so that when she quitted it, seemed as if it were plunged in darkness.

So may all Christians live amongst th worldly and the wicked, and so may they bring glory to God ! Patience and gentleness are neve lost in the world, and Mr. Vernon was now learning how much he loved his niece and how great a loss her absence was to him.

On the second morning after Edith's departure, the postman brought two letters to the porch of Eureka House. Alec had been on the lookout for the letter-carrier for the last half-hour, being very anxious to receive tidings from Effie Holland. To the poor man's great satisfaction, he saw that one of the letters was addressed to himself and was in his niece's handwriting.

"There will be no good news in it," said the gloomy Stewart to himself; "I need be in no hurry to look inside."

And yet he was in a hurry, and very eagerly pored the gray eyes under those shaggy brows, over the few lines contained in the hastily written note:

"Rejoice with me, I have found him! I trust that we shall all be back in our happy home before twelve to-morrow."

Never had any thing so like a laugh burst from old Alec's lips since the first month after his marriage, as when he had read these words.

"Now, this was past all reckoning on!" cried the old man, too glad to find that he had been a false prophet of evil. "It all comes of the child having with her a friend like Miss Temple; there is a blessing on that lady wherever she goes, and whatever she takes in hand.

"Why, I should as soon have found a needle in a hay-stack as Robert midst the shipping at Southampton, and if caught he'd have been as slippery to hold as one of the cobras. But Effie maybe is deceiving herself still." Alec was too much accustomed to expect misfortune to give ready faith to good news.

He now glanced at the envelop of the other letter, which was for his master.

"Odd enough, this bears the Southampton postmark too," Alec observed. "This will be from Miss Temple! Why what a donkey I am to say so; this is no more like her handwriting than a kitchen poker is like a lady's hair-pin! I should take this for the writing of a school-boy, and one who wrote in a temper. What a broad black dash he has put through the t!"

Alec, according to custom, put the letter for his master on the breakfast table, to be read after the morning meal. It was a rule of the philosopher never to open a letter till he had finished his breakfast. Oswald Vernon was not an early riser; he preferred sitting up late, "burning the midnight oil," as he said, to breathing the fresh air at sunrise.

On this particular morning Mr. Vernon was later than usual, and he was also more peevish than usual. The philosopher's gentle softness of manner was, as the reader knows, kept like his dress clothes—for the special benefit of strangers. Mr. Vernon surrounded by scientific admirers, and Mr. Vernon at his solitary meal, appeared as two different persons.

"How's this! the egg is boiled as hard as a stone!" exclaimed the philosopher, looking by no means philosophic after breaking the shell. "Alec, bid Eliza boil another for me directly."

(To be continued.)

THE PERFECT SAVIOUR.

S. Lesson for Nov. 9, 1 John 1; 2:1–6. Golden Text, 1:7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

First the Redeemer, then Redemption—Yet There is Room—Fellowship Walking in the Light—Blood-bought and Cleansed with Blood—To Have Sin and yet not Commit Sin—Confession—To Know Him we must Die—Keeping His Word.

OUR subject for to-day embraces the great truths of Christ's redemption: walking in the light, fellowship with the Father and the Son, abiding in Christ, living without sinning, being cleansed from all unrighteousness. But the apostle John, in writing his Epistle, does not begin by speaking of the redemption, but of the Redeemer. He has eyes, ears, touch, but for One, and he begins thus abruptly: "That which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life (for the life, was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and shew unto you that eternal life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us)." Here is a lesson for teachers: Christ first, then His salvation. "We have seen it, and bear witness, and shew unto you, etc." If those around us see and recognize the eternal Life, God "manifest in the flesh," as dwelling in us in power, then they are attracted to inquire how their state may be also changed, and their life and spirit bear the same impress. We must shew unto men eternal life.

"That which we have seen and heard declare we unto you, that ye also may have fellowship with us." Real Christianity is large, not exclusive. "Yet there is room" breathes from all the words and actions of our Lord—room for more sinners, more broken hearts, more sick bodies, more burdened ones; in the Father's heart, and in the Father's home, "yet there is room."

But what is, then, this fellowship with the Father and the Son? Fellowship implies something in common, and so wondrous is the grace of our God that He calls us not only to receive of Him, but to partake with Him in His joys over returning sinners, His grief over lost ones, His glory in the conquests of His kingdom, etc. But such fellowship can only exist where we have learned to lose our own life that we may live in His.

And now he speaks of the redemption. "This then is the message which we have heard of Him, and declare unto you, that God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all. If we say that we have fellowship with Him, and walk in darkness, we lie, and do not the truth: but if we walk in the light, as He is in the light, we have fellowship one with another, and the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." It is very clear from what follows, that walking in the light, fellowship with God, and abiding in Christ, mean the same thing, a life in which we sin not (chap. 1 : 1), "our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience," i.e., a conscience which condemns us (Heb. 10 : 22). This is not to say that the law of sin does not exist in our members; but while by faith we are holding the position of being crucified with Christ, our members are servants to another master, and the old law of sin has no power over them, and it is only when we cease to hold this position, when we return to our own strivings, and seek to live our own life, that sin has power over us anew.

By His sacrificial death for us and by our position as crucified with Him, our beloved Lord has made a way for our walk on earth to be in the light, as God Himself is in the light. In Him is no darkness at all, nor need there be darkness in us. He has made provision that in our inward life and in our outward life we shall be all light. "When thine eye is single, thy whole body also is full of light" (Luke 11 : 34). As Moses and Stephen drank in the light of God until their faces shone with the divine reflection, so is it possible, and so ought it to be, that we should be rays of His light to all whom we meet with. And it is so true that in measure as all darkness disappears, as the atmosphere of our souls becomes more limpid, as less of darkness regarding the will of God and the truth of God clouds us, fellowship with Him becomes our natural element, the breath of the eternal life which we are living.

But one may say, is not this to take so high a place as to forget that we are but redeemed sinners after all? No, for it is the beggar whom He took from the dunghill to set him among princes, even the princes of His people (1 Sam. 2 : 8; Ps. 113 : 7, 8). And the apostle reminds us—and can we need the reminder?—that "the blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." To forget the blood which bought us would be to leave the only foundation on which we stand. But the blood does not only atone, bless God, it cleanses also; and in order to fellowship with God, in order to take and maintain the place of royal priests which He has assigned to us, we must have our conscience purged from dead works to serve the living God.

The apostle guards us against error when he says, "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us;" and again, "If we say that we have not sinned, we make Him a liar, and His Word is not in us." But to have sin, to possess a nature prone to sin, is not necessarily to commit sin. "Every man is tempted when he is drawn away of his own lust and enticed" (James 1 : 14), but if a man is not drawn away, but by faith meets the temptation with the written Word as the Lord Himself did, resisting unto blood, striving against sin; then he has not sinned, although sin was in him, and he may have suffered, being tempted, as Christ did. But if we have sinned, what then? "If we confess our sins, He is faithful and just to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

Yes, praise God. But let us not get lightly over our sins while thinking that He rejoices to pardon. A laundress will tell you that some stains come out much more easily than others, and for inkstains an acid must be used. So with sin. Confession is required first and chiefly to God, but there are times when it is needful to make the confession to man as well. A child cannot generally set things right with God while hiding them still from his parents. A wife cannot always be clear before God without opening her heart to her husband. There are exceptions, but if in our home ties there is constraint from unconfessed sin, let us yield to the voice of the Spirit of God, and humble ourselves if we would be cleansed and separated from our sins.

Oh! it is a precious thing to know that we have an Advocate with the Father, Jesus Christ the righteous, who is just to justify, faithful to forgive, in whose pardon is no weakness, no allowance made for sin, and yet sin is so met that no voice raised in judgment against us can condemn us. And we are reminded that He is the propitiation, "not for our sins only, but also for those of the whole world," as though the consciousness of what He has done for us should open our hearts in love to sinners everywhere, and be a power by our very testimony to draw them also to Him. How can we have fellowship with Him and yet have no heart to go out after the lost in the name and in the spirit of our Lord, to tell them the glad news of His salvation?

Now the apostle gives us a test of our knowledge of Him: "Hereby do we know that we know Him, if we keep His commandments. He that saith, I know Him, and keepeth not His commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in Him." It is an impossibility to know Him and yet not do His will. And how shall we know Him as He is to be known? When some Greeks came to Philip and said, "Sir, we would see Jesus," and Philip and Andrew told Him, He taught at once the lesson of dying to self (John 12 : 21–25). "There shall no man see My face and live" (Ex. 33 : 20). To see Jesus, to know Jesus, self must cease to be. So says Paul (Rom. 12 : 1, 2), that we must present our bodies a living sacrifice, etc., that we may know "what is that good, and acceptable, and perfect will of God."

"But whoso keepeth His Word, in him verily is the love of God perfected: hereby know we that we are in Him." That is, if we no sooner understand His mind in His Word than there is an unquestioning obedience on our part, then the love of God is perfected in us; for to know Him is truly to love Him: all He says, all His Word, is meat and drink to them who know Him, and a loving understanding is created between Him and the souls of His obedient children. "He that saith he abideth in Him ought himself also so to walk as He also walked." No lower standard than His own life and walk, for such as understand the perfect salvation of our perfect Saviour. Now let us ask ourselves is this perfect Saviour a perfect Saviour for me, and is His salvation in all its unlimited scope the power in which I live? And if not, how then shall I escape if I neglect so great salvation?

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Abdication of Yakoob Khan, the Ameer of Afghanistan, is announced, and it is expected that the country will be virtually, though probably not nominally, annexed by England. "Afghanistan will, it is supposed, be bound by a treaty which shall make an English Resident at Cabul the actual governor of the country, though a native machinery of government may exist under the influence of the Resident. There may be a sovereign prince, and the throne may be hereditary in his family. England will collect the taxes and pay the sovereign a salary. There will be an army of native troops with British officers, or with officers from Indian regiments; but there will always be in the country another army than that of this sovereign." It is difficult to see what other policy England could adopt toward her treacherous neighbor; but it is one likely to excite the hostility of Russia, and may eventually lead to that struggle between the two Powers for supremacy in the East, which many statesmen have for some time regarded as inevitable.

Missionaries in Zululand.—The London Times correspondent at Durban states that John Dunn, the Zuluized Scotchman, who is now the most important of the thirteen new chiefs of Zululand, has announced to the veteran missionary of Tebro, over which John Dunn is appointed, that he does not intend to allow any missionaries to settle in his territory. This is the most important of the new districts, and the nearest to Natal. The Zulus were gladly welcoming the missionaries back when they were thus stopped. It is much to be feared that the bad example thus set by John Dunn, who is a European although a polygamist, may be followed by the other chiefs.

The Times says: "It will hardly be reckoned among the satisfactory results of the war now happily at an end that the missions scattered throughout Zululand should be abandoned, and that many peaceful examples of a civilized and a self-denying, not to speak of a Christian life, should hereafter be withdrawn from the country.

A Snake-Tamer's Death is Reported from Madrid. M. Karoly, a lion-tamer, endeavoring to exhibit his power over the brute creation, had frequently performed with a boa-constrictor, the huge snake enveloping him in its folds, but never doing him any injury. On a recent occasion the boa had, as usual, wound itself round the performer's body, when suddenly it tightened its folds. The spectators applauded, thinking it some new trick, but Karoly simply uttered a groan, and in one or two seconds was a dead man. A post-mortem examination of the unfortunate athlete's remains discovered no fewer than eighty-seven fractures of his bones, effected by the constriction of the serpent's coils. His death must have been almost instantaneous, as the spine was disarticulated in several places.

The fate of this unfortunate man serves well to remind us of the nature of sin; a man plays with the serpent of sin, thinking, perhaps, that he has sufficient power, when he chooses to exert it, to forsake the evil, but repeated indulgence gives it at last the force of a habit in whose coils he will find himself as powerless as was Karoly in those of the boa-constrictor.

The Marquis of Hartington, the Nominal leader of the Liberal Party in England, has delivered a speech in reply to that of the Marquis of Salisbury, to which we referred last week. He said: "England is less prepared than any other Power for war, and no minister ought to threaten war or go to war unless he asks himself the question whether the cause is so just—so obviously just in the eyes of the whole people—that they will be ready to make those long, those continued, those protracted sacrifices which would be necessary for the prosecution of the war.

"Nor does it follow from these opinions that the policy of England ought to be one of selfish and timid isolation. I believe the resources of England to be so great, and her naval power so great, that her alliance will always be courted in Europe. That alliance ought to be used for the purpose of forming and joining in a combination of the States of Europe, framed for the purpose of preserving the peace and independence of Europe; repressing the aggressive ambition of any Power; protecting the weak against the strong, the free against the oppressor. This is the policy which has always been in the main adopted by the Liberal Party. It is the policy, I believe, that will now be adopted by the Liberal party. It has not been the policy of the present government."

The London Times, in a leading editorial article, commenting on Lord Hartington's speech, says: "It was not what might be expected of the leader of a great party at a critical moment in the political history of the country. Lords Hartington and Salisbury differ respecting certain broad facts, and the country will not be on the side of the Liberal leader."

That prediction remains to be proved. It is certain that the English people do not like their government to be regarded as a factor of no account in the councils of Europe, as it was under Mr. Gladstone's administration; but neither on the other hand, do they wish for a blustering policy, undignified, expensive, and dangerous.

A Disastrous Flood Devastated an Important district in Spain on October 21st. The valleys of the Mundo and Segura are the scene of the disaster.

"It was about ten o'clock at night," the telegram states, "when the approach of a cold and biting wind was felt from the direction of Cartagena. The sky clouded over. Soon the storm was howling over the town and amid the streets, and tore through the houses. It increased in violence every minute. The rain seemed to be falling in broad sheets of water.

"Shortly after midnight the watchman was going his rounds, fighting his way through the blinding downpour, when, as he passed over the bridge that leads to the Plaza and divides the town into two portions, he saw a black stream of water rushing between the arches. He found that the river was rising rapidly. It had already overflowed the banks, and was stealthily climbing over the stone parapet which protects the frontage. The watchman knew that no time was to be lost. He hurried to a clock tower which gives signals of fire and of other catastrophes to dwellers by the water-side and set the bell in motion. The note of warning was heard above the noise of the thunder-storm. Instantly the inhabitants rushed into the streets. Few of them had time to do more than snatch up a little clothing."

A more terrible night than the succeeding one it is difficult to imagine. The gas was extinguished by the flood, and brave men, wading up to their chins in the water, were rescuing women and children at the risk of their own lives. Falling houses and overturned monuments added to the havoc worked by the flood. It is supposed that over three thousand lives were lost, and over ten thousand persons are rendered destitute.

The King of Spain, whose Approaching marriage is announced, has made the happy event the occasion of a timely act of charity He has caused it to be made known that whatever sums of money may be sent by private individuals or public bodies are to be devoted by him for the relief of the sufferers by the late storms and floods.

A Brutal Wager.—An English Correspondent says that at the old Exhibition building in Vienna Blondin daily risks his life on a rope stretched across the vast dome at a giddy height. He has expressly requested that no net be placed under the rope to break his fall should an accident occur. He says that he has found by experience that the public do not care half so much for his performance when the possibility of a terrible accident is not present to lend a zest to the show. He traverses the rope without the balancing bar, walking backwards blindfolded. Blondin is followed everywhere by a Mr. Thompson, who has made a bet of £10,000 that the Hero of Niagara will fall from the rope and be killed ere he attains the age of sixty. Five years more and the cruel wager will be decided, for Blondin is already fifty-five.

A Mysterious Disappearance of a Young Lady at Liverpool, England, has excited a wide and painful interest, as above a month has now elapsed since she was lost; and notwithstanding the offer of a hundred pounds reward, no trace of her has been discovered. Miss Edwards, the lady in question, was of high respectability and only eighteen years of age, and was about to be married to a young man to whom, apparently, she was much attached. One afternoon she left her home in the outskirts of Liverpool to go into the town and purchase a few things, among the rest a present for her lover. She went in an omnibus as far as the London road, a busy thoroughfare in the centre of the town, where she got out and was seen to turn down Stafford Street, a broad side street of no great length, leading to another thoroughfare. From that moment she has never been seen or heard of, and all the anxious inquiries of her family, the exertions of the police, and the offer of a large reward, have failed to obtain the slightest information.

The story is a strange and startling one, yet how few among those who have read and speculated about it have been reminded that a day is coming when the same thing will happen not in one home alone, but in ten thousand homes all the world over! Can we imagine the wonder and consternation that will be then excited? Here a mother will be gone, there a child; in one house a single member of the family, in another many! Does the reader ask incredulously When shall this happen? Christ Himself has told us, in Luke 17:30–37, that at His Second Coming His waiting people will be suddenly and mysteriously translated to heaven, when "one shall be taken and another left."

The Massacre recently Perpetrated by th King of Burmah, frightful as it appears, i merely one more example of a custom so unive sal in the East that it may almost claim rank a a recognized institution. The natural com mencement of every Oriental reign is the slaugh ter or disablement of all possible pretenders t the throne; and the annals, not merely of Bu mah, but of Persia, Turkey, Afghanistan, an Bokhara, teem with instances too frightful f quotation. As recently as the close of the la century, a western traveller found one of t royal Princes of Persia going about with a ba dage over his eyes, and, on questioning hi was told, with a matter-of-course air which ma the statement doubly horrible, that "as l eldest brother would certainly put out his ey on mounting the throne, he was teaching hi self to dispense with the use of them.'

Spurgeon's Autograph Album; containing t Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's and Mrs. Spurgeon's au graphs, may be obtained at 63 Bible House, through any bookseller. Price 75 cents. The Sa and Trowel says: "Our young friends delight possessing birthday albums, and here is one whic fit for a queen. We will say nothing of the conte but the binding is simply gorgeous. . . . Th a dainty birthday present, and is equal to any have gone before it; we think we might ventur say that it is second to none. Facsimiles of the tographs of the pastor and his wife are given in t proper places."

The following works by the same eminent prea may also be obtained at the CHRISTIAN HER Office, 63 Bible House:

"The Treasury of David." Containing an O nal Exposition of the Book of Psalms; a Colle of Illustrative Extracts from the whole range of L ature; a series of Homiletical Hints upon al every verse; and list of writers upon each Ps Five volumes. Price, per vol., $3.

"John Ploughman's Talk; or, Plain Advic Plain People." Price, cloth, 60 cents; paper ers, 40 cents.

"The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit." Sermons. Preached and revised during the 1878. Price $2.50.

"Twelve Sermons on Various Subjects." W Portrait. Price 35 cents. A remittance must a pany every order.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

P lished at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. T .MAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, or some other E nent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc. The Circulation is 165,000 Copies.

ice, Single Copies, Three Cents.
bscription, $1.50, including Postage.

THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 6, 1879.

13th Year. No. 55—New Series.

NTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

TRAIT AND LIFE OF REV. JOHN OUGHTON, D.D., with a View of le, Switzerland.

ITICS AND RELIGION. A New rmon by Dr. Talmage.

OLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE. Thrilling Serial Story by the Author "Felicia Cuffe."

THOMAS SPURGEON'S Farewell ldress to his Father's Congregation.

RENT EVENTS: The Deaths of nator Chandler and General Hooker The Week of Prayer—Indian Girls School—An Offering of Jewelry— e Missing Aeronauts—A Foolish ke—Restitution by a Thief—Mr. Muller's Tour—Rival Claimants a Miser's Hoard—Eight Days in a amp, etc.

MISTRUST OF GOD DEPLORED AND DENOUNCED. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

MR. J. B. GOUGH'S ADDRESS at his Reception in New York.

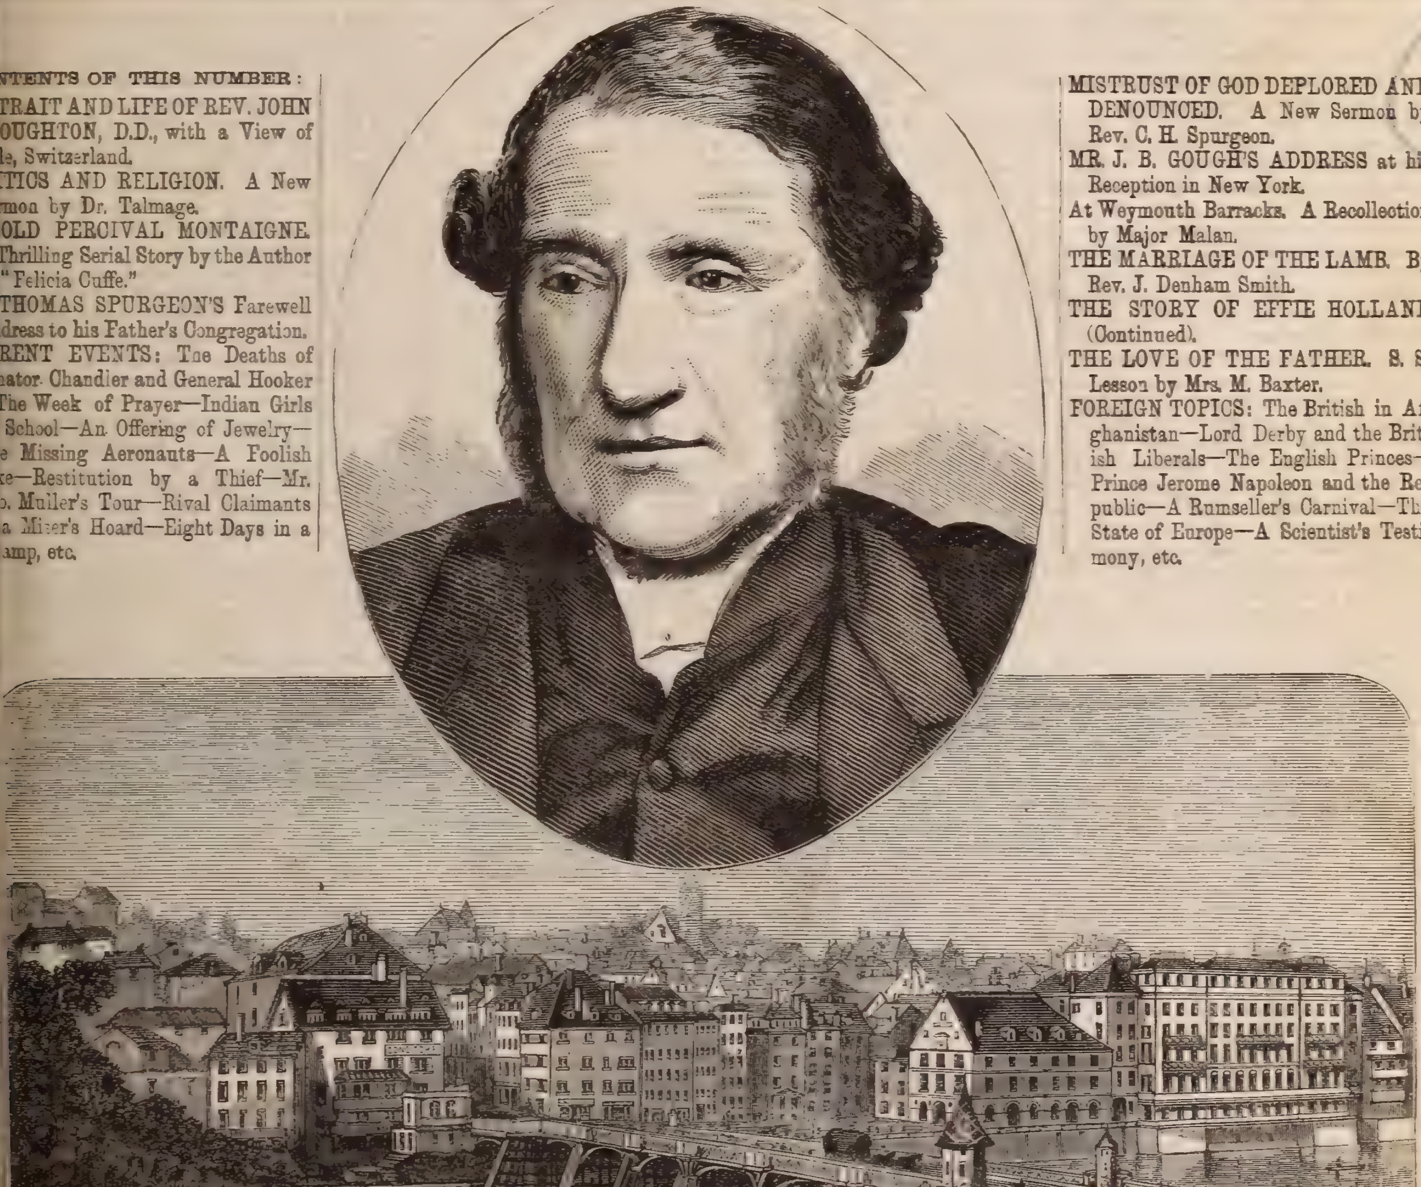
At Weymouth Barracks. A Recollection by Major Malan.

THE MARRIAGE OF THE LAMB. By Rev. J. Denham Smith.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND (Continued).

THE LOVE OF THE FATHER. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

FOREIGN TOPICS: The British in Afghanistan—Lord Derby and the British Liberals—The English Princes—Prince Jerome Napoleon and the Republic—A Rumseller's Carnival—The State of Europe—A Scientist's Testimony, etc.



THE REV. DR. STOUGHTON, of the Evangelical Alliance, and View of Bale, Switzerland.

REV. JOHN STOUGHTON, D.D.,

Pastor, Author, and Tutor.

His Early Life and First Pastorate at Windsor—Reminiscences of Rowland Hill at Eton—His Removal to Kensington—A Remarkable Jubilee Sermon—Terrible Martyrdom—A New Chapel—Dr. Stoughton's Works—His Discourse on the Jews—The Change from Pastor to Professor—A Handsome Testimonial.

THE Seventh Conference of the Evangelical Alliance, which was held at Bâle, a few weeks since, brought into general prominence a name which has been well known in England for many years. Probably few American Christians, except those belonging to the Congregational denomination, previously knew much of the Rev. John Stoughton, D.D., his abilities, or his work. But the eloquent and interesting address he delivered on the evening of Monday, September 1st, aroused the interest of those who heard him and those who afterwards read his address, and a general desire has been expressed to know more of a man so learned and so able.

John Stoughton was born in the ancient city of Norwich, England, about the year 1810. In early life he contemplated devoting himself to the legal profession, but any prospects of success in this direction were readily abandoned, when he became converted to God, for the sake of becoming simply a minister of the Gospel. He entered Highbury College, then a well-known institution belonging to Nonconformists, but since amalgamated with other colleges of the same denomination, and, having spent the usual term of years here, began his ministerial career at Windsor, the town famous for its proximity to the favorite residence of the royal family of England. The venerable Dr. Redford was then pastor of the Congregational Church in "the royal town," and Mr. Stoughton at first filled the position of co-pastor. Subsequently the sole charge of the church devolved upon him.

The interest he took in the scene of this his first pastorate was a deep and abiding one. His earliest and most pleasant associations seem to have been about that spot. He frequently refers to it in his speeches and sermons, and evidently cherishes a warm regard for the place and the people.

One of the first books he published was "Windsor in the Olden Time." This was very favorably received, and especially by those best acquainted with the castle and neighborhood. The little volume was for some time out of print, and though repeatedly requested to republish it, he always refused. When, however, he had collected materials to render the book more complete, he recast the whole, and presented the public with substantially a new work. It was dedicated in its original form, by special permission, to H.R.H. Prince Albert, and a later edition was dedicated to his revered memory.

Mr. Stoughton as a minister of the Congregational Church did not conceal in his book his opinion of of whom the Congregationalists are the spiritual descendants. When the book was written, it was the fashion in England to sneer at these brave men, to laugh at their peculiarities, and to hold them up to general contempt. There are times in the history of every people when the true heroes of the nation's life are misunderstood and undervalued, and England has been no exception to the rule. But for Cromwell and his Puritan followers England would have been enslaved under a despotism more intolerable than any in Europe. But these godly, noble men took their lives in their hands and fought for civil and religious liberty, and won the battle. They secured to their descendants the right of worshipping God according to His word, and of controlling the executive government in its dangerous policy. Succeeding generations showed their base ingratitude by loading the names of their benefactors with opprobrious epithets, and covering their memory with derision.

THE PURITANS,

Mr. Stoughton was one of the first writers to recognize the true excellencies of the character of the Puritans, and to place on record his high esteem for them. In noting the fact that Charles I. spent much of his time at Windsor Castle, he remarked : "It has been the fashion with almost all writers on the antiquities of Windsor to allude in terms of strong indignation to the character of the Puritans who took the Parliamentary side in that unhappy contention. They are represented as base, hypocritical, factious, and contemptible. It would be out of place to treat of their politics in a work like this, but it is not improper to say that if they were enthusiasts there was a sublimity in their enthusiasm such as rarely characterizes the deeds of mortals."

This encomium was subsequently confirmed by Lord Macaulay, the brilliant historian, who certainly was not prejudiced in favor of Puritanism. On this subject he observes : "We perceive the absurdities of their manners, we dislike the gloom of their habits, we acknowledge that the tone of their minds was often injured by straining after things too high for mortal reach, and we know that, in spite of their hatred of Popery, they too often fell into the vices of that bad system — intolerance and extravagant austerity : that they had their anchorites and their crusaders, their Dunstans and their De Montforts, their Dominics and their Escobars ; yet, when all circumstances are taken into consideration, we do not hesitate to pronounce them a brave and honest body."

Nor was Mr. Stoughton too much of a partisan to neglect doing justice to the opposite party. In the same work he admitted that the cavaliers were not heartless, dangling courtiers, not mere machines for destruction dressed up in uniforms, defending without love, and destroying without hatred ; that they felt a strong sentiment of individual independence ; that they were misled, but not by selfish or sordid motives ; that compassion and romantic honor, the prejudices of childhood, and the venerable names of history, threw over them a potent spell ; that they fought for the old banner which had waved in so many battles over the heads of their fathers, and for the altars at which they had received their brides ; that with the vices of the Round Table they had many of its virtues ; that they had more of polite learning than the Puritans ; and that their manners were more engaging, their tastes more elegant, often their tempers more amiable, and sometimes their households more cheerful.

These views were more fully developed in Dr. Stoughton's "Spiritual Heroes," in which many portraits are drawn with inimitable vigor and beauty. In his "Lights of the World" we have illustrations of character drawn from the records of Christian life.

His method was a singularly successful one, and well adapted to impress on his readers the lessons he desired to teach. He sought to bring out in each chapter some important element in vital godliness, and then, by associating with it some illustrious name, to afford a proof and illustration of its actual existence and eminent power.

William Tyndale, for example, was adduced as a noble illustration of labor and patience ; Richard Hooker of a soul in love with God's law and holy order ; Robert Leighton of the peacefulness of faith : Sir Matthew Hale of secular diligence and spiritual fervor ; John Bunyan of spiritual valor and victory ; Richard Baxter of earnest decision.

During Mr. Stoughton's pastorate at Windsor he was much interested in the local associations connected with the eccentric preacher, Rowland Hill, who had lived in the neighboring town of Eton. He was fond of relating an incident of Mr. Hill's work of which he heard while doing pastoral work in the vicinity. It appears that Rowland Hill used to hold prayer-meetings in certain villages adjacent to Eton, and at one of them, the only place where he could obtain the occupier's consent to receive the little gathering, was an old lady's cottage, in the front of which ran a rather wide ditch which must be leaped before the cottage could be reached.
render this feat easy of accomplishment, a l pole was provided, and placed ready to the ha so that each comer might find no difficulty in ting to the scene of the meeting.

In 1843 Mr. Stoughton accepted the invitat of the

CHURCH AT KENSINGTON,

a fashionable suburb of London, and here succeeded the accomplished and eloquent Robert Vaughan, one of the most succes preachers of modern times. This became scene of his pastoral efforts until, comp tively, a recent period.

He gathered round him a congregation highly appreciated his ministry, and to who became for long years a holy pleasure to hi break the bread of life. In ten years' time sanctuary became too small for the numbers were desirous of attending, and, without m stir, so far as appeals to the public are concer a new place of worship was erected, capable holding a far larger congregation. Nor was all, for Horbury Chapel, Notting Hill, was af ward built by his people to meet the w of those residing in the district in which i situate.

These facts will at once bear eloquent t mony to the attractiveness of his ministry. would almost seem to be an impossibility Dr. Stoughton to be dry or dull whatever be the subject on which he is discoursing.
enters so heartily into it, and depicts it such vivid power, that the scene he is descri seems literally to pass before the mind of hearer or reader. He had been at Kensing about two years, when he delivered a comme rative discourse to celebrate the fiftieth anni sary of the formation of the Christian ch assembling there.

It is interesting to note that in this sermo have at least a hint of the studies which ma said to have reached their perfection in his great work, "The Ecclesiastical History of land." While speaking of former days, he s
"Yes, last Sunday was the anniversary of a but little noticed on the pages of history, but one stained with no common deed of barbar and at the same time illumined by no com gleams of heroic endurance.

"Henry Barrow and John Greenwood, cha with holding and promulgating opinions w impugned the Queen's ecclesiastical suprem and with forming churches, and conducting ship contrary to the law, were, on the 6t April, 1592, conveyed to Tyburn, to die by hands of the common hangman ; and when rope had been fastened to their necks, and bitterness of death seemed past, a reprieve sent, not in good faith, but mockery, and the next day they had again to summon up Christian fortitude, thus paying the penalty twofold death for their allegiance to consci and to God ; others like-minded and like-perished too, leaving their memories to be balmed and revered by a nobler generation that on which their lot was thrown ; for wo of all honor are such men, fit to be placed in same rank with the Polycarps and Cypria primitive times. They deserve from us ho able mention on this occasion, when we ca remembrance the former days, and link ours with our fathers who held the same princ which we have adopted."

In 1855 a new and enlarged chapel was bui Allen Street, Kensington, and it was readily and faithfully attending to any calls his time and energy which this large past necessitated that he was able also to pro tracts and books, and to deliver lectures to young men's associations—books and lect which commanded a larger circle of adm year by year. It may be added that this too, he became Congregational Lecturer, the following year filled the chair of the Co gational Union of England and Wales.

Among the

SPECIAL SERMONS

which Dr. Stoughton preached was a rem

I'll put you in a place compared with which the cell you are now in you'd count joy an' liberty."

"Thank you for nothin', as the sayin' is," replied Jemmy, "but shure I was hurtin' no man—only divartin' meself a bit; and if it's a trouble to ye, and yer ears are bad, dacent man, I've no objecshun in loife to step outside an' do me melodious task in the open air, for it's pershuin' to me if I can stand this gintleman's life o' doin' nothin' any longer."

The warder was about to return some very stern reply, when his attention was caught by an energetic signal at the grating of the door of the cell next Jemmy's. It was made by Percival; for as we have stated, it so happened that his appointed place of confinement was quite close to his domestic. Of this fact, however, he was completely ignorant until he heard Jemmy's vocal effort and his altercation with the turnkey. A little after the commencement of Jemmy's solo concert the ear of Percival was strangely arrested. Muffled though the tones that reached him were, as coming to him through thick stone walls, it struck him that the voice he heard was not one to which he was altogether unaccustomed.

He had often heard Jemmy sing when at work in the stable at home, and even in the yard of Mr. Spencer's house in Rathmines give musical utterance to his reveries, and whoever once heard Jemmy's unique attempts at vocalism would never forget them. Yet, how could it be possible that the sounds which arrested him could come from his faithful liegeman? They surely must proceed from some one whose vocal organs had a singular likeness to Jemmy's; for what possible turn of fate could have brought his honest servitor into the same durance vile which he himself was experiencing? While he thus revolved and reasoned in his thoughts concerning the inscrutable phenomenon which had so broken in upon the tenor of his lonely prison life the controversy between Jemmy and the turnkey put an end to all mere speculation upon the subject, and clearly proved that the thunderous notes which had so startled him proceeded from his own veritable henchman in the flesh, his well-beloved, appreciated, and comical Jemmy.

"Warder," said Percival, when the man opened his cell door, "tell me, is not the name of the prisoner in the cell next mine James Mehay? But indeed I need not ask the question, for I know it is."

"If you do then," said the warder testily, for he had not got over his irritation from the gross irregularity of Jemmy's behavior,—"if you do that, why in the world do you ask me? It is interfering with me in my business, and I have no time for answering nonsensical questions." He was about to shut again the door of Percival's cell, and with a slam, when Percival stopped him, by crying out, "For mercy's sake do not fasten that door until I speak a few words to you!"

"Come, then, be quick, and do it off-hand," was the reply. "It's not my duty to be pestered with the talk of troublesome prisoners."

(To be continued.)

"Insole Christians" are a Class of Persons whose only ambition is to escape danger and trouble, and who hope to be borne by the ordinances of the church easily through this world and safely into the next. To "endure hardness," to "rough it," to march in the face of storms, and look into the eye of the foe, is no part of their desires.

The epithet, though homely, is very expressive. Inside the shoe and out of wet, it is used to fill up when there is waste-room, occupying a humble but not uncomfortable place, quite different from the outer leather, a passive, though not always a useless appendage. They never become the earnest Christian workers, the faithful servants of Christ, whose constant endeavor is to advance His kingdom and who look for His coming.

MR. THOMAS SPURGEON'S FAREWELL ADDRESS TO HIS FATHER'S CONGREGATION.

Reasons for Coming to Christ—Because He invites You—Because Nobody else can do what You Require—Because it is a Favorable Opportunity—A Captain and a Bird.

[Mr. Thomas Spurgeon, one of the twin sons of Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, whose portrait and life appeared in this journal of May 15th, 1879, has again been compelled by ill-health to seek recovery in change of climate and a long sea voyage. He had arranged to preach at a chapel near London recently, but was unable to attend. A note from him was read, in which he said, "It is my painful duty to inform you that I shall be unable to fulfil my promise for September 14th. I have been compelled to cancel all my engagements, owing to serious cough and cold. What is worse, I am obliged once more to set sail for Australia, as I dare not risk a winter here. It will be a great trial to leave home again. Pray for my dear parents, and for me. How disappointed I am I cannot tell. All will be well, though, I'm sure."

On Sunday, September 28th, he was at the Tabernacle at the evening service, and Mr. C. H. Spurgeon invited him to speak to the assembly, as it would be his last opportunity of doing so previous to his departure for Australia, to which place he sailed on October 1st. Mr. Thomas Spurgeon, having expressed his unwillingness to deprive the congregation of the more powerful words of his father, said:]

It is only in the hope that parting words may carry power with them that I have been induced to speak to you this evening. I will take no particular text, but will base my address upon the concluding words of the hymn we have been singing, "Steal away to Jesus." I will give a few reasons why you should all come to the loving Saviour. First of all because Christ invites you. When Peter wanted to walk upon the water, he said to his Master, "Bid me come unto Thee," and the Saviour said, "Come." But there is no need of sinners to say to Christ, "Bid me come unto Thee;" for He has already said it very many times. You have the invitation; why, then, stop away?

When Christ asks men to come to Him, though they have sinned against Him, He desires to pardon them and not to punish. A circumstance which I lately witnessed reminded me forcibly of what God never did to a sinner. A mother had just been washing the stone step in front of her house, and her little boy, who came out with a pail of water, clumsily spilt it upon the work which she had just completed. She was very angry, and, for the moment, almost forgot he was her son, and called to him, "You come here, you young rascal." That was inviting, certainly, but the woman wanted to punish her son. Now, every one of us has sinned against God, and done their best to spoil His work and to provoke His temper, but when He says, "Come unto Me," He does not call us in order to inflict punishment, but to give blessing. When Philip met Nathaniel, and told him that he had seen Jesus of Nazareth, Nathaniel replied, "Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?" to which Philip again replied, "Come and see." He was just to prove it for himself, and so should each sinner present. He should come to Jesus if he had never come before; trust in Him, to see if he could find in Jesus that peace which could not be found elsewhere.

Those who trust in Christ will never regret having done so. Why will you not?

Make but trial of His love;
Experience will decide How blest are they, and only they,
Who in His strength confide.

Then, further, you should also come to Jesus because nothing else and nobody else can do for you what you require. Your own righteousness can never save you, for at best it is but "filthy rags." Sacraments, good deeds, prayers, can never save you, for when we have done all these we are but "unprofitable servants." The woman who came to Jesus to be healed left it to a very late period. She had been to many physicians, she had spent her all, but grew no better, but rather worse, and then she came to Christ. 'Twas better late than never. She came to Christ at last for healing, and did He reprove or rebuke her? Nay, He healed her with a word. He might have said, "But why did not you come before? You have tried all else, and have not succeeded, and as a last resource you come to Me. Not very complimentary this. I will have naught to do with you." Not so the loving Lord; nor will He treat the poor sinner so. I plead with sinners to come to Christ, since they have tried all else in vain. All other physicians will fail to heal you; your wounds will never be stanched till Christ stanches them, and your leprosy never cleansed until He speaks the cleansing word.

One more reason why you should come to Christ is that it is a favorable opportunity. It is little matter that you may not hear my voice again, but oh! it is a great matter that you may not hear Christ's voice again. Many a time you have heard it in this Tabernacle—aye, and in the stillness of the midnight hour. You have heard it above the roar of the tempest and in the still quietude of night. Something within them or something from above had seemed to beckon you to Christ, and you have felt no comfort away from Him. Are you young? then He has said, "Suffer little children to come unto Me, for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Are you burdened with the weight of years? then remember that the "weary and heavy laden" are invited to come to Him for rest. Are there sinners present of the deepest dye, in that they have sinned against light and knowledge, and forsaken a God who has been so gracious to them? then remember that God says, "Return, ye backsliding children, for I am married to you" (Jer. 3). Yes, all such Christ invites to come home—to come home to a Father's arms, home to His kind embraces, home to a Saviour's wounds, home to a Mediator's love, home to all the bliss that ransomed souls could want, and home at last to heaven, to go no more out forever. Oh, blessed home!

I am about to leave my earthly home, but yonder is a better one; for bright as earthly homes may be, they are nothing to heaven above. There will be experienced all the familiarities of home without its troubles; there are the caresses of home without its cares and anxieties; there all the sweets of home with our parents and friends, with the additional happiness of knowing that they will last forever; and the still greater joy of seeing the King in His beauty. Then why do you hesitate to come to the Saviour? Mercy's door is opened wide, but it may be shut before the morrow. On the morrow the sun may never rise to many of you, and for this reason, while day lasts, you should come to Christ.

I remember very well, when I first went out to Australia, that one fine evening a little bird was seen to be following the ship, evidently a land bird which had got driven out to sea. When the little thing got tired it tried to alight on some portion of the rigging, though it seemed afraid to do so. On one occasion the captain stretched forth his hand and tried to take hold of the little bird, and had it for a while; but it eluded his grasp and went back far away into the darkness of the night, falling upon the waves without the hope of rescue.

I have thought what a picture this is of a sinner who has been flying over the waste of waters without finding rest for the sole of his foot, and who at last comes to understand that no rest can be found except in Jesus, and tremblingly comes to Him. Then the Great Captain stretches forth His hand, and wishes that it would rest within His bosom; but no, it is too timid, too fearful. Back it goes to death and doom, to rise no more for ever.

Shall this be the case with any now present? If you will but accept the offered Gospel and cling to Jesus, all shall be well with you; but if not, then all will be ill with you for ever. I trust that the Holy Spirit will plead with your conscience. "Now is the accepted time; now is the day of salvation." Oh, improve this happy hour by trusting for eternal salvation in the dear Redeemer.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

The subscription-price is $1.50, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, October 29th, at 5.00 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Reoublican Party has Lost One of its most prominent members and one of its hardest workers by the death of Senator Chandler, of Michigan, which occurred November 1st at Chicago. Mr. Chandler had been very active during the campaign, and had on the night previous to his death addressed a meeting of 5000 persons at Chicago. He stated his intention of making that the last speech he would deliver during the campaign, but subsequently agreed to speak at Detroit November 3d. He went to bed October 31st, complaining of a slight attack of indigestion, which was not considered serious by his friends; but the following morning on entering his room he was found dead.

He was born at Bedford, N. H., in 1813, and from a small beginning became a successful merchant. Remarkable for the strict integrity of his commercial transactions, he attained considerable wealth, and in 1850 turned his attention to politics. He became an extreme man on the Republican side of all questions. He was elected Mayor of Detroit in 1851. In 1857 he was chosen Senator for Michigan, and took his seat in the Thirty-fifth Congress, a congress remarkable for the brilliancy and ability of its members. In the political contests that preceded the outbreak of war he was a zealous and uncompromising partisan, and after its conclusion advocated extreme measures against the Southern States. He was a violent opponent of Great Britain, and had his advice been followed the Nation would have been involved in war with that Power on the Alabama question.

Mr. Chandler was generally respected for his personal integrity and honesty of purpose, but his extreme opinions aroused a strong feeling of hostility among the ranks of his political opponents.

General Joseph Hooker, commonly known as "Fighting Joe" Hooker, died on Friday, October 31st, at the hotel in Garden City, L. I. He had enjoyed fair health for some time, his chief trouble being from lameness. He was stricken with apoplexy in his room, and died in a few minutes.

He was born at Hadley, Mass., in 1813. He was a lineal descendant of Thomas Hooker, the Puritan pioneer who led the small band of settlers through the wilderness to found the city of Hartford and colony of Connecticut. When the Mexican War broke out in 1833 he was serving in the army as second lieutenant. For his bravery in the engagements of that war he was rapidly promoted, and at its close held the post of lieutenant-colonel. In the civil war he was appointed brigadier-general of volunteers, and was wounded at the battle of Antietam. He succeeded General Burnside in the command of the Army of the Potomac. After the battle of Chancellorsville he resigned, but was appointed to the command of the Twelfth and Thirteenth Army Corps. He fought the famous battle of Lookout Mountain, and his name afterwards was chiefly identified with that engagement. Since the war he has lived in retirement.

The Week of Prayer for Young Men.—The International Convention of the Young Men's Christian Association, held at Baltimore last May, representing one thousand Associations with a membership of one hundred thousand, recommended the observance of the second Lord's Day of November and the week following as a season of thanksgiving and of special prayer for God's blessing upon young men and upon the work in their behalf. The World's Convention at Geneva, Switzerland (in which eleven nations were represented by 250 delegates), made a similar recommendation, so that in all parts of the world this season of prayer will be observed.

The International Committee suggest the following topics for meetings each day in the week:

November 9th, Sunday.—Agreement in Prayer Encouraged. Dan. 2:17-23; Matt. 18:19, 20.

November 10th, Monday.—A Moral Young Man Weighed and Found Wanting. Mark 10:17-22.

November 11th, Tuesday.—The Son of a Godly Father who went Astray. 2 Chron. 32:33; 33:1-13.

November 12th, Wednesday.—A Man Prospered Beyond Precedent Unsatisfied. Eccl. 2:1-11; John 4:13, 14.

November 13th, Thursday.—The Secret of a Young Man's Success in Business. Gen. 39:1-23.

November 14th, Friday.—A Highly-favored Man and his Terrible end. Matt. 10:1-4; Luke 22:3, 6, 47, 48; Matt. 27:3-5; Acts 1:16-20.

November 15th, Saturday.—Opposite Choices of Two Young Men. Heb. 11:24-26; Gen. 13:10-13.

The Committee have issued a circular to pastors, asking their co-operation and requesting if practicable a sermon to young men, on Sunday, November 9th, and such other observance of the following week as they deem desirable. Last year the season was generally observed; a large number of sermons to young men were preached; many special services were held, and most encouraging reports of good results were received from ministers and associations.

Indian Girls at School is the Subject of an interesting communication from a teacher at the Barracks, Carlisle, Pa. The heartless dictum of one of our generals, that "the only good Indian is a dead Indian," is so thoroughly unchristian that we welcome any attempt to civilize the tribes as a needed protest against that sentiment being adopted by a Christian nation. Nothing more hopeful could be conceived than this project in operation at Carlisle, and all Christian people will wish it complete success. There are about thirty girls in the establishment; they are mostly Sioux, and at departure for their new home several thousand Indians assembled together and rendered night hideous by their wails and lamentations, though they seemed glad that their children should have an opportunity to be educated. The teacher says: "Several of the girls can sew a little, buf scarcely any understand a word of English. They are, however, accomplished in all sorts of Indian fancy-work, their knapsacks being marvels of ingenious beadwork. The dress of the girls consists of a loose dress, with flowing sleeves, almost covered with a gay blanket, which also forms a covering for the head. Their mocassins are very pretty, and highly ornamented. They wear a profusion of jewelry. The ears are pierced in various places, so that several pairs of earrings are worn at once, some of which (those of elk's teeth) extend from the ears in strings around the neck. They have on, also, the usual amount of paint and feathers.

"One of the first things done was to put them into the bath, to which they were apparer not accustomed, but submitted with good gra Then they were put into the hands of the t bers. As soon as the Government suppi arrive they will be put into civilized costume, that they may appear as much as possible l American girls.

"The teachers are already on the ground, f of interest and enthusiasm in their work. T children themselves seem happy and content eating the plain, wellcooked food as if they h never tasted any thing so good before. It d one good to hear their merry chatter a laughter, and to see them so anxious to lea One of the ladies found several of them with c ico, with scissors in hand, trying to cut the selves out some dresses! They have alrea learned the words and the music of 'Come Jesus,' and sing it very sweetly. There are sorts of visages and dispositions among the some being bright and even pretty, while othe are quite the reverse.

"Some of the Indians who are being educat at Hampton have been here for a few days their way back to school. The contrast betwe these children and those who have just arriv is very striking and encouraging to those wl have the moral and spiritual elevation of the children at heart. If such a short training h already done so much for them, what may n time and effort do for these?

"Quite a curious scene, the other day, was t naming of the girls. Their Indian names bei unpronounceable, and the English equivalents b ing such as 'White Cow,' 'Plenty Ant 'Crockery Face,' 'Wooden Earrings,' 'He in Front,' 'Her Pipe,' etc., it was deemed a visable to give them such names as Americ girls have, which was accordingly done. Ev those who have pleasant sounding names, suc as 'Pretty Lance,' desired to have their nam changed."

Dissipation ending in Suicide.—Francis I Heyward killed himself at No. 17 W. 21 St. Ne York. Mr. Heyward was of good family. H Henry Heyward, was a lawyer of some not father, who amassed a competence and bequeat ed to his son an income of $12,000 a yea The young man gave way to habits of dissip tion, and at midnight on Monday, October 6th he returned to his home broken down from th effects of drink. Two friends accompanied him and with them he entered his room. One wa sitting beside him, the other having left them when Heyward with a sudden motion drew pistol, and, with the words, "I will end it no as well!" fired at his own head. The bullet entered the brain through the temple, and deat was almost instantaneous. Deaths so sad an sinful remind us that suicide is not the end o life, but the beginning of eternity.

The Gospel to the Poor.—While Learned authorities compliment Mr. Spurgeon and Dr Talmage in their erudite way, those ministers o Christ would probably be most pleased at the following unaffected testimony from a humbl reader whose soul their sermons have strengthened: "I am very thankful for such good reading as I have in the CHRISTIAN HERALD. Sometimes when I am reading Mr. Talmage's sermons I feel as though I should like to take wing and fly up. Some say that Mr. Spurgeon drinks, but I know that drink affects the mind first, and I perceive by reading his sermons that his mind is clear as a bell. They are so plain that a poor ignorant person like me, who has never had a day's schooling, can understand almost every word in his sermons. Thank God that the poor have the Gospel preached to them nowadays as well as in the times of old. May God's blessing rest on Mr. Spurgeon and Mr. Talmage!"

The Centennial Baptist Church, Brooklyn, of which the Rev. Dr. Fulton is pastor, is negotiating for the purchase of the Rink on Clermont Avenue for church purposes. A committee of the church has reported in favor of the purchase.

It was in this Rink that the first meetings of Moody and Sankey in this country were held. The building will seat about 6000 persons.

r. Talmage Continues to be an Illustration o he fact that untruthful gossip "loves a shin- n mark." Certain newspapers, without tak- in the trouble to investigate the veracity of at ird stories about him, give currency to state- m ts which are pure fabrications. It is alleged, fo instance, that Dr. Talmage, while in Eng- a , wrote a letter agreeing to lecture at Bristol o £40 ($195), and afterwards wrote to say he m t have £50 ($245), and still later that he must £60 ($292). The Bristol gentleman who ged him is alleged to have twice telegraphed, ome, come," and then, after the lecture, n £60 was asked for, he produced the first r, agreeing to come for £40, with a sixpenny ement stamp on it, rendering it legally bind- so that Dr. Talmage found himself outwit- by the wideawake Bristolian, and had to re- crestfallen with only £40.

ow this story is absolutely false from begin- to end. Dr. Talmage never wrote asking 50, or £60, instead of £40. He never re- d any telegram saying "Come, come," or ls to that effect, and he never had after the re a letter from himself shown to him ped with a sixpenny or any other stamp. can be deposed to on affidavit by persons had to do with the arrangements for the tol lecture.

ot only did Dr. Talmage obtain £1300 ($6310) profit for the Young Men's Christian As- tion of Leeds, but also £30 ($146) was sent of the receipts for his lecture at Exeter Hall, lon, to Mr. George Müller's Orphan Homes ristol. The donation to that institution was urse unasked for, as neither Mr. Muller nor ssistants ever solicit in any way contribu- for those institutions, but rely entirely God to provide for them.

e Story of the Patient Waiting of a Lov- nother comes from West Virginia. Her son out one evening thirty years ago, asking to have supper ready for him when he ld come back. Whether he was murdered n away to sea, nobody knows. He has r returned. His mother, now feeble and -haired, makes ready for him every night, s his chair by the table and waits. "He come some day," she says, "and then he ee that I never have forgotten him." Her may never be fulfilled, but it teaches Chris- the lesson that the coming of their Lord, h is assured, should be so anticipated, that He comes He will find us ready.

. George Muller, who is now on a visit is country, began a series of evening meet- in Rochester on Thursday, October 23d, n closed on the following Monday. He held ervices, occupying a different pulpit each as arranged by the Christian Association. numbers were drawn together to hear and his spirit and instructions left a delight- nfluence. By special request, he gave de- of his wonderful life-work on Sabbath even- Dr. Page writes :

o great was the desire to hear the wonder- ory, that hundreds were unable to gain ad- nce to the house, which was densely packed and below. For an hour and twenty min- he held the vast congregation as if spell- d." Mr. M ller goes from Rochester to ilton, Ontario, thence to Toronto, Buffalo, oit, Cleveland, and Chicago. He is to re- eight months longer in this country.

ny Rival Claimants to a Miser's Estate entered an appearance at the Jersey City ans' Court. They come from Brooklyn, City, Ohio, Indiana, and Ireland, and if all press their claims there seems a strong bility that the estate, large as it is, will be owed up in litigation. The deceased miser rag-picker named David Leach, who had for many years in abject misery, subsisting y on the crusts he found in ash-barrels the city. He died last February, and it hen found that he was possessed of con- able property invested in mortgage and real es . During his lifetime he had suffered his on daughter to become a domestic servant, and when she fell ill she went to a charity hospital, and when she died she was buried as a pauper. The only intimation his neighbors had that he was not so poor as he seemed, was a grim joke he played on some occupants of the house where he lived. The people had complained of him to the landlord as a nuisance, and asked to have him turned out. The rag-picker hearing of the complaint went quietly to the landlord and bought the house, and then promptly ejected his fellow-lodgers.

When we consider the privations of the miser's life, his ceaseless labor, his lonely death, and the struggle afterwards of others for the fruits of his labor, we realize how wise are the teachings of the inspired writer, and say with him, "This is a sore evil and what profit hath he that hath labored for the wind?' Eccles. 5 : 16.

Jewelry as an Offering to the Lord.—Rev. Dr. Kirkus, of Baltimore, Md., asked for contributions of "gold, silver and jewelry" from his congregation, on a recent Sunday, toward the manufacture of a new communion service. A half-bushel measure of silver plate and jewelry was the response. These offerings, including a diamond ring, were valued at eleven hundred dollars.

The Fate of the Missing Aeronauts who ascended from St. Louis on Sunday, September 22d, of whom mention was made in this journal of October 16th, is now considered a matter of certainty. No intelligence has been received of Prof. Wise, but the body of his companion, Mr. Burr, was washed ashore on Lake Michigan on Friday, October 31st, from which it appears probable that both perished in the lake. It is to be hoped that the catastrophe may operate as a warning against the desecration of the Lord's Day.

A Foolish Practical Joke came near ending in death recently in Indianapolis. A number of medical students undertook to make a victim of a professional "resurrectionist." They told him that they had secured a body, and asked him to remove it from its hiding-place. The supposed corpse in the bag was a live medical student. The students pointed out the spot where the bag was concealed, and the man threw the bag over his shoulder and set out for the college. The student in the bag, with no knowledge of his whereabouts, made demonstrations of life just as his bearer was crossing the canal. The bearer was intensely frightened, and in his terror dropped his burden over the bridge into the water and calmly walked on. Had not the companions of the unfortunate fellow rushed to his rescue he would have been drowned.

A Thief's Restitution of his Booty was made unexpectedly a few days ago. Mr. Isaac G. Jenkins, of Syracuse, while sitting in his library lately, was handed a letter, and on opening it carelessly was surprised to find $2500, with the simple explanation, "I robbed you of this years ago." Mr. Jenkins has no idea who the conscience-stricken person may be.

A Liquor Law Contest is in Progress at Jamaica, L. I. For years the provisions of the Excise law have been notoriously disregarded in that city. Many dealers have sold liquor without a local license, and the Sunday clause has been openly violated. Efforts have from time to time been made to enforce a more strict compliance with the law, but they have not been successful in effecting permanent good. Now, however, there is a more determined movement, resulting from the organization of the Sabbath Observance Association some months ago. This association has an Executive Committee composed of a number of the most prominent and influential property-owners of the town, who have secured the services of W. T. B. Milliken as counsel, and have gone about the work of enforcing a compliance with the law with an earnestness and a persistency which show that they intend to succeed.

The Members of the First Presbyterian Church, Baltimore, have purchased a building which is to be fitted up as an orphan asylum for the fatherless, motherless, and friendless poor children of the congregation.

MISTRUST OF GOD DEPLORED AND DENOUNCED.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"How long will it be ere they believe me?"—NUMBERS 14 : 11.

God's Long-Suffering brought to a Pause through Unbelief—I. The Sin of Unbelief Defined—An Idle Excuse—Fear was Natural—"We are Weak"— Blaming the Leaders— II. The Sin Described—1. Such Sin seems Incredible—2. An Unreasonable Thing—3. Most Inexcusable—4. Unbelief Ought to be Impossible—Especially to a Child of God—III. The Sin Bitterly Deplored—All Guilty—Faith should be an Everyday Thing—IV. The Sin Denounced—1. It Insults God—2. It has Ruined Our Race—3. It has brought Misery upon God's Children—4. It has Hampered the Work of Christ in the World.

THE children of Israel were very prone to unbelief. They wanted something visible to worship and to trust : they could not learn the lesson of faith in the One great Invisible, and hence they were one day bowing before an idol, and the next they were murmuring against the true God. Their life was according to the flesh, after the sight of the eyes and the hearing of the ears, and hence they praised God when Pharaoh was drowned, and when manna lay round about their camp ; but the moment they were in want or difficulty, and saw no supply of relief, they could not trust in God, but began to mistrust and murmur.

The incident before us relates to that great and terrible provocation in which the longsuffering of God came to a pause. They sent spies into Canaan, and when they were informed by ten false-hearted men that the giants were in the land, and that the inhabitants of it dwelt in walled cities which they could not hope to capture, they then began to accuse the Lord according to their former manner, denying His power to fulfil His ancient covenant and give them the land that flowed with milk and honey.

This time the Lord lifted His hand and swore that they should not enter into His rest. Let us be warned by this fact, that there is a limit to the longsuffering of God, and especially when it is tried by distrust. He may bear with unbelief for a time, and, blessed be His name, for a long time, for He remembers that we are dust ; but when it comes to wilful perseverance in unbelief the Lord will not forever be thus provoked. It behooves us to listen to the words of Paul : "Let us therefore fear, lest, a promise being left us of entering into His rest, any of you should seem to come short of it."

This morning my one subject is

THIS SIN OF UNBELIEF,

which I desire to deal with in the fear of God and in the power of His Holy Spirit.

I. Our first head shall be (the sin of Israel is here defined) : "How long will it be ere they believe me?" Observe that God's account of all the murmuring and discouragement and fear which these people felt was simply that they did not believe Him. They doubtless said that they were naturally afraid of their enemies : the Anakim, the sons of the giants, these would overtop and overcome them. They seemed like grasshoppers in the sight of such gigantic beings, and therefore they might well tremble. Had they been ordinary men, however numerous their bands, they declared that they should not have been afraid ; but these huge monsters created a natural and unavoidable fear. "No," says God, "that is an idle excuse. No fear of giants would enter their minds if they believed me. How long will it be ere they believe me?"

If these sons of Anak had been ten times as high as they were, yet the almighty Lord could vanquish them, and if their cities had been literally as well as figuratively walled up to the skies, yet Jehovah could smite them out of heaven, and cast their ramparts into the dust. Gigantic men and battlemented cities are nothing to him who divided the Red Sea. When the Omnipotent is present opposition vanishes. This was so clear that, if the Israelites were afraid, the real reason was that they did not believe their God.

So, my brethren, let us strip our discouragements and murmurings of all their disguises, and see them in their true character, and they will appear in their own naked deformity as discrediting God. It is true the difficulty before us may appear great, but it cannot be great to the Lord, who has promised to make us more than conquerors. It is true the circumstances may appear unusually perplexing, but they cannot perplex Him who has promised to guide us with His counsel ; and, since we are well aware of this, it is clear that the true reason why we are so dismayed is not to be found in the difficulties and the circumstances, but in our misgivings of God.

"Ah," but these people might have replied, 'We fear because of our weakness. We are not a drilled host, like the armies of Egypt. We know not how to fight against chariots of iron : we are only feeble men, with all these women and children to encumber our march."

But the Lord puts the matter very differently. What had their weakness to do with His promise? How could their weakness affect His power to give them the land? He could conquer Amalek if they could not. Caleb had told them, "If the Lord delight in us, then He will bring us into this land." They knew that their feebleness had not prevented the Lord's bringing them out of Egypt, despite the pride and power of Pharaoh, and they must have known that He could with equal ease overthrow the Canaanites and their armies. Their weakness could only be a foil to the glory of the divine power, so that it would be made the more conspicuous.

We also, when we plead our weakness, ought to be ashamed, for we know that we can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth us. If we probe to the bottom of those doubts and fears which apparently arise out of a sense of our own weakness, we shall find that they spring from mistrust of God. Our trembling is not humility, but unbelief. We may mask it how we please, but that is the state of the case as God sees it, and He sees it in truth. The question is not, "How long will they be weak?" but, "How long will it be ere they believe me?"

"No, no," the people may have said, "We are not murmuring against God : it is against Moses and Aaron. They made a mistake when they brought us into the wilderness, and they have undertaken an enterprise which they cannot carry through : we blame these two men for their foolhardiness." But the Lord would not have it so. Moses and Aaron were only his instruments, and mere second causes, and the Lord will not allow that the quarrel is with them, but he asks, "How long will it be ere they believe me?"

Thus, brethren, we sometimes fix upon our fellow-man, his infirmity, his shortsightedness, his want of wisdom, and we say that we do not doubt God, but we can never feel secure while our leaders or our friends are such poor, unwise creatures. If you put this pretext to the test you will see that it avails nothing, for God can use what instruments he pleases, whether Paul, or Apollos, or Cephas, and he can accomplish his purposes despite their frailty. His word is not to fall to the ground because of the medium through which He carries it into effect.

So, brethren, I come back to that first point, and solemnly declare that though our doubts and fears are called oftentimes by more respectable names, because we do not like to see their sin in all its nakedness, yet they come to this, that we do not believe the ever blessed God. If we look at our discouragement and mistrust in this light we shall no longer pity, but blame ourselves, and instead of excusing we shall accuse our heart of a great crime. Mistrust toward God is not a mere weakness : it is a wickedness of the gravest order.

II. We will now proceed, in the second place, further to describe this sin of not believing.

1. I would remark, first, that at the first blush it would seem incredible that there should be such a thing in the universe as unbelief of God. That God should manifest Himself to man so as to make a promise to Him is indescribable condescension. One would think that the high and lofty One would abide in His eternal silence, or communicate Himself to the most exalted creatures, rather than speak to such a being as man. What is man that God should be mindful of him and speak to him? Yet we believe that the Lord has spoken to us often by His prophets, and in these last days by His Son.

Now if an angel altogether unacquainted with human history could be informed that God had spoken to men, I imagine that His astonishment would be overwhelming if we also informed Him that men have disbelieved Him. "What!" he would say ; "what! dare to disbelieve the Lord! Doubt the Lord, whose infinite love stooped to speak with His creature! God, who is essential truth, and cannot possibly lie nor deceive, have there been creatures vile enough to perpetrate such their Benefactor? Can they suspect the infinitely pure of deceit? Dare they question the truth of the perfect One whom cherubim adore?" I say that an angel would be staggered at such blasphemy.

AN INSULT UPON THEIR MAKER,

2. Consider, next, that, though unbelief certainly exists, it is a most unreasonable thing. If God hath made a promise, on what grounds do we doubt its fulfilment? Which of all the attributes of God is that which comes under suspicion? Probably the first distrusted attribute will be His power. Have not men said, "Can God furnish a table in the wilderness? or can He deliver us out of the deep waters?" Let us think of this. Has the Lord promised to supply and deliver? Then, my dear friend, do you really in your sober senses question the power of God to do as He has said? Hath He not made the heavens and the earth? Do not all things subsist by His continuous power? Is any thing too hard for the Lord? Is His arm shortened that He cannot save? Is His hand paralyzed that He cannot achieve His purpose? The more we consider the supposition that God is unable to keep His promises, the more we discard it with indignation. It is not to be entertained for a moment.

What, then, is it God's goodness that we suspect? After He hath filled the world with bounty, and multiplied His loving kindnesses to His creatures ; above all, after He has given from His bosom His only-begotten Son to die, as the fulfilment as well as the seal of the great promises of His covenant, dare we question His goodness? Do we call God evil? Do we impute unkindness to Him? Let horror seize us at the suggestion of such a thought ; let our bones quake that we should ever tolerate the hideous libel upon him whose very name is good : for what is "God" but "good" written in brief? It must come back to this with which we started, that we suspect the truth of God ; and yet the more we shall consider the supposition the more we shall be alarmed by its blasphemous character.

3. Again, because this sin is so unreasonable, it is also most inexcusable. Let me try, if I can, to frame an excuse for doubting the truthfulness of the Lord our God. Look back upon your own experience, and take with it the experience of all men that have ever lived, and find if you can a single instance in which God has been untrue to the word He has spoken. We challenge eternity to divulge such an instance : we appeal to all mankind, from Adam to the latest born, and to angels, ay, and to devils themselves, to produce one single case in which Jehovah has turned from promise or from threatening so as to forfeit His word.

His faithfulness is indisputable ; the ages witness it. Now ; if there had been one instance, we might be justified in our misgivings. If we could find one authenticated case, fully established, in which God had acted contrary to His promise, or failed to keep His word, then might we lawfully distrust, but as we can never find such a case, what excuse can we make?

Moreover, when a man is suspected of untruthfulness we usually impute to him some motive for it ; he has something to gain by the lie, and therefore we suppose he will prove false. But what motive can be imputed to the Lord Most High which could lead Him to forfeit His word? He knows all things from the beginning, and therefore, even if it were supposable that to keep a promise would be inconvenient to Himself, He would never have made it, for he must have foreseen that inconvenience.

God is not bound to promise, and therefore if the good deed were not to His mind, He would not promise to perform it. Nor has God changed, since immutability is essential to His being. If, therefore, He has uttered a word you may rest quite sure that it will stand fast : an unchangeable being cannot be fickle, and run back from His promise.

Why, my friends, it is to God's glory to keep His word. As it is to the glory of every man to be upright, so is it to the glory and honor of God to be faithful to His solemn declarations. Even on the lowest conceivable ground the Lord's own interests are bound up with His truth. All the glory of His name and the honor of His divine person bend toward the keeping of His word. There is no supposable reason why the Lord should not be true : how dare we, then, without the slightest cause, cast suspicion upon the truthfulness of the Most High?

4. My dear brethren, I venture to say that unbelief of God's word ought, therefore, to be impossible. It ought to be impossible to ever reverent-hearted man. Doth he know God an tremble in His presence, and shall he think o distrusting and doubting him? No one tha hath ever seen Him in contemplation, an bowed before Him in sincere adoration, but mus be amazed at the impertinence that would dar to think that God can lie. O reverent heart, i ought to be to thee beyond the bound of possibility that thou shouldst doubt the truth of th promises of God!

And this ought to be more impossible still, i such an expression may be used, to God's ow children. You could not make a true-heart child suspect his father of falsehood. If h heard such an accusation brought against a loving and kind father he would be indignant : h would not want to hear rebutting evidence ; h would say, "It is impossible ; I know my fathe I know his character, I have seen him, I unde stand him, I cannot endure to hear him sla dered, and I do not need to hear him defende for of this I am sure—that

"HE CANNOT LIE."

In the child's case there might be a partialit and the father might have been guilty ; but i the case of the children of God no such poss bility exists, for our Father is the God of trut Oh, my brethren, shall it ever be said that t children of God doubt their Father?

I have heard some professing Christians s that they find it hard to believe His promise and yet they do not appear to think that th have said a dreadful thing : yet a very dread thing it is. What must be their opinion of G if they find it hard to believe Him? Think of again : of a child of God finding it hard to b lieve his own Father, his heavenly Father! A wretched sin! Wretched insult to God! If were not so false-hearted ourselves we shou never dream of the Lord's being so, and if were not conscious of being chargeable with u truth, the thought that perchance God mig fail to fulfil His word would never be tolerate It is horrible! If it has crossed your mind, sco it, and, with many tears, confess it before God ; f to a child of God it ought to be impossible doubt his Father's truthfulness.

It is strange how you and I can enter into co fidence and conviction about many things, a yet we cannot exercise the same confidence t ward our God. You all believe in the laws matter. You expect that the law of gravitati will bring a weight downward if you throw from the window ; why are you so certain? E cause you have seen the rule in action so oft that you now expect to see it carried out: and yet the law of gravitation might be suspended; indeed, it has been suspended, for at the Red Sea the floods stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea. You all expect the sun to rise in the morning and to set at his appointed time, because he has kept his daily marches for many years; and yet there was a time when there was no sun to rise or set, and there will be a time when the sun shall be turned into darkness, and day and night shall cease. Can you trust the temporary and yet doubt the eternal?

III. This brings me, in the third place, to dwell upon this sin very much in the same way, only with this heading—the sin bitterly deplored. We have all been guilty of it. Some here are living constantly in the commission of it. But what I want to call to your remembrance is this, that in any one case of doubting the truthfulness of God there is the full venom of the entire sin of unbelief. That is to say: if you distrust the Lord in one, you doubt him altogether.

You say that you can believe the Lord about other things, but there is one particular point which staggers you. But is it not clear that the man who is convicted of one falsehood is no longer trustworthy? The Scripture calls him "God who cannot lie." Do you think he can lie once, then he can lie and the Scripture is broken? "Ah, but I mean he may not keep His promise to me; I am such an unworthy person." Yes, but when a man forfeits his word it is no defence for him to say, "I told an untruth, but it was only to an unworthy person." No, the truth must be spoken irrespective of persons. I have no right to deceive even a criminal.

Do you dare say that to one person the Lord can be untrue? If it can be so, He is not a true God any more? It only wants one falsehood, one breach of promise, one lie, to be proved, and you have smitten the character of the accused to the very heart; you would not dream of doing such a thing to the great God. You may as well doubt Him about every thing if you distrust Him upon any one matter. Get but the promise from God, and there is an infallible necessity that he shall keep it, be it a little promise or a great one, for the character of a truthful being is all square, and he is false in nothing.

Do you reply that you doubted him upon a very trivial matter, and it was only a little mistrust? Alas, there is a world of iniquity in the faintest discredit of the thrice-holy Lord. Reflect, then, with sorrow that we have been guilty of this sin, not once, but a great many times.

Timorousness and suspicion spring up in some bosoms like weeds in the furrows. They sing the Lord's praises for a great deliverance just experienced, but the next cloud which darkens the sky fills them with fear, and they again mistrust divine love. Their heavenly Father delivers them and helps them and comforts them, and they say they will never doubt again, but in a short time another trial looms in the distance, and they are despondent and dismayed. Now I will read to you, and I will read to myself, these words of God, which make up our text: "How long will this people provoke me? and how long will it be ere they believe me, for all the signs which I have showed among them?"

Another thought upon this point, and it is this: Are there not some professing people of God who do not seem to live a life of faith at all? I mean some who have no faith about their temporal circumstances at all, and almost look upon living by faith as if it were a kind of fanaticism which they admit to be very pious and good, but they can never come up to it. Yet faith should be an every-day thing with us.

In the life of Abraham how few acts are mentioned of outward religion, of long retirements, fasts, public services, sacraments, and so forth! but how clear it is that his daily secular and domestic life was a living unto God as a pilgrim and a sójourner with him! There is no visible line between secular and sacred in the patriarch's life: it was all sacred. It is an evil distinction which saith so far is spiritual and so far is secular. My brethren, your whole lives must be spiritual lives; there must be faith in God about your home, your families, and your neighbors. Some look upon faith as a kind of Sunday grace to be laid up in the ark of the covenant with Aaron's rod; but indeed it is an every-day faculty, a grace for the table, a grace for the cupboard, a grace for the pocket, a grace for the market, a grace for the nursery, and a grace for the sick bed.

The life of God's peope is not to be lived within the four narrow walls of a meeting-house; it is lived wherever they are, for in every place the just shall live by faith. The religion of a Christian is to be the whole of his life, and faith is to run through it like a thread through a necklace of coral. We are to believe God as much when he saith, "Thy bread shall be given thee and thy water shall be sure," as when he saith, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." Oh, for more household faith, more Saturday faith, more real faith! Let us blush—and never cease to blush—that we have had so little of it.

THE SIN DENOUNCED.

IV. Lastly, as we have now deplored this sin, we shall conclude by spending a moment or two in heartily denouncing it.

1. This sin of unbelief, if there were no other reason for denouncing it, let it be reprobated because it insults God. I feel an infinite enmity to unbelief because it so terribly misrepresents and calumniates my God. If any man were to say to me, "Your father breaks his word," I would not suffer the accuser to go unanswered; and assuredly I cannot be silent when my heavenly Father is thus slandered. Our race fell by believing the old dragon's base charge against God when he said to the woman in his vile serpentine language, "Ye shall not surely die." He thus gave God the lie. Away with thee, thou subtle serpent! Away with thee! Go and eat the dust that is thy predestinated meat; for God cannot speak that which is not true; He is truth itself.

How greatly does unbelief dishonor the Lord! What shame it casts upon the splendor of His name! Alas, that there should be going up and down this world creatures denying the existence of their Creator, and other beings who admit that there is a God, and believe that He has spoken and given promise of good things to come, but treat His word as if it were worthless and unfit to be trusted. Oh, hateful, abominable, loathsome mistrust, which dares to treat the Lord as unworthy to be believed.

2. This is sufficient reason for denouncing it, and yet since weaker reasons may perhaps help the stronger, let me mention that we are bound to hate unbelief because it is the ruin of the great mass of our race. Why are men lost? All their sins which they have done cannot destroy them if they believe in Jesus, but the damning point is that they will not believe in Him. Thus saith the Scriptures—"He that believeth not is condemned already." Why? "Because he hath not believed on the Son of God."

3. We may hate it, again, because it brings so much misery and weakness upon the children of God. My brethren, if we believed God's promises we should no longer be bowed down with sorrow, for our sorrow would be turned into joy. We should glory in our infirmities—yea, we should glory in tribulation also, seeing the good result which the Lord bringeth forth from them.

The man who steadily believes his God is calm, quiet, and strong. If men fail him his God supports him. Suppose his business fails him, his chief business is to serve his God, and that has not failed. If he is himself sick and racked with pain, he resigns himself to the great Father's chastening hand, and patience is given. If health is utterly failing he leaves himself with God, that he may take down His tabernacle curtain by curtain, confident that He will build it again in nobler form. When death approaches he so fully believes in God that he feels it will be gain to him to pass out of this state of trial into everlasting blessedness at the Lord's right hand; and so he is always happy. How strong such a man becomes! The weakness which comes of fear and trembling does not touch him; his heart is fixed, and therefore he has all his strength under control, and can bring it to bear upon the place where it is needed.

I do not know whether you have thought of the prowess of Samson. His is a very poor character in many aspects, but yet what a true hero he is when you view him in the light of his faith! It was not that he was physically strong by nature, but that he believed God, and strength came upon him. As a believer in God he trusted that the Lord could make His thews and muscles strong enough for any task which was allotted him, and so when the gates of Gaza shut him in he rose up from his sleep and bowed himself before the huge doors, and with a mighty tug uplifted them; and as the bars were fastened to the posts, he pulled up posts and all, and carried the whole away to the top of the hill, not as a feat of Herculean strength, but as an act of faith in God.

Only believe God and

YOU CAN DO ANY THING.

If the Lord should bid you shake the world you could do it by faith. Plucking up sycamore trees by the roots, and hurling mountains into the sea, are mere sport for faith, which ere now has subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, stopped the mouths of lions, and quenched the violence of fire. She hath grander things to do than the mere slaying of Philistines, for she wrestles with principalities and powers and spiritual wickedness in high places, and comes off more than conqueror through him that loved her.

And yet, my friend, you are hiding in the rear? You are lying in the ambulance: you are being nursed and cared for as a babe! Shall it always be so? Will you forever be a mere child? If you do not believe you will never grow strong, but he that believeth comes to the full development of that celestial manhood which is akin to the manhood of Christ in whom we live.

4. One very shocking point about this unbelief is that it has hampered the work of Christ in the world. The Christ that can save is a Christ believed in, but of a Christ who is not believed in it is written: "He did not many mighty works there because of their unbelief." The reason why at this time whole nations lie under popery or heathenism is that the church has not faith enough for their conquest. There is no straitening in God; our limit lies in our own timorous hearts. The first thing to be done is for Zion to believe in God, and then the rod of His strength shall go forth out of her midst, and she shall become "Fair as the moon, clear as the sun, and terrible as an army with banners."

If the Son of man should now come on the earth, where would He find faith? Where could He discover a high degree of it? You know what most churches do. There is the regular performance of divine service; the regular preaching of an orthodox sermon as dry as it is orthodox; the regular meeting of a few people for a prayer-meeting, in which there is no real prayer; and the regular revolution of a spiritual barrel organ, from which all spirituality has long ago been ground out. Nothing comes of this lifeless routine, and it was never likely that there could be any thing, for out of death death alone can come.

Forward, brethren. God the Holy Ghost helping you, resolve in your hearts this day that all the boasted discoveries of science you will doubt, all the affirmations of the wise you will doubt, all the speculations of great thinkers you will doubt, all your own feelings and all the conclusions drawn from outward circumstances you will doubt, yea, and every thing that seems to be demonstrable to a certainty you will doubt, but never, never, never, while eternity shall last, will you suffer the thought to pass your mind that God can ever in the least degree run back from any thing that he has spoken.

Thus have I spoken for Him; may His Holy Spirit make it powerful on your minds, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

MR. J. B. GOUGH'S RETURN.

Welcome at the Broadway Tabernacle.

MR. JOHN B. GOUGH was tendered a reception on Thursday, October 30th, in the parlors of the Broadway Tabernacle, which had been kindly offered for the purpose by the Rev. Dr. Taylor. The Board of Managers of the National Temperance Society had the reception in charge, and issued invitations to prominent clergymen, temperance workers, and Mr. Gough's personal friends about two hundred persons were present, the meeting not having been publicly announced. The Hon. William E. Dodge occupied the chair, and expressed the sincere pleasure Mr. Gough's friends felt in welcoming him on his return to his adopted country. Addresses of welcome were also delivered by Dr. Taylor, Dr. Cuyler, Dr. Peck, Dr. J. P. Newman, Judge Noah Davis, and Rev. Mr. Mears, of Worcester, Mr. Gough's pastor.

In reply to the cordial words of greeting Mr. Gough said:

MR. DODGE AND KIND FRIENDS: If I followed my own inclination I should walk straight out of this room and retire quietly for a while. The kindness of your reception overcomes me. As I listened to the many kind things you have said of me I asked myself, "What am I or my father's house that I should receive this at your hands?" I never felt my own littleness so much in all my life as I have felt it to-night. God has been so good to me as to enable me to do what I have done for this great movement of temperance, and I say to myself it is the cause, not the man, to whom you are doing the honor; and if it had been another man who had been blessed of God in this work as I have been, you would have extended your welcome to him just as heartily.

At the same time, as I look about me and see here the faces of the friends of years long past, I know that you feel an extra tenderness for the man, and that you are glad that it is I who have been so honored. To you, my dear friends, I say, as Mr. Spurgeon said in a letter to me, "I hope you and I will be near together by divine appointment when at the great day we all, blood-bought, look on the face of our Redeemer."

When I went to England this time I went to rest. I had no conception of what was before me. When we reached Queenstown a friend said to me, "There are a lot of letters for you on the cabin table; they have just come on board." I said, "Oh, that must be a mistake; who is there likely to write to me?" I did not go down till the tender had left, and then I found them; such a heap! letters, telegrams, words of welcome, notices of reception meetings, requests to lecture—a perfect host. I saw there was something more for me to do than the thirty lectures I had engaged to deliver. The heartiness and cordiality of the reception when I did arrive, overcame me.

Well, you will like to hear something of the progress of

THE CAUSE IN GREAT BRITAIN

compared with the state of things I found there twenty-five years ago. I noticed in this visit a decided change in many respects. I found that what are known as the lower classes were more steeped and brutalized by drunkenness than they were twenty-five years before. Mr. Spurgeon, with whom I conversed on the subject, confirmed my impression on this point.

How is it that this brutality exists? It is not a characteristic of the Anglo-Saxon race. By nature the race is a noble and a generous one. The charities of England are amazing. If there is a call for help in any direction at home or abroad, a subscription is started at once, and the money rolls in. When the Princess Alice disaster occurred £90,000 were subscribed in a very short time, and it was not all made up of the gold of the rich, for the bronze offerings, the pennies of the shoeblacks, formed no inconsiderable portion. And that shows that the working men are generous. Then, too, look at the subscriptions for the famine in the East, and all the other calls for help; what a liberal response was evoked from all classes!

What is the cause, then, for this almost incredible brutality, which is not inherent in the Anglo-Saxon race? It is the awful drink that does it. There is nothing to be compared to it on this side the water. The sights in London are heartrending. The American visiting the great city is struck with amazement at the wickedness he sees. But then that is partly due to the fact that there you see it at a glance. The population is so vast, and the area is relatively so small. But apart from that view, the extent to which drunkenness prevails is something awful. Samuel Morley, M.P., said to me, "I have the gravest apprehensions for the future of this country unless something is done to stem this tide of drunkenness."

I noticed that when you come up to the middle classes and the higher classes there is in the drinking customs. But there is a sad exception to this favorable feature, and that is among the women of these classes—I mean respectable women. They drink more, and they drink more frequently to excess, than formerly. I attribute that evil to the granting of licenses to grocers. At this time a lady can buy, where she buys her tea and sugar, liquor in large or small quantities, which she can have sent home to be drunk there. That is a great evil, and the cause of much of this painful relapse in domestic life.

A MARKED IMPROVEMENT

But what I want you to know is the quantity of temperance work there is being done in England. The organization is glorious. When I saw the number of societies, and the energy of their efforts, I should have been ashamed to come back to you if I did not work. And I did work as I never worked in my life before.

The Church of England Temperance Society is doing a grand work. That was started since I was there twenty-five years before. Dr. Lightfoot, one of its most prominent members, presided at one of my meetings, and he said, "I want Mr. Gough, when he goes back to America, to tell the American people that the Bishop of Durham goes up and down his diocese preaching total abstinence." I had four bishops at different times presiding over my meetings. When I was there twenty years before, if we got the rector to preside people were amazed, but now the bishops are with us; and as for the canons on our side—if they all went off together they would make a tremendous report. Canon Farrar, so well known as a writer and a preacher, is a total abstainer, and nine of the Queen's chaplains are total abstainers.

THE BISHOP OF DURHAM,

All the Church dignitaries who belong to the Church of England Temperance Society are not total abstainers, and at first I was inclined to contest this half measure. But I soon changed my mind. I have got rid of that rabid sort of feeling that if men do not go altogether my way I will have nothing to do with them. After all, they are going in my direction, and most of them, after a time, get dissatisfied with the semi-reform and come into our ranks. So the end is the same, although it is a more gradual matter; therefore I gave a welcome to the moderate drinking pledge.

Dr. Thorold, Bishop of Rochester, spoke on this point at one of my meetings, and afterward I told a story about compromises, at which both bishop and audience laughed heartily.

A NEGRO'S COMPROMISE.

I said, I do not like compromises as a rule, but we must compromise sometimes. I remember hearing of a negro who had a great failing. He would steal anything within his reach. It was not safe to leave him alone for a minute. Well, he was in a boot store, and there he saw a beautiful pair of boots, and he said, "I want de boots, but de Lord says, 'Let 'em alone.' I put my hand on 'em, and dey are most lovely soft leather, and de debbil, he says, 'You may have 'em,' and I want de boots. De Lord says, 'No, let 'em alone.' Well, there were two of us, so I compromised with de Lord, and I took a cheap pair of shoes off another shelf." No I, do not like compromises myself, but we must take all the help we can get even if it does not go as far as we wish it.

Then ministers of the Gospel of all denominations are preaching temperance. Westminster Abbey is open twice a year for a special temperance service. We have the sympathy and the influence of all the clergy, and we hope we shall soon have their example as well. I had Lord Cairns, the Lord High Chancellor of England, to preside at one of my meetings, and you know he is next to Royalty.

I took Dr. Taylor to see another kind of work when he was in England. We went to

THE HOXTON MUSIC HALL.

That was once the worst place of amusement in London. It was so bad that at last the magistrates withdrew its license. Now my friend Mr. Noble holds his meetings there regularly. These meetings have been kept up until more than twelve thousand pledges have been signed there. Jerry MacAuley's mission here was the father of that Hoxton Hall mission. Mr. Noble saw what Jerry MacAuley was doing in this city, and he said, "I will try the same work here;" and he has had glorious success.

I remember the night Dr. Taylor and I went there. There was a large audience, principally dressed in rags, and the smell of that crowd was —well, not particularly refreshing. But I shall never forget the singing and the sight of those faces bearing the marks of the drunkard's curse. They call the place the recruiting office, and they send all their recruits on. When a drunkard has reformed, and he gets a respectable coat on his back, and a decent hat on his head, and a whole pair of boots on his feet, they say to him, "We don't want you here; you go and join some church." A gentleman went into the place not long since, and seeing the work that was going on, said, "This thing must cost money; how are your funds? how much do you want?" and he put down three thousand pounds there and then.

Then there are the

HOUSES OF REFUGE

which have been established all over the large cities. There, there are dominoes and bagatelle boards and newspapers and tea and coffee and bright fires and plenty of light. Here men can spend their evenings away from temptation. Some say, "Men ought to spend their evenings at home." Yes, when they have a home, but too often the only home a young man has in a large city is a back room in a garret, where he may sit all alone moping in the cold or with an uncongenial companion. I believe there is great good in these institutions, and that rich men might expend their money to great advantage in establishing such places as this on this side the water.

One night a man staggered into one of these places so drunk he could scarcely stand. The manager said, "Come, you must get out of this; you are drunk." "Yes, I know I am drunk," said the man. "Well, this is a temperance house." "Yes, and I am a teetotaler; here is my pledge;" and the man, fumbling in his pocket, produced the card. "Have you never seen a drunken teetotaler before?" he said. "I must turn you out," said the manager. "Oh, don't turn me out; I signed this half an hour ago, and I have not touched a drop since; why, man alive, I came in here for safety." He was not turned out, and that man is now one of the most hard-working men in the temperance cause.

THE MEDICAL SIDE

of the question is receiving great attention on the other side. All the great physicians are coming in gradually. Sir William Gull, Sir Henry Thompson, Dr. Richardson, have all given their testimony on our side. There are some, of course, who give us their sympathy but not their support. Now sympathy is a very intangible thing, and I would rather have a good honest opposition than mere lukewarm sympathy. I am not a medical man; I know nothing of the science; but I know that the rubbish I have heard some of these doctors talk has made me inclined to advise them to strike out the M.R.C.S. after their names, and write A.S.S. There was one of this kind—a Dr. Moxon—who said, "I do not believe in the possibility of a reformed drunkard." I said, "I hope you will go to heaven, and there I think you will meet with many." He told me of a fine noble patient he had, a teetotaler, who when the doctor ordered him brandy refused to take it. "That man died," said the doctor; "and I will never forgive the temperance society for the death of that noble fellow; he died a fanatic." Well, there was another fine fellow, a brewer's drayman, who was told when he was ill he must leave off stimulants, and he would not, and he died; and he was so saturated with alcohol that after he died his doctor punctured his skin, and the spirit came out, and the doctor had sixty little lights burning on his body at one time. Suppose I say I will never forgive the brewers for the loss of that noble fellow.

When I was at Kilmarnock I was suffering torture from neuralgia. A man said to me, "You should take a glass of brandy." I said, "No." He said, "You are a fanatic." I said, "No, I am not, but I can bear pain for a principle." Why, what is the pain of neuralgia compared to what a drunkard endures the next mornng after he has signed the pledge. He is weak, he has the shivers, his nerves are unstrung, his head is racked with pain, his blood is stagnant n his veins. He longs for drink as he never onged for any thing in heaven or on earth; he knows that one glass of brandy would set him up, would send the blood through his veins, teady his hand, settle his nerves; and he stands ace to face with the fiend and fights his battle. did it in 1842, and I know what it is. Would ou advise a man in that strait to drink? You ay "no." Then if not in that agony, why do you dvise it for neuralgia? Let us stand up for emperance, and laugh to scorn the doctors who all us fanatics.

I knew

AN ACROBAT AND HIS WIFE

who had both been drunkards and had signed he pledge. The man was ill, and the doctor aid, You must take stimulants." "How much?" said the acrobat. "Well," said the doctor, "you must have half a pint of stout with your dinner, nd about a pint of bitter with your supper," That?" said the man; "why doctor, I tell ou if I drink any I shall drink till I am mad." If that is the case," said the doctor, "then ou had better not take it at all."

But it is time to close, I believe, though, as my watch keeps English time, it is now only five 'clock by that. I have come home for rest, nd this time I mean it. In England I delivered ver 150 speeches, and I feel tired now. I am red when I go to bed, and I am tired when I et up. I don't like it, and I am going to rest.

I cannot express my gratitude for the generus things you have said of me to-night, and I m especially grateful that with my name you ave coupled that of my dear wife. I know she ould rather I said nothing about her; she likes me to talk to her, but not of her. But she has ad her share of the honors as she did in Engand. I had eleven splendidly illuminated adresses presented to me there, and in each of hem my wife occupied an honorable place.

I am sincerely pleased to meet you, my old riends, here. A gentleman on the other side aid to me, "Your friend Cuyler has become great gun." "Has he?" I said; "I knew im when he was only a little pistol." We rayed together in Princeton before he had finhed his theological course. Mr. Dodge, Dr. eck, Dr. Newman, Dr. Taylor, and all my old iends, I thank you very heartily and very sinerely.

There is one pleasant circumstance of my visit o England I ought not to pass over, for it gave e very great pleasure. I refer to my acquaintnce with

REV. C. H. SPURGEON.

I spoke twice at the Tabernacle before I saw him. The first time he was away at Mentone, and the second time he was unexpectedly summoned in another direction. I met his brother, and I said I wanted to see Mr. Spurgeon, and I mean to see him. Soon after, there came to me a letter from Mr. Spurgeon with the kindest invitation to his house. We went, and I fell in love with him at first sight, and my wife fell in love with his wife.

He took me with him to his Orphanages—noble buildings full of happy children. He had a crowd round him directly, and he chatted pleasantly to them, and we had a most delightful day.

And I wish to say just here that Mr. Spurgeon is a total abstainer, and so is his dear wife. She is a great invalid, suffering from some severe internal complaint which keeps her in her bed one day in three; and the doctors ordered her stimulants, which she took for a time, but she gave them up on principle. "Is she not a brave little woman?" said Mr. Spurgeon, admiringly; "and do you know she is getting a little better, I think, notwithstanding."

Now I conclude by saying, "Thank you all very much for this kind reception." I shall never forget it to my dying day.

AT WEYMOUTH BARRACKS, ENGLAND.

A Recollection by Major Malan.

Spiritual Struggles Following Conversion—Providentially Stationed at Weymouth—A Sunday Afternoon Hospital Visitation Opposed by Satan—A Color Sergeant Saved.

CONVERSION to God—that is, giving Him the heart because forgiveness of sins is received and His love in Christ believed—is that blessed change by which the soul passes from death to life and from darkness to light. But it is not all. Hard were the struggles, painful was the discipline, and lengthened the teaching, before I learned the fulness of these privileges. Gladly would I, by God's grace, help to save you, dear reader, from such an ordeal.

For nine years after my conversion I went on fighting and struggling, desiring to live for Christ, but more or less tied to the world, its vanities, amusements, and pleasures, because I did not understand, what God's Word so plainly sets forth, the death of my fallen nature, my body of sin (called in Scripture "the old man"), in Christ's death on the cross, and the present, real, living union of the believer with the living Christ in glory. This fact, when realized, frees the Christian, by the power of the Holy Spirit, from the bondage of his wretched self, and from the chains of this world's pleasures.

Never until I saw this was I free. But the day this glorious truth flashed from the light of God's Word into my soul I was delivered from the bondage of my sinful self and of the world. Oh, blessed, happy liberty!

Countless are the mercies which rise up before me, echoes on echoes of the love of God! How delightful when memory revels in the mercies and faithfulness of the ever-loving and long-suffering Creator! I will choose one out of many as an instance for the encouragement of others who may be similarly tried.

Some years ago I was obliged to go to the south of France for the health of one dearer to me than myself. From her I was determined I would not part. She was sick, and no one could nurse her better than I could. It was a question where my regiment would be sent on leaving Aldershot, and on this depended my remaining in the army. If sent to any station in Ireland or in the north of England, away from her friends, I should leave the service.

At that time there was one company of infantry quartered in the Weymouth Barracks. My regiment was moved from Aldershot, and when I returned from France my company was the one in those barracks. Thus, day by day, I was able to do my duty and cheer my sick wife. Our God chose the best place for her, and the only quarter where I could have continued to serve in the army. Am I wrong in thus praising His faithfulness?

Some months after our arrival I had a time of great trial. It was too evident that we should have to part; and, of course, when the Christian's heart is sorest Satan delights to try him most. We are not ignorant of his devices.

A SUNDAY AFTERNOON STRUGGLE.

One Sunday afternoon I went up to barracks to pay my men a visit, as usual. I had gone through the barrack-rooms, and was waiting at the door for the orderly-room clerk, who had some returns ready for me, as the invalids were to go to headquarters early next day.

The clerk was a careless man, which is why I felt obliged to look through the returns on Sunday. The returns were wrong. They had to be made out again, and it was more than an hour after the time I had promised to return to my home before they were finished.

In consequence of this vexatious delay I had not visited the hospital, where it was my practice to read the Gospel on Sunday afternoons. I looked up at the hospital windows, and then thought of my home, and my promise to return. Now ensued a struggle of conscience such as I had never before experienced. The invalid had put unusual emphasis on her request that I would return and sit with her by a certain hour. It was long past that time.

But there were those sick men, concerning whose souls I had such deep interest. "She is on the rock, thank God!" I said to myself; "but these poor fellows who are going away to-morrow may never again meet one who cares for them as I do, and may never hear the Gospel again." I went toward the hospital. If ever the tempter met a man he met me then. He fought me every inch of the way to the house, and defended every step of the stairs. I could almost hear a voice saying, "Remember your promise!" "Go home!" "What's the use? you know you've been working so many years in the regiment, and what good have you done?"

These suggestions Satan urged again and again with increasing vehemence. I halted at the ward door, and before entering said, "Master, I have toiled all night, and taken nothing; nevertheless, at Thy word I will let down the net." I entered. The men were glad to see me. I told them why I was late, and that I could only stay a few minutes, as I had promised to return to my sick wife, but that I wished once more to read the Gospel to them. I read the first parable in Luke 15, pointing out the love of God and Christ to sinners in that beautiful parable, the helplessness of the sinner, and the love and power of the Saviour.

I spoke very earnestly to the men who were going to leave the regiment next day, urging them to believe in the Lord Jesus, and to accept His salvation, that He might bear them on His shoulder to His home in heaven. Having prayed, I left the hospital, hoping for a blessing, and thanking God that He had given me grace not to miss this opportunity. But when I had got well away from the barracks, and my thoughts turned from my sick comrades to my invalid wife, who had been expecting my return all this time, the tempter again met me.

This time he fairly beat me. I leaned against a wall, dispirited, until as a message from heaven, there rang in my heart these words: "He that now goeth forth weeping and bearing precious seed shall doubtless come again with joy, and bring his sheaves with him." The trial was over. I ran home. A sweet smile rewarded me when I told the cause of my absence.

Next morning the invalid soldiers left for headquarters. Three days afterward I received a letter from one of them, a color-sergeant, which filled my heart with inexpressible joy. That last visit had been blessed to his soul; he believed in Christ, and rejoiced in hope of glory. This at once explained the fierce temptations which had assailed me before going to the hospital that night. How I thanked God that I had made a last attempt! Fellow-Christian, you may have toiled long, and apparently without success; but go on, faint not: in due season—at the right time—you shall reap. We corresponded until he was called to glory.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

(Continued from page 863.)

EDITH NEEDED

"ELIZA has stepped out to see a friend; I boiled that egg myself," said old Alec in reply to the philosopher's complaint about the bad cooking.

"Stepped out to see a friend, and at breakfast-time, without asking my leave!" cried the angry master. "And this tea—it is cold as ditch-water, and bitter as gall; a pauper would not drink such trash!" Vernon pushed the cup aside so angrily that he almost upset it.

"Certainly Edith knew how to keep things right," muttered Vernon, but not loud enough for his servant to hear what he said; "these women have a knack of putting oil on the wheels of life to make them run smoothly. This is one of the chief uses, I suppose, for which women were put in this planet of ours."

After finishing an uncomfortable breakfast in an uncomfortable mood (for Vernon's philosophy was not brought to bear on such matters as overboiled eggs or bitter tea), the sage stretched out his hand and took up the letter which had come hours before by the morning post.

To judge by the outside, it looked a most uninteresting epistle, one scarcely worth the trouble of opening. Mr. Vernon did open it, however, and read it likewise. The letter was written in characters so large and so black, that it might have been perused by one standing at the other side of the room.

Alec was clearing away the breakfast, but paused in his occupation, with the tray in his hands, being struck by the perplexed, annoyed, almost alarmed expression on the face of his master. Mr. Vernon turned sharply round in his chair and looked at the clock.

"Put down that tray, never mind clearing away the breakfast," said Mr. Vernon, rising from his seat: "saddle Fleetfoot for me directly."

It was unusual for the philosopher to go out riding in summer before the cool of the day.

Alec, who, like many old servants, disliked being put out of his accustomed routine of work, ventured a word of remonstrance.

"Fleetfoot has not had his dinner, sir, nor the adders their food, and—"

"The adders may wait, and as for Fleetfoot, he's just eating his head off," said the master peevishly. "I must go out riding directly. And mind you, Alec, if any one calls to see me, say that I'm out, that you don't know whither I have gone, and have no notion when I'll come back. You understand me?"

"Yes, sir," replied the old butler.

"Go and get Fleetfoot ready at once," repeated Oswald Vernon, and again he glanced at the clock as Alec quitted the room.

"Not half-past eleven, and Holland writes he'll be here before noon. I've time to ride off," said the philosopher to himself. "Does this bullying fellow think to get any thing out of a gentleman like me by threats or abuse?

"But it's an awkward affair, a very awkward affair!" thus Vernon pursued his reflections. "I do not want the whole country to be talking about my unlucky prosecution of Ellen. I must hush the matter up; I must find means of softening the rage of this furious Holland, who seems to be ready like a bull-dog to spring at my throat. 'Justice to my sister;' yes, of course I'll do justice to Ellen.'

Vernon was talking to himself as he passed from his dining-room to his Museum. He always felt more calm and serene when amongst his stuffed lizards and curious things, his glass-stoppered bottles and jars. The scent of his gases and drugs, the sight of his shelf full of skulls, had usually a soothing effect upon the philosopher's mind.

"I must get Edith back to Eureka House, that is clear," said Mr. Vernon, still speaking half aloud, as was his habit when alone. "I cannot get a clerk at a day's notice; besides, a clerk requires a salary, which Edith does not, and she makes the best tea that ever I tasted, and looks to the buttons on my shirts.

"True, I cannot go on with my great work while I have only a woman full of nonsensical scruples to act as my scribe; but the great work need not come out for awhile; perhaps that fruit is not yet quite ripe. The grand ideas in my mind may develop themselves into yet greater perfection. I shall have time now for devoting more attention to my Antidote; that balsam will make my name famous in the remotest corners of the habitable globe, and so prepare the world to listen with deference to my opinions on metaphysical subjects.

"Yes, yes, I must get Edith back to-morrow. She will put matters right between me and this furious Holland, to whose farm, it appears, she has gone. Cunning minx, to keep so near to the Lodge! There was worldly wisdom in that. These meek saints are no more lacking in shrewd regard for their own interests than they are in dogged firmness when their pet notions are attacked.

"Edith shall be installed in her old post to-morrow. But what if the girl refuse to come back? what if she choose to show me that she is not at my beck and call? Tush, resentment can no more burn on a spirit like hers, than live coals in a limpid stream!

"It will be quite enough to tell Edith that I am going at once to take out a patent for my cure for serpent bites, to make her walk here, barefoot if needful, to write out to my dictation the paper of application. Was she not worrying me to lose no time in saving lives ever since I had the power to save?

"Yes, yes, all that is wrong will be easily set right to-morrow. Edith shall take her place at the tea-table and the desk just as if she had never left my dwelling; Ellen Morris shall be satisfied, and her brother pacified, if money and soft words have any effect. My paper shall be drawn out on its way to the Patent Office to-morrow."

And so saying, with a more complacent spirit and cheerful manner than had been his since Edith's departure, Vernon sauntered up to the wire-covered case in which the philosopher kept his special pets, the adders.

It is a trite saying that "familiarity breeds contempt." In no case, perhaps, is the truth of the proverb more apparent than in what regards danger. The recruit who, in his first battle field, started and shrank aside as the bullets whistled past his ear, learns, as a veteran, to stand unmoved in the midst of the roar of cannon. The boy who, on his first voyage, was dizzy when sent up the rigging, when he becomes a weather-beaten tar boldly furls the sail in a gale.

And so the sad experience of thousands have proved it to be with sin. The first contact has repelled and disgusted young men, who, after a time, have fallen under its power. The first time the boy fresh from a Christian home hears an oath he shudders with horror; but after he has lived for weeks within hearing of profane language, his repugnance abates, and he is in danger of falling into the habit himself. So contact with vice in any shape is dangerous, and, as we are taught by the inspired writer, "Evil communications corrupt good manners." (1 Cor. 15 : 33.)

And thus was it with Oswald Vernon. The sight of venomous snakes had become so familiar to him that he hardly associated with them any idea of personal danger. The adders had cost their owner much trouble and much money; this naturally increased in his eyes their value; they were helping him, as he believed, to win high honor and fame; they were to the philosopher objects of interest and pride, it might also be said of affection.

Mr. Vernon would speak coolly of thousands of Indians being killed by snake-bites, but he hardly realized the possibility of ever himself being bitten. Even so serenely would the philosopher discourse about national sins as bringing evil on multitudes of his fellow-creatures; he saw no peril to himself in the bosom-sins which he cherished within.

There was another reason besides familiarity with danger to account for Mr. Vernon's feeling of careless security as regarded his snakes. Even were he to feel the serpent's fang, the discoverer of the Antidote would have nothing to fear. Had he not enough of his balsam in the bottle on yonder high shelf to render the bites of twenty adders as harmless as the pressure of the lips of an infant?

"One of my pets looks more sluggish than usual to-day," observed Mr. Vernon, as he peered through the wire work which covered the case. "I have feared for some time that the creature was sickening in spite of our care. It is difficult to keep these delicate strangers alive in a climate like that of England."

The philosopher's sight was not good, and, what between blue spectacles and close wire work, he gained but an imperfect view of the reptile for whose health he felt far more concern than he would have done for that of his servants.

To see the adder more clearly, Mr. Vernon lifted the cover of the case a few inches, and stooped down to peer through the opening thus made. As he did so the second adder made a dart at his face, rapid as a flash of lightning, and seemed just to touch his cheek with its sharp little fangs, inflicting so small a puncture that not a single drop of blood could ooze from the wound.

"Bitten at last!" exclaimed Mr. Vernon, shutting down the cover, and so securing the snake. His exclamation was something like that of Wellington—"Hit at last!"—when he had received his first and only wound.

There was probably as little fear felt in the one case as in the other, possibly something of pleasure in both. A wound that neither disfigures, nor disables, nor causes much pain, is scarcely thought an evil by a hero; and Mr. Vernon felt pride in running some risk—he thought it small risk—in the cause of his much-loved science.

It was satisfactory to the discoverer of the Antidote to have the effects of his balsam tried on a human subject at last, and shown to be a perfect cure by such an infallible test. Such a proof of its power should have a foremost place in advertisements of the balsam.

Mr. Vernon was by far too sensible a man to lose a quarter of a minute in applying his cure. The preceding reflections flashed through his mind while he was rapidly mounting the steps needed to raise him high enough to reach his large bottle.

He put out his hand to take down the Antidote; but at that instant it seemed to the snake-bitten man as if some one from behind gave him a violent blow on the head and neck, and at the same time a sharp, intense pang was felt in his chest. He gave a start as he laid his hand on the bottle, and that start overthrew it; with a crash it fell to the ground, and all its precious contents were scattered over the carpet.

Mr. Vernon was scarcely able to scramble down the steps, but he did so; the energy of the man's mind was never more clearly shown than in that moment of peril. He knew, he felt, that poison was in his blood; his foot was on the carpet, strewn with fragments of glass, and moist with drops of priceless value; but the philosopher's presence of mind did not fail.

Mr. Vernon rushed to the window and flung i open. Looking out on the drive, he saw Alec Stewart leading Fleetfoot, ready saddled and bridled.

"Alec, I'm bitten!" shouted Mr. Vernon. "Ride at speed to my niece; get from her the phial of Antidote. If you're back in half an hour I am safe!"

Alec did not hear the latter part of the sentence; the first was enough. The old man bareheaded as he was, had flung himself on the horse, and was plying the whip which he held in his hand with a vigor which made Fleetfoo bound forward at speed like a terrified deer.

"He'll be in time," said Mr. Vernon as he saw the pace at which the horse galloped, and heard the rapid rattle of his hoofs as he spurned the ground.

'He'll be in time,'' the philosopher repeated a he walked with staggering gait to the table, a d opening a glass-stoppered bottle, poured out f m it such a dose of ammonia as, under other c cumstances, he would not have dreamed of p ting to his mouth.

The fiery fluid blistered his lips, burnt his t gue and throat, and almost choked him; yet h resolutely swallowed it down. The ammonia w , as the philosopher knew, the best medicine w ich he could take in the absence of that inf ible remedy which could not be prepared on t spur of the moment.

Had Mr. Vernon been bitten on the finger in-s ad of the cheek, he would with the same reso-l e firmness have cut off the injured mem-b ; for the man was not lacking in courage, a d he knew that under the circumstances p mpt and stern measures were needed.

The ammonia revived the wounded man; it g e new energy to the blood which was ready t stagnate and coagulate under the influence of t adder's venom.

Mr. Vernon had led a sober, temperate life; h blood was healthy, his constitution was g od. He was as one entering on a conflict w h a consciousness of strength which gave c rage and hope. He would not give way to f r, far less to despair. It seemed impossible t t death could enter in by so small an opening a that made by the serpent's tooth.

'I must keep in motion; I must not stand s l for an instant,'' said Mr. Vernon, pressing h hand on his chest, which felt pain as if from t branding of red-hot iron, and oppression a if a heavy weight of lead were crushing it d wn. "I will summon the servants; they must h p me to walk till the balsam arrives.

Mr. Vernon rang the bell loudly, and before a m ute elapsed rang again, and more loudly still. H might have rung till he broke the bell-wire, f no one was within reach of the sound. Eliza w s out with her friend Sarah, hanging out linen i the back yard.

'No one at hand—no one to help when help i wanted,'' muttered Mr. Vernon, after ringing f a third time. "But no matter, Alec will s n reach the farm; I've no doubt that he will b back in time.'' The very words "no doubt'' s wed that a cloud of fear was rising on the s ferer's mind.

Up and down the study resolutely strode the p losopher; his life depended on his keeping up t flow of blood through his veins.

(To be continued.)

THE LOVE OF THE FATHER.

S. Lesson for Nov. 16. 1 John 4 : 7-21. Golden Text, ver. 19. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

G d is Love—Man Misunderstands God—God re-ains Love—He Manifests His Love, which pre-xisted—Dwelling in God—Loving as He Loves -Confessing Christ—Love made Perfect—Cast-g out Fear.

FROM eternity to eternity God is love. It was G d the Father who went out first in the garden o Eden to seek after His lost child; it was His v ce which sounded among the trees of the g den with the words, "Where art thou?'' (G n. 3 : 9). Why art thou not with Me? what h e I done to thee? It was God the Father w o "so loved the world, that He gave His only b gotten Son, that whosoever believeth in Him s ould not perish, but have everlasting life'' (J hn 3 : 16). It was God the Father who was in Chr t, reconciling the world unto Himself, n imputing their trespasses unto them'' (2 C r. 5 : 19). It is the very instinct of a father t make provision for his child, not only when e l comes, but as soon as he foresees it coming; a d this instinct took its origin in the heart of t great Father.

The grief of God is that His creatures, for w om He has done so much, yet understand H m so little; He says (Hos. 13 : 5), "I did k ow thee in the wilderness, in the land of great d ought.'' But "I taught Ephraim to go, taking t m by their arms; but they knew not that I healed them'' (Hos. 11 : 3). Oh what depth of sadness is there in the words, "They return, but not to the Most High''! And then, as though one look into the far future was a relief to the very heart of God, He says, "Israel shall cry unto me, My God, we know Thee'' (Hos. 7 : 16; 8 : 2).

The apostle whom Jesus loved exhorts us, "Beloved, let us love one another; for love is of God; and every one that loveth is born of God, and knoweth God. He that loveth not, knoweth not God, for God is love.'' Wherever love is, there God is; and wherever God is, there love is. And God remains ever love, whether He is understood or misunderstood. The servant who said, "Lord, I knew Thee that Thou art an hard man, reaping where Thou hast not sown, and gathering where Thou hast not strawed,'' knew little of the Master of whom he thus spoke; but his ignorance did not make his Master to be other than He was. And thus our God is unchangeable, unutterable, illimitable love to endless ages.

But "in this was manifested the love of God to us''—a love which pre-existed—because that God sent His only begotten Son into the world that we might live through Him. Man had lost life through sin; death had entered into all his being; that which was made in God's image, after his likeness, and destined to partakership of His own eternal life, became subject to a foreign power, "the bondage of corruption'' (Rom. 8 : 21); and spirit, soul, and body lost the eternal life which was man's native element. Once thus lost, there was no power and there was no right in man to regain it; must, then, the purposes of God be frustrated?

The love which from all eternity sought not its own began to manifest itself. Mighty questions must be solved. How could God remain God, and pass over the sin of the fall? How could a fallen creature who had forfeited the life and immortality of God be restored to his first estate? If sin were not judged, God must become a party to it; if sin were judged, then man must die, and all is lost. God must make a new man, a new Adam, a new creation, through whom fallen man could return to Him. He must come in the very flesh and nature of the fallen, and God must deal with them in Him. But at what a cost! A mighty sacrifice lay before the infinite love of God; He must bruise and put to grief Him who was His dearest, His only begotten Son, for the very creatures who had done Him wrong.

And God's love was equal to it; at such a cost has He procured for us life through and life in Jesus Christ. Oh let us lay this to heart: we have no life but in Jesus Christ, in the power of His blood, which is the life current for us, under the authority of His Name, which is above every name, in his Person, in whom the Father is well pleased; have we life power in all our being. And just in measure that we live for self, seek our own, love our own life, etc., the life power waxes faint, and the bondage of corruption reasserts its authority.

"Herein is love, not that we loved God, but that He loved us.'' "We love Him because He loved us'' (ver. 19). He loved us because?—He is love. Love which needs something to call it into being is not self-existent, but is only reflective; God's love is its own source. His proof of love was the gift of His Son; and what a proof! Now, "beloved, if God so loved us, we ought also to love one another;'' i.e., this ought to be our type of love. Let us begin with ourselves. Have we the love of God, so that to see need is to supply that need? Is it enough for us that a soul should be unsaved, to awaken us at once to seek his salvation? Is the sight of a poor drunkard an instinctive call of God to seek in His name to raise him up? Love is of God. Oh how little we have of it!

"No man hath seen God at any time,'' but we can see what is of God in one another, and "If we love one another, God dwelleth in us, and His love is perfected in us.'' But let us be far from thinking that the selfish pleasure in the society of a congenial spirit which we all have experienced, partakes of the nature of love. Love "seeketh not her own,'' and lives in the life of another. "Beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things, etc., but it is never said enjoyeth all things.'' Only an experienced Christian knows how to love, how to endure, and bear with all which is un-Christlike in others, passing over all that which might wound him, looking at every question relatively to God, because he is not living his own life.

How can we be sure that we dwell in Him and He in us? "Because He hath given us of His Spirit.'' The Spirit by which Christ was actuated brought Him intensely near to all the fallen, while yet remaining pure from contact with their sin. We need never fear contamination from the sin of those whom we go to raise in Jesus' name, so long as we go in Him and not in ourselves. The aged apostle says, "He hath given us of His Spirit, and we have seen and do testify that the Father sent the Son to be the Saviour of the world.'' To receive His Spirit was to see and to testify in apostolic times. And if the Father says, "I change not'' (Mal. 3 : 6); if Jesus Christ is "the same yesterday, and to-day, and for-ever'' (Heb. 13 : 8), surely also the blessed Spirit cannot be other in our days than in those; and as surely as God gives us of His Spirit, and in the measure in which we receive the Spirit, shall we understand our Father, and bear our personal testimony to God's love in sending His Son to be the Saviour of the world.

Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God dwelleth in him and he in God. So he that loveth others, he that shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, and he that dwelleth in love, he "dwelleth in God,'' goeth no more out, but is at home, and only at home in God. The principles which actuate men in general are strange to him; his life confesses more than his words, that Jesus is the Son of God. A man confesses his king when he bows to his authority, his name, and his commandments; and to confess Jesus to be the Son of God is surely to cling to the principles of His kingdom, however unlike other people it may make us, and whatever it may cost us. But what is it, then, to dwell in love, for that is to dwell in God, and God in us? Is it not to remain warm when all around is cold, to love the unloving and the unlovely, because the fuel which keeps our love burning is God's very life? Oh! it seems easy sometimes to love, but to dwell in love—this is rare.

But herein and herein only 'is our love made perfect,'' or love with us made perfect, i.e., by dwelling in God, by refusing life or action in any form to that which is of self. And "love with us is made perfect that we may have boldness in the day of judgment, because as He is so are we in this world.'' In really confessing Christ, in the being found ever in our divine dwelling-place, a mutual understanding is maintained between heaven and earth. As He is there, so are we here; love there and love here—all, all, love. And in love fear has no standing ground; perfect love, i.e., God's indwelling, "casteth out fear, because fear hath torment. He that feareth is not made perfect in love.'' In love there is honor and consideration for others, but no constraint, for love which is of God cannot tolerate a shadow.

Fear of being separated, fear of love growing cold, fear of being misunderstood, etc., cannot exist where God's love comes in; all these roots flourish where self-life reigns, but have no root in the garden of our God. And thus God's test of our love is very practical. If a man say, "I love God, and hateth his brother, he is a liar: for he that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen? And this commandment have we from Him, that he who loveth God love his brother also.'' Nothing in God can hinder us from loving every man; thus every hindrance to love belongs to the life of self. "Brethren, let us love one another.''

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The British in Afghanistan.—Telegrams from India state that by order of the Viceroy of India, Sir Frederick Roberts has issued a proclamation that in consequence of the abdication of the Ameer, and the outrage at the British Residency, the British Government has been compelled to occupy Cabul and other parts of Afghanistan. The Afghan authorities and the chiefs and sirdars are instructed by the proclamation to continue to maintain order in the districts under their control, and are invited to hold a joint consultation with General Roberts. The proclamation promises that the people of the occupied districts will be treated with justice and benevolence, and their religion and customs respected. Loyalty and good service to the British crown will be suitably rewarded, but all offenders against English administration will be punished. Further accounts say, the population of Cabul is quiet, but it is a sullen calm. There can be no doubt that beneath it is hid a deep hatred of the British domination. The Cabulese are kept down by fear, and would rise if they saw a chance of success.

Five men were hanged for complicity in the massacre of the British Embassy, including the Kotwal of Cabul and two generals, one of royal blood. One of the generals, it is charged, dragged the head of Major Cavagnari from the British Residency to Bala-Hissar. The inquiry into the massacre is proceeding. The Ameer's father-in-law, the ex-Governor of Cabul, and the Minister of Finance are under close arrest.

The correspondent of the London Times considers that the tendency of opinions at Simla strongly favors a policy of disintegration rather than an attempt to set up a strong central government at Cabul. He points to the fact that Herat, Candahar, and Afghan Turkestan remained tranquil under their petty chiefs months after all control from Cabul had been withdrawn.

Despatches from Cabul say that Yakoob Khan is voluntarily in General Roberts's camp, and that he is in a pitiable state of apathy and depression.

"Vanity of Vanities" seems to be the Echo of modern palaces as it was of that one in Jerusalem. Dr. Busch thus writes of Prince Bismarck: He is not happy; he laments his lot, and is discontented with his work. "What good have I," he asks, "accomplished under the sun? And what widespread misery have I not caused?" "In satisfying my ambition," he said, one evening at Varzin, "I have made nobody happy. And what a number of people I have cast into misery! Without me three great wars would have been avoided; 80,000 men—nay, many more—would not have been killed, and such numbers of families, of fathers, mothers, brothers, sisters, and wives, would not have been plunged into mourning. What happiness have I derived from all my success? Little or none; and I have reaped endless worry, vexation, hatred, pain, grief, overwork, and care."

The English Princes.—Great Interest has been evinced by the English people in the embarkation of the Prince of Wales's two sons on H.M.S. Bacchante for a long cruise at sea. It is felt that the Prince and Princess of Wales, as well as the Queen, have shown a wise discretion in sending the heir to the throne, as well as his brother, who is destined to make the navy a profession, to be knocked about in a midshipman's berth. Visitors have been admitted to see the arrangements which have been made, and no one can fail to be struck with the simplicity and plainness of the accommodation which is thought good enough for the future King of England. He and his brother have no other place for their goods than a common midshipman's chest, and they live with their sixteen messmates on terms of equality. The messplace is very small, and they will have to be pushed and squeezed about in a fashion far from royal. The only luxury they have is a cot instead of a hammock, and a separate cabin for these cots and for their chests, opening into the cabin allotted to their tutor. Great pains have been taken to select their associates, who are the pick of the navy—youths from twenty-two down to fourteen. Many of them are known as religious lads, and all come from excellent homes. The captain and first lieutenant are also excellent men for this work.

The Earl of Derby, who formerly held the post of Minister of Foreign Affairs in the English Government, but who resigned in consequence of a difference of opinion with his colleagues on the question of national policy in the Russo-Turkish question, appears to have severed his connection with the Conservative party. He was always regarded as the most liberal member of the Cabinet, and, it was thought, was bound to the Tory party by hereditary ties rather than by principle.

Extreme importance is attached in English political circles to the invitation reported to have been sent by him to the Marquis of Hartington, the leader of the Liberals, to his abode during his stay in Lancashire. Lord Salisbury, who recently spoke in Manchester, and who was a colleague of Lord Derby's, and is a relative of his, was not invited to Knowsley. The Liberal clubs draw only one deduction from this preference for one noble lord over the other. It is that Lord Derby wishes it to be understood that he altogether separates himself from the Conservative Government. The Liberals regard him as an important acquisition to their ranks.

A French Writer of Eminence Asserts that Jerome Napoleon is more to be feared as a pretender than his late cousin. "This," says an English journalist, "tallies with the language of one of the principal Bonapartist Generals to a friend of mine. 'The Prince Imperial,' he said, 'was an untried youth, and the supposed Ultramontanism of his mother alienated the masses from him. Jerome is a shrewd, able man, whose ideas are much more in unison with those of the majority of Frenchmen. He will play a waiting game, and if the Republic makes mistakes he will know how to profit by them.'"

The Rumseller's Carnival of Crime.—Sir Wilfrid Lawson, speaking lately at a large prohibition meeting, presided over by the Lord Provost, in the City Hall, Glasgow, Scotland, said that the London papers had been announcing a grand show of publicans' utensils at the Agricultural Hall. That show, which was exciting immense interest in the South of England, was to consist of barrels, bottles, bungs, spigots, glasses, down even to church-wardens' pipes. Now, what he wanted to suggest was that the publicans should, when they exhibited the articles of their trade, exhibit at the same time the results of their trade. Alongside of these barrels, bottles, and spigots let them have the finished article. Let them have a row of paupers, lunatics, prisoners, malefactors condemned to death, broken-hearted widows and starving children; and alongside that let there be set a row of the big brewers, with their pockets full of the money which they were going to spend in building churches and chapels, and at the end of the row let the Chancellor of the Exchequer be set, with his pockets full of the thirty millions of money which he had extracted from the miserable victims of strong drink. Would not that be an instructive spectacle, and would it not teach a good deal to the people of England?

The Porter and Messenger of the Great Seal of England, Mr. Stockdale, who for more than twelve years has held that office, has just died. This official has the charge of the Great Seal during the day, and upon him rests the responsibility of guarding against the recurrence of the calamity which occurred in 1784, when this important legal emblem was stolen. He has also charge of the wax required for the seal, which Mr. Stockdale, in his evidence before a recent commission, estimated to amount at that time to "about 4 cwt. a month." The Porter to the Great Seal is in attendance upon the Lord Chancellor whenever he is in London, transmits to him, wherever he may be, the whole of his official correspondence, and receives from him his r plies, to be delivered or posted.

This messenger of earth's Great Seal is dea but the messenger of Heaven's Great Seal—tl angel that has the Seal of the Living God (Re 7 : 2)—still lives, and is now engaged in seali the servants of God on their foreheads, tho who sigh and cry over the wickedness arou them, to mark them for preservation in the a proaching judgment, when the four angels the four corners of the earth shall let loose tl winds of havoc and retribution, and when tl six angels with slaughter weapons shall be se forth to destroy (Ezek. 9).

A Scientists Testimony.—The Eminent D Ackland, Regius Professor of Medicine in tl University of Oxford, an authority in matters science, told the students of Union Theologic Seminary that "after thirty-five years of patie research with the scalpel, microscope, and tel scope, he was amazed that any man could do matize in the department of science as thou he had reached ultimate truth. There is no a tagonism between the Word of God and the fac of science." He said that he finds the "ul mate solution" of vexed questions in "the gre truths of Holy Scripture."

"Europe has not had a more Troubled Apect," says an eminent journalist, "since t battle of Waterloo than she presents now. G many and Austria are against Britain and Fran respecting the management of Egyptian affai Russia, and probably France and Italy, a against Britain, Germany, and Austria on Tur ish affairs. All are armed or arming to t teeth, and no one can even guess at the result the conflicting interests and bad feelings whi are becoming more and more apparent eve day." Students of prophecy will see in this scription a confirmation of the conclusions dra from Holy Writ that the close of this dispen tion is near at hand.

The Death of Bishop Russell, of North Chi on October 5th, is announced. He was a gra uate of Dublin, and was ordained by Bish Blomfield in 1847, and went to China in th year, in company with the Rev. R. H. (aft wards Archdeacon) Cobbold. They were t first English missionaries at Ningpo, and at th city Mr. Russell labored, including the interv of his visits to England, for thirty-one years, d ing which time, by the labors of himself and h brother missionaries, several hundreds of C nese were brought to a knowledge of Chri He translated into the colloquial dialect of Nin po the greater part of the New Testament a portions of the Old, and the Book of Comm Prayer, besides tracts, etc. He was appoint the first Missionary Bishop of North China, 1872.

Spurgeon's Autograph Album; containing t through any bookseller. Price 75 cents. The Sw and Trowel says: "Our young friends delight possessing birthday albums, and here is one whic fit for a queen. We will say nothing of the conten but the binding is simply gorgeous. . . . Thi a dainty birthday present, and is equal to any t have gone before it; we think we might venture say that it is second to none. Facsimiles of the tographs of the pastor and his wife are given in th proper places."

The following works by the same eminent preac may also be obtained at the CHRISTIAN HERA Office, 63 Bible House:

"The Treasury of David." Containing an Ori nal Exposition of the Book of Psalms; a Collect of Illustrative Extracts from the whole range of Lit ature; a series of Homiletical Hints upon alm every verse; and list of writers upon each Psal Five volumes. Price, per vol., $3.

"John Ploughman's Talk; or, Plain Advice Plain People." Price, cloth, 60 cents; paper c ers, 40 cents.

"The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit." F Sermons. Preached and revised during the y 1878. Price $2.50.

"Twelve Sermons on Various Subjects." Wit Portrait. Price 35 cents. A remittance must acc pany every order.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

blished at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. LMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, or some other nent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc. The Circulation is 165,000 Copies.

ingle Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 13, 1879. 13th Year. No. 56—New Series.

NTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

TRAIT AND LIFE OF MAJOR-EN. ROBERTS, C.B., V.C., and Picre of Cabul.

T EAST WIND. A New Sermon Dr. Talmage.

A OLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE. Thrilling Serial Story by the Author "Felicia Cuffe."

ACHING THE LORD JESUS. A rmon by Dr. W. Morley Punshon.

RENT EVENTS: The State Elecns—The New York Contest—A ayer-Meeting at an Election—A eamboat Disaster—A Soul Conscious its Need—Messrs. Moody and Sany at Cleveland—A Clergyman's an Repaid—A Wife's Twentyars' Prayer Answered, etc.

NUMBER 1500; or, LIFTING UP THE BRAZEN SERPENT. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

MODERN REJECTION OF SOUND DOCTRINE, by Dr. Mackay, of Hull.

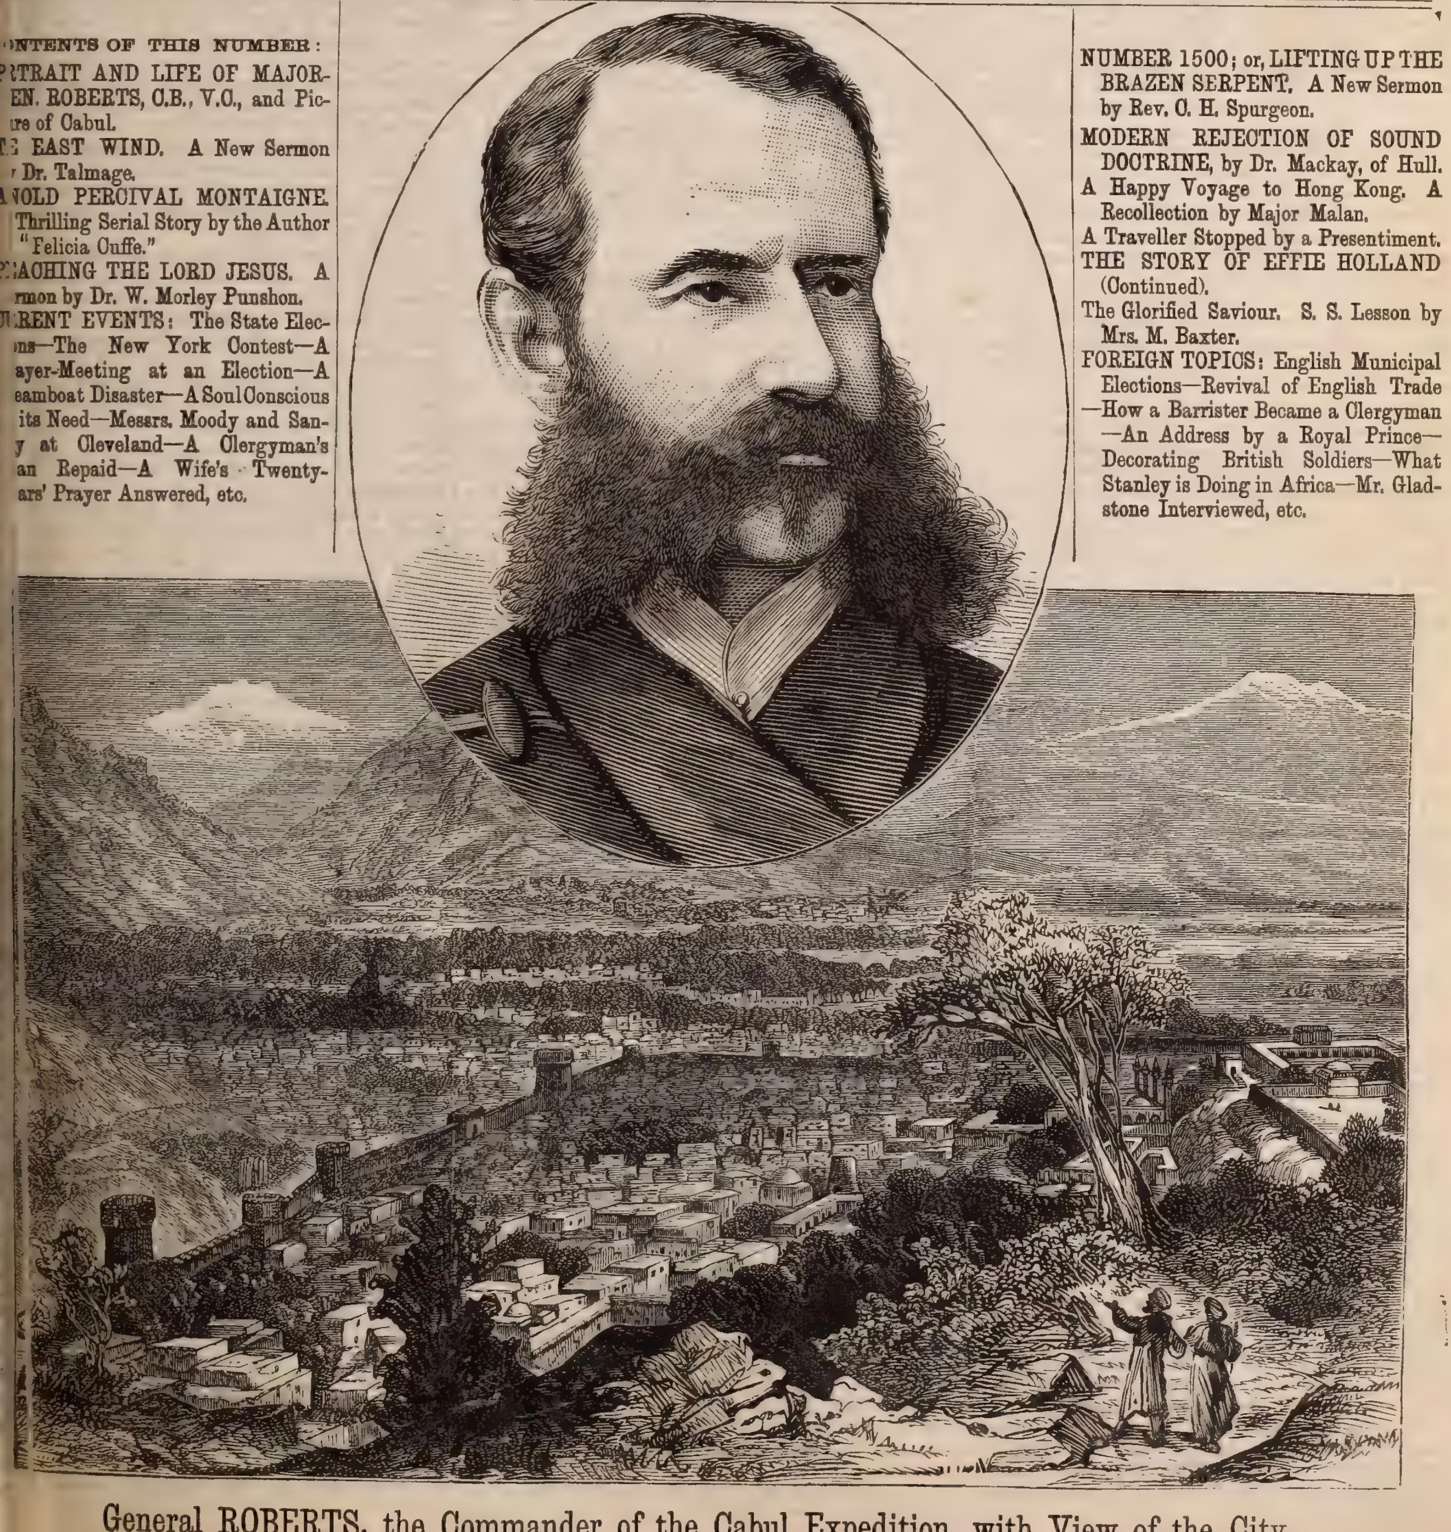
A Happy Voyage to Hong Kong. A Recollection by Major Malan.

A Traveller Stopped by a Presentiment.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND (Continued).

The Glorified Saviour. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

FOREIGN TOPICS: English Municipal Elections—Revival of English Trade—How a Barrister Became a Clergyman—An Address by a Royal Prince—Decorating British Soldiers—What Stanley is Doing in Africa—Mr. Gladstone Interviewed, etc.



General ROBERTS, the Commander of the Cabul Expedition, with View of the City.

MAJOR-GEN. ROBERTS, C.B., V.C.

MAJOR-GENERAL FREDERICK SLEIGH ROBERTS, whose portrait we present in this issue, is the commander of the Koorum Valley column of the British army which has just entered the city of Cabul.

He has seen twenty-eight years of arduous service, having entered the army as Second Lieutenant on December 12th, 1851, and was attached to the Bengal Artillery (now Royal Artillery). Six years later, when the Indian mutiny broke out, he was promoted to the rank of First Lieutenant. In the capacity of Deputy-assistant Quartermaster-General of Artillery he greatly distinguished himself.

He was present at the siege and capture of Delhi. At the commencement of the siege, which lasted three months, he was wounded, and at the capture of the city had a horse shot under him. He also lost his horse in the engagement at Bolundshur and Kunoj, which quickly followed the fall of Delhi. At Bundhera he narrowly escaped capture by the mutineers while reconnoitering. He was present and took part in the storming of Meangunge and in the series of engagements which ended with the capture of Lucknow, for which he was thanked by the Governor General of India, and received the Victoria Cross medal and three clasps, and brevet rank of Major, on November 13th, 1860, when the mutiny had been completely quelled.

He earned his Victoria Cross at the siege of Delhi. The distinction is a memento of his having at great personal danger sabred a standard-bearer, and thereby caused confusion in the ranks of the mutineers.

In 1863 he again served in the Umbeyla expedition which was sent against the troublesome tribes in the north-west provinces of India. For this service he received a medal and clasp. He also served in the Abyssinian War in 1868, and superintended the re-embarkation of the whole of the returning army, and was selected by Sir Robert Napier (now Lord Napier of Magdala) to carry his final despatches. For this service he received the brevet rank of Lieutenant-Colonel and another medal.

He held a command as senior Staff officer in the Looshai expedition against the lawless mountaineers who for a considerable time rendered the passage of some of the passes from India towards Central Asia difficult and dangerous. For this service he was created a Companion of the Order of the Bath. He has been twenty-three times mentioned in despatches.

Upon the breaking out of the war with the Ameer of Afghanistan in 1878, Colonel Roberts (as his rank was then) was selected to command one of the three columns of troops which marched from India to Afghanistan by different routes. The route his troops followed was that by the valley of the river Koorum, the same as that by which he recently returned to Cabul after the assassination of Sir Louis Cavagnari; in fact, he had not really reached Indian territory when he was ordered to return. He was raised to the rank of Major-General for the victory which he won in the Peiwar Pass against the hill tribes in December last.

He completed his return march to Cabul with about 5000 soldiers, through a hostile country and surmounting great dangers, on October 10th, only forty days after the massacre of Sir Louis Cavagnari. Upon entering the city the British standard was hoisted for the third time over the Bala Hissar, in which is the British Residency, where Sir Louis Cavagnari and some thirty others were massacred. Portions of the building are burned, but the greater part is still standing, though completely looted. The bodies of Major Cavagnari and Dr. Kelly are said to be buried beneath a pile of débris and charred logs at the northern end of the courtyard. A search for the remains was at once commenced.

General Roberts has won a reputation for personal valor as well as for skillful generalship worthy to be enrolled on the list of the famous English soldiers whose names adorn the history of British rule in India.

DESCRIPTION OF CABUL.

CABUL, or Kabool, is the chief city of Afghanistan, and the present capital and seat of government. It takes it names from a river bearing the same name. It is beautifully situated, and is about five miles in circuit, and is defended by a line of weak fortifications. These were all the resistance General Roberts met with when he approached the city. These fortifications were once very powerful.

Both in a military and commercial point of view it possesses many advantages, and it has always been considered one of the most important cities in Asia. So long ago as the sixteenth century we find the secretary to Akbar the Great writing in a native paper called the Ayeen Akbari: "Cabul is the gate of Hindostan towards Tartary as Candahar is towards Persia, and if both places be properly guarded, that extensive empire is safe from the irruption of foreigners. According to the Indians, no man can be called the ruler of Hindostan who has not taken possession of Cabul."

The eminent advantage possessed by Cabul is that of locality. It is one which cannot be impaired. It is conferred by the Creator, and so long as the present conformation and arrangement of hill and plain endure, so long will Cabul preserve this advantage.

There always has been and will be a commercial communication between India and Central Asia; Cabul, happily situated at the gorge of the nearest and most practicable passes between the two countries, will always profit by the intercourse between them. Whether the tide of commerce roll up the Ganges or up the Indus, its course must be directed upon Cabul.

The houses of the city are neither handsome nor strong, being generally built of sunburnt bricks and mud, and surrounded by a framework of wood. The windows are not of glass, but simple lattices or shutters. The European traveller is struck with the peculiar appearance which the city wears by reason of the absence of any appearance of chimneys. These luxuries of Western civilization are, in Cabul, thought unnecessary, a hole in the roof sufficing to allow the smoke to escape from the fire, which is generally in the middle of the room.

The streets of the city are in many parts so narrow that a "tug of war" is the result if two obstinate horsemen meet in those parts. They are very wretchedly paved, but are passable in summer. In winter they are often blocked for a considerable period by reason of the huge mass of snow which has been thrown from the flat roofs into them, and allowed to accumulate until it thaws; then their condition becomes piteous.

Cabul has no public buildings worth mentioning. There is a college in it, but it has no scholars, for the weighty reason that it has no endowment, and no one thinks it worth while to attend to such a matter as education. The caravansaries, or Eastern hotels, and the baths are numerous, but the first are models of discomfort, and the latter aid the accumulation of filth rather than its removal.

Of bazaars, the emporiums of trade in the East, Cabul has two which are three quarters of a mile in length. The city formerly possessed one of the finest bazaars in Asia, but it was destroyed by the British in the first Afghan war in 1842. The manufactures of the city are trifling, and the artisans unskilled; but what the goods which the vendors have to sell lack in value, they gain in praise in the cries of the itinerant sellers. So loud and long, as well as numerous, are these noisy "puffs," that the noise in the bazaar is compared by a recent traveller with that of Whitechapel or Clare Market, in London, on a Saturday night. The old clothes-man of New York and our larger towns is perfectly represented by the "moghat" of Cabul.

The city is well supplied with provisions, and its cattle, fruit, and grain markets are well stocked. It is divided into districts, and these again into sections, each inclosed by a wall and gates, so that in time of war each of these becomes a fortress. One of these is the now historic Bala Hissar, which appears in the fo ground of our picture. This locality is the a tocratic quarter of Cabul. Here is the Amee palace; and here, too, was the temporary home the late British embassy. This section of city is about half a mile long and a quarter bro well placed on the acclivity of a hill, and s rounded, not with sunburnt bricks, but w stone walls, strengthened at intervals by tow and protected by a stagnant moat.

The Bala Hissar has been always held as royal palace, because it was a place sufficie strong to resist the seditious risings on the of the populace, and it afforded a place of curity against any sudden outburst of rebelli

It was also very convenient as a prison ho for rivals or refractory vassals. But as a f ress against the attack of disciplined troops Bala Hissar is practically incapable of defe It surrendered to General Roberts without attempt being made to defend it. The Afgh as they have always done before, even in t wars among themselves, evacuated it on approach of the English army.

In 1840 Sir Henry Durand advised the de lition of its fortifications, but it was not then ried out; but General Roberts has ordered towers and notable buildings upon the hill t razed to the ground.

Visible from Cabul are the Koosh mounta capped with eternal snow. From these m tains the river systems of Afghanistan are Out of Cabul's population of 60,000, there 10,000 or 12,000 Persians—representatives once dominant race in and about Cabul. T live together in one of the quarters of the and although in the minority numerically, have considerable weight in the councils o Ameer, and their language is that of the n classes. Most of the people are bigoted Mo medans.

The people of Cabul are generally tall, black eyes. The women are said to have beauty of face and elegance of form, but th cover themselves up that neither their be nor their form can be seen. The city st 6396 feet above the level of the sea, consequ ly the winter is very severe, but in summe heat is considerable.

Each sect has its own distinct resting-plac its dead, and many of the tombs are well w a visit. The most curious, and to Englis the most interesting, gravestone to be f about Cabul is one commemorative of a cou man, which bears a simple epitaph in larg man letters. The inscription is rather co edly engraved around the side of the stone it can be clearly deciphered, and runs as foll

"Here lyes the bodye of Joseph Hicks son of Thomas Hicks and Edith, who dep this lyfe the 11th of October, 1666."

How a European happened to be in Cabu years ago is still a mystery, and we believe no further information has ever been disco regarding this solitary traveller, whose bone in soil since made famous by the blood many of England's heroes.

In 1839 the English took the city, but in the British army of 3000 men and 12,000 followers were all massacred, except one escaped to tell the tale. The survivor, Dr. don, riding on his pony into Jellalabad, i subject of a well-known picture by Mrs. B in last year's Royal Academy in London.

The Circulation of Impure Literature in land is doing incalculable mischief. A wri an English journal says: "I have stood at corners and watched recently-published vil lications pass into the hands of young f employés of large, respectable firms; and I it on the best authority that girls who e one large establishment, pure and fresh happy homes a few months ago, are now of the worst characters it would be possi find in the streets. And the taste for th they are now indulging in was engender the filthy writings their minds constantl upon.'

THE EAST WIND.

New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, November 9, 1879.

"He stayeth His rough wind in the day of the east ind."—ISAIAH 27 : 8.

he Worst Wind that ever Blew—The World's Morals Affected by the Wind—Be on your Guard in the East Wind—The Depression of Great Men—The Dean of Carlisle—Trial must Come to all—John Wesley Libelled—George Whitefield Caricatured—Trouble Comes on Horseback and Leaves on Foot—Trial made to Blossom—The Guns in the Tower of London—A Christian Mother and her Child—The South Wind Enervating—The Rosetta Stone—What Trouble has done for Great Men—Hogarth's last Picture—The Roman Standard-bearer's Negligence—"The Sorrowing Tree"—Joy Cometh in the Morning—A Great Christian Fleet—Vessels Driven into Harbor by the East Wind.

THE north wind is bracing, the south wind is laxing, but the east wind is irritating and full threat. Eighteen times does the Bible speak ainst the east wind. Moses describes the thin rs blasted by the east wind. The Psalmist deribes the breaking of the ships of Tarshish by e east wind. The locusts that plagued Egypt re borne in on the east wind. The gourd at sheltered Jonah was scattered by the east nd; and in all the six thousand summers, au- mns, winters, springs, of the world's existence, e worst wind that ever blew is the east wind.

Now, if God would only give us a climate of rpetual nor'-wester, how genial and kind and acid and industrious Christians we would all ! But it takes almighty grace to be what we ght to be under the east wind. Under the illing and wet wing of the east wind the most the world's villanies, frauds, outrages, sui- les, and murders have been hatched out.

I think if you should keep a meteorological story of the days of the year, and put right side it the criminal record of the State, you uld find that those were the best days for blic morals which were under the north or st wind, and that those were the worst days public morals which were under the east wind, e points of the compass have more to do th the world's morals and the church's piety an you have yet suspected.

Rev. Dr. Archibald Alexander, eminent for rning and for consecration, when asked by one his students at Princeton whether he always ld full assurance of faith, replied, "Yes, ex- pt when the wind blows from the east." Dr. ancia, Dictator of Paraguay, when the wind s from the east, made oppressive enactments the people; but when the weather changed, ented him of the cruelties, repealed the actments, and was in good humor with all the rld.

Before I overtake the main thought of my ject this morning, I want to tell Christian ple they ought to be observant of climatical anges.

BE ON YOUR GUARD

en the wind blows from the east. There certain styles of temptations that you cant endure under certain styles of weather. en the wind blows from the east, if you are a nervous temperament, go not among exas- ating people, try not to settle bad debts, do t try to settle old disputes, do not talk with a ot on religion, do not go among those people o delight in saying irritating things, do not to collect funds for a charitable institution, not try to answer an insulting letter. If these ngs must be done, do them when the sun nes and when the wind is from the north, or south, or the west, but not when the wind is m the east.

ou say that men and women ought not to be sensitive and nervous. I admit it, but I am talking about what the world ought to be: I talking about what the world is. While there persons whose disposition does not seem to affected by changes in the atmosphere, nine of ten are mightily played upon by such uences. O Christian man! under such circumstances do not write hard things against yourself, do not get worried about your fluctuating experience. You are to remember that the barometer in your soul is only answering the barometer of the weather. Instead of sitting down and being discouraged and saying, "I am not a Christian because I don't feel exhilarant," get up and look out of the window and see the weather vane pointing in the wrong quarter, and then say, "Get thee behind me, Satan, thou prince of the power of the air; get out of my house! get out of my heart, thou demon of darkness horsed on the east wind. Away!" However good and great you may be in the Christian life, your soul will never be independent of physical condition. I feel I am uttering a most practical, useful truth here, one that may give relief to a great many Christians who are worried and despondent at times.

Doctor Rush, a monarch in medicine, after curing hundreds of cases of mental depression, himself fell sick and lost his religious hope, and he would not believe his pastor when the pastor told him that his spiritual depression was only a consequence of physical depression. Andrew Fuller, Thomas Scott, William Cowper, Thomas Boston, David Brainard, Philip Melancthon were mighty men for God, but all of them illustrations of the fact that a man's soul is not independent of his physical health.

An eminent physician gave as his opinion that no man ever died a greatly triumphant death whose disease was below the diaphragm. Stackhouse, the learned Christian commentator, says he does not think Saul was insane when David played the harp before him, but it was a hypochondria coming from inflammation of the liver. Oh, how many good people have been mistaken in regard to their religious hope, not taking these things into consideration! The Dean of Carlisle, one of the best men that ever lived, and one of the most useful, sat down and wrote:

"Though I have endeavored to discharge my duty as well as I could, yet sadness and melancholy of heart stick close by and increase upon me. I tell nobody, but I am very much sunk indeed, and I wish I could have the relief of weeping as I used to. My days are exceedingly dark and distressing. In a word, Almighty God seems to hide His face, and I entrust the secret hardly to any earthly being. I know not what will become of me. There is doubtless a good deal of bodily affliction mingled with this, but it is not all so. I bless God, however, that I never lose sight of the cross, and though I should die without seeing any personal interest in the Redeemer's merits, I hope that I shall be found at His feet. I will thank you for a word at your leisure. My door is bolted at the time I am writing this, for I am full of tears."

What was the matter with the Dean of Carlisle? Had he got to be a worse man? No. The physicians said that the state of his pulse would not warrant his living a minute. Oh! if the east wind affects the spleen, and affects the lungs, and affects the liver, it will affect your immortal soul. Appealing to God for help, press yourself against these withering blasts and destroying influences, lest that which the Psalmist said broke the ships of Tarshish shipwreck you.

But here comes in the glorious promise of my text: "He stayeth His rough wind in the day of the east wind." Mind you, He does not say that the wind will not blow from the east; it must sometimes blow from that quarter; the east wind is just as important as the north wind, or the south wind, or the west wind, but not so pleasant.

TRIAL MUST COME.

The text does not say you will escape the cutting blast. Who ever did escape it? Especially who that accomplished anything for church or state ever escaped it? I was this summer in the pulpit of John Wesley, in London, a pulpit where he stood one day and said: "I have been charged with all the crimes in the catalogue except one, and that of drunkenness," and a woman arose in the audience and said: "You were drunk last night." John Wesley passing under the flail!

I saw in a foreign journal a report of one of George Whitefield's sermons—a sermon preached a hundred and twenty or thirty years ago. It seemed that the reporter stood to take the sermon, and his chief idea was to caricature it; and these are some of the reportorial interlinings of the sermon of George Whitefield, the mightiest uninspired man who ever preached the Gospel. After calling him by a nickname indicative of a physical defect in the eye, it goes on to say:

"Here the preacher clasps his chin on the pulpit cushion. Here he elevates his voice. Here he lowers his voice. Holds his arms extended. Bawls aloud. Stands trembling. Makes a frightful face. Turns up the whites of his eyes. Clasps his hands behind him. Clasps his arms around him, and hugs himself. Roars aloud. Hollas. Jumps. Cries. Changes from crying. Hollas and jumps again."

Well, my brother, if that good man went through all that process, in your occupation, in your profession, in your store, in your shop, at the bar, in the sick-room, in the editorial chair, somewhere, you will have to go through a similar process; you cannot escape it.

Keats wrote his famous poem, and the hard criticism of the poem killed him—literally killed him. Tasso wrote his poem entitled "Jerusalem Delivered," and it had such a cold reception it turned him into a raving maniac. Stillingfleet was slain by his literary enemies. The frown of Henry VIII. slew Cardinal Wolsey. The Duke of Wellington refused to have the fence around his house, which had been destroyed by an excited mob, rebuilt, because he wanted the fence to remain as it was, a reminder of the mutability and uncertainty of the popular favor.

And you will have trial of some sort. You have had it already. Why need I prophesy? I might better mention an historical fact in your history. You are a merchant. What a time you had with that old business partner! How hard it was to get rid of him! Before you bought him out, or he ruined both of you, what magnitude of annoyance! Then after you had paid him down a certain sum of money to have him go out, and to promise he would not open a store of the same kind of business in your street, did he not open the very same kind of business as near to you as possible, and take all your customers as far as he could take them? And then, knowing all your frailties and weaknesses, after being in your business firm for so many years, is he not now spending his time in making a commentary on what you furnish as a text?

You are a physician, and in your sickness, or in your absence, you get a neighboring doctor to take your place in the sick-room, and he ingratiates himself into the favor of that family, so that you forever lose their patronage. Or, you take a patient through the serious stages of a fever, and same day the impatient father or husband of the sick one rushes out and gets another medical practitioner, who comes in just in time to get the credit of the cure.

Or, you are a lawyer, and you come in contact with a trickster in your profession, and in your absence, and contrary to agreement, he moves a non-suit or the dismissal of the case; or the judge on the bench, remembering an old political grudge, rules against you every time he gets a chance, and says with a snarl, "If you don't like my decision, take an exception."

Or you are a farmer, and the curculio stings the fruit, or the weevil gets into the wheat, or the drought stunts the corn, or the long-continued rains give you no opportunity for gathering the harvest. Your best cow gets the hollow horn, your best horse gets foundered.

A French proverb said that trouble comes in on horseback and goes away on foot. So trouble dashed in on you suddenly, but oh, how long it was in getting away! Came on horseback, goes away on foot. Rapid in coming, slow in going. That is the history of nearly all your troubles. Again and again and again you have experienced the power of the east wind. It may be blowing from that direction this morning. My friends, God intended these troubles and trials for some particular purpose. They do not come at random. Here is the promise, "He stayeth His rough wind in the day of the east wind."

TRIAL MADE TO BLOSSOM.

In the Tower of London the swords and the guns of other ages are burnished and arranged into huge passion-flowers, and huge sunflowers, and bridal cakes, and you wonder how any thing so hard as steel could be put into such floral shapes. O my friends! I have to tell you this morning of the hardest, sharpest, most cutting, most piercing sorrows of this life may be made to bloom and blossom and put on bridal festivity. My text says they shall be mitigated, they shall be assuaged, they shall be graduated. God is not going to allow you to be overthrown. A Christian woman, very much despondent, was holding her child in her arms, and the pastor, trying to console the woman in her spiritual depression, said, "There, you will let your child drop." "Oh no," she said, "I couldn't let the child drop." He said, "You will let the child drop." "Why," she said, "if I should drop the child here, it would dash his life out!" "Well, now," said the Christian minister, "don't you think God is as good as you are? Won't God, your Father, take as good care of you, His child, as you take care of your child? God won't let you drop."

I suppose God lets the east wind blow just hard enough to drive us into the harbor of God's protection. We all feel we can manage our own affairs. We have helm and compass and chart and quadrant. Give us plenty of sea room and we sail on and sail on; but after a while there comes a Caribbean whirlwind up the coast, and we are helpless in the gale, and we cry out for harbor. All our calculations upset, we say with the poet,

"Change and decay on all around I see;
O Thou that changest not, abide with me!"

THE SOUTH WIND

of mild providence makes us throw off the robe of Christian character and we catch cold, but the sharp east wind of trouble makes us wrap around us the warm promises. The best thing that ever happens to us is trouble. That is a hard thing perhaps to say; but I repeat it, for God announces it again and again, the best thing that happens to us is trouble.

When the French army went down into Egypt under Napoleon, an engineer, in digging for a fortress, came across a tablet which has been called the Rosetta stone. There were inscriptions in three or four languages on that Rosetta stone. Scholars studying out the alphabet of hieroglyphics from that stone were enabled to read ancient inscriptions on monuments and on tombstones. Well, my friends, many of the handwritings of God in our life are indecipherable hieroglyphics; we cannot understand them until we take up the Rosetta stone of divine inspiration, and the explanation all comes out, and the mysteries all vanish, and what was before beyond our understanding now is plain in its meaning, as we read, "All things work together for good to those who love God." So we decipher the hieroglyphics.

O my friends! have you ever calculated what trouble did for David? It made him the sacred minstrel for all ages. What did trouble do for Joseph? Made him the keeper of the corn cribs of Egypt. What did it do for Paul? Made him the great apostle to the Gentiles. What did it do for Samuel Rutherford? Made his invalidism more illustrious than robust health. What did it do for Richard Baxter? Gave him capacity to write of the "Saint's Everlasting Rest." What did it for John Bunyan? Showed him the shining gates of the city.

WHAT HAS IT DONE FOR YOU?

Since the loss of that child, your spirit has been purer. Since the loss of that property, you have found out that earthly investments are insecure. Since you lost your health, you feel as never before a rapt anticipation of eternal release. Trouble has humbled you, has enlarged you, has multiplied your resources, has equipped you, has loosened your grasp from this world and tightened your grip on the next. Oh! bless God for the east wind. It has driven you into the harbor of God's sympathy.

Nothing like trouble to show us that this world is an insufficient portion. Hogarth was about done with life, and he wanted to paint the end of all things. He put on canvas a shattered bottle; a cracked bell; an unstrung harp; a signboard of a tavern called "The World's End" falling down; a shipwreck; the horses of Phœbus lying dead in the clouds; the moon in her last quarter, and the world on fire. "One thing more," said Hogarth, "and my picture is done." Then he added the broken palette of a painter. Then he died.

But trouble, with hand mightier and more skilful than Hogarth's, pictures the falling, failing, mouldering, dying world. And we want something permanent to lay hold of, and we grasp with both hands after God, and say, "The Lord is my light, the Lord is my love, the Lord is my fortress, the Lord is my sacrifice, the Lord, the Lord is my God."

Bless God for your trials. O my Christian friend! keep your spirits up by the power of Christ's Gospel. Do not surrender. Do you not know that when you give up, others will give up? You have courage and others will have courage.

The Romans went into the battle, and by some accident there was an inclination of the standard. The standard upright meant forward march; the inclination of the standard meant surrender. Through the negligence of the man who carried the standard, and the inclination of it, the army surrendered. Oh! let us keep the standard up, whether it be blown by the east wind, or the north wind, or the south wind. No inclination to surrender. Forward into the conflict.

There is near Bombay a tree that they call the peculiarity of which is it never puts forth any bloom in the daytime, but in the night puts out all its bloom and all its redolence. And I have to tell you that though Christian character puts forth its sweetest blossoms in the darkness of sickness, the darkness of financial distress, the darkness of bereavement, the darkness of death, "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning."

THE "SORROWING TREE,"

Across the harsh discords of this world rolls the music of the skies—music that breaks from the lips, music that breaks from the harps and rustles from the palms, music like falling water over rocks, music like wandering winds among leaves, music like carolling birds among forests, music like ocean billows storming the Atlantic beach: "They shall hunger no more, neither thirst any more, neither shall the sun light on them norany heat; for the Lamb which is in the midst of the throne shall lead them to living fountains of water, and God shall wipe away all tears from their eyes." I see approaching that harbor. Some of the ships come in with sails rent and bulwarks knocked away, but still afloat. Nearer and nearer the shining shore. Nearer and nearer eternal anchorage. Haul away, my lads! haul away!

A GREAT CHRISTIAN FLEET

Some of the ships had mighty tonnage, and others were shallops easily lifted of the wave. Some were men-of-war and armed of the thunders of Christian battle, and others were unpretending tugs taking others through the "Narrows," and some were coasters that never ventured out into the deep seas of Christian experience; but they are all coming nearer the wharf, brigantine, galleon, line-of-battle ship, long-boat, pinnace, war-frigate—and as they come into the harbor I find that they are driven by the long, loud, terrific blast of the east wind. It is through much tribulation that you are to enter into the kingdom of God.

You have blessed God for the north wind, and blessed Him for the south wind, and blessed him for the west wind; can you not in the light of this subject bless Him for the east wind?

"Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee.
E'en though it be a cross
That raiseth me;
Still all my song shall be,
Nearer, my God, to Thee,
Nearer to Thee."

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it and for its weekly circulation of more than 150,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

THE BEDOUIN MAIL-CARRIER.

THE village of Damer is the point at which the Arab express courier, after a nine days' and nights' journey across the desert, delivers up his mail. The wild Bedouin, who performs this dangerous, solitary, and fatiguing journey, rarely enters the two centres of Eastern civilization, between which he furnishes a means of communication. For him the fragrant gardens and well-stocked bazaars of Damascus have no attraction. He stops on the verge of the desert, at either end of his route, and swings on his lithe dromedary to and fro over its arid wastes, catching such snatches of rest as he may at the scattered oases and widely-separated wells where he stops to refresh his camel. With the coppery sky scorching him by day, and the changeless blue above him at night, rarely knowing the shelter even of an Arab tent, carryin with him the dates and rice sufficient to last hir for his journey, exposed to perils from thirst an sand-storms and predatory Arabs, to whom th fleet animal he rides is a sore temptation, he is without doubt, the most bizarre and exceptiona postman in existence.

We have in this strange character a standin picture of the rule of things three thousand year ago. At that time, when nobody dreamed of change, God foretold that "many should run t and fro, and knowledge should be increased' (Dan. 12:4). And to-day we of the nineteent century are witnesses of the fulfilment of tha prophecy.

A Catastrophe Occurred at Kansas City, Mo on November 7th, from the appalling character which it seems marvellous that so comparative few deaths should have resulted. The walls a large candy manufactory, in which two hu dred persons were employed, suddenly fell i From within the huge tumbling wreck issued t terror-stricken occupants, who mingled the screams and shrieks with the crash of falling ti bers and masses of brick. Hardly had the hou fallen before the ruins took fire, ignited by t overturned furnaces. In the second story abo thirty girls were cut off from the stairs by ti bers blocking the doorway. They ran to t windows, and before any one could stop the several had jumped to the ground, receiving t rible wounds. At last the door to the stairw was battered down and the girls were released

The firemen worked like heroes, as with could be heard the calls and prayers of the i prisoned girls and boys. The flames were fierce, however, that nothing could be done nearly half an hour, and only one person, a gi was released alive. Of those caught when t building tumbled at first, it was thought t from ten to twenty persons were killed, but a late hour all had been accounted for except eig But for Providential mercy the two hundred e ployés might have been so engaged as to r der escape impossible.

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

. Thrilling Story by Henry Martin, Author o "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 871.)

he Warder propitiated to inform Jemmy that nis Master is confined near to Him—Jemmy is Insubordinate in consequence—Percival seeks to know the Cause of Jemny's Imprisonment.

"TELL me, please do," said Percival, to his rison Warder "how has it come to pass that y servant has been lodged in prison?"

"Come, come, if that be all you have to say," as the answer, "I must lock the door. You e not going to get me to blab out matters that long to the prison officials, and not to you. pon my word, but you have an assurance. rhaps I had better go for the governor's oks and let you read them."

"My good fellow," said Percival—and as he oke he slipped a half-crown into the janitor's nds—"my good fellow, do not be so unamiable. at poor fellow in the next cell is my servant an."

"Very likely," answered the warder; "'like aster like man,' you know, sir." The coursy of the "sir" was no doubt the fruit of the lf-crown, and Percival feared it was going to the only result, for the warder immediately swered, "Really, you must excuse me, sir; I ve no time for further talk; your servant man, (I call him so upon your authority), has been ilty of very gross misconduct, and I must see er his correction."

'Poor fellow!" said Percival; "if he has ed, it has been, I well know, through ignorce of your discipline, for I can heartily assure u, warder, he is one of the best-behaved and od-hearted creatures in the world. As you so pressed for time, however, I will only add o very short requests."

"Well, out with them, sir, and please don't ep me," said the man.

'Well, tell my neighbor-prisoner who it is t is in the cell next him. And, secondly, it l greatly oblige me, and perhaps will insure nething to yourself, if you will tell the gov or of the gaol that I greatly wish to speak h him."

ropitiated by the past solatium put into his nd, and by the prospect of favors of the same d yet to come, the warder's reply was, "Well, I don't mind doing what you ask. I'll now e your message to the next cell, and in half hour when I go off duty I'll let the governor ow that you'd like to see him." Having en this promise, he relocked the cell, and cival heard him convey to Jemmy the infor ion he sent him.

e know we shall fail to fitly describe to the ler the effect upon Jemmy of the warder's in igence. First, unable to believe that such a e of news was within the bounds of possi y, he got the warder to repeat Percival's ne. Even then he doubted the tidings, deem it probable that it must be some other Mr. cival Montaigne that was meant, and not e masther." How could it be that he was xt dure to him"? The thing was simply ossible, and it was only the warder's state t that the prisoner in the neighboring cell distinctly said that the individual who had ken the rules of the gaol by singing was his ant man Jemmy Mehaffy, that the miraculous rapturous assurance of the warder reached Jemmy's mind the stage of conviction. orroo!" he shouted, and he leaped from the r of his cell, like one suddenly gone mad, quite beyond himself, not from aberration nind, but from wild delight of a joy too t for his bosom to hold.

he next move of Jemmy was to endeavor to his cell and rush "nixt dure," as he called In his ecstatic gladness, losing all remem nce that he was in gaol and a prisoner, the that there was any difficulty in the way of going to "the masther," never entered his d. He hurried forward from a spontaneous impulse, and was halfway through the cell door when the warder with a violent grasp and push arrested him. "Hold, my man," he cried, fiercely, "what are you about? Go back out o' this, will you?" and he gave Jemmy a shove that drove him half-way down the length of his dungeon. "Dacent man," said Jemmy, "don't do that agin. I'd advise ye not; me timper mightn't be able to stand it; and indeed as it is, if it warn't for the good news yer after bringin' me, it isn't at all onlikely I'd pay ye back in your own coin, and with more nor yer own agin. What right have ye, purshuin to ye, to hindher me from me work? Shure I was only goin' to the masther?"

"Then you had better not attempt it again, my good fellow," said the warder, "that's all; you and your master are a pair of troublesome fools;" and having given expression to this acute and gracious piece of criticism, he turned the key of Jemmy's cell-door, and left him in his previous solitude.

Jemmy was again shut out from communication with the outer world, but his feelings and impulses were widely different from those which possessed him when he resolved upon his musical performance. Then he wished to get free from a dead and dull monotony which consumed him with an utter and unendurable weariness: now his heart was filled with a tumult of emotion that too much engaged his excited spirit. Then he had with conscious effort to put his bodily powers into exercise: Now he was all alive with involuntary motion. He stamped wildly upon the cell floor; he worked his shoulders alternately; he shook his head from side to side; he capered and gambolled to and fro; he put his hands upon the iron door before him—near the lock, as if he would push back its heavy bolt with his finger and thumb; he pressed the palms of his hands against the granite wall of his cell on the side next Percival's, as though he supposed it were soft like dough, and that he could push his way through it. For several moments, possessed and mastered by the thought that his beloved master was quite near, there seemed to be no room in his mind for the idea that he could not get actually to him.

By degrees, however, the unwelcome fact came home to his consciousness, and the cell, which when he entered it on the night before had seemed so inviting as being "sich a nice, clane, nate, convanyant, and wonderfully chape lodgin'," became to him a veritable chamber of torture.

"Oh!" he cried, "what in the world shall I do? What'll becum o' me? Shure I'll never be able to stand it. Only think uv it! the masther is there"—and he looked towards the side of the cell indicated—"within arm's lingth o' me he is, jist there," he repeated, "and, do me best, I can't git to 'im. Shure it's worse nor murther to thrate me in dhis way. What did I do, at all at all, to desarve it? Shure the world—God's blessin' be about us!—is nothin else nor a topsy-turvy place of onjustice and confushun. That thievin' vagabone of a peeler that put me here, an' all for nothin', can come and go whin and where he likes, and me that's honest and dacent, and has done no wan an ill turn, is locked up here, and deprived o' me liberty. May God and the blessed Vargin tache me what it all manes, for thruly it so bothers me, that fur the life o' me I can't ondherstand it."

No, Jemmy, we dare say not; and such experiences as yours have been a mystery and a stumbling-block to men better instructed and holier than you. Even David, a man inspired, with soul illumined by supernatural light from heaven, was staggered and perplexed by these seeming irregularities of Providence—vice triumphant and virtue trampled in the dust, the wicked in great power and spreading themselves like a green bay-tree, and the righteous plagued all day long, and chastened every morning.

In calm and easy hours faith may find no difficulty in seeing that the world, as disturbed by sin, is not a system of adjusted rewards and punishment in the present, but is rather a remedial scheme and a school of discipline for the future; but when we are in severe trial, the soul in deep waters, and the waves going over our head, it is not so easy thus to think and meditate. Blinded by the spray and staggered by the billows, steady thought and deep reflection are impossible, and in misery, and vexed, the petulant cry of the man in trouble is, "Verily I have cleansed my heart in vain, and washed my hands in innocency."

But "to the upright light ariseth in the darkness;" and so it was proved in the case of the perplexed and honest-minded Jemmy. His state of "bedazement" was brought to a sudden and grateful termination—one that put a joyful end to all the puzzling and murmuring inquiries of his soul; for, after some interval, the noise of a key was heard as being placed again in the lock of his cell door, and when it was opened a pleasant voice said,

"Here, my good man, you may, if you wish, go to Mr. Montaigne, who is in the next cell. I know I am doing an act beyond our general rules and altogether unusual, but under the circumstances I will take the responsibility, and I hope you will not abuse my kindness."

The voice that Jemmy, with bounding joy, heard speak these words was, as will be surmised, that of the gaol governor.

When the warder was relieved from work, his hours of duty for the day having expired, he conveyed, as he had promised, Percival's request to his chief. That gentleman, while a good disciplinarian, firm and vigilant, was no tyrant, but was kindly in disposition and considerate in conduct. Therefore, when he got the message conveyed by the warder, as soon as his present engagement allowed he repaired to his cell.

"Governor," said Percival, "do not refuse, I beseech you, to tell me the cause of the imprisonment of the man who is in confinement near me, and whose name is Jemmy Mehaffy. You may think I have no right to ask such a question, and I at once admit that in ordinary circumstances that would be true; but believe me, governor, my case and my man's are not ordinary, but the very opposite. Perhaps you will not believe me—indeed, I cannot demand that you should—but nevertheless I speak the truth when I assure you I am here under a very gross mistake or through some cruel miscarriage of justice. I have chosen to voluntarily surrender myself to the authorities, knowing well that a little inquiry urged by my friends will clear me. But my servant man, my faithful and honest-minded Jemmy, sober, upright, of irreproachable character, why should he be involved in my misfortune? It is a piece of gratuitous oppression and a monstrous wrong, and my whole soul feels outraged when I think of it."

The governor, however, was able to tell Percival that if he was the object he was also the subject of a great mistake. "My dear sir," he said, and he used the words in kindness, "your man is not here, I assure you, through any thing in connection with the charge against yourself—of that I am certain. What I understand is, he has been placed in custody for some assault or other upon the police. It cannot, however, have been of a serious character, for four days, only four days, is the limit of his detention."

"Thank you, governor," said Percival: "I am deeply grateful to you. And now, as his offence is so trifling and I am here only under a suspicion of political complicity, will you kindly let him see me? He knows, poor fellow, that I am here, he is devoted to me, and I feel certain that he is enduring not much less than agony in being kept from me. If you like, of course a warder can be present to hinder any possible misuse of this privilege."

For a moment or two the governor paused in his reply, and then said, "Well, sir, you make a request that is not at all regular, and which I would not, as a rule, for an instant think of granting.

(To be continued.)

PREACHING THE LORD JESUS.

A Sermon by the Rev. W. M. Punshon, LL.D.

> "And some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, which, when they were come to Antioch, spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus. And the hand of the Lord was with them; and a great number believed and turned unto the Lord."—ACTS 11 : 20, 21.

Jewish Exclusiveness—The Gospel a Blessing to the World—Peter's Mysterious Vision—The Lord Jesus the Great Subject of the Gospel Ministry—We must Preach Christ—I. In His Dignity as a Divine Sovereign—II. As the Great End and Theme of the Scriptures.

THE Jews were accustomed for a long period to regard themselves as the chosen people of God, and, in the pride which that knowledge seemed to exercise over them, looked with jealous eyes upon the nations around them. Instances of their exclusiveness are not wanting in the Scriptures. You will remember that when the woman of Samaria was talking to Christ, she said, "How is it that Thou, being a Jew, askest drink of me, which am a woman of Samaria? for the Jews have no dealings"—no courteous, friendly, social interchange—"the Jews have no dealings with the Samaritans." Again, in the Gospel of John, we find the Jews, proud of their ancestral privilege, speaking to Christ in this wise: "We be Abraham's seed, and were never in bondage to any man; how sayest Thou, Ye shall be made free?" (John 8 : 33.)

Peter, before the illuminating influence of the Holy Spirit shone upon his soul, dispersing the darkness which had so long gathered there, accounted the Gentiles as common and unclean; and in the chapter before us we read that, "When Peter was come up to Jerusalem, they that were of the circumcision contended with him, saying, "Thou wentest in to men uncircumcised, and didst eat with them" (Acts 11 : 3).

But the Lord Jesus Christ, whose heart was as expansive as the heaven from which He came, never intended the benefit of His Gospel to be thus exclusively confined. It was to be a boon and like the sun, it was to shed its radiance upon the just and upon the unjust; like a bright and beautiful rainbow, it was to span the whole arch of heaven. Peter, in the narrative before us, defended himself against those who contended with him by rehearsing the matter of the vision.

A BLESSING TO THE WORLD;

You remember that mysterious vision which Peter had when he was lodging with Simon the tanner, and which told him to go to the house of Cornelius, a devout man and one that feared God, and to preach the everlasting Gospel. You remember, further, that while he was preaching the Holy Ghost fell upon his congregation; and you will further recollect the allusion with which he now closes the rehearsal, "Forasmuch then as God gave them, the Gentiles, the like gift as He did unto us who believed on the Lord Jesus Christ; what was I that I could withstand God?" His narrative had the primary effect of removing the narrowness of Jewish prejudice from the minds of his hearers, and of causing them to behave as every Christian must behave when he hears of the spread of the Gospel. They rejoiced, saying, "Then hath God also to the Gentiles granted repentance unto life."

But it had another and a remoter influence, and one, perhaps, which was not originally intended; it made the other members of the Church to go and do likewise, and to declare unto the Gentiles the unsearchable riches of Christ. "Some of them were men"—not preachers, not ordained for the purpose, not separated to the sanctities of the ministerial office. "Some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene"—scattered by the blast of persecution. "Some of them were men of Cyprus and Cyrene, which, when they were come to Antioch, spake unto the Grecians"—a common name by which the Jews were in the habit of denoting all the Gentile nations—"spake unto the Grecians, preaching the Lord Jesus; and the hand of the Lord was with them: and a great number believed, and turned unto the Lord."

And surely the great subject of the Gospel ministry has not altered with the lapse of time. I know that the curse rests upon those who discover a new Gospel, and I am anxious to avert that curse from myself. It is on the old subject, therefore, the subject of apostolic teaching, the subject which was followed by such signal and eminent successes when the first preachers of the Gospel handled it, that I am to address you for a few moments on the present occasion. "Preaching the Lord Jesus." That is not a gospel ministry, whatever else may be its excellencies or pretensions, which does not prominently, and in every sermon, put forth and exhibit and illustrate the life and death of the Son of God.

I. I observe in the first place—and I can only run rapidly over such thoughts as you will perceive to be suggested—that Christ is preached in the dignity of His character

AS A DIVINE SOVEREIGN.

The doctrine of the entire and unoriginated divinity of the blessed Saviour is clearly and explicitly revealed to us in the Bible. We are not left to vague conjecture or to doubt about it. It forces itself upon our consciousness with the distinct utterance of impressive truth; it flasles upon our minds as it flashed upon the centurion's when he said, "Truly this man is the Son of God."

Indications of His majesty appeared in the first periods of His history. Wise men followed the guidance of His star until it led to the place where He was. Simeon and Anna prophesied in the temple concerning His future glory, and an angel, express from heaven, was sent to announce and publish His coming. Even amidst the humiliation in which the time of His incarnate life was passed there were occasions when bursts of His glory, visible through the veil which enshrouded it, testified a present God. "It came to pass that He took Peter, and James, and John, and went into a high mountain apart, and He was transfigured before them; and His face did shine as the sun, and His raiment was white as the light" (Matt. 17 : 1, 2).

On another occasion we find Him entering, in all the dignity of His understood office and royalty, into the temple, casting out them that bought and sold, and overthrowing the sordid tables of the money-changers, and the seats of them that sold doves; and the dignified and rebuking accents in which He pronounced their dismissal were, "My house shall be called a house of prayer, but ye have made it a den of thieves." How convincing an illustration of the divinity of His character, and the innate and resplendent power which shone forth through its earthly covering, we have at the time of His betrayal! A band of officers and men were sent by the chief priests and scribes to take Him. No sooner had they answered His interrogatory than He replied, "I am He," and, as though there were thunder in the tone or lightning in the glance, they went backward and fell to the ground.

But apart from these visible and palpable manifestations of His divinity—in addition to the pale sun, and the shrouded sky, and the rent vail, and the yawning earth, and the open sepulchres, those evidences of divinity which made the centurion believe and tremble; besides the immense mass of evidence which His miracles furnished, the healed lepers and raised dead who could come forth to avouch to the fact, we have His own witness claiming to be the Messiah, and the love of the Father attesting and confirming His testimony. St. Mark tells us that when He was brought before the tribunal of the high priests, the question was asked of Him, "Art Thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?" and He answered, "I am." And on another occasion He declared, "I and My Father are one," and the affection of the Father cried with an audible voice from heaven, "This is My beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased" (Mark 14 : 31; John 10 : 30; Matt. 3 : 17).

There are those in the world, I know, who would degrade the Lord Jesus to the level of a mere man like ourselves, and who would thereby darken the light which His atonement has shed around the earth, dislocate the perfection of the exquisitely-wrought deliverance which He has purchased for us, and fling a whole world of ransomed and happy sinners back again into the regions of fell despair. Their system at the best is a painful and destructive thing; beautiful it may be, but it is beautiful in death; its lessons of morality may fall like music upon the ear, but for any effect which is produced it is like music that is played among the tombs.

We joy to believe that the same Jesus whom we preach is the Son of God as well as the Son of man. We have no assurance of the validity of the atonement, we have no certainty of the acceptance of that atonement on high, if we can for a moment believe it otherwise. We are lost, absolutely lost, unless while we have a man that can sympathize, we have a God to save; and we rejoice to think that soon this same Jesus whom we preach shall be seen sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven.

II. Secondly, we preach the Lord Jesus as the great end and

THE THEME OF THE SCRIPTURES.

God at sundry times hath, in divers manners, spoken unto men by the prophets. God anointed holy men of old and made them prescient of the future; and appointed certain types, and ceermonies, and ordinances to be observed in the ritual of the chosen people, the children of Israel. Why was all this? Were prophets ushered into the presence-chamber, and did the floo of light burst upon their previously clouded vision? It was that they might foretell the glorie of Christ. Were holy men of old favored with vision of future things? They were the things be sure of it, concerning Christ.

Were there types and ceremonies in the gran Levitical economy? Those types, every one them, foreshadowed that Christ to whom, an to whom alone, with marvellous unanimity testimony, gave all the prophets witness. He wa the Shiloh that blessed the expiring Jacob; H was the burden of the songs of the royal bard Israel; He was "The Wonderful, the Counsellor, of whom Isaiah speaks; He was "The Lord o Righteousness" spoken of by the plaintive Jer miah; He was the "Ancient of Days" who Daniel describes; He was the "Desire of N tions" whom Haggai said should come; He w the "Branch out of the stem of Jesse" of who Zechariah prophesied; He was the "Sun Righteousness" whom Malachi, last of t bright-robed and radiant train, saw arise up the earth with healing in His wings.

Each of these looked at Him from His o standpoint, and presented Him in His own pect; but they all gazed upon Christ just as t moon looks down upon a multitude of flowe and the flowers look gratefully up to the one rene and steadfast moon. Were there types a ceremonies in connection with the Levitical ec omy? You will find that those types unifor had to do with Christ. There was a smit rock, was there not, in the wilderness of Hor from which there gushed out the stream of cl and crystal water, so that the thirsty Israeli drank and were healed? What of that? C "they drank of the rock that followed the and that rock was Christ." There was a bra serpent uplifted in the wilderness, by gazin which the plague-smitten Israelites were hea of all their harm. What of that? Why, ' Moses lifted up the serpent in the wildern even so must the Son of man be lifted up; whosoever believeth in Him should not per but have everlasting life" (John 3 : 14).

Oh, the Scripture, apart from its Divine gin, is worthy of the highest commendation praise! History, correct and comprehens reasoning, subtle and profound; eloquence, lime and forceful, are found within its pages. is a book designed for man, and for man it i pecially adapted. So varied are its contents, it can give to every needy son of Adam his tion of meat in due season; but that w crowns it with its most surpassing excellency, that which invests it with its noblest grandeur, that which enrobes it in its richest and most unapproachable royalty, is the special and distinct revelation which its pages give of Christ.

It contains doctrines the most sound and healthful; precepts the most pure and practical; threatenings the most authoritative and awful; promises the most sweet and consoling; but the doctrines are more wholesome because Christ has endorsed them, and the precepts are more practical because Christ has uttered them, and the threatenings are more terrible because Christ has denounced them, and the promises are more tender because Christ has spoken them. The atonement comes and casts a lustre of hallowed radiance upon the whole; and the book of God, beautiful in itself, is ten-fold more beautiful and lovely by the flood of Glory which streams upon it from the Cross.

[The third and fourth divisions of this sermon will appear in our next number.]

HAPPY VOYAGE TO HONG-KONG.

Recollections by Major Malan.

Why I Decided to go to Hong-Kong—A Providential Passage in a Man-of-War, with 550 Crew—"What's a Deal Better than Grog"—A Text given me as a Message—Hospital Visitation in the Afternoon, and Meetings in the Evening for Four Months—Instances of Sailors Saved.

In the year 1868 my regiment was ordered to Hong-Kong. This move always gave promotion, and I was thereby offered my step as major. I had a dread of Hong-Kong on account of its climate. I had seen some invalids of the 59th Regiment from China in 1857, and I remember at the time resolving that I would never go to Hong-Kong if I could avoid it. On the score of health, and other considerations, I might have justified myself in declining to go there.

I prayed for guidance as to leaving the army. Never did I spend such a night as that wherein I decided to retire from the service. But this was not the Lord's will, and I had no peace until I determined, come what might, to go to China. I felt that if I were to leave the regiment now that it was ordered to Hong-Kong, my fellow-soldiers would be able to say of me that I had professed to be their friend and to teach them about Christ in England, but that, now the regiment was ordered to a bad climate, I was afraid to trust to Him and go with them. Thus dishonor would be brought to His holy name.

This decided me to go. I committed myself to the Lord Jesus, only desiring that, happen what might, He would keep me faithful to Him. I never dreaded any thing so much as the prospect of this service at Hong-Kong; but I felt that the honor of His name was concerned in it, and I had faith given me to go, looking unto Him alone for grace and strength.

Very wonderfully did He provide for me. Instead of the crowding and rush of an Overland steamer, He found me passage in the captain's cabin of a man-of-war. This happened in a remarkable way.

I was in London for the last time. Before leaving I was led to call on the widowed mother of an old friend. She said, "I am so sorry you have just missed my son; he has been appointed captain of a ship under orders for China."

"I am ordered there, too," I rejoined.

"How I wish you could go together!"

I sat down and wrote him a note there and then. In a few days I was embarked in his ship, and on my way to Hong-Kong. "He that hath friends, must show himself friendly," is, like all God's Word, good counsel. I could not leave England without calling upon her, and thus the Lord opened for me this most pleasant means of travelling to China.

My friend the captain had had a passage with me in my cabin some years before. I found him at the Mauritius, with a foot very badly injured. The doctors feared the Red Sea passage for him. I was returning in a sailing vessel round the Cape, and I of course offered him my cabin, if he could come to terms with the master of the ship. Our friendship was formed during that voyage, and now he was glad to receive me as his guest into his cabin. "With the same measure that ye mete withal, it shall be measured to you again" (Luke 6 : 38).

A telegram from my friend started me off to Plymouth at three hours' notice. But I was quite ready, and my faith rose as soon as I found myself again going on foreign service. I wrote the following lines in the railway between Crewkerne and Exeter. They exactly expressed what were my thoughts on leaving home that day:

At Thy command, once more, O Lord!
  I leave my native land;
Once more, in humble faith and hope,
  I take Thy loving hand.

'Tis peace indeed to lean on Thee,
  To know no will but Thine,
To have Thy blessed Word as guide,
  To follow light divine.

I cannot leave those whom I love
  Without a passing tear;
But ever when my heart's most sad
  Thy gentle voice I hear.

It bids me trust to Thee alone
  Myself and those I love;
To set affection not on earth,
  But on the things above.

It was my earnest desire and prayer to live in the spirit of these lines, and to trust in the Lord, and follow His Word during every day of this foreign service.

The ship's company numbered, including officers and myself, the only passenger, five hundred and fifty souls. One half were boys from the training ships for the China squadron, and crews for some of the ships on that station. It was a field prepared of God for sowing. God had already given me some experience with sailors, and I had the happiest recollection of moments spent with blue-jackets over His Word.

(I here may digress for a minute to mention that at the close of a subsequent voyage from America to England, the day the ship arrived at Liverpool the first officer, offered the men, who had been working very hard all day, a second glass of grog. "No, thank you, sir," was the reply he received. "You know that when we embarked at Montreal there was not a man of us who would not have gone up to his armpits in rum, but there's been a gentleman among us this passage who has taught us what's a deal better than grog." Blessed be God for a sailor's confession of the faith! "Thy love is better than wine." To know Christ as our Saviour is indeed a great deal better than grog.)

On this voyage to Hong-Kong I prayed for guidance. After a few days the word came unto me: "Be strong, and work, for I am with thee, saith the Lord of Hosts" (Haggai 2 : 4). I asked my friend the captain's leave to go among his men during the voyage. "If they have no objection, I should be glad," was his kind reply. I went round the messes, told the men I wished to visit them of an evening, and read the Book, which was my best friend, if they would like me to do so. A very hearty welcome was their response. "We would be much obliged if you would, sir." I thanked God, and took courage.

From that day, the 3d of February, until the 4th of June, 1869, I visited my friends, the blue-jackets, daily, except when the ship was in harbor, and endeavored to teach them the truths which were the delight and joy of my soul. My hour was from half-past six to eight in the evening. In the afternoon I visited the sick in hospital, and read the Word to them. He who sent me on board that ship blessed His Word by my lips to not a few who have since been kept steadfast in the faith. When I remember the intense heat between decks, the noise of the machinery, and the strain on my voice to make myself heard by those around, I cannot but praise Him who gave me the physical strength day by day. I look back in wonder and adoration at the grace and help then given.

We touched at Madeira, where, I believe, the Lord sent me with His saving name to a dying American sailor. Poor fellow! he was lying, smashed, head and knee, by a fall from the main-yard of his ship. But "Jesus" is a name which has salvation in it, and I believe that the few minutes I had to tell the man of Him were enough, and that we shall meet in glory. We also visited Cape Town, Singapore, and Labuan, at each of which places I found an open door for testimony—at Labuan to some poor Scotch miners.

Very happy are my recollections of that voyage. The affection which many of the blue-jackets have for the ship is wonderful. "It was a good day I ever shipped in her." "I thank God the dear old —— was ever built." None of them, however, are more thankful than I am: "It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20 : 35).

A MAN-OF-WAR'S MAN IMPRESSED IN A GALE.

A year or more after the voyage, I met a man-of-war's man at Singapore. He touched his cap. "Very glad to see you, sir." I thanked him, remembering that we made the voyage to China together. "You were not then a believer in Christ, my friend," I added.

"No, sir," he said; "but do you remember the night of that terrible gale off St. Paul's? I was lying in my hammock in fear and trembling when I saw you come down to read the Gospel to the men. I could not hear a word you said, but I could see your face, and I watched you the whole time. I saw your bright, happy smile just the same as ever. I said to myself, Here am I, an old sailor, many years at sea, and I am afraid now in this gale; and here's a landsman as happy as if he were ashore. I felt that you had what I had not; I felt that you had, what I had heard you say you had, forgiveness of sins, and eternal life. I prayed that night. Ever afterwards I came near you when you were reading, and when I left the ship I was a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ."

Well did I remember the gale. I went below that night, because I thought that, if I did not go among them, the men would imagine that I was afraid, and I thought I might cheer them. "The Word of God is the same in a storm as in a calm, men: it always does us good," was my opening remark. I sat on a mess-table, as usual, "hanging on" to a rope. I enjoyed that evening as much as any. Little did I then think what the Lord had done by making His joy and peace shine in my face. He is wonderful in counsel.

I cannot omit to notice the happy Sunday evenings. I sat in the bow of the ship, on the foremost pivot gun, and the blue-jackets sat round. What a sight it was! I read from my Bible, and spoke to them of Him who walked the sea and calmed the storm, whose precious blood cleanseth from all sin. The sun sank beneath the horizon as we sat there; and when the stars had come out, we sang 'Sun of my soul, Thou Saviour dear,' and parted. The sound of praise that floated away over the sea was, I hope, a tribute of worship, accepted at the throne of God. We shall know all about these things in "a little while."

Often since this voyage letters from my old shipmates have come to me in moments of trial, cheering and helping me. I had committed myself to the Lord Jesus, desiring only to serve Him, and He had given me this opportunity of so doing. I felt it to be an assurance of His guidance and presence; and when I arrived at Hong-Kong, my heart was rejoicing in God more than it had ever done before.

The Evangelical Alliance of the United States commenced its sittings at St. Louis, October 28th. Delegates were present from all parts of the country, and were personally provided for and entertained by friends in the city. The programme for the first evening was an address of welcome by the Rev. Mr. Rhodes, and a response, and also an account of the conference at Bâle, Switzerland, by the Rev. T. W. Chambers, of New York. The sessions continued for three days.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, November 5th, at 4.10 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Elections were Held in Eleven States on Tuesday, November 4th. Pennsylvania chose its Treasurer only; New York, Maryland, Massachusetts, and Wisconsin elected State officers and Legislatures; Minnesota elected its full Board of State officers; Nebraska elected three of its State officers; Connecticut, Mississippi, New Jersey, and Virginia elected their Legislatures.

Of these, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Nebraska record a victory for the Republican party.

In Maryland the Democrats have elected their governor, State officers, and members of Legislature. Mississippi also gives a victory to the Democratic party, and it is probable that the result in Virginia may be counted on the same side.

The Republican gains in the eight States above mentioned have occasioned considerable elation in the party, as they have occurred in quarters, some of which had been counted "doubtful" in making up the list. The advent of commercial prosperity which usually operates to the advantage of the party which happens to be in power at the time, has probably conduced to this result and the ease with which the resumption of specie payments was effected, is doubtless another factor in the case. But whatever the influences at work, the results of the elections indicate that the Republicans have grounds for expecting an extension of their lease of power.

The Election in New York State has Resulted in placing the Republican candidate in the Gubernatorial Chair. Mr. A. B. Cornell has received a larger number of votes by about 36,000 than were polled for his principal Democratic rival, Mr. Lucius Robinson. The result, satisfactory as it is to the Republican party, cannot be regarded as a triumph of Republican principles. The entire Democratic vote in the State is still largely in excess of the Republican vote. The returns indicate that if a Democratic candidate had been nominated who would have commanded the support of the entire party, he would have been elected. Mr. Kelly received 70,000 Democratic votes, which had they been added to those given to Mr. Robinson, would have secured that gentleman's election by a majority about equal to that of Mr. Cornell. As it is, the two rival leaders, Mr. Tilden and Mr. Kelly, by their personal antagonism, have achieved a defeat for their party; Mr. Tilden by forcing a nomination distasteful to a large and influential section of the party, and Mr. Kelly, by fighting a battle in which victory for himself was hopeless, and in which he could hope only to secure the defeat of his political allies.

The issue, so far as concerns the other names on the two tickets, indicates that Dr. Talmage's suggestion as to scratching was adopted. Voters appear to have selected their men for their personal characteristics, rather than for their political denomination.

The Coming Presidential Election will Probably be materially affected by the issue of the New York contest. Mr. Tilden was supposed to have strong claims on his party for the Presidential nomination—claims which many politicians believed it would be dangerous to ignore. The defeat in New York may have the effect of setting aside those claims; a political leader so blind as to conduct his party, in his own State, into a ditch, can scarcely hope to be trusted in the larger issue. As Mr. Tilden is unquestionably the weakest candidate the Democratic party could nominate, any blunder which relieves it of his claims will doubtless be regarded with complacency. If the Democratic Convention is now free to nominate as its candidate the best man at its disposal, and can select a man of integrity and ability, the privilege is cheaply purchased by the loss for one term of the governorship of New York. In thus committing political suicide, Mr. Tilden may have unintentionally rendered his party the most valuable service in his power.

Thanksgiving Day.—A Proclamation by the President recommends Thursday, November 27th, as the day of national thanksgiving for national mercies. President Hayes truly says:

"At no recurrence of the season which the devout habit of a religious people has made the occasion for giving thanks to Almighty God and humbly invoking His continued favor, has the material prosperity enjoyed by our whole country been more conspicuous, more manifold, or more universal. During the past year also unbroken peace with all foreign nations, the general prevalence of domestic tranquillity, the supremacy and security of the great institutions of civil and religious freedom, have gladdened the hearts of our people and confirmed their attachment to their Government, which the wisdom and courage of our ancestors so fitly framed, and the wisdom and courage of their descendants have so firmly maintained, to be the habitation of liberty and justice for successive generations."

The blessings of God on this favored land demand that both in word and deed we should individually evince our gratitude to God, and the plentiful harvest and revival of trade render our like acknowledgment as a nation this year more than usually appropriate.

A Prayer Meeting at an Election is an Unusual feature of those periods of political excitement. But the recent election furnished a remarkable instance of the value of prayer, and shows that even in political matters it is well that our "requests be made known unto God" (Phil. 4 : 6). Temperance legislation has been the subject of much work and anxiety in Stamford, Connecticut, and on the result of the late election depended the question of the possibility of needed reforms being effected. The election was closely contested, and on the day of the polling two thousand ladies gathered together, and, led by a Christian minister, observed the day as a day of prayer for the success of the candidates pledged to temperance principles.

It is scarcely necessary to add that the candidates so prayed for were triumphantly elected.

Collision of an Ocean Steamer with an Iceberg.—The Arizona, the new steamer of the Guion line, whose rapid trips from New York to Liverpool have surpassed the speed of every vessel afloat, came near being wrecked on Friday night, November 7th. It was a clear night, and the Arizona had made an excellent passage. She was off the Banks of Newfoundland, having left New York on Tuesday, November 4th. The captain had gone below, and the 300 passengers on board were distributed on the deck and in the cabin, congratulating each other on the pleasant passage they were having. Suddenly a shock was felt which threw every one off their feet. The captain rushed on deck and found the bows of the vessel crushed in by an iceberg right ahead of him. For some minutes terror took possession of all, and the boats were got ready to be lowered. Meanwhile the captain went below and found that the water-tight bulkheads with which the vessel was fitted were closed and kept out the rush of water from the hull. After laying to for a time, it was decided to put in to St. Johns, Newfoundland, for repairs. As she entered the port crowds of hardy sailors gathered during the day to gaze on the awful breach made by the collision, and all are agreed that never another ship had such an escape.

The passengers and crew speak of the few minutes during which it was uncertain whether the ship was sinking, as a time of "supreme terror,' but the captain's report tranquillized their minds and gradually they returned to the saloon When they were all assembled the Rev. J. M Ross rose and in a few feeling words suggeste that prayers should be offered to God in thank for the mercy He had so graciously shown Hardly had the suggestion been uttered whe the assembled passengers knelt and joined in appropriate prayer. Then the hymn, "Prais God from whom all blessings flow," was sun with impressive earnestness. Heartfelt sob mingled with the chant, and tears stood i strong men's eyes.

No. 1500 is the Unusual Title under whic Mr. Spurgeon's sermon appears this week. Th sermon explains the title. We will only notic the faithfulness with which the Lord of heave and earth has kept His promise, "Them th honor me, I will honor." Twenty years ag very few persons would have had the faith t predict Mr. Spurgeon's career, although the might have been professed servants of the Go whose truth he was then setting forth with th unaffected earnestness of an ardent nature. H was made a butt of ridicule, a subject of mi representation, and a victim of malice. Th writer of these lines heard him called "a thief and "an impostor" by one who was a clerg man in holy orders, and who ought to have bee a brother in Christ.

Many of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons of that da are in type, and they meet the test laid down i 1 John 4 : 2, by setting forth with matchle plainness the central truth of the Bible, viz "that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh." In the impressibility of his youth, this man of G never swerved by a hair's breadth toward a of the abominations of modern latitudinarianis and now he stands on a pinnacle that bisho and archbishops aspire to in vain. Truly, "th is the Lord's doing, and it is marvellous in o eyes."

A Steamboat Collision Occurred at 3 o'clo Friday morning, November 7th, as the steam Champion, from New York, was rushing throu the water towards Charleston at the rate of t and a half knots an hour. The sea was qui and the stars were shining brightly overhe The passengers were asleep in their stateroo Suddenly the captain heard a shout from t deck: "A sail ahead!" He ran to the whee too late. With a terrific crash an iron sh named the Lady Octavia, struck the Champi on the starboard bow. The steamer filled, s tled, and plunged headforemost to the botto Of the sixteen passengers twelve were drow —all or most of them in their staterooms. the fifty-seven lives on board thirty-one w lost.

A Wife's Twenty Years' Pleading was Gra fully spoken of at a public meeting in New Y last week by her husband. He said that he always touched by the requests for prayer husbands. He had a wife, who for twe years had been praying for his conversion. months ago he, too, was led to Jesus. brother could hardly speak, such was his em tion. May such an instance encourage we souls, and lead them to hope that "in due s son they will reap if they faint not"!

Soul Conscious of its Need, and of the only S rce of Help.—On Wednesday, October 29th, a C istian gentleman, who had once led a dissi- d life, but who many years ago was rescued he grace of God, was walking along a street ew York, when, near a church he met a man asked him if Jesus Christ was preached in house. The man confessed himself a poor sinner, sick of self and sin. He was a dissi- d man, and had proved the fascinating pleas of the flesh to be bitter and deceptive apples odom—nothing but ashes. He spoke to the t man, as the latter soon told him. "I have there, my brother, and sunk lower than you issipation," said the speaker to the inquirer Gospel preaching. The latter doubted this, was convinced when the speaker told him he three times been the victim of delirium tre- s as part of the results of his dissipation. Th inquiring, sin-sick soul was directed to the Sa our of the lost, and it is hoped he found e in believing.

e Meetings of Messrs. Moody and Sankey leveland fully test the capacity of the hall, h seats 4000. Often, it is said, a room twice size could be filled. Many of the auditors e from the surrounding country. One train ntly brought in 1200 persons for the meet- The inquiry meetings are well attended.

ecial Services at Salem, Mass., are being under the leadership of Rev. George F. Pe ecost and Mr. George C. Stebbins, the gelists. The meetings have already been held weeks, and a very deep and wide interest ne truths of the Gospel has been created. Th e is a strong Unitarian and Universalist ment in proportion to the population in city. The evangelists have been fully aware is, and Mr. Pentecost's preaching has been ally directed to a thorough exposition ne doctrines of the New Testament, with a to awaken men from the infidelity which is so evalent.

e congregations have all been large, and for ast two Sunday evenings the floor of the spa- church where the preaching services are has been reserved for men, and on both oc- ns has been crowded, while hundreds of le, who could not gain admission, have gathered into an "overflow" meeting in djoining church, to listen to preaching by one of the pastors. Mr. John Curry, of on, a reformed rum-seller, is engaged in temperance work in connection with the ings, and the interest in this department is ening every day. Eight Evangelical churches nited in the work.

Association called the Christian Union has formed at Yale, composed of all students ested in the religious welfare of the college. designed to aid incoming students, and to ome the Christian members of the several es into closer association and fellowship.

e Effects of the Liquor Traffic in California.— the M. E. Preachers' Meeting on October Bishop Haven described the drinking cus- of some districts of California. He drew a picture of society. He said: "The effect e drinking customs there is an almost utter nce of piety or regard for the Sabbath. The general election will settle the sectional is- now before the country, and then the people make this temperance question the leading in politics." He declares that it is to be the tion for the next twenty-five or more years.

Unenviable Distinction.—Collector Knowles ports that Peoria City, Ill., paid the United s Government $1,130,129.78 as taxes on dis- spirits for the month of October. This is argest sum ever received by the Government a single district in a single month.

Clergyman's Loan to a Farmer was repaid e following singular manner, illustrating ext "Stormy wind fulfilling His word."

poor clergyman had lent a struggling far- a sum of money which was large compared his stipend, and it caused him some uneas- when he learned that, the times being so there was but little probability of the farmer ever being able to repay it. He had a considerable amount of good old timber on his glebe which he was not permitted to cut down, but if any was blown down, he might dispose of it. During the night in which he turned restlessly upon his bed because of his anxiety about his loan, a hurricane arose and blew down several fine trees, the sale of which brought him more money than he had lent to the farmer. He at once cancelled the note which the farmer had given him, remarking that God had repaid, and with compound interest too, the help which he had given to a Christian friend in trouble.

An Attempt to Control Public Schools by Roman Catholics has been frustrated at New Britain, Conn. An election has been held to decide whether to build a new public school-house or allow the Roman Catholics to furnish a building and control certain matters in the school. The interest in the election was strong. About nine tenths of the registered vote was polled. The result was a majority of 598 against the Catholic proposition; this in a total vote of 2285.

Speech Lost through Fright was suddenly recovered last week by a young lady at Peoria, Ill. In December last, Maggie Lehr was abducted from her home by some ruffians and carried into the woods. She was rescued by some respectable persons who happened to see her helpless condition. When she was conveyed back to her father's house it was discovered that the terror she had undergone had deprived her of the faculty of speech. From that time until Thursday last she was unable to utter any articulate sound. On that day some children sang some hymns in her hearing. She listened, and tried to reproduce the sounds. To her great joy, and that of her family, her voice, lost nine months before, returned to her as suddenly as she had lost it.

Eight Days in a Swamp.—About two weeks ago a widow named Avery, about 45 years old, left her home, near Salem, Wayne County, Pa., to visit a brother, living near the Lackawaxen River, in Pike County, Pa. While passing through a dense piece of woods in the western part of Lackawaxen Township, it being after dark, she lost her way, and wandered into Tinkwig Swamp, where she became fastened in the mire. When she found that she could not extricate herself, she called for help, but as no one lived within some distance her cries were not heard. Her struggling to free herself caused her to sink deeper and deeper in the mire in which she was caught. In this position she remained for eight days, with no food except bark from the bushes which grew within her reach. The water she drank she dipped from the bog with her hands. On the eighth day her moans were heard by a man who passed on a shooting excursion. He obtained help and rescued her just in time to save her life.

So do sinners sink in Satan's swamp, and while they attempt to extricate themselves only sink deeper in the mire. But the cry of faith to the Great Deliverer always brings the needed help.

The Tide of Mormon Immigration Continues to flow to Utah, in spite of the warnings issued. By the Guion steamship Arizona, which arrived from Liverpool on Monday, October 27th, came 213 Mormon immigrants and eleven Mormon missionaries, who had been at work in Great Britain, on the Continent and in Germany for nearly two years. Most of the Mormons were in families, the majority being mechanics in various trades, with a few farmers. They came in about equal divisions from Scotland, Wales, England, and the Scandinavian countries.

The Baptists of the State of New York have just held their Pastors' Conference and Missionary Convention at Rochester. The meetings throughout were very large. They represented every section of the State, and were of unusual interest. The Missionary Convention never before held so interesting a meeting. Sixty-one missionaries, it was stated, had been employed and $9424.44 expended. A deficiency of about $1650 was more than made up in a short time.

LIFTING UP THE BRAZEN SERPENT.

A New Sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

The Fifteen Hundredth he has Published.

"And Moses made a serpent of brass, and put it upon a pole, and it came to pass, that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass he lived."—NUMBERS 21 : 9.

The Types in the New Testament—I. The Persons in Mortal Peril—1. They had Despised God's Way and God's Bread—2. They had been actually Bitten—Death of a Snake-keeper in London—3. The Bite was Painful—4. The Bite was Mortal—5. The Remedy Unlimited by Time—II. The Remedy Provided—1. Divine in Its Origin—2. Exceedingly Instructive—3. The Only Remedy—4. Bright and Lustrous—5. An Enduring Remedy—III. The Application of the Remedy—Very Simple—Very Personal—Very Instructive—IV. The Cure Effected—1. It Healed at Once—2. It Healed Again and Again—3. It Healed All—V. A Lesson for those who Love the Lord.

THIS discourse, when it shall be printed, will make fifteen hundred of my sermons which have been published regularly week by week. This is certainly a remarkable fact. I do not know of any instance in modern times in which fifteen hundred sermons have thus followed each other from the press from one person, and have continued to command a large circle of readers.

I desire to utter most hearty thanksgivings to God for divine help in thinking out and uttering these sermons,—sermons which have not merely been printed, but have been read with eagerness, and have also been translated into foreign tongues; sermons which are publicly read on this very Sabbath day in hundreds of places where a minister cannot be found; sermons which God has blessed to the conversion of multitudes of souls. I may and I must joy and rejoice in this great blessing, which I most heartily ascribe to the undeserved favor of the Lord.

I thought the best way in which I could express my thankfulness would be to preach Jesus Christ again, and set Him forth in a sermon in which the simple Gospel should be made as clear as a child's alphabet. I hope that in closing the list of fifteen hundred discourses the Lord will give me a word which will be blessed more than any which have preceded it, to the conversion of those who hear it or read it. May those who sit in darkness because they do not understand the freeness of salvation and the easy method by which it may be obtained, be brought into the light by discovering the way of peace through believing in Christ Jesus! Forgive this prelude; my thankfulness would not permit me to withhold it.

Concerning our text and the serpent of brass. If you turn to John's Gospel you will notice that its commencement contains a sort of orderly list of types taken from Holy Scripture. It begins with the creation. God said, "Let there be light," and John begins by declaring that Jesus, the eternal Word, is "the true light, which lighteth every man that cometh into the world." Before he closes his first chapter John has introduced a type supplied by Abel, for when the Baptist saw Jesus coming to him he said, "Behold the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world." Nor is the first chapter finished before we are reminded of Jacob's ladder, for we find our Lord declaring to Nathanael, "Hereafter ye shall see heaven open, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of man." By the time we have reached the third chapter we have come as far as Israel in the wilderness, and we read the joyful words, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of man be lifted up, that whosoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life."

We are going to speak of this act of Moses this morning, that we may all of us behold the brazen serpent and find the promise true, "every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon the brazen serpent, shall live,"

I. I shall invite you to consider the subject first by noticing the person in for whom the brazen serpent was made and lifted up. Our text saith, "It came to pass that if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass, he lived."

MORTAL PERIL

1. Let us notice that the fiery serpents first of all came among the people because they had despised God's way and God's bread. "The soul of the people was much discouraged because of the way." It was God's way, He had chosen it for them, and He had chosen it in wisdom and mercy, but they murmured at it. As an old divine says, "It was lonesome and longsome," but still it was God's way, and therefore it ought not to have been loathsome: His pillar of fire and cloud went before them, and His servants Moses and Aaron led them like a flock, and they ought to have followed cheerfully.

The people also quarrelled with God's food. He gave them the best of the best, for "men did eat angels' food;" but they called the manna by an opprobrious title, which in the Hebrew has a sound of ridicule about it, and even in our translation conveys the idea of contempt. They said "Our soul loatheth this light bread," as if they thought it unsubstantial, and only fitted to puff them out, because it was easy of digestion, and did not breed in them that heat of blood and tendency to disease which a heavier diet would have brought with it.

I may be speaking to some who have up to this moment quarrelled with the precepts and the doctrines of the Lord, and I would affectionately warn them that their disobedience and presumption will lead to sin and misery. Rebels against God are apt to wax worse and worse. The world's fashions and modes of thought lead on to the world's vices and crimes. If we long for the fruits of Egypt, we shall soon feel the serpents of Egypt. The natural consequence of turning against God like serpents is to find serpents waylaying our path. If we forsake the Lord in spirit, or in doctrine, temptation will lurk in our path and sin will sting our feet.

2. I beg you carefully to observe concerning those persons for whom the brazen serpent was specially lifted up, that they had been actually bitten by the serpents. The Lord sent fiery serpents among them, but it was not the serpents being among them that involved the lifting up of a brazen serpent: it was the serpents having actually poisoned them which led to the provision of a remedy. "It shall come to pass that every one that is bitten, when he looketh upon it, shall live." The only people who did look and derive benefit from the wonderful cure uplifted in the midst of the camp were those who had been stung by the vipers.

The common notion is that salvation is for good people, salvation is for those who fight against temptation, salvation is for the spiritually healthy; but how different is God's Word! God's medicine is for the sick, and His healing is for the diseased. The grace of God through the atonement of our Lord Jesus Christ is for men who are actually and really guilty. We do not preach a sentimental salvation from fancied guilt, but real and true pardon for actual offences. I care nothing for sham sinners: you who never did any thing wrong, you who are so good in yourselves that you are all right—I leave you, for I am sent to preach Christ to those who are full of sin, and worthy of eternal wrath. The serpent of brass was a remedy for those who had been bitten.

What an awful thing it is to be bitten by a serpent! I dare say some of you recollect one of the keepers of the reptiles in the Zoological Gardens. It happened in October, 1852, and therefore some of you will remember it. This unhappy man was about to part with a friend who was going to Australia, and according to the wont of many, he must needs drink with him. He drank considerable quantities of gin, and though he would probably have been in a great passion if any one had called him drunk, yet reason and common-sense had evidently become overpowered.

THE CASE OF GURLING,

He went back to his post at the gardens in an excited state. He had some months before seen an exhibition of snake-charming, and this was on his poor muddled brain. He must emulate the Egyptians, and play with serpents. First he took out of its cage a Morocco venom snake, put it round his neck, twisted it about, and whirled it round about him. Happily for him it did not arouse itself so as to bite. The assistant-keeper cried out, "For God's sake put back the snake," but the foolish man replied, "I am inspired." Putting back the venom-snake, he exclaimed, "Now for the cobra."

This deadly serpent was somewhat torpid with the cold of the previous night, and therefore the rash man placed it in his bosom till it revived, and glided down ward till its head appeared below the back of his waistcoat. He took it by the body, about a foot from the head, and then seized it lower down by the other hand, intending to hold it by the tail and swing it round his head. He held it for an instant opposite to his face, and like a flash of lightning the serpent struck him between the eyes. The blood streamed down his face, and he called for help, but his companion fled in horror; and, as he told the jury, he did not know how long he was gone, for he was "in a maze."

When assistance arrived, Gurling was sitting on a chair, having restored the cobra to its place. He said, "I am a dead man." They put him in a cab, and took him to the hospital. First his speech went, he could only point to his poor throat and moan; then his vision failed him, and lastly his hearing. His pulse gradually sank, and in one hour from the time at which he had been struck he was a corpse. There was only a little mark upon the bridge of his nose, but the poison spread over the body, and he was a dead man.

I tell you that story that you may use it as a parable, and learn never to play with sin, and also in order to bring vividly before you what it is to be bitten by a serpent. Suppose that Gurling could have been cured by looking at a piece of brass, would it not have been good news for him? There was no remedy for that poor infatuated creature, but there is a remedy for you. For men who have been bitten by the fiery serpents of sin Jesus Christ is lifted up: not for you only who are as yet playing with the serpent, not for you only who have warmed it in your bosom, and felt it creeping over your flesh, but for you who are actually bitten, and are mortally wounded. If any man be bitten so that he has become diseased with sin, and feels the deadly venom in his blood, it is for him that Jesus is set forth to-day. Though he may think himself to be an extreme case, it is for such that sovereign grace provides a remedy.

3. The bite of the serpent was painful. We are told in the text that these serpents were "fiery" serpents, which may perhaps refer to their color, but more probably has reference to the burning effects of their venom. It heated and inflamed the blood so that every vein became a boiling river, swollen with anguish.

In some men that poison of asps which we call sin has inflamed their minds. They are restless, discontented, and full of fear and anguish. They write their own damnation, they are sure that they are lost, they refuse all tidings of hope. You cannot get them to give a cool and sober hearing to the message of grace. Sin works in them such terror that they give themselves over as dead men. They are in their own apprehension, as David says, "free among the dead, like the slain that lie in the grave, whom God remembers no more."

It was for men bitten by the fiery serpents that the brazen serpent was lifted up, and it is for men actually envenomed by sin that Jesus is preached. Jesus died for such as are at their wits' end: for such as cannot think straight, for those who are tumbled up and down in their minds, for those who are condemned already—for such was the Son of man lifted up upon the cross. What a comfortable thing that we a able to tell you this.

4. The bite of these serpents was, as I have t you, mortal. The Israelites could have no que tion about that, because in their own presen "much people of Israel died." They saw th own friends die of the snake-bite, and th helped to bury them. They knew why th died, and were sure that it was because the ven of the fiery serpents was in their veins. Th were left without an excuse for imagining t they could be bitten and yet live.

Our Lord Jesus speaks of the condemned ing away into everlasting punishment, wh there shall be weeping, and wailing, and gna ing of teeth. We ought to have no do about this, and the most of those who prof to doubt it are those who fear that it will their own portion, who know that they are ing down to eternal woe themselves, and the fore try to shut their eyes to their inevita doom. Alas, that they should find flatterer the pulpit who pander to their love of sin piping to the same tune! We are not of t order. We believe in what the Lord has in all its solemnity of dread, and, knowing terrors of the Lord, we persuade men to esc therefrom. But it was for men who had end the mortal bite, for men upon whose pallid f death began to set his seal, for men whose v were burning with the awful poison of the pent within them—for them it was that God to Moses, "Make thee a fiery serpent, and it upon a pole: and it shall come to pass every one that is bitten, when he looketh u it, shall live."

5. There is no limit set to the stage of po ing: however far gone, the remedy still power. If a person had been bitten a mo before, though he only saw a few drops of b oozing forth, and only felt a little smart might look and live, and if he had waited, happily waited, even for half an hour, and sp failed him, and the pulse grew feeble, yet could but look he would live at once. No b was set to the virtue of this divinely orda remedy, or to the freedom of its applicatio those who needed it. The promise had no ifying clause,—"It shall come to pass that e one that is bitten, when he looketh upo shall live," and our text tells us that C promise came to pass in every case, withou ception, for we read, "It came to pass th a serpent had bitten any man, when he be the serpent of brass, he lived." Thus, th have described the person who was in m peril.

II. Secondly, let us consider

THE REMEDY PROVIDED

for him. This was as singular as it was effe

1. It was purely of divine origin, and it is that the invention of it, and the puttin power into it, was entirely of God. Men prescribed several fomentations, decoctions operations for serpent bites: I do not how far any of them may be depended upor this I know—I would rather not be bitt order to try any of them, even those tha most in vogue. For the bites of the fier pents in the wilderness there was no re whatever, except this which God had prov and at first sight that remedy must have se to be a very unlikely one. A simple look figure of a serpent on a pole—how unlik avail! How and by what means could be wrought through merely looking at tw brass?

It seemed indeed to be almost a mock bid men look at the very thing which had c their misery. Shall the bite of a serpe cured by looking at a serpent? Shall which brings death also bring life? But l lay the excellency of the remedy, that it divine origin; for when God ordains a cu is by that very fact bound to put potenc it.

2. This particular remedy of a serpent on a pole was exceedingly instructive, the do not suppose that Israel understood it.

en taught by our Lord and know the . It was a serpent impaled upon a pole. would take a sharp pole and drive it a serpent's head to kill it, so this brazen was exhibited as killed, and hung up as fore all eyes. It was the image of a dead ke oler of wonders that our Lord Jesus condescend to be symbolized by a dead . The instruction to us after reading Gospel is this: our Lord Jesus Christ, in humiliation, deigned to come into the and to be made a curse for us. The bra- spent had no venom of itself, but it took n of a fiery serpent. Christ is no sinner, him is no sin. But the brazen serpent the form of a serpent; and so was Jesus rth by God "in the likeness of sinful He came under the law, and sin was im- o Him, and therefore He came under the nd curse of God for our sakes.

ease to recollect that in all the camp of here was but one remedy for serpent-bite, at was the brazen serpent; and there was e brazen serpent, not two. Israel might ake another. If they had made a second d have had no effect: there was one, and e, and that was lifted high in the centre camp, that if any man was bitten by a ser- e might look to it and live. There is one r, and only one. There is none other given under heaven among men whereby st be saved. All grace is concentrated in of whom we read, "It pleased the Father Him should all fulness dwell." Christ's g the curse and ending the curse, Christ's slain by sin and destroying sin, Christ d as to His heel by the old serpent, but ng the serpent's head,—it is Christ alone e must look to if we would live. O sinner! o Jesus on the cross, for He is the one y for all forms of sin's poisoned wounds.

here was but one healing serpent, and ne was bright and lustrous. It was a ser- of brass, and brass is a shining metal. was newly-made brass, and therefore not ed, and whenever the sun shone, there d forth a brightness from this brazen ser- It might have been a serpent of wood or other metal, if God had so ordained: but mmanded that it must be of brass, that it have a brightness about it. What a tness there is about our Lord Jesus Christ! do but exhibit Him in His own true metal lustrous in the eyes of men.

Once more, this remedy was an enduring It was a serpent of brass, and I suppose it ined in the midst of the camp from that forward. There was no use for it after Is- entered Canaan, but, as long as they were e wilderness, it was probably exhibited in entre of the camp, hard by the tabernacle upon a lofty standard Aloft, and open to aze of all, hung this image of a dead snake perpetual cure for serpent venom. Had it made of other materials it might have been en, or have decayed, but a serpent of brass d last as long as fiery serpents pestered the rt camp. As long as there was a man bit- here was the serpent of brass to heal him. t a comfort is this, that Jesus is still able ave to the uttermost all that come to God Him, seeing He ever liveth to make interces- for them. The dying thief beheld the htness of that serpent of brass as he saw s hanging at his side, and it saved him; so may you and I look and live, for He is sus Christ, the same yesterday, to-day, and ver."

hope I do not overlay my subject by these res. I wish not to do so, but to make it very n to you. All you that are really guilty, all who are bitten by the serpent, the sure rem- for you is to look to Jesus Christ, who took sin upon Himself, and died in the sinner's d, "being made sin for us, that we might be le the righteousness of God in Him." Your y remedy lies in Christ, and nowhere else. ok unto Him and be ye saved.

III. This brings us, in the third place, to consider or the link between the serpent-bitten man and the brass serpent which was to heal him. What was the link? It was of the most simple kind imaginable. The brazen serpent might have been, if God had so ordered it, carried into the house where the sick man was, but it was not so. It might have been applied to him by rubbing: he might have been expected to repeat a certain form of prayer, or to have a priest present to perform a ceremony, but there was nothing of the kind; he had only to look.

THE APPLICATION OF THE REMEDY,

It was well that the cure was so simple, for the danger was so frequent. Bites of the serpent came in many ways: a man might be gathering sticks, or merely walking along, and be bitten. Even now in the desert serpents are a danger. Mr. Sibree says that on one occasion he saw what he thought to be a round stone, beautifully marked. He put forth his hand to take it up, when to his horror he discovered that it was a coiled-up living serpent. All the day long when fiery serpents were sent among them the Israelites must have been in danger. In their beds and at their meals, in their houses and when they went abroad, they were in danger.

These serpents are called by Isaiah "flying serpents," not because they do fly, but because they contract themselves and then suddenly spring up, so as to reach to a considerable height, and a man might be well buskined and yet not be beyond the reach of one of these malignant reptiles. What was a man to do? He had nothing to do but to stand outside his tent door, and look to the place where gleamed afar the brightness of the serpent of brass, and the moment he looked he was healed. He had nothing to do but to look,—no priest was wanted, no holy water, no hocus-pocus, no mass-book, nothing but a look.

A Romish bishop said to one of the early reformers, when he preached salvation by simple faith, "O Mr. Doctor! open that gap to the people and we are undone." And so indeed they are, for the business and trade of priestcraft are ended forever if men may simply trust Jesus and live. Yet it is even so. Believe in Him, ye sinners, for this is the spiritual meaning of looking, and at once your sin is forgiven, and what perhaps is more, its deadly power ceases to operate within your spirit. There is life in a look at Jesus; is not this simple enough?

But please to notice how very personal it was. A man could not be cured by any thing anybody else could do for him. If he had been bitten by the serpent and had refused to look to the serpent of brass, and had gone to his bed, no physician could help him. A pious mother might kneel down and pray for him, but it would be of no use. Sisters might come in and plead, ministers might be called in to pray that the man might live; but he must die despite their prayers if he did not look. There was only one hope for his life—he must look to that serpent of brass. It is just so with you. Some of you have written to me begging me to pray for you: so I have, but it avails nothing unless you yourselves believe in Jesus Christ. There is not beneath the copes of heaven, nor in heaven, any hope for any one of you unless you will believe in Jesus Christ. Whoever you may be, however much bitten of the serpent, and however near to die, if you will look to the Saviour you shall live; but if you will not do this you must be damned, as surely as you live.

At the last great day I must bear witness against you that I have told you this straight out and plainly. "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved: he that believeth not shall be damned." There is no help for it; you may do what you will, join what church you please, take the Lord's Supper, be baptized, go through severe penances, or give all your goods to feed the poor, but you are a lost man unless you look to Jesus, for this is the one remedy; and even Jesus Christ Himself cannot, will not, save you unless you look to Him. There is nothing in His death to save you, there is nothing in His life to save you, unless you will trust Him. It has come to this, you must look, and look for yourself.

And then, again, it is very instructive. This looking, what did it mean? It meant this—self-help must be abandoned, and God must be trusted. The wounded man would say, "I must not sit here and look at my wound, for that will not save me. See there where the serpent struck me, the blood is oozing forth, black with the venom! How it burns and swells! My very heart is failing. But all these reflections will not ease me. I must look away from this to the uplifted serpent of brass." It is idle to look anywhere except to God's one ordained remedy. The Israelites must have understood as much as this, that God requires us to trust Him, and to use His means of salvation. We must do as He bids us, and trust in Him to work our cure; and if we will not do this we shall die eternally.

This way of curing was intended that they might magnify the love of God, and attribute their healing entirely to divine grace. The brazen serpent was not merely a picture, as I have shown you, of God's putting away sin by spending His wrath upon His Son, but it was a display of divine love. And this I know because Jesus Himself said, "As Moses lifted up the serpent in the wilderness, even so must the Son of Man be lifted up. For God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son:" plainly saying that the death of Christ upon the cross was an exhibition of God's love to men; and whosoever looks to that grandest display of God's love to man, namely, His giving His only begotten Son to become a curse for us, shall surely live.

Now, when a man was healed by looking at the serpent he could not say that he healed himself; for he only looked, and there is no virtue in a look. A believer never claims merit or honor on account of his faith. Faith is a self-denying grace, and never dares to boast. Where is the great credit of simply believing the truth, and humbly trusting Christ to save you? Faith glorifies God, and so our Lord has chosen it as the means of our salvation. If a priest had come and touched the bitten man he might have ascribed some honor to the priest; but when there was no priest in the case, when there was nothing except looking to that brazen serpent, the man was driven to the conclusion that God's love and power had healed him. I am not saved by any thing that I have done, but by what the Lord has done. To that conclusion God will have us all come; we must all confess that if saved it is by His free, rich, sovereign, undeserved grace displayed in the person of His dear Son.

IV. Allow me one moment upon the fourth head, which is

THE CURE EFFECTED.

1. We are told in the text that "if a serpent had bitten any man, when he beheld the serpent of brass he lived;" that is to say, he was healed at once. He had not to wait five minutes, nor five seconds. Dear hearer, did you ever hear this before? If you have not, it may startle you, but it is true. If you have lived in the blackest sin that is possible up to this very moment, yet if you will now believe in Jesus Christ you shall be saved before the clock ticks another time. It is done like a flash of lightning; pardon is not a work of time.

Sanctification needs a lifetime, but justification needs no more than a moment. Thou believest, thou livest. Thou dost trust to Christ, thy sins are gone, thou art a saved man the instant thou believest. "Oh!" saith one, "that is a wonder." It is a wonder, and will remain a wonder to all eternity. Our Lord's miracles when He was on earth were mostly instantaneous. He touched them, and the fevered ones were able to sit up and minister to Him. No doctor can cure a fever in that fashion, for there is a resultant weakness left after the heat of the fever is abated. Jesus works perfect cures, and whosoever believeth in Him, though he hath only believed one minute, is justified from all his sins. Oh the matchless grace of God!

2. This remedy healed again and again. Very possibly after a man had been healed he might go back to his work, and be attacked by a second serpent, for there were broods of them about. What had he to do? Why, to look again, and if he was wounded a thousand times he must look a thousand times. You, dear child of God, if you have sin on your conscience, look to Jesus. The healthiest way of living where serpents swarm is never to take your eye off the brazen serpent at all. Ah! ye vipers, ye may bite if ye will; as long as my eye is upon the brazen serpent I defy your fangs and poison-bags, for I have a continual remedy at work within me. Temptation is overcome by the blood of Jesus. "This is the victory which overcometh the world, even our faith."

3. This cure was of universal efficacy to all who used it. There was not one case in all the camp of a man that looked to the serpent of brass and yet died, and there never will be a case of a man that looks to Jesus who remains under condemnation. The believer must be saved. Some of the people had to look from a long distance. The pole could not be equally near to everybody, but so long as they could see the serpent it healed those that were afar off as well as those who were nigh. Nor did it matter if their eyes were feeble. All eyes were not alike keen; and some may have had a squint, or a dimness of vision, or only one eye, but if they did but look they lived.

Perhaps the man could hardly make out the shape of the serpent as he looked. "Ah!" he said to himself, "I cannot discern the coils of the brazen snake, but I can see the shining of the brass;" and he lived. O poor soul! if thou canst not see the whole of Christ nor all His beauties, nor all the riches of His grace, yet if thou canst but see Him who was made sin for us thou shalt live. If thou sayest, "Lord, I believe, help Thou mine unbelief," thy faith will save thee; a little faith will give thee a great Christ, and thou shalt find eternal life in Him.

It is a pleasant thought that if they looked to that brazen serpent by any kind of light they lived. Many beheld it in the glare of noon, and saw its shining coils, and lived; but I should not wonder that some were bitten at night, and by the moonlight they drew near and looked up and lived. Perhaps it was a dark and stormy night, and not a star was visible. The tempest crashed overhead, and from the murky cloud out flashed the lightning, cleaving the rocks asunder. By the glare of that sudden flame the dying man made out the brazen serpent, and though he saw but for a moment yet he lived. So, sinner, if your soul is wrapped in tempest, and if from out the cloud there comes but one single flash of light, look to Jesus Christ by it and you shall live.

Thus I have tried to describe the cure. Oh that the Lord would work that cure in every sinner here at this moment! I do pray He may.

V. I close with this last matter of consideration: here is a lesson for THOSE WHO LOVE THEIR LORD.

What ought we to do? We should imitate Moses, whose business it was to set the brazen serpent upon a pole. It is your business and mine to lift up the Gospel of Christ Jesus, so that all may see it. All Moses had to do was to hang up the brazen serpent in the sight of all. He did not say, "Aaron, bring your censer, and bring with you a score of priests, and make a perfumed cloud." Nor did he say, "I myself will go forth in my robes as lawgiver, and stand there." No, he had nothing to do that was pompous or ceremonial; he had but to exhibit the brass serpent and leave it naked and open to the gaze of all. He did not say, "Aaron, bring hither a cloth of gold, wrap up the serpent in blue and scarlet and fine linen." Such an act would have been clean contrary to his orders.

He was to keep the serpent unveiled. Its power lay in itself, and not in its surroundings. The Lord did not tell him to paint the pole, or to deck it with the colors of the rainbow. Oh no. Any pole would do. The dying ones did not want to see the pole, they only needed to behold the serpent. I dare say he would make a neat pole, for God's work should be done decently, but still the serpent was the sole thing to look at.

This is what we have to do with our Lord. We must preach Him, teach Him, and make Him visible to all. We must not conceal Him by our attempts at eloquence and learning. We must have done with the polished lancewood pole of fine speech, and those bits of scarlet and blue, in the form of grand sentences and poetic periods. Every thing must be done that Christ may be seen, and nothing must be allowed which hides Him. Moses may go home and go to bed when the serpent is once uplifted. All that is wanted is that the brazen serpent should be within view both by day and night. The preacher may hide himself, so that nobody may know who he is, for if he has set forth Christ he is best out of the way.

Now, you teachers, teach your children Jesus. Show them Christ crucified. Keep Christ before them. You young men that try to preach, do not attempt to do it grandly. The true grandeur of preaching is for Christ to be grandly displayed in it. No other grandeur is wanted. Keep self in the background, but set forth Jesus Christ among the people, evidently crucified among them. None but Jesus, none but Jesus. Let Him be the sum and substance of all your teaching.

Some of you have looked to the brazen serpent, I know, and you have been healed, but what have you done with the brazen serpent since? You have not come forward to confess your faith and join the church. You have not spoken to any one about his soul. You put the brazen serpent into a chest and hide it away. Is this right? Bring it out, and set it on a pole. Publish Christ and His salvation. He was never meant to be treated as a curiosity in a museum; He is intended to be exhibited in the highways that those who are sin-bitten may look at Him.

"But I have no proper pole," says one. The best sort of pole to exhibit Christ upon is a high one, so that He may be seen the farther. Exalt Jesus. Speak well of His name. I do not know any other virtue that there can be in the pole but its height. The more you can speak in your Lord's praise, the higher you can lift Him up the better, but for all other styles of speech there is nothing to be said. Do lift Christ up. "Oh!" says one, "but I have not a long standard." Then lift Him up on such as you have, for there are short people about who will be able to see by your means.

I think I told you once of a picture which I saw of the brazen serpent. I want the Sunday-school teachers to listen to this. The artist represented all sorts of people clustering round the pole, and as they looked the horrible snakes dropped off their arms, and they lived. There was such a crowd around the pole that a mother could not get near it. She carried a little babe, which a serpent had bitten. You could see the blue marks of the venom. As she could get no nearer, the mother held her child aloft, and turned its little head that it might gaze with its infant eye upon the brazen serpent and live. Do this with your little children, you Sunday-school teachers. Even while they are yet little, pray that they may look to Jesus Christ and live; for there is no bound set to their age.

Old men snake-bitten came hobbling on their crutches. "Eighty years old am I," saith one, "but I have looked to the brazen serpent, and I am healed." Little boys were brought out by their mothers, though as yet they could hardly speak plainly, and they cried in child language, "I look at the great snake and it bless me." All ranks, and sexes, and characters, and dispositions looked and lived. Who will look to Jesus at this good hour? Oh, dear souls, will you have life or no? Will you despise Christ and perish? If so, your blood be on your own skirts. I have told you God's way of salvation, lay hold on it. Look to Jesus at once. May His Spirit gently lead you so to do, Amen.

MODERN REJECTION OF SOUND D TRINE.

An Address by Dr. Mackay, of Hull, Englan

The Popular Error that the World is to be verted before Christ Comes—How I was vinced of this Error—Three Fourths of the pel Seed Unfruitful—The Wheat-tare Field the Net—Sound Doctrine not now Endur
God's Righteous Judgments—Man's Failu
Tyndall's Mistake, etc.

THE "State of the World at the Return of Lord Jesus" is our subject this morning. cannot disguise the fact that Prophecy is loo at very differently by different classes of Cl tians; for it is with them I have to do, and their thoughts about the matter. Some Cl tians say, "There are so many mysteries difficulties about the future that I cannot un stand much about it, and so I don't me with them at all." They tell you they do study these things, and cannot see their wa all.

But wait a little, and see if they never into the future. They will say, "The Gosp to go on converting the world." You see make up a future; and the very best way to c from being prophets is to take God's Word f and see what God says. And the safest and future is the future that God has reve Therefore, not merely being content with ting "acceptance and forgiveness," let us g "in all wisdom and prudence" to know mystery of His will"—the wisdom of God cerning not the present dispensation merely the dispensation that is to wind up all ar gather up in Christ all things that are in he and earth.

I speak now as one who was brought t believe that the pre-millennial advent of C is very great heresy. I do not like the "second conversion," because it means e too little or too much. I do not believe in justifications or two regenerations; but respect to conversion from preconceived erro doctrine and practice we may have many versions, and the more the better. You not, therefore, misunderstand me if I speak sonally. After I knew the truth of God, forgiveness of sins and acceptance with H went on with the mistake, as an evangelist, it was by our own energy and faith and p that we should soon get Britain converted enemies cast down; and that we should ma it all without the Second Coming of Christ.

This went on till, about sixteen years ago, I pened to come up to London, and I shall forget that. I met some people in a par Christians who talked a good deal about things. I had to take the night express to burgh, where I was a student at the Unive I shall never forget it, for I was deliber whether I was to preach the Gospel or to pra medicine, and at that time I did not know to do. These friends were speaking abou ruin to close this dispensation, and the da Noah. I argued with them about the comi the Lord being death, and, as I thought, sil them, but not myself; and when I entere express train at King's Cross I thought these arguments, and I felt they did not s very well—that it would not do—and that it be that the Church is waiting for Christ to And this text came to me: "Turned to from idols, to serve the living and true God to wait for His Son from heaven." " heresy," I thought, but I got no sleep i train that night thinking over the subject.

I saw that

THE LINE OF TRUTH

was waiting for God's Son from heaven. I to my Bible when I got to Edinburgh, and whole week I took the texts of Scriptur asked myself this: Is the Second Coming Lord to be in a time of universal blessednes the whole earth to be brought to Christ's and no man dispute His sway from the le the greatest before His advent or after it? to come before or after the 1000 years of th lennium?

ould not find a text showing that Christ is d the world converted at His coming—not n the Old Testament or the New. So I round to another side, and I found the er Himself telling us that His kingdom was as a man sowing seed in a field and losing r cent of it—three seeds out of every four lost, the devil taking one, the world one, he flesh a third. And that was when the f Man was the Sower ; and what then can pect when we try sowing?

en He tells us that even among the success- owing the devil comes and sows tares ; so the kingdom of heaven is a wheat-tare field ned as a wheat field. That is what the lom of heaven is likened to. These two les in Matt. 13 are the only two that Christ ins ; the others are to be explained by these That is His kingdom while He is away—a t-tare field ; the sower deprived of three hs of his seed, and then the enemy mixing up with the remaining fourth.

en I find another illustration in the net ; and s to gather in, not the fulness, but a net As James said in Acts 15, "to take out a e for His name," and "an election of ." Then Christ tells us, in passages that been brought before us, that His coming be "as in the days of Noah"—not, you see, e of blessing. Then He says, "When the of Man comes, shall He find faith on the ?" Faith is to be so scarce, and man so un- ving, that they will not endure sound doc-ever there was a time when this was true it is. People want nice doctrine, not sound ine. They want to sit in a seat very com- oly, and if preachers can put the thing nice- ld tickle their ears, that is what they want. demand makes the supply, and so we find instead of teachers who will tell the truth, ave men who treat their congregation to they like best. But sound doctrine is what ant. It is not "First the beautiful, and the true," "First the true, and then the iful." It is first, "What hath God said?"

SOUND DOCTRINE.

n nowadays do not like to hear the old- oned doctrines of God's judgment ; they do elieve nowadays in an eternal hell ; they are g in every way to explain away the two words—"everlasting punishment"—and are only two ways, either by explaining the noun or the adjective. They say the asting is age-ending, and punishment is ceas- o exist. The Annihilationist and Universal- nnot endure the sound doctrine.

eel this is an age when we have to contend estly for such truth ; and at the risk of leav- ny subject to a certain extent, I would sound e of warning to younger students of God's d ; for fathers in Christ know better than to d away by such nonsense—better than to to explain away the just judgments and eous attributes of our holy God under the xt of magnifying His grace and love. Was t the disciple who used to feel the throb- s of His heart, and who told us that "grace truth came by Jesus Christ?" was not he ne chosen to write the most awful book of n—judgment beginning at the house of a judgment that spares not the churches, a e who walks in the midst of the seven gold- ndlesticks, with glorious majesty ushering is kingdom of righteousness and truth?

is the judgment of God and the justice of which show us what a God we have got. at the Polytheism of Greece and Rome ; at the ideal deities of exaggerated lust and gerated sin! Bacchus, for instance. Man d that his passions led him to get drunk, so he made a god of drunkenness, and made of other human passions.

t the God of Creation and Revelation is so , so perfectly holy, that we know what im- ty and sin are chiefly by contrast. We learn race to hate them, and mourn over them, we long for the time when we shall be satis- when we wake up after His likeness. And we know what holiness and purity are by knowing that God cannot tolerate one sin. He says that if a man offend in one point he is guilty of all. If His grace, His love, and His mercy are slighted, He must be, in the necessity of His nature, a God of judgment, inflicting punishment for such offences.

I saw that the Bible did not require cleverness, but faith ; hence I went and read my Bible like a fool, or, rather, like a little child, and asked what God had to say about it. I changed my by coming out of self and going into Christ. The ancients believed that every thing in the heavens went round the earth ; but true astronomy showed that this is just a very little globe going round the large sun. So, when a man is converted, he changes his centre about self ; instead of self, Christ becomes his centre.

THEOLOGICAL ASTRONOMY

Many people think that, because all the Bible is for us, so all the Bible is about us. That is making us the centre, and revolution revolving round us! But Christ must be the centre of our theology, and we shall then find every orb taking its right course, all revolving with the same perfection as stars around their centres. All will be in its right place. Gentile truth will not cross Jewish truth, but all will go round the centre, held in the same grasp of a wondrous God!

The history of the Bible is a history of the failure of man, and the shining out of the perfection of the grace and purposes of God. Man, to begin with, cannot bring in the millennium. He gave up God for an apple ; and although started holy and pure, he soon degenerated. We believe in development ; but this development is all the wrong way. All the ideas of development which the scalpel and the microscope reveal have nothing to do with the Bible. We listen with respect to a scientific man on a scientific subject, but he makes a terrible mess when he comes here among spiritual things.

MAN WAS LEFT TO HIS CONSCIENCE ;

and a pretty mess he made of it! "Every imagination of the thought of man's heart was only evil"—very unlike a millennium! And then when God sent His Son, man exclaimed, "This is the Heir ; come, let us kill Him." We all speak of the failure of Judaism ; but we do not like to hear about our own failure.

In II Thessalonians 2, we are told that Christ, at His Second Coming, will destroy Antichrist, the lawless one. If we do not accept the position that Christ comes at the end of a time of failure, we are on the horns of a dilemma. Either Antichrist goes right through the millennium and to the end of it—a sorry millennium indeed!—or there is no text which tells us that Christ will come to destroy Antichrist.

But we believe that Christ comes to set all right, and put all evil away. I saw a statement by Professor Tyndall at Birmingham lately. He says that the beautiful anthem. "Peace on earth, good-will to men," was not sung at all by angelic hosts ; it was simply putting into a dramatic form the higher aspirations of all time that there should be peace on earth. But I won't accept this explanation. The Heir of this earth's throne has been taken, and by wicked hands crucified and slain, but His plans of universal peace are only postponed until He comes back in judgment, and puts down all rule and all opposition, and lets the world know what it has done in its wicked treatment of the Son of Man. We look not too much at the Atonement, but not enough at the other side. There cannot be peace until judgment has taken place. Then comes the evangelizing of the world.

Did you ever read the next verse to that which foretells that Christ "shall have the heathen for His inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for His possession?" (Psalm 2.) It goes on to say, "He shall break them with a rod of iron, and dash them in pieces like a potter's vessel"—execute judgment upon them. And this will be, then, the state of the earth : "The kings of the earth take counsel together against the Lord and against His Anointed, saying, Let us cast away their cords from us!" It is a very solemn word, "He that sits in the heavens shall laugh." I do not know that it is ever spoken of God anywhere else ; but at the impotence of setting up their power against His, "He shall laugh, He shall hold them in derision!"

I believe that the idea that there is to be a large and universal conversion has been the greatest marring of missionary evangelization. I have been told that my view of the Lord's speedy coming would stultify all missionary efforts ; but I see that the men who advocate these second advent views are most active ; and it is very easily explained. We should just sit down in despair if we expected the entire conversion of the world in the present dispensation. We have not yet succeeded in that in Hull, and I don't think you have succeeded in London. Our concern must be to be God's witnesses in the midst of abounding iniquity, "to take out an elect, a people for His name."

There is a good deal in the Bible about the Jews. "What is that to us?" say some. "Having food and raiment, let us be therewith content." Such Christians do not get into the old corn of the land. This is studying God for myself, and not God for His own sake, and truth for its own sake, and the ways, and times, and thoughts of God simply because God has revealed them. Oh, study the glorious coming of the King, who shall appear to put down all rule and all authority—to set all things right and introduce the day of His glorious reign.

A TRAVELLER STOPPED BY A PRESENTIMENT.

THE following authentic instance of divine direction is furnished by the son of the minister concerned in it, who often heard his father relate the circumstance.

Mr. R., a faithful minister of the Gospel as well as a merchant, some few years before railroads were known left his native village for the city of P—— to make his usual purchases of goods. The distance of about one hundred miles was then accomplished in two days' travel by stage coaches. When near the end of the second day, some twelve or fifteen miles from the city, he became impressed with the thought that he would not reach his destination that day.

He tried to dismiss the idea, and could only think that an accident would prevent it. However, the stage stopped at the last exchange hotel, and, almost involuntarily, he said, "I took my carpet-bag, and, walking into the hotel, asked for entertainment," concluding to follow the bent of his mind, not knowing why.

Supper was announced ; he was the only guest, and was waited on by a middle-aged lady. At an early hour he retired, or purposed to do so, but was interrupted by a rap at a door communicating with the room next the one he was to occupy. He answered the call, when the lady of the dining-room requested permission to get something in the room. After having asked to be excused for the interruption, she had scarcely commenced the search when, turning around, she asked, "Are you not a minister of the Gospel?" The answer was, "Yes, madam ; and why do you ask?"

She replied that her daughter was lying very ill, and very anxious about her salvation. "To-day," said she, "I prayed God to send some one to pray and talk with her, and the moment you put your foot in the dining-room something seemed to say, 'He is the man ; ask him.'"

Mr. R. complied with her request, found the daughter very sick in body and mind, prayed and talked till near daylight, when she was able to trust in the Great Physician of souls, and was made to rejoice in His pardoning love. Then it was clear to his mind why he was not to end his journey the previous day. Such are the ways of Providence, ofttimes ruling and overruling when we fail to recognize the divine hand.

Mr. Jevons, of Birmingham, England, has given the Wesleyans $45,000 to establish an orphanage for the children of godly parents.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

(Continued from page 879.)

A SCEPTIC'S DEATH.

THE poison of the adder gradually spread itself through the veins of the bitten man. Mr. Vernon's steps became unsteady his body swayed from side to side, but his strong will mastering the weaknss of nature, he kept on walking still.

To and from the window Mr. Vernon staggered, straining his eyes and ears for tokens of his messenger's return; how dull both eyes and ears were growing! Heavy cannon balls seemed to be fastened to his feet; he could hardly drag them along.

Then, like a little cloud spreading into a black pall over the sky, the dreadful doubt of preservation grew and increased in the sufferer's mind. Mr. Vernon leant his sinking frame against the sill of the open window, and faintly murmured, "What if he should not be in time!"

Did a thought of his soul's peril then come to the smitten man? Did he think not only of possible death, but of an awful Hereafter? Did he utter a cry to the God whom he had denied? Did fear force a prayer from lips that had spoken so many words against that faith which alone robs death of its sting?

No, the habit of a life is not changed in a moment; besides, the action of poison was now felt in the brain as well as the chest. All that Mr. Vernon's mind now could grasp was the necessity for keeping in motion; all his energy was given to the effort of moving his paralyzed limbs.

In the meantime Fleetfoot was dashing on at his utmost speed. Those who saw Alec lashing the excited animal accused of cruelty the man who had never struck the creature before. Persons at a distance seeing the horse's furious career, and noticing that his rider was bareheaded, believed that the animal was running away.

A drove of cattle was met on the road, but Alec never slackened his pace, and ran a narrow chance of impaling his horse on the horns of one of the startled bullocks that could hardly get out of the way. A child was almost run over, and its shriek of terror made the horse fly faster.

Had hedges or five-barred gates obstructed the road, Alec would have pressed his steed to the leap. Happily the high-road was smooth, and tolerably clear. The trees that bordered it seemed to the rider to be flying backward; rows of white cottages looked like a flash of light!

Now the gate of Salem is in sight; Alec sees that some kind of vehicle is at that gate; he still lashes on his foaming, panting horse. Ha! it trips in full career—it is down—it has flung its rider over its head! yet horse and man are up again in an instant, the one, with loose bridle, has fled far away, the other, with blood on his face, yet too full of his mission to think whether he be hurt or not, has rushed up to the open carriage, in which Edith has just arrived.

The Vicar, going northward by the same train as that which had brought Miss Temple, had proffered for her use the conveyance which had just carried him to the station.

"Master—bitten—wants the cure!" gasped forth Alec. Edith stayed not to ask questions; she sprang from the carriage, rushed into the farm-house, and almost before Alec had recovered his breath had returned with her phial.

The next moment she was in the open carriage, and Alec scrambled on the box. "Drive for your life!" he cried to the coachman.

Happily the Vicar's horse was fresh and strong, for its speed and its mettle were tried. Never before had the light vehicle gone at so rattling a pace.

Several minutes were still wanting to complete the half hour since Mr. Vernon had shouted out from his window, when Edith, phial in hand, sprang down from the carriage, scarcely waiting till it had stoyped at the door. Not that the lady had forgotten, what Alec now had time to remember, that Mr. Vernon always kept a large bottle of Antidote in his Museum; the recollection of this fact somewhat lessened their anxiety, but it did not diminish their speed.

Edith hurried into the house, and was followed not only by Alec Stewart, but by Robert Holland, who had just reached Eureka House on foot. He had left Miss Temple at the station in conversation with the vicar, and by a short cut through the fields had come on foot to the House.

The farmer had walked very fast, for his spirit was full of indignation, and he was determined to call to a stern reckoning the persecutor of his innocent sister. Robert was amazed to see the carriage driven up to the house at so furious a pace, and then to behold the eager speed with which Miss Temple and Alec rushed into the dwelling.

Robert might have questioned the driver, but he preferred following the rapid steps of Edith, and seeing for himself what sudden catastrophe could have brought her back in such haste to her uncle's home. Robert strode rapidly along the hall, but Edith was in the study half a minute before him; when he entered the Museum the lady was already on her knees beside the form of her uncle.

"He is living—he breathes—he moves!" she exclaimed. Alec raised a little the head of his master, whose livid face, overspread with a yellowish-green hue, was fearful to look on. Edith with no sparing hand poured on it the contents of her phial, rubbing them in with her fingers so trembling and cold! A spot yet more livid than the rest of the face, directed Miss Temple to the place where the adder's fang had pierced the skin.

"Chafe his limbs, bring spirits, hasten for a doctor!" cried Edith as she emptied out the last drop from her phial.

Alec obeyed the first order, Robert the second, for various labelled bottles stood on a shelf. It was the hand of the brother of Ellen Morris that held the glass containing the last draught that should ever be proffered to her enemy's lips.

Those white lips moved as the hartshorn touched them, but they did not unclose; the teeth of the dying man were hard set. Not one hour before how full of life and health had been that form, now growing so rigid! what an active brain had worked in that heavy head!

Mr. Vernon had been full of grand projects and scientific discoveries; he had laid his plans for the morrow—ay, and for years of work, success, and glory, that were to succeed that morrow.

Unconscious had the philosopher been that the last sands were dropping through the time-glass of his existence, that the shadow on the dial was nearing the hour which should mark his death, and that the day of which the noontide hour was now striking would have no morrow for him!

Yes, the sceptic-philosopher died, died in his sins, despising and rejecting the only salvation offered to man. The clever learned man shut out of the kingdom unto which even children who trust in Christ receive a welcome.

The newspapers lavished enconiums on the dead man for some days, for his scientific attainments were well known, but though he received the praise of men we know that would not avail him in the position he now occupied. "God seeth not as man seeth."

"Just read this bit, Ellen, before we set out for Eureka House," said Robert, holding out a newspaper to his sister, who had just come down stairs wearing bonnet and shawl, ready to accompany him in a walk. Exactly a week had elapsed since Ellen had come with Robert and his wife to Salem, after their meeting at Southampton.

Ellen took the paper, and read the following paragraph, which was headed by the name of Oswald Vernon, with a variety of letters after it, of which rustic readers only understood that they meant that the person to whose name they were tacked on must have been a wondrously learn person:

"This day the grave has closed over one our most eminent men of science, one wh death leaves a blank which will not soon filled up. By his graceful urbanity of mann the outward index of a most benevolent disp tion, and by the charm of his conversation, Vernon had greatly endeared himself to a w circle of friends.

"But it is in the scientific world, of which was so bright an ornament, that Oswald Ver will be most missed, and longest regretted. fact that this great man actually died a ma to his unselfish love for the human race, his no desire to lessen the sufferings to which fles heir, gives a touching interest to his fate.

"It is understood that our gifted countryn had discovered a cure for snake-bites, and f victim to an experiment made with a self-devot equalling that of a Curtius.

"It is believed that Mr. Vernon has bequeat his valuable collection of curiosities to country. Thus this great philosopher has only lived and died for the welfare of others, even after death, will continue to earn his to a name more honorable than any other— of a disinterested benefactor of mankind."

"Think of such flummery being written a a stony-hearted, selfish man like Mr. Verno said Robert sternly. "How little is the w able to judge the character of one who nev believe, did a disinterested act of kindness in life, and who kept his 'graceful urbanity strangers!"

"Let us not judge him, dear Robert," Ellen, as she laid down the paper. "My happy master has gone to his solemn acco from the bottom of my heart I forgive and him."

"And Mr. Vernon certainly did one wise, right thing," observed Effie, who was stan by the window, arranging flowers in a jar; " was when he made the will by which he ha Eureka House and all his money to our s Miss Temple."

"He could not have done better," said Ro "unless,"—he glanced at his sister, but ins of finishing his sentence observed abru "and that reminds me that Miss Temple ex us at Eureka House. Ellen, I see that yo ready; Effie, my darling, we'll be back b dinner." So with a smile and nod to his Robert quitted the farm-house, accompani his sister.

"So Mrs. Cross writes that she does not to return to Salem?" said Ellen to her bro when the two had proceeded some way o road towards Eureka House.

"The widow wrote in the letter which this morning, that she is tired of the duln country life, and has made up her mind to s in business with a cousin in London," re the farmer. "Mrs. Cross offers to let us re at Salem on condition of our doubling the payment, instead of continuing our form rangement, though she would prefer sellin freehold at once."

"I hope that you will be able to remain in bright little home," said Ellen. "It see me that a sweeter spot than Salem is not found in the world."

"Effie and I would gladly remain to liv die in it," replied Robert, suppressing a "I had hoped gradually to save up enough to buy the freehold, and have the for my own. But it can't be done," add young farmer more sternly; "I have been money rather than saving. I cannot get on out a little capital to start me fairly.

"It is now a struggle from hand to mou need more cattle, more horses; I need for draining, money for fencing; and mon all this I have none. I shall scarcely scra enough to pay for our passage to Canad when I am there I must support myself a wife by the sweat of my brow. I shall have one shilling to rub against another land in the West."

And what says Effie to leaving the home of ch she is so fond?" inquired Ellen.

Effie, poor darling, makes the best of it," lied Robert in a softened tone. "She told this morning that she deserved to be ban- is ed from her Salem. If Effie deserves it, her band does so a thousand times more."

obert fell into gloomy silence, for he remem- ed with shame and remorse his evenings spent the "Crown," his outbursts of violent pas- , and, worst of all, his cruel desertion of the who loved him so deeply.

llen also was silent and sad. She, too, had ely enough of money to enable her to pay her sage to Canada, whither she would accom- y her emigrant brother. It was a more bitter l to Ellen to leave her native land than it was Robert; now that her character had been red from all suspicion, the weary woman ld fain have peacefully passed the remainder er days amongst her own people.

ut the sister's heart clung to him who had er doubted her when others condemned, who never forsaken her when others despised, Ellen had resolved that wherever her brother t there would she go; they should have one e and one grave.

trange and mingled were the emotions of El- as she entered the grounds of Eureka House, saw before her the house in which she had lt for years. Scarce a twelvemonth had sed since Ellen had quitted that place to ac- pany her invalid mistress to Hastings.

he last time that Ellen had trod that gravel e she had gone out to gather flowers to take her lady, of whose recovery then she had es. How little had Ellen dreamed, when plucked the geraniums, what a year crowded painful events was before her!

seemed as if a whole lifetime had passed e Ellen had gathered that nosegay. There before her mind now the solemn scenes of lady's last illness and death; then the fearful nts which had succeeded—accusation, trial, demnation, the unutterable misery endured prison, followed by the brief but strange ourn at Southampton, closed by the sudden ting with Effie and Miss Temple.

(To be continued.)

THE GLORIFIED SAVIOUR.

S. Lesson for Nov. 23. Rev. 1:9-20. Golden Text, ver. 8. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HE venerable Apostle John was a true father n C ist. He knew what the little children could r; and it is characteristic of him that, before speaks of the wondrous vision of Christ's y which was vouchsafed to him, he should ind the disciples that he was their "brother companion in tribulation, and in the king- and patience of Jesus Christ." Far from g uplifted "through the abundance of the lations," he calls himself the brother of every ever in the churches, and their companion, in honor, or earthly success, but in tribula- and patience.

hat a world of truth do these few words open s! Here is a man who lives so much in l, that instead of beginning his Gospel with a ealogy, like Matthew, and the relation of circumstances of the birth of Christ, like k or Luke, he begins far back in the past nity of God, and says, "In the beginning the Word, and the Word was with God, and Word was God." In His first epistle, in- d of commencing with his own name, as did l, Peter, and Jude, again he goes back be- d them all, and says, "That which was from beginning, which we have seen with our , which we have looked upon and our hands e handled of the Word of life," etc. Here a man who knew Him that is from the be- ning. And not only was the past eternity of an element in which he was at home: he into the far future. Living nearer heaven most men, he could see at a greater dis- e that which was behind and that which was re; and yet it is he who comes down to the level of the little children in Christ as none other of the apostles do.

Nothing empties, humbles, and softens a man so much as to live in the presence of God; the nearer we are to Him, the nearer we are to all men, and the more safe are we at the same time from their influence. The old man goes on to say: I "was in the isle that is called Patmos, for the Word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ." He was neither there by chance, nor for pleasure, nor because of any purpose of his own, nor yet because unbelieving men persecuted him: a higher power was at work, and the old apostle lived near enough to God to see His purposes through all which happened around him. Whatever circumstances may have conspired to bring him there, he was in the isle of Patmos "for the Word of God, and for the testimony of Jesus Christ."

He continues: "I was in the Spirit on the Lord's day, and heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet," saying, "I am Alpha and Omega, the first and the last: and what thou seest write in a book, and send it unto the seven churches which are in Asia; etc." The voice seems to have caused him no alarm: "I turned to see the voice that spake with me." He had an educated ear, and knew that voice well; he had heard it in its teaching, in its comfort to sad ones, in the hour when Lazarus was raised from the dead, on the cross and after the resurrection, and he turned to see the well-known form of his Saviour. But God had said (Ex. 33:20) "There shall no man see My face and live;" and the sight, when he had fully taken it in, deprived him of all power: "when I saw Him, I fell at His feet as dead."

How, then, did the vision dawn upon him? "Being turned, I saw seven golden candlesticks; and in the midst of the candlesticks one like unto the Son of Man, etc." In the glory, He does not appear without His ransomed church, and the characteristic of that church will be light. He stands in the midst, not nearer to one candlestick than another. He was "clothed with a garment down to the foot." In Daniel 7, "His garment was white as snow," and in both passages the hair of his head was white. Purity and age seem to be symbolized by this. "The same yesterday, to-day, and forever," from age to age, and "of purer eyes than to behold evil" (Hab. 1:13).

"And His eyes were as a flame of fire." "Neither is there any creature that is not manifest in His sight: but all things are naked and opened unto the eyes of Him with Whom we have to do" (Heb. 4:13). As in Ps. 139: "Yea, the darkness hideth not from Thee; but the night shineth as the day: the darkness and the light are both alike to Thee" (Ps. 139:12). And this is glory—they who walk in the light are not afraid of the all-seeing jealous eyes, which search out, and burn out, every stain; before which evil cannot continue to exist: they welcome the glance of that fire which reveals their work, and tries it of what sort it is (1 Cor. 3:13). "Search me, O God! and know my heart; try me, and know my thoughts; and see if there be any way of wickedness in me, and lead me in the way everlasting" (Ps. 139:23, 24).

"And His feet like unto fine brass, as if they burned in a furnace." In the vision of Daniel (chap. 10:6), "His arms and His feet were like in color to polished brass," the color of glowing light, probably to signify that where His feet tread there light and warmth accompany Him. "I will make the place of My feet glorious," He says (Isa. 60:13); and "His arms," because all which our Lord does is light. Light and heat are in His thoughts, and words, and deeds: "God is light" (1 John 1:5). "And His voice as the sound of many waters." Yes, to the apostle John, who had the hearing ear. But to how many is the voice of God like a rare sound, heard only now and then! Oh! He wills that His voice should be as the sound of many waters, always flowing on, never ceasing.

And He had in His right hand seven stars, which (ver. 20) are the angels or bishops of the seven churches. "They that be wise shall shine as the brightness of the firmanent, and they that turn many to righteousness as the stars forever and ever (Dan. 12:3). To shine in an endless eternity, to give light—that is blessed indeed; but to shine in His right hand, there for special and immediate use—this was the glory of those holy men who were fathers of the infant church. "And out of His mouth went a two-edged word"—His own trenchant Word; "And His countenance was as the sun shineth in his strength"—all light, all warmth, all glory.

And he who had lain on His breast, when in the days of His flesh He emptied Himself, now fell at His feet as dead. He knew Him that was from the beginning, but had never formed an idea of His burning glory. That which Moses had besought, and was refused, was now revealed to the aged John. "I beseech Thee show me Thy glory," was Moses' petition (Ex. 33:18); and God answered him, "Thou canst not see My face; for there shall no man see Me and live." Now John lived, and saw the face of the Son of God in glory. Yet he fell as dead before Him, and it was only when His own right hand was laid upon Him that His beloved disciple who knew His touch regained strength. It was the well-known hand, although so glorious; it was the old voice, and yet so new. John was already dead to himself, and thus he could see God.

"And He said unto me, Fear not; I am the first and the last: I am He that liveth, and was dead; and, behold! I am alive for evermore." The only past in Jesus is His death. I am He that liveth, not that hath lived. He liveth evermore, the very life which He lived on earth as Son of man. True He passed through death, but it was powerless upon Him. Death without corruption, such was His—a death whose power was abrogated; and in the strength of that truth that His soul was not left in hell, and God's Holy One did not see corruption, He says, "I am He that liveth, and was dead; and, behold! I am alive for evermore, Amen." "Because I live, ye shall live also" (John 14:19).

"And have the keys of hell and of death." Once Satan "had the power of death" (Heb. 2:14); but the Son of God took part of flesh and blood," that through death He might destroy him that had the power of death, that is, the devil," and He has given His flesh as a seed of life for the life of the world. "The bread that I will give is My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world" (John 6:51). "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone; but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit." Thus Jesus' death is a seed of life for soul and body; and in His death, because therein by faith in Him we abandon our own selves, His very life becomes our own life, and we live Christ instead. All must be reckoned henceforth in relation to Him, and not to us. He is our very being. As we in Him have died unto sin, so in Him we live unto righteousness. And even when God makes us aware that we have not done His will in things of which we have been before unconscious, we are not to lose our foothold in Christ, but by bringing the thing, whatever it may be, into connection with His death, and burying it in His grave, we find there the power to live in freedom from it in the future. All in relation to Him and not ourselves.

The whole domain is now in Jesus' hands. We can never have to tread one step where His conquering tread has not gone before. Death, temptation, sorrow, sickness, are prisons no more to him whose life is Jesus. We have to do with an overcome death, the key of which lies in the hand of Him whose life we breathe. Every temptation, every sickness, is already overcome; and by living in the life of the conqueror, we become "more than conquerors," because we know that the questions which are raised by the enemy are already settled by our Lord. What place can fear have in us when we see the keys of hell and of death in the hand of Him in Whom we live!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Municipal Elections in Great Britain in many cases are decided on local and personal grounds, but in boroughs which return members to Parliament imperial politics exercise an important influence on the elections. It is regarded as a sign of the approach of the long-predicted Liberal reaction that at the elections of mayors, etc., of November 8th, wherever political considerations were involved, the Liberals were generally triumphant. In one or two very important boroughs the balance of power was completely reversed in favor of the Liberals, and in other boroughs where a large majority of the council were Conservatives the majority was reduced. In Liverpool, where the Town Council stood 42 Conservatives and 22 Liberals, it now stands 34 Conservatives and 30 Liberals.

A Revival of Trade in England is Announced. An English journal says: "Not only does the revenue exhibit some slight signs of 'elasticity,' and the railways, in general, improved traffic returns, but from most of our manufacturing districts we are informed that 'things look brighter.' The iron and coal trades exhibit the most marked improvement as yet, but the hardware trades of Birmingham show an activity for a long time unknown, and the banks of the Clyde resound once more with the hammers of the shipbuilders. Even the long-silent looms of Lancashire are again becoming instinct with life and motion."

Brave British Soldiers Decorated.—It has become the fashion in many quarters since the death of the young Prince Louis Napoleon to speak disparagingly of the courage of British officers and soldiers. The following account of the exploits of a captain and a sergeant in the army in Africa shows that British officers do not always act as Lieutenant Carey did when a comrade is disabled.

"The Queen," says the Court Circular, "confers the Victoria Cross on Commandant D'Arcy and Sergeant O'Toole. On Captain Cecil D'Arcy, for his gallant conduct on the 3d of July, 1879, in endeavoring to rescue Trooper Raubenheim, of the Frontier Light Horse, who fell from his horse as the troops were retiring. Captain D'Arcy, though the Zulus were close upon them, waited for the man to mount behind him; the horse kicked them both off, and though much hurt by the fall and quite alone, Captain D'Arcy coolly endeavored to lift the trooper, who was stunned, on to the horse, and it was only when he found that he had not strength to do so that he mounted and rode off. His escape was marvellous, as the Zulus had actually closed upon him.

"On Sergeant Edmurd O'Toole, Frontier Light Horse, for his conduct on the 3d July, 1879, in assisting to rescue Sergeant Fitzmaurice, whose horse fell and rolled on him as the troops retired before great numbers of the enemy. When lifted up behind him by Lord William Beresford, the man, being half stunned by the fall, could not hold on, and he must have been left had not Sergeant O'Toole, who was keeping back the advancing Zulus, given up his carbine and assisted to hold Sergeant Fitzmaurice on the horse. At the time the Zulus were rapidly closing on them."

Mr. H. M. Stanley, the African Explorer, writes under date of September 13th from the mouth of the Congo River an account of his year's work and his future plans. He says: "All this year I have been very busy and have worked hard. I have equipped one expedition on the East Coast, have reconstructed another—namely, the International, of whose misfortunes we have heard so often, and have explored personally several new districts on the East Coast. Having finished my work satisfactorily to myself, my friends, and those who sent me, I came through the Mediterranean and round to this spot, where I arrived two years and four months ago, on that glorious day on which we sighted old Ocean after our rash descent of the Livingstone.

"And now I begin another mission seriously and deliberately, with a grand object in view. I am charged to open—and keep open, if possible—all such districts and countries as I may explore for the benefit of the commercial world. The mission is supported by a philanthropic society which numbers noble-minded men of several nations. It is not a religious society, but my instructions are entirely of that spirit. No violence must be used, and wherever rejected the mission must withdraw to seek another field. We have abundant means, and therefore we are to purchase the very atmosphere, if any demands be made upon us, rather than violently oppose them. In some regions, experience tells me, the plan may work wonders. God grant it success everywhere! I have fifteen Europeans and a couple of hundred natives with me."

Mr. Gladstone, the English ex-Premier, has recently been staying in Paris, where he was received with much cordiality. In the course of an interview with a representative of the press, he expressed his opinion of the policy of the English Government. Being questioned as to the issue of the approaching general election, he intimated his belief that it would give England a Liberal government, and noticed Lord Derby's defection as a significant symptom. He hoped himself not to take office again. Lords Hartington and Granville would be quite sufficient as leaders. He would not himself again bear the burden of power unless absolutely called upon by his countrymen.

As to the possibility of a war between England and Russia about Afghanistan, he still hoped the two nations would avoid a struggle which would be onerous for England. The material difficulties in the way of such a war would be enormous, and where would they find a vulnerable point in Russia? England had absolutely nothing to fear in India. When he was in power he always strove to keep up friendly relations with Russia, and believed he had succeeded. Regarding the recent alliance between Germany and Austria, he said it had, no doubt, for its immediate object to keep Russia within bounds; but the import of the alliance should not be exaggerated. Prince Bismarck was one of those men who never hesitated to throw away his instruments when he no longer wanted them.

A Barrister became a Clergyman of the Church of England under the following circumstances. In 1875, when Moody and Sankey were holding large meetings in London, three young barristers were talking together in a jocular way about the meetings, and agreed to "toss up" as to which of them should write a "request for prayer" and send it up. The one on whom the lot fell went to the Agricultural Hall, to be amused by hearing his own request publicly announced. Mr. Moody read it, saying it seemed to be written in an ironical spirit, and asked special prayer to be made for the writer of it. A dead silence ensued, during which the barrister felt how awfully solemn was his act and its result. He felt perplexed and anxious; he heard all that was said that evening; and on the following day he determined to give up his profession, which was a promising one, and to devote himself to the ministry of the Word. That young and rising barrister of 1875 is now an earnest and devout clergyman of the Church of England, devoting all his renewed and consecrated energies to the work of saving souls. This is a remarkable illustration of one who "went to scoff and remained to pray."

Prince Leopold, the Youngest Son of Queen Victoria, visited the English manufacturing town of Sheffield on October 18th, to take part in the ceremony of opening a public college which had been presented to the town by Mr. Mark Firth, a local manufacturer, at a cost of $125,000. The same liberal donor had previously presented the town with a public park.

Prince Leopold showed that he rightly estimated public benefits like those of Mr. Firth. In the course of his inaugural address he said:

"The effect of intellectual culture is to make us shrink from and hate what is false and vulgar, and prefer pure and simple pleasures to ostentation, vanity, and self-indulgence. We cannot wonder that when a man has tasted the happiness of great and generous actions he is eager to enjoy the high delight again, and finds other triumphs and satisfactions insipid as compared with the triumph and satisfaction of conferring on his fellow-townsmen a real and lasting good. Those men who, with great wealth at their disposal, elect to spend it in mere sumptuousness and luxury, are repaid, indeed, by admiration from certain persons and of a certain kind; but how far richer is the reward of those who, after spending what is needed to maintain with dignity their place in society, devote the remainder towards furthering the happiness of their fellowmen! Far-off generations shall rise up and call such men blessed."

An English Duke's Temperance Action i worthy of record. The Duke of Westminste is refusing to renew leases of houses belonging to him in which liquor is sold. The leas of a large public-house in Oxford Street, London lately expired, and several hundred pounds year rent could have been obtained for a renewa of the lease; but the duke has let the house rent free, to the incumbent of the parish as mission house, and has put up, at his own expense, a public drinking fountain against th flank wall.

Five Young Ladies the Misses Prideaux Brune and Miss Nora O'Shaughnessy, have jus received from the British Lifeboat Institutio five silver medals in acknowledgment of their intrepid services in rowing their boat through rough sea, and saving at considerable risk life, an exhausted sailor from a boat capsized i squally weather. The accident occurred on th coast of Cornwall; two sailors had already pe ished before their arrival, and it is related tha the young ladies rowed "like heroines" t the rescue. The presentation of the medals wa made at a formal meeting, which the ladies a tended dressed in their boating costume.

The Paris "Gaulois Newspaper" asserts th ex-Empress Eugenie, notwithstanding all effor to dissuade her, will embark next February f Zululand, to pray on the spot where her s was killed.

An Unintentional Reproof was Administer recently to a rather gayly attired Sunday-scho teacher by one of her class. "What is meant the pomps and vanities of the world?" asked t teacher. "Fine clothes," replied a child, ad ing as an illustration, "such as feathers and flo ers, like them on your hat." The child's rep was a striking commentary on 1 Peter 3:3.

Spurgeon's Autograph Album; containing t Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's and Mrs. Spurgeon's au graphs, may be obtained at 63 Bible House, through any bookseller. Price 75 cents. The Sw and Trowel says: "Our young friends delight possessing birthday albums, and here is one whic fit for a queen. We will say nothing of the conte but the binding is simply gorgeous. . . . . Thi a dainty birthday present, and is equal to any t have gone before it; we think we might ventur say that it is second to none. Facsimiles of the tographs of the pastor and his wife are given in th proper places."

The following works by the same eminent prea may also be obtained at the CHRISTIAN HER Office, 63 Bible House:

"The Treasury of David." Containing an O nal Exposition of the Book of Psalms; a Collec of Illustrative Extracts from the whole range of L ature; a series of Homiletical Hints upon al every verse; and list of writers upon each Ps Five volumes. Price, per vol., $3.

"John Ploughman's Talk; or, Plain Advice Plain People." Price, cloth, 60 cents; paper ers, 40 cents.

"The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit." Sermons. Preached and revised during the 1878. Price $2.50.

"Twelve Sermons on Various Subjects." W Portrait. Price 35 cents. A remittance must a pany every order.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc. The Circulation is 165,000 Copies.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 20, 1879. 13th Year. No. 57—New Series

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

ORTRAITS OF MRS. J. HUDSON TAYLOR AND MISS CRICKMAY, the Missionaries to China, with Sketches of their Lives.

HE FATAL LINE. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.

RNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE. A Thrilling Serial Story by the Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

IGNS OF COMING STRUGGLES.

reaching the Lord Jesus: Conclusion of Dr. Punshon's Sermon.

At Singapore Barracks: A Recollection By Major Malan.

CURRENT EVENTS: Senator Bayard's Advice—Kindness Returned—A Railroad Catastrophe—A Young Man Shot—Miss Bright Eyes in Boston—Mr. Moody's Work—High-heeled Boots—A Providential Escape—A Dying Message—Death of Dr. Lovick Pierce—The Planet Jupiter—Mission Work in New York—An Energetic Preacher, etc.

REVOLUTIONARY EUROPE.

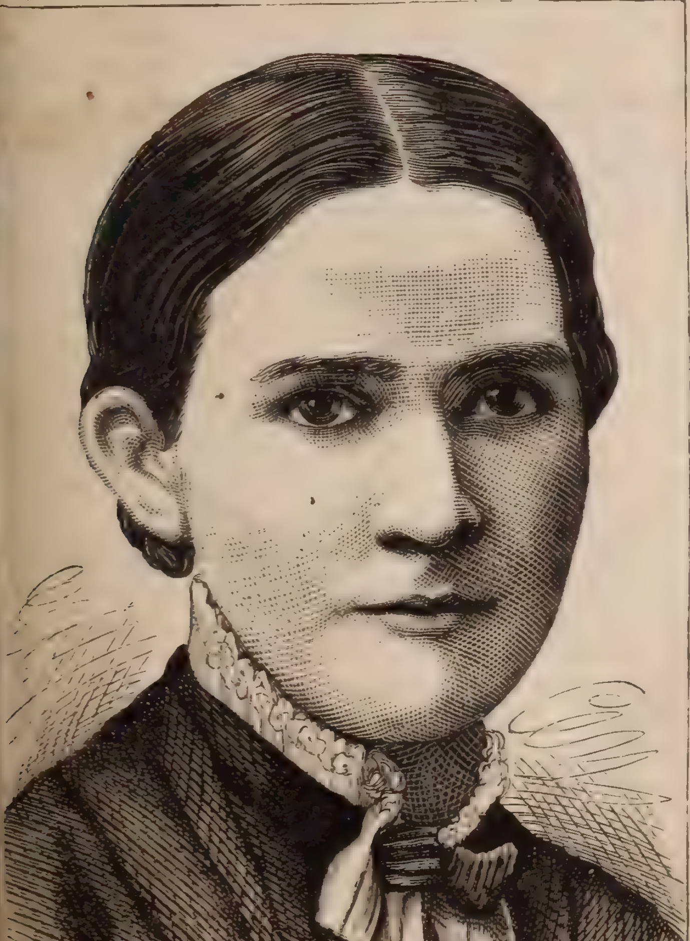
REFUGES OF LIES AND WHAT WILL BECOME OF THEM. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

THE BUTCHERS' FESTIVAL at the Tabernacle.

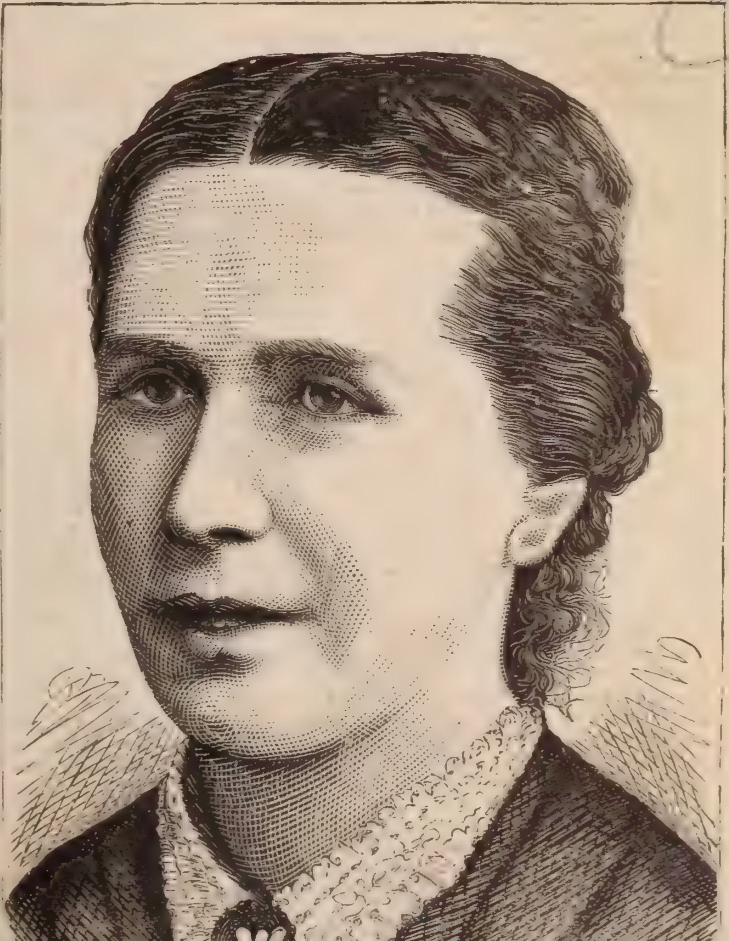
The Message to the Churches: S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND (Concluded).

FOREIGN TOPICS: Lord Beaconsfield's Speech—British Troubles in Turkey—Heathen in London—The Great Naval Fight—Prince Bismarck's Early Love—Vice in London, etc.



MISS CRICKMAY,



MRS. J. HUDSON TAYLOR,

English Missionaries in China.

MRS. HUDSON TAYLOR,

A Missionary in China.

Mrs. Taylor's and Miss Crickmay's Diaries of their Journeys in China.

THE churches of England and America are being more roused than they ever were on the subject of carrying the Gospel to the heathen. Recruits are being gathered with fresh impetus for the wide fields of India, China, and Central Africa. More than twenty young men and women, full of holy zeal, have sailed from New York within the last month for foreign shores. We mentioned recently that fifteen had gone out in connection with the Baptist denomination. Since then seven young men have sailed in one ship for India to join the South India Conference of the M.E. Church—the newest sphere of missionary labor opened in Southern Asia, but one upon which God is already pouring out the power of His spirit in a measure in which no other mission work in that country has been blessed. For the same blessed field five missionaries—four ladies and one gentleman—two of whom had been well tried in the world's battle field, and knew perfectly what they were about, set sail on Saturday, November 8th. Let the prayers of the churches go up to God that all these heroic men and women may have His abiding assurance within them to enable them to stand like rocks after the novelty of their enterprise has passed away, and its testing realities and untold heartaches have begun to work upon their human nature.

The present time seems a good opportunity to give portraits and brief life-sketches of two ladies who have been some years in the foreign mission field. We select Mrs. J. Hudson Taylor and Miss Crickmay, English missionaries in China. The husband of the former, whose life and portrait appeared in the CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 22d, is one of the most vigorous workers in the whole field, and has been honored by God in the starting of the China Inland Mission.

Miss Faulding (who is now Mrs. J. Hudson Taylor) went out, from England, in the first party of missionaries of the China Inland Mission in the ship Lammermuir, in 1866, and did valuable missionary work in China. She returned to England in 1871, and was married, on November 28th, 1871, to the Rev. J. Hudson Taylor. Mr. W. Berger wrote at that time: "A more devoted missionary could scarcely be found than Miss Faulding." Her age is about thirty-five years. She returned to China in the autumn of 1878, and travelled with Miss Crickmay and Miss Horne and Mr. Baller to establish an orphanage for children rendered orphans by the recent famine which devastated an immense extent of that great heathen country. They penetrated to T'ai-yüen Fu, a remote inland town, which no foreign ladies had ever before reached. The following is part of Mrs. Taylor's narrative of the journey:

MRS. J. HUDSON TAYLOR'S DIARY OF A JOURNEY TO T'AI-YÜEN FU TO FOUND AN ORPHANAGE.

Oct. 9th, 1878.—I will take the opportunity afforded by a boat journey to tell you how God has continued to help me here in China. Of our safe arrival in China you will have heard. After visiting one or two stations I then went to Gank'ing, as that seemed the best point from which to get children, who we heard were being sold away to all parts of the empire. Mr. Pearse kindly spared his best helper, who took a journey and brought back two nice girls of eleven and thirteen, one of whom had been sold by her father for 300 cash [about 30 cents] to a man who was subsequently glad to part with her

The difficulty and expense of the long journeys needful to procure girls in this way seemed clearly too great, and the only thing to be done appeared to be to wait, until in cooler weather we could either some of us go and open schools in one of the famine districts (if our way were opened into such), or could, where we were, gather children from among the refugees whom the cold of winter would drive into our neighborhoods.

Now we are on our way; dear Miss Crickmay and Miss Horne and Mr. Baller are going with me; we have been led step by step, and after a very pleasant little stay among the missionaries at Tientsin, are now at Pao-ting Fu, just about to commence our journey over the mountains.

Satan has tried hard to make my weakness an excuse for hindering me, but I have asked that the promise of John 14:23 may be fulfilled to me—"If a man love Me, he will keep My words: and My Father will love him, and We will come unto him, and make Our abode with him." I can well afford to go in that strength, though I have no other. God is so good to me. I know He is leading many to help us in prayer. I know He is caring for my precious husband and children. He is with you and with us, and soon we shall all be with Him.

Pao-ting Fu, Oct. 11th.—We are now on the way to a part of China where a foreign woman has never been seen (i.e., Shan-si province). To-morrow we start off in springless carts for a four days' jolt over bad roads: after that we have to go over some very high mountain passes called "Heaven's Gates" in mule litters. We have come to this point by water very pleasantly; but one seems very far away from home, and letters are long and uncertain in coming. Nevertheless we are thankful to seize this opportunity of beginning work in Shan-si, and God has been so good to us all the way. He helps me every day. I have had such full joy in realizing that every thing, small and great, that comes, is exactly what our Father has chosen for us; and it rests me so much to look away from my own weakness, and to feel that it is Christ in me who is to do all the work. "We will come and make our abode with Him." Why should we not claim the fulfilment of this promise every day?

Hwei-loh, Octth. 16.—Another stage of our journey is accomplished, and we have been obliged to make a day's stay here in order to hire the mountain litters we shall now need. Our experience of cart travelling has been very satisfactory: much easier than I anticipated; but then we have had every thing in our favor—fine weather, the roads at their best, all that could make it pleasant and comfortable. I could not help thinking what a sight we should be in the streets of London. Three two-wheel carts, having the appearance of each carrying a huge beer-barrel, with a box or two tied up behind; two mules to each, one in the shafts, the other attached by ropes and walking at the side.

To walk behind, as we did part of every day, and see these rolling and jolting along—jerk, jerk, jerk—would have amused you as it did us. Any one very nervous would certainly have expected to be thrown over many times a day, and been agreeably disappointed; for the carts, notwithstanding their rude construction, are wonderfully strong, and seem to defy the laws of gravitation, or, at any rate, to right themselves, whatever their angle, and jolt on as before without causing the carters any concern. I propped myself up on all sides with pillows and bedding, and wanted nothing to complete my enjoyment but to be able to occupy part of the time by reading, which, however, was out of the question; indeed, I found that I could not think undistractedly.

The fresh bright weather made it quite a pleasure-trip. We crossed wide plains, some really pretty, others bare (one misses the hedges of England in the scenery here), and came, every mile or two, upon snug, pleasant villages embosomed in trees. This part of the country, not having suffered from the rebellion, wears an air of comfort that is missing where trees have all been felled and ruins abound. In the part through which we have come they have not suffered from famine either, further than to have to pay much higher prices for every thing.

We were called up each morning at 4 A.M., and jogged on, after a cup of cocoa and some biscuits, fruit, etc., till about one o'clock, when the carters stopped for an hour, and took the first of their two meals a day, then on again till about seven at night, when, after a good tea, we were tired enough to sleep without any more rocking. Last night, after having gone some distance, by the light of a lantern, through a defile so narrow that a man could not pass us without climbing, we suddenly found four baggage carts coming the other way.

Neither party could go back, so there was a long consultation in the almost darkness as to what could be done; at last they found two spots in the road just wide enough to allow these narrow carts to pass with the greatest care, so one cart was arranged in one place, and three in another, and that difficulty, like many another, was got over. Happily the men were all very good-natured; my carter took it so coolly that he lighted his pipe to help the deliberations. We crossed two rivers, the carts and contents being put on barges, and the mules made to swim over, and one afternoon we were ploughing our way through streams most of the time. The people do not notice us much, but are very friendly.

T'ai-yüen. Oct. 26th.—We reached the end ol our long journey on Wednesday, the 23d. The houses here are all one-storied, built a foot o more above the ground, the best rooms alway: facing the south, so as to avoid the keen nortl winds. In this house there are five principa rooms, and a kitchen facing south. The kangs, o heated bedsteads, fill half each room, and are use for putting things upon and sitting upon in th daytime, as well as sleeping on at night. The are heated with coal, which is very cheap her The floors are brick. Houses are all let fu nished with chairs, tables, cupboards, sid boards, etc. The people here live chiefly on sort of vermicelli sometimes called "doug strings;" they also eat millet, and have ve good rice, which they do not like as well, ar also bread. We shall miss the fish of other pai of China, but we get abundance of splendid mi ton, beef too, and fowls, English as well as swe potatoes, and cabbages; and there are delicic grapes al through the winter. We found t nice bright little girls here waiting as the co mencement of our orphanage.

JOURNEY IN MULE LITTERS.

The journey by mule litter was very pleasa though over very rough roads. The "Heav Gate" passes disappointed me. I had expec them to appear so much higher; but being after day among the hills did me good, as it ways does. A geologist would have foun rich field for observation—such varieties of str hard stone everywhere, then coal and slate, t n a red crumbling stone. The cities, towns, d villages all looked very deserted; few wo n were to be seen, many houses were empty d locked up, and of the people we did see a l e proportion were in mourning as the result ol ie famine.

We passed over the Great Wall of China, id were reminded that we were not far from ie deserts by meeting strings of camels, fort or fifty at a time. Sometimes we made our ay along the dry bed of a river all day. The li rs are like large sedans borne by mules, one be id and one in front, and are long enough t lie down in, and wide enough for two pers s; rather awkward things for turning corners ut very comfortable for people who are not er-vous. We are pleased to find that they are ble to understand us, speaking Southern Man rin so well.

MISS CRICKMAY,

A Missionary to China.

MISS CRICKMAY, who is about twen five years old, went out to China as a mission y in 1875. She was a member of the late Rev. Samuel Martin's congregation at Westm ster Chapel, London. The Rev. H. Simon, the res-ent pastor, says of her: "She was one cur very best Sunday-School teachers." The flow-ing is a part of her narrative, published in C na Millions, a monthly publication in Lon of her recent journey in China in 1878:

PREACHING THE LORD JESUS.

Sermon by the Rev. W. M. Punshon, LL.D.

(Continued from page 886.)

I. As the Great and Perfect Teacher—IV. As the Great Atonement for the Sins of the World—The Baptism of Blood—His Life and Death for You—The Hand of the Lord the Secret of Success.

III. And then we preach Jesus also as the eat and perfect Teacher. When man was iginally created he was made in the image of od. No cloud had darkened his understand- g; no error had crept upon his brain: his owledge was extensive, and he was wise. en after the sad and terrible fall this mark God's image seemed not to be entirely re- oved from the soul. Reason in the midst of e people, without God and without hope, ex- ed herself and astonished the world by her scoveries, although in Rome she could only ess at the existence of the Deity, and in Athens e reared her altar "to the unknown God."

In reference to real spiritual saving knowl- ge, darkness covered the earth, and gross dark- ss the minds of the people. Now, to scatter s darkness and disperse this gloom, the Son God appeared, in whom were hid all the treas- es of wisdom and knowledge. The world had ore heard of wisdom: in Him it was embod- ; rays of its glory had been previously visi- : now it was as the sun at noon. Isaiah had ned his harp to noble strains, and had struck wisely and well; but here is one in whose esence he confesses himself a man of unclean s. John the Baptist was a prophet, mighty in rd and deed before God and above all the ple; but here is one whose shoe-latchet he is t worthy to loose. Solomon was the wisest of n; the fame of his wisdom had spread oad, and the queen of the south came from uttermost parts of the earth and declared of n that the half had not been told; but behold! reater than Solomon is here.

Wherever we look at Him, we beheld the ens of His wisdom; whether we stand in the ke of the multitudes who heard Him gladly, d listened to the burning words which flowed m His lips; whether we consider the elevating ure of the doctrines He preached; the apt- s with which He illustrated every subject He dled, the exquisite adaptation of His dis- rses to the circumstance of His hearers, or commanding energy and overwhelming power ich attended them, we must join in the eulogy ich the men of old pronounced upon him, "Never man spake like this Man."

Do you want teaching? Come to Jesus. ase from the tablets of your enthusiasm the nes of Zoroaster and Confucius and Socrates, d all the wise men of the world; carve the ne of Jesus there instead, for that hill of sac- ce where Jesus meets His disciples is the unt of wisdom, and no matter how dull the olar whom He takes into His school, He kes him wise unto salvation. "Preaching Lord Jesus."

V. And then we preach the Lord Jesus as one duly accepted offering for the sins of the ld. The vicarious nature of the sufferings the death of Christ has ever been a matter congratulation. From the time when the ciples were first called Christians at Antioch wn to the present it has been a constant and ailing theme of praise. "We preach Christ cified," says the rejoicing apostle, "to the s a stumbling-block"—we mourn over that— d to the Greeks foolishness"—we are sorry that—"but to them that are called, whether or Greek, the power of God and the wisdom God." The fact that Christ died, not for His sins, but for the sins of others, was the fact ch seems to have been prominently before own mind.

THE GREAT ATONEMENT—

During the time of His sojourn upon earth kept His eye constantly fixed upon this one ect. Undazzled by the glory of temporal sperity; undeterred by the frowns of perse- on; unmoved by the malignity of avowed enemies, or by the weakness or treachery of professed friends—the path He travelled was a straight one, and went direct from the manger to the cross. His answer to those who questioned Him about His friends was, "Wist ye not that I am about My Father's business?" How often in the writings of the Evangelists do we read such passages as this: "From that time forth began Jesus to say unto His disciples how that He must go up to Jerusalem, and suffer many things from the priests and scribes and elders, and be crucified, and be raised again the third day" (Matt. 16 : 21).

On one occasion you remember His giving utterance to a sentiment like this: Peter, with that natural and unguarded impetuosity which had often been better concealed, said, "This be far from Thee, Lord;" but what was the answer he got from the Saviour's lips? "Get thee behind Me, Satan; get thee back, thou tempter, thou art an offence unto Me: I must not suffer any of thine allurements to swerve Me from the path of duty; I must not listen to any thing which would interfere with the straight course of My life to the cross." On another occasion He seems rather to exult in the prospect of His martyrdom, to wish for the time of the trial, to long for the approach of the hour:

"I HAVE A BAPTISM TO BE BAPTIZED WITH." Hear, O Heavens, and be astonished, O Earth, it was a baptism of blood!—"I have a baptism to be baptized with, and how am I straitened till it be accomplished!" Thus did He ever speak of and publish the great end of His life. And surely this was the great topic of apostolic preaching. "I delivered unto you first of all"—not stopping till the people were presumed to be ready for it; not keeping back a truth like that until the people had been trained by civilization and science and education and human means; not hiding it behind folds of drapery; not burying it under piles of traditionary rubbish—"I delivered unto you first of all that which I also received, how that Christ died for our sins according to the Scriptures." "He is the propitiation for our sins," says the rejoicing apostle; and then, rising into a climax worthy of the grandeur of the subject, he adds: "And not for ours only, but for the sins of the whole world."

There are those in the world I know who represent the merit of the death of Christ as fettered in its reign and as limitable in its application, but I cannot so understand the Scripture. I know there are wise and good men, and these not a few, on that side of the question, and as such I honor them; but I must preach the truth, if I preach it at all, as I believe it to be in Jesus. Hence I must exhibit the Gospel, as I believe my Saviour intended it, as a

BALM FOR A BLEEDING WORLD,

for I rejoice to think that to you, and to you—and this is my warrant and my confidence in preaching—that to you all within the sound of my voice, however degraded, however leprous, however standing upon the very verge of the pit of perdition—"to you is the word of this salvation sent;" and I now preach to you the Lord Jesus. Yes, and I would preach Him with equal confidence, and with greater joy, if my cheek were now damp with the dews of death and ashen with the paleness of the mortal agony—

"Happy if with my latest breath
I might but gasp His name,
Preach Him to all, and cry in death
'Behold, behold the Lamb!'"

Oh, there is something in this personality of the atonement, so to speak, which invests it with a heartier welcome to the mind. Surely the truth will come home to the heart of a penitent as he thinks of the suffering of Christ and of the glory that has followed it, and remembers that all Christ did was done for him. And he is right. Look at the Lord Jesus yonder upon the throne of His glory, receiving the homage of thrones and dominions and principalities and powers; and then look at the child Jesus in the stable at Bethlehem, with the peasants for His nurses and the manger for His pillow; that humiliation was submitted to for you.

Follow Him through life; hunger pierced Him, thirst tormented Him, sorrow branded Him as her own, the God of glory walked in the world of His creation a homeless and a persecuted stranger—and those sufferings and tortures were for you. Go into the garden—the garden immortalized by His memory—where the flowers were crimsoned with His blood, and hear the groan more tender than human ear had ever heard, or human fancy ever conceived: that agony was borne for you. Stand at the place called Calvary; see Him subjected to a torturing death; listen to the sharp and bitter cry which announces the last struggle of the Man of Sorrows: that death was borne for you.

There is a sepulchre hewn out of a rock; women are going with wine and spices, expecting to behold the place of the dead; nay, it is empty; the dead has arisen and has gone forth into Galilee: and that triumph was achieved for you. The Lord is on the Mount of Olives, in the midst of His rejoicing and astonished disciples, talking with them about the things pertaining to the spiritual kingdom, and a bright cloud-chariot comes and receives Him out of their sight, and they see Him enter the skies: and that testimony was given for you. Follow Him in His upward progress—no one will hinder you; enter the house of many mansions in search of the risen Saviour; pass through the shining ranks of the ransomed until you get to the right hand of the throne. There—don't you hear it—that voice that will ever live in the storehouse of the most pleasant recollections, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do?"

THAT VOICE IS PLEADING FOR YOU.

"Now may be saved whoever will,
This man receiveth sinners still."

Thus was Christ preached in the days of the apostles, and thus is Christ preached still, and this is the only ministry, I take it, which God has promised to bless. Morality the most sublime may be promulgated from the pulpit; fancy the most glowing may illustrate it; eloquence the most commanding may enforce it; but unless it be accompanied with the demonstration of the Spirit and with power—and that Spirit is only given to glorify the name of Christ—it will be but as the sounding brass or as the tinkling cymbal. The apostles knew better than to trust to the mere utterances of the maxims of moralists.

What could hinder their success? The hand of the Lord was with them. No matter how bigoted the passions of those whom they addressed; no matter how strongly fortified the pride they had to humble; no matter how thick and foul the darkness which enshrouded the people; no matter how brutalizing the ignorance in which the spirit was degraded—"the hand of the Lord was with them." No matter though learning was an antagonist to them; no matter though philosophy scouted them; no matter though science frowned them from her fellowship—"the hand of the Lord was with them." No matter though the heathen raged, and though the people themselves—and that is far worse than the heathen raging—the people themselves imagined a vain thing, and the kings of the earth took counsel together against the Lord and His Anointed—"the hand of the Lord was with them."

And the hand of the Lord, the great secret of spiritual success and blessing, has been with His faithful ministers from that day to this, and the hand of the Lord is not at this moment withdrawn. The hand of the Lord is with the preaching of the truth to-day; and in answer to earnest, believing, and importunate prayer, the hand of the Lord will be more extensively outstretched to save, until poor trampled Ethiopia from beneath shall lift up her palsied and withered hand unto God, and the Lord's hand bending down from heaven, and Ethiopia's hand stretched tremulously up from beneath, shall clasp and join in one close and firm and lasting embrace, and earth shall be turned to heaven. "Preaching the Lord Jesus, the hand of the Lord is with us."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, November 12th, at 5.25 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Further Returns of the New York State Elections indicate that the Republicans have elected all the names on the ticket except Mr. Soule, the candidate for State Engineer. But the fact that Mr. Cornell polled only a little over forty-seven per cent of the apparent aggregate vote of the State, shows that New York is not to be reckoned among the certain Republican States for next year. Another lesson may also be drawn from the returns. Mr. Wadsworth, nominated by the party as controller, received 20,000 more votes than were registered for Mr. Cornell as Governor—thus showing that the mighty power in politics known as "the machine" is not all-prevailing, but that a large proportion of the electors are influenced by considerations of the character of the candidate. It is a good sign that moral grounds weigh at the polls apart from mere expediency of party interests.

Senator Bayard Spoke Words of Wisdom worthy the attention of patriots of all parties, on the occasion of the brilliant reception accorded him at Wilmington, Del., November 11th, on his return from Europe. He drew a contrast between the governments of the old world and the new, favorable to the latter, but he said: "My sense of admiration for our system of government is accompanied by an apprehensive realization of the conditions under which only it can be practically and permanently maintained. And the conviction grows stronger and clearer daily that such a government can only be maintained by the exercise and employment of the higher and better qualities of human nature. It is a government of laws emanating from popular will, but that will must be for honest and worthy ends, accomplished by honorable means. It is controlled by public opinion, but that opinion must be the intelligent result of knowledge carefully acquired, and deliberation, and not the unstable froth of tumult and gusty passion. And to make public principles secure, they must be engrafted on private honor; the wishes of an intelligent and upright constituency must be reflected by intelligent and upright representatives. To maintain this government of ours, such are some of the conditions, and it is upon the self-protecting elements of society that we must rely.

"Truly, we are a favored people, and in the full tide of that prosperity that seems fairly to have set in, let us, while availing ourselves of it, keep a sharp eye upon the dangers of over-trading and wild speculation, from the results of which we have so lately suffered. With prudent counsels, well-considered economies, and steadily prosecuted reforms, with suspicions and ill-will between our own people discouraged and put an end to, we shall have before us an era of prosperity which should gladden the heart of every man who loves this country."

A Railroad Catastrophe has occurred at St. Charles, Mo., which, but for the providential circumstance that only a few persons were on the train, might have turned out one of the most disastrous accidents on the railroad record. At St. Charles, the St. Louis, Kansas City and Northern Railroad crosses the Missouri River by an iron bridge, eighty feet above the stream. As a train crossed this bridge on the evening of November 8th, an entire span lost its bearing on the piers supporting it and fell horizontally into the river with seventeen cars which were then upon it; the engine and first car were saved by the breaking of the couplings uniting them to the hinder portion of the train. Seven passengers and a large number of cattle filled the wrecked cars. Three dead bodies were recovered and three men badly injured were rescued; the seventh passenger has not been found; it is supposed he is underneath the cars. It is difficult to imagine anything more appalling in the material world than this scene of the sudden descent of the bridge with its living burden into the river. It reminds us of that period of which St. Paul warns the world; 1 Thess. 5: 3.

Bright Eyes, the Indian Maiden who has accompanied Standing Bear to Boston, and who interprets his addresses, speaks with grace and eloquence to large assemblies. She is much talked of as a young lady of education and accomplishments, speaks English fluently, and awakens a deep sympathy for the "Native Americans" whose wrongs she pleads. It is announced that the Fisk Jubilee Singers will give them a benefit, and by this and other means a liberal purse will be made up in aid of the legal rights which the Poncas wish to bring before the United States Supreme Court at Washington. Since the Indians have been at Boston, a brother of Standing Bear's has been shot by the pale faces.

A Young Man was Shot at Cincinnati, November 14th, under circumstances which ought to be a warning to young people of both sexes. The newspaper report states that Mr. Charles Schener had been visiting a young lady named Miss Hoff for about eight months, when he made her an offer of marriage which she accepted. He gave her an "engagement ring," and was received by the young lady's family as her future husband. About three months ago he induced her, upon the strength of their engagement, to abandon her principles. She trusted him, and when she foresaw the consequences that were likely to result she went to him and asked him to marry her soon to avoid scandal and disgrace. He put her off on the pretext that he was not financially able to marry then.

Later, her brother went to see him, and to him Schener promised to arrange matters speedily, and make the girl his wife. But no steps were taken toward keeping that promise, and finally Miss Hoff, in desperation, went to his residence and insisted on having a decisive answer as to his intentions. With callous indifference. Schener said he did not believe he "should ever marry her." Upon this Miss Hoff drew a revolver and shot him through the heart.

As the result of the sin of those two young people, one lies dead and the other is in prison awaiting trial. "When lust hath conceived, it bringeth forth sin: and sin when it is finished bringeth forth death." (James 1: 15.)

Mission Work in New York was the Subject of an interesting statement by the Rev. A. F. Schauffler, at the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, on November 9th. He gave a short account of the operations of the five mission chapels—Dewitt in Greenwich Street, Calvary at the Five Points, Carmel in the Bowery, Lebanon in Columbia Street, and Olivet—supported by the society under which he acts. The first is intended for the floating seafaring population of the city, and its congregations are consequently very shifting and miscellaneous. The second works in concert with the Five Points House of Industry, and thus dips down to the very lowest stratum of the city population. The Sunday-school connected with it is well attended and doing a good work in one of the most squalid districts down town. Carmel works in concert with the Young Men's Christian Association, dealing almost exclusively with the floating population of the city, or rather with that large section of it whose members have lost all hope and sunk lower and lower until they are stranded and helpless, as well as hopeless. The number of persons in this class is not easy to estimate, but those who are most conversant with the matter place it as high as 25,000 in winter, and 15,000 during the summer months. Lebanon on the other hand, is situated in a tenement-house tract, and Olivet in such a tract inhabite in the main by Germans, at the rate of 407 persons to the square acre, a trifle more crowde than the neighborhood of St. Giles in London which registers 401 to the square acre. In enumerating the difficulties under which the missionary labors among the German populatio Mr. Schauffler said that one of the main obstacles to Sunday-school work was the stalwart rationalism of the heads of families. The quie persistent way in which these agencies are working is not generally known; but the results wi be proclaimed at the great day when "the Lor makes up His jewels."

A Roman Catholic Priest in Holyoke, Mass has experienced the evils of a Protestant gover ment by being found liable in $3433 damag for telling the people of his parish not to hi hacks from a certain livery stable-keeper nam Parker, who had disobeyed his commands. The commands were that none of the parishione should go to hear a Protestant preacher who w holding services in the town. Parker went hear the preacher, and was therefore excomm nicated, and the people were ordered to cea dealing with him. He lost half his business consequence, and so sued the priest in the S preme Court for damages, with the result abo stated.

The judge stated emphatically that no eccle astical authority ought to be in existence th attempted the injury of any man's business.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey brought th meetings at Cleveland, Ohio, to a close Nove ber 12th. Mr. Moody set out at once for Chica and Mr. Sankey went to his home in Pennsyl nia. Preparations are being made to rece them at St. Louis. A choir is organized in Young Men's Christian Association Hall by P fessor Hamilton to assist Mr. Sankey. The 3 Book will be used, and Mr. Sankey is expec to arrive a week before Mr. Moody to comp the training. The St. Louis branch of Evangelical Alliance will probably have cha of the arrangements. Prayers are being offe for a rich outpouring of the Divine blessing.

An Instance of the Ignorance otherwise w educated people sometimes display of the w of the Bible is related of two journalists in O Soon after the late Salmon P. Chase assu the gubernatorial chair, he issued his procla tion appointing a Thanksgiving-Day. The ernor composed his proclamation almost e sively of passages from the Bible, which he not designate as quotations, presuming every one would recognize them. The pr mation meeting the eyes of a Democratic itor, he pounced upon it at once, declared he had read it before—he couldn't exactl where, but he was sure that it was a down plagiarism from beginning to end! The day the Republican editor came out valiant defence of the governor, pronounced the c false and libellous, and challenged any ma ing to produce one single line of the procl tion that had ever appeared in print before

An Energetic Preacher.—It is Reported Dr. Atticus G. Haygood preached two and eighteen minutes at a Georgia camp-me on Foreign Missions. In the intensity appeals, he frequently struck the book-bo front of him with his hand, and ultimately it, but, not discomfited, added, as it fell wish I could break old prejudices as easily

Mr. Moody's Labors at Baltimore Last Year still continue to bear [illegible]. A Baltimore journal says: "A numbe[illegible] our churches are in the midst of revivals, many have been converted, prospects are very encouraging, and it is hoped this will be a grand year of soul-saving. October 12th, the pastor of Grace M. E. Church, one of the largest in the city, took fifty probationers nto full connection, many of whom were husbands and wives. These were chiefly the results of Mr. Moody's meetings at that church nearly a year ago. We might give many other interesting references to churches of a similar kind all over the bounds of the Baltimore Conference."

The Service of Fashion is not a Service free rom sacrifices, as physicians can prove. A fashionable lady, suffering from a complication of disorders, recently sought the advice of an eminent New York physician. Having related her ymptoms, which were of a character to cause erious alarm, she was surprised to hear him say imply, "Let me look at your shoes." In seeing them, he added, "I cannot treat a patient who wears shoes with such heels as those"—and politely bowed her out. What this wise doctor had the courage and fidelity to say, every capable physician would say, if he dared, to those of his female patients who submit themselves to the torture, and expose themselves to the perils, of wearing the inordinately high heels which have been fashionable during the past year or two.

A Providential Escape from Death Occurred recently at Pottsville, Penn. A miner was employed in a shaft on Sharp Mountain. He had ghted a fuse and was climbing to the surface y means of pegs in the side of the shaft. When within a few feet of the top one of the pegs gave ay, and the unfortunate man fell to the bottom, hirty feet below. One of his thighs was bro-en, and the splintered bones were pushed through two pairs of pantaloons. Notwithstanding his terrible injuries, he had sufficient presence of mind to crawl to the lighted fuse which had burned within a few inches of the charge and to smother it. If he had not done this he would have been blown to pieces when the ex-osion took place. He then crawled back to one of the earth buckets, got into it without as-stance, and was hoisted to the surface.

A Dying Message.—A Pathetic Fact has come to light in connection with the murder of Frank Dresser by the Utes. Dresser was the young man killed in Coal Creek Canyon, 130 miles from the agency—that is, about midway between the scene of the agency massacre and that of the Thornburgh fight. He crawled into cavern to die, but before expiring he wrote the llowing lines on a post near the entrance to his tomb:

"F. G. Dresser, died October 1, 1879. Have en here twenty hours. All killed at the agency. nd to mother."

There was another word that could not be de-phered between the words "send" and "mo-er." Some person had robbed the corpse of e outside clothing. There were bullet wounds two or three places, but the remains were not herwise disfigured.

A Large Bequest to Harvard.—The Boston ournal says that Walter Hastings, recently de-ased, left the bulk of his fortune, after the ath of his wife, to Harvard College. It is es-nated at $500,000, the largest donation ever ade to the college.

Vaccination Continues to be Bitterly Op-sed by some people from ignorance and by me others from mistaken religious scruples; t facts prove more stubborn than their oppo-ion, and during this century it has been sys-natically practised among all civilized nations, d the result has been almost the stamping out the once dreaded disease. In the Prussian ny vaccination was made compulsory about enty-five years ago, and small-pox is almost known in Prussia, though common enough in her parts of Germany. In England, during e latter half of the last century, nearly ten per nt of all the deaths were from small-pox; now en in crowded London less than two per cent of the mortality is due to small-pox. In New York City, with more than a million people, there were last year only fourteen cases of small-pox, and only two of these were fatal. In 1877 there was not a single fatal case of the disease in the city. This year there was a local epidemic in one of the wards, resulting in sixty-four cases and thirty-four deaths—nearly all among the unvaccinated tenement-house population. The Board of Health has caused 39,574 vaccinations to be performed on account of this outbreak. The transmission of constitutional diseases through vaccination can be avoided by the use of vaccine from a calf instead of from a human subject.

The Venerable Lovick Pierce, D.D., Father of Bishop Pierce, of the Methodist Episcopal Church, South, and, we believe, the oldest minister of Methodism, died on Monday, November 10th, in the 95th year of his age, and the seventy-fifth year of his itinerant ministry. He was the chief founder of Methodism in Georgia, and had for more than half a century been one of the most influential ministers in American Methodism. We expect to give his portrait and life shortly.

The True Position of the Unitarians in relation to the Christian Church has been strikingly illustrated by a movement in New York, Boston, and Cincinnati, for the interchange of pulpits between Unitarian ministers and certain Jewish Rabbis of what is called the reform party. The once favored descendants of Abraham are to this day under the curse they pronounced upon themselves when they said: "His blood be on us and on our children" (Matt. 27 : 25); and the curse will remain upon them, shutting them out from the promises given to Israel, till the day when they are to exclaim, "Blessed is He that cometh in the name of the Lord" (Matt. 23 : 39; Zech. 12 : 10; Rev. 1 : 7). To be a Jew is therefore to be our Lord's bitterest enemy upon earth, and the Unitarians have only shown what they are by this association with the Rabbis.

A Thief's Involuntary Exchange.—A Young lady of Philadelphia had her pocket picked of a wallet containing $5. On ascertaining her loss, she found that a diamond ring, pronounced to be worth $300, had slipped from the thief's finger during the operation and had remained in her pocket.

The Planet Jupiter is Shown by the Telescope to be enveloped in a dense cloud, but for many months past a vast rift has appeared in the cloud envelope. This opening has a length of fully 25,000 miles, a breadth of about 7000 miles, and it is to be noted, as not the least remarkable feature of this strange phenomenon, that since it was discovered the opening has changed markedly in size and shape, if not in position. The part of Jupiter's outer cloud envelope thus displaced cannot be less than 135,000,000 square miles in extent—in other words, the area of the gulf is nearly equal to that of all the sea-covered parts of our earth. Thus God is using the discoveries of modern science to warn men of His awful power in heaven and in earth, and to remind them that the world they live in will assuredly be burned up by fire one day.

The Civil Damage Liquor Law Exists in eighteen of the States of the Union. Their provisions are substantially the same, making dealers responsible pecuniarily for all harm resulting from the sale of alcoholic beverages. New York, Maine, Massachusetts, and Illinois have statutes precisely alike. If these laws were more generally enforced a great improvement would soon become manifest in the drinking habits of the community.

Biblical Things not Generally Known is a handy compendium of very various information bearing on nearly 550 texts of the Bible, much of which cannot be found in the usual Bible Dictionaries. It is capitally indexed. (Dick & Fitzgerald, New York.)

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London) for November has arrived, and may be obtained at the office of the CHRISTIAN HERALD at six cents a copy.

REFUGES OF LIES AND WHAT WILL BECOME OF THEM.

A New Sermon by C. H. Spurgeon.

"Judgment also will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet: and the hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies, and the waters shall overflow the hiding place."—ISAIAH 28 : 17.

The Day of Blessing also a Day of Judgment—I. The Lord Judging False Refuges—Three Tests of a Refuge—1. Is it Founded on Christ?—2. Does it Come through Faith?—3. Does it Produce Righteousness?—False Refuges—1. Moral Goodness—2. A Notion of Fate—3. Novel Doctrines—4. Religious Profession—5. A Hope that does not Sanctify—6. Old Experience—II. The Destruction of False Refuges—The Hailstorm—The Flood—III. The Lesson of Warning.

OVER against amazing mercy the Holy Spirit sets awakening judgment. The acceptable year of the Lord is also the day of vengeance of our God; and the sentence which shall confirm the righteous in his righteousness is attended by another, which saith, "He that is unjust let him be unjust still." When the Lord shall come to be glorified in His saints He will at the selfsame time take vengeance in flaming fire upon those who know Him not. In the present instance, in the sixteenth verse of this chapter, the Lord declares, "Behold I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone;" and then immediately in our text he speaks of another laying: "Judgment also will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet."

Upon the roses of grace grow the thorns of justice. Whenever the Lord bares His arm for mercy towards believers He gives a back stroke to His enemies. Hence even the activity of love wears a threatening aspect to those who abide impenitent—wedded to their sins—since it is accompanied by an energetic display of justice.

Take care that ye remember this, ye who are unbelievers and yet dream of some millennial benediction, or latter-day glory, which may bring salvation to you. Is it not written, "Woe unto you that desire the day of the Lord! to what end is it for you? the day of the Lord is darkness, and not light?" Whatever good may be in store for believers there is none for you. The pillar of fire which will give light to the Lord's Israel will be darkness to you, O ye Egyptians. To those who are out of Christ, even the greatest triumphs of divine love will be terrible; they shall behold and wonder and perish: they shall see the plentiful goodness of the Lord, but they shall not eat thereof, but die in the gate.

Our desire this morning is anxiously and solemnly to warn men of what will come of their wilfulness, and to lead them to look a little before them and spy out through the telescope of Scripture the sure future of their ungrounded hopes. Thus I trust they may be led to abandon all false refuges, and may be guided by the Spirit of God to accept the sure foundation which God has laid for His believing people. O how I long that you may all of you be right for eternity! I would not have one of you perish any more than I would wish to perish myself. O Holy Spirit, bless my feeble words to the good of these my beloved people. May my weakness of thought and speech never hinder thee from working, but the rather, in this hour of my infirmity, speak thou with the greatest power.

First, let us see the Lord judging false refuges; secondly, let us picture their destruction; and thirdly, let us take the warning which such a subject should convey to every thoughtful mind.

I. Let us see

THE LORD JUDGING MAN'S REFUGES.

He says, "Judgment also will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet." Observe that, however carelessly we may judge ourselves, God will not so judge us. We may take things at second-hand, and view them very lightly, but God makes personal observation, and takes a careful survey. We may foolishly say, "Do not let us trouble ourselves too much or become too anxious: things will no doubt come right one of these days;" but God is in earnest, and there is no trifling with Him.

THREE TESTS.

According to the connection of our text there are three ways by which we may all of us judge whether our confidences are refuges of lies or not.

1. For, first, if they are safe hiding-places, such as will bear the brunt of the coming storm, they are founded upon Christ. "Behold, I lay in Zion for a foundation a stone, a tried stone, a precious corner-stone, a sure foundation." Now examine, my dear friend, your hope for eternity. Is it the hope which God has set forth in Scripture? Is it based and bottomed upon the work of the Lord Jesus? For if not, as the Lord my God liveth, and as thy soul liveth, it will fail thee in the day of trial.

2. He then gives us a second test, and that is, if our confidence be a right one it comes to us through faith, for it is written in the 16th verse, "He that believeth shall not make haste." He shall not be confounded; he shall not run away in trepidation and alarm; he shall not be in a hurry to anticipate the day of blessing, nor be in distress about the hour of trial. "He that believeth" is the man whose soul is fixed on the sure foundation and therefore abides in peace.

3. A third test seems to me to be proposed in my text—"Judgment will I lay to the line, and righteousness to the plummet." Here, then, is the test of righteousness. If our hope is sound, it is a holy, sanctifying hope, which purges us from sin, and breeds in us all that is true and good. This is a test which some do not like to apply. They are wonderfully pleased when we are preaching the gospel of believing, but when it comes to fruit, to the declaration that true faith works by love, they fight shy of it; but I beseech you, my brethren, be not like unto these foolish persons. Court those tests which are the most searching and thorough, that you may make sure work for eternity. Exercise a loving severity toward your own soul. Be lenient to every other person, but be sternly severe to your own case.

We shall now apply the tests to certain refuges which I am sure will turn out to be

REFUGES OF LIES.

A few of these we will mention at length.

1. The first is the hope which some men ground upon their own moral goodness. "It will be all right with me," says one, "for I have not done any thing much amiss. If I have been faulty, we are poor, imperfect creatures, and we cannot help it. On the whole, my aims and objects have been greatly superior to those of the bulk of mankind. I do not think I can have incurred much wrath from God, or that I need be under any apprehension as to being judged of him at the last great day."

Alas, my friend, yours must be a refuge of lies, for it will not stand trial by the first plummet; it is not based upon the foundation which God has laid. Your hope has nothing to do with Christ, that precious corner-stone. It is evident that you do not want Him, or His blood, or His righteousness, for you are altogether independent of such help. Do you not see that, inasmuch as you rely upon your own moral goodness, you as good as tell the Lord that the gift of His dear Son and His death on Calvary were all a mistake, a Saviour was not required, and an atonement was not wanted? If you can save yourself so can others; and the whole plan of grace becomes an absurdity. I feel sure that since you cannot stand this first test your refuge is a false one.

Now try the second touchstone as to faith. You have no faith in God; your hope is not based on faith in Jesus; you have no faith except faith in yourself. You are trusting to the works of the law, but do you not know what the Scripture saith: "By the works of the law there shall be no flesh justified in His sight?" You are opposing the revelation of God: He declares that men are not saved by works but by grace, and you, on the other hand, claim salvation by your own works. You are under a gross delusion, and your trust is a refuge of lies.

2. I have noticed, however, in the second place, that a number of persons make a refuge for themselves out of the notion of fate. They say "every thing is settled and determined and ordained: and, therefore, if I am to be saved I shall be saved, and if I am to be lost I shall be lost. After all, we are creatures of circumstances, and are like the fish of the sea taken in a net, or sea-birds caught in the wind, driven we scarce know whither. Let us hope that all may come right at last, but we cannot help whatever may occur."

I have no hesitation in saying that this refuge is a refuge of lies. It would not endure one of the tests, and assuredly not the last, for its tendency is to deny all moral obligation, and hence it is no friend to holiness. It deliberately charges God with the creature's sin, and makes out the sinner to be the injured person, and clear of the guilt of his own acts. Many persuade themselves that they believe it, but it is such a poor, paltry shelter that I wonder they are not ashamed to mention it: in the bottom of their hearts those who urge it know better.

Look you here, good sir, and see your own inconsistency. Why did you punish your boy this morning for wilful disobedience? Why did you not say to him, "I will not chide with you, my son, nor chasten you, though you provoke me, for you cannot help it; you are ordained to it." The thief that broke into your house the other day — did you lie still and let him take your plate? If he was ordained to have it he would have it; why did you open the window and cry for help? When the thief was taken, did you say to the magistrate, "Do not punish him: he could not help it; no doubt some divine decree led him thereto?" The scoundrel that called you "liar" the other day, and knocked you down in the street—did you rise up and with a quiet smile thank him for it, for he could not help it; he was only the agent of a divine purpose, and the instrument of an omnipotent predestination which he could not resist? You never thought of such folly. You feel that those who injure you are responsible, and you treat them accordingly.

Now mark—you are responsible too. It is a truth that all things are fixed, but it is not a truth that therefore men may live in sin and lay the blame upon God. Whatever foreordination and predestination may be or may not be, they leave men free agents and responsible beings, or else both law and gospel are absurdities, and the Bible is ill-written. In other matters men act not on the supposed inferences of fate, but on the evident necessities of every-day life; why not in religion?

It may be true that every thing is fixed, and doubtless so it is, but because it is fixed whether I shall live or not do I therefore refuse to eat? Because it is fixed whether I shall sleep or not do I refuse to undress and get into my bed? Because it is predestinated whether I shall be rich or not do I leave my shop and get me away, and leave my goods to sell themselves? Nay, verily, predestination or no predestination, you are all eager to get gain. Men are not such idiots in other things as they pretend to be in the things of God.

The plea of fate is a fool's refuge, worthy only of a brainless sot. Since it will not stand even my feeble brush you may be sure that it will all dissolve beneath the iron rod of the Prince of truth. It is in vain for you to say, "We were delivered to work this iniquity," for ye know that ye sin willingly and ye refuse Christ deliberately. Ye choose the evil and turn your backs on the good, and therefore your ruin must be laid at your own doors. Cease, then, from the vain endeavor to justify yourselves, and seek unto the Lord and His Christ.

3. The third shelter of lies which many fly to is a hope based upon novel doctrines. Each age would fain have its own gospel, and the present is not behindhand in the desire to be its own prophet. Many are ready to help in this presumptuous design. Certain divines attain to eminence by undermining the Gospel they pretend to defend, and forging new theories upon the anvils of their own fancy. Men who would never have been known if they had acted honestly have gained a cheap notoriety by vending heresy, and yet wearing the garb and eating the bread of orthodoxy.

The most fashionable form of this evil just now is the production of novelties with regard to the future punishment of the wicked. False prophets prophesy smooth things, and talk of a larger hope—which being interpreted is this, that men may live very much as they like: but some time or other, and somehow or other, character will cease to operate upon destiny, and the righteous and the wicked will stand on a par. This is the old doctrine of falsehood with which the sinner blesses himself in his heart, saying, "I shall have peace, though I walk in the imagination of mine heart."

In this refuge there is no Christ, and no faith in Him, and assuredly there is nothing in it that conduces to holiness. Mark its influence whereever it is received. When any of our friends embrace the novel theology, do they become more devout, more earnest, more gracious, more holy, as the result of it? I think not. Are these the persons who make our prayer-meetings a power? Are these the winners of souls? Are these the men who speak much of Jesus, and live in daily fellowship with Him? Do we see them more careful to avoid conformity to the world? Our witness is that the consequence are the reverse.

At any rate, sirs, suppose your larger hop should turn out to be correct, in what respec will the orthodox be the losers? But suppos your larger hope should turn out to be a mer delusion, what will become of you who ventur your all upon it? We are in any case upon t safe side of the hedge, and this is no small advai tage when the weightiest interests are at stak Suppose there shall be no hell, if I am a believ in Christ it matters not to me; but suppose the is—and there is—then you who are unbelieve are in an evil plight. If you do not catch th will-o'-the-wisp of a larger hope, as I believe y never will, then where are you?

It behooves every man not only to make su but to make doubly sure. About the soul want the utmost certainty. I would counsel y to dig deep, and see what you are resting on. would have you make sure that you do not p mit a falsehood to lie like a worm at the root your hope. Seek to know the reason for y building on Christ, and when you have asc tained that, then look for God's warrant placing stone upon stone in the upbuilding, without this do not rest. Nothing but div authority ought to content you in the busin of eternity. The views and hypotheses of learned Dr. Somebody are of no value to me, I can theorize for myself if I have a mind to. want fact and certainties, for I dread ev refuge of lies.

4. Alas, we have another brood of men wh refuge is that they make a profession of relig "I am always at a place of worship," says o "I am never absent from a single service, what is more, I joined the church some y ago, and I have kept up my membership have been baptized, and I come to the Lo table with great regularity, and I feel a g deal of pleasure in religious exercises. I am not sure that I was ever born again; I am not sure that I ever repented of sin; I am not sure I try to live a holy life, but still I am a mem of a church, and that is a great comfort to

Ah, my brethren, this will not do: for u this membership of yours with a visible church is backed up by holy living, and unless there is an inward resting upon Jesus Christ and a vital faith whereby you held fast to Him, your name may be on the church roll, but it will not be found written in the Lamb's book of life, and this profession of yours, instead of blessing you will curse you. If you are not savingly converted, you are guilty of a daily hypocrisy, and chargeable with sacrilege for appropriating sacred things to which you have no right.

If you are doing very little for your Lord and Master compared with others you may well be very anxious and careful, for the doom of unprofitable servants is not a light one, and barren trees are not always allowed to stand. "Oh," saith one, "But I do not like heart searching." Then I am afraid of you. You who do not examine yourselves, you who are not willing to be tested and tried by the Word of God, you cause us serious suspicion lest you may have built very rapidly with wood, hay, stubble, and yet your whole structure will be consumed in the last great fire.

5. Let me speak a word concerning certain who have a hope of being saved which does not sanctify them ; for there are professors who feel sure they are Christians and will go to heaven, and yet they show no sign of being prepared for it. They live as others live, and yet imagine that they shall not die as others die. They have an outward film of morality upon their lives, but underneath it there is worldliness and love of sinful pleasure. How dare they hope? If they sow iniquity shall they reap perfection? Can a man go to heaven who is not heavenly? Can lovers of worldly pleasure enter into the dwellings of the perfect? O sirs, if your hope does not lead you to follow after holiness, away with it. God help you to away with it at once and to begin aright. Above all things, dread an empty, baseless hope of heaven, for it will make hell all the more terrible.

6. Some, too, make a refuge of their old experience. Now an old experience which is all old is a manifest deception. A true experience continues and grows day by day. Not with one even pace each day; but still, as a whole, the divine life goes forward to perfection; and where it does not do so, but comes to an end, it is not the divine life at all.

Have you never heard of the man who wrote out his experience of religion when a young man, that he might fall back upon it in after years? He lived in neglect of all godliness; but having already experienced religion, as he said, and having made a record of it, and put it away with the title-deeds of his farm, he dreamed that when he came to die he might fetch it out and comfort himself with his evidences of salvation. His daughter went to the drawer and found that the mice had eaten it. Ah, dear me, it was not much loss, for that hope which is grounded on a musty experience, which is not supported by a present love of God, and present prayer, and present fellowship, and present striving against sin, is a lie.

It is all in vain to say, "I know I did experience such and such a thing a dozen years ago when I joined the church." What of that? If a man is alive now he does not need to prove it by going back to the records of his youth. Present life is its own evidence. If you are not living to God to-day, I care not a button what you profess to have done twenty years ago. If you had a true faith then, you have it now; and if you have no faith now, you are in the gall of bitterness. It is true that he that believeth in Christ is saved, but we must have proof of it in the consequent life. If the man is not saved from living in sin, we infer that he has not believed; and if he does not persevere to the end, we are sure that he is not one of the Lord's own; "for if any man draw back," saith the Lord, "My soul shall have no pleasure in him." This is the test of true faith; those who have really believed do not draw back unto perdition, for they have believed unto the salvation of their souls. Oh, then, I pray you, if your imaginary experience in former times has dissolved into present carelessness and sin, do not attempt to hide behind it. It will not endure the line and the plummet, therefore put it away, and seek unto God this day that He may begin a sound work of grace upon your souls.

I hope I have said enough by way of laying the line and the plummet to false refuges. May the Lord arouse the carnally secure and lead them to forsake their useless hiding places to shelter themselves in Christ.

II. Very briefly let us in the second place picture

THE DESTRUCTION OF THESE REFUGES OF LIES.

A man has been very comfortable in one or other of these refuges for a good number of years, but at last he is getting old, and is laid aside to think; infirmities are increasing, death is drawing nigh, and he takes a look into the dark future. He finds himself facing an eternal state, and he has need of all of his confidences and hopes to sustain him. Now what happens? His spirit undergoes a great storm, and what is the result? Does he dwell in a fortress which defies the hurricane? No, his shelter is so frail that, according to the text, "the hail shall sweep away the refuges of lies."

A cold, hard truth falls from heaven like a hailstone, and crashes right through the glass roof of his false confidence. He looks up astonished, and lo! another and another forgotten truth descends with like violence and crushes through all opposition till it smites his soul. He had always hoped, good, easy man, that sunshine and quiet would last forever, and then his glass house would have been all he needed. He never reckoned on these hailstones. Great truths which he forgot, neglected, and despised, come rattling down upon him from heaven pitilessly, in awful earnest and with deadly aim. He must think, and he has much to think of, and no means of forgetting any of it. His conscience, which he tried to smother, awakes, and as it awakes the big hailstones of truth come through his roof faster and faster. Down falls all his comfort and peace of mind, as hailstone after hailstone pounds all his hope to pieces.

"After all, I never was born again and the Scripture hath well said, 'Ye must be born again.' I never yielded up my selfishness, and I cannot be saved unless Christ is my King. I did not really close in with Christ and cast my naked soul on Him: I trusted in something else, and I am lost forever." Great hailstones thus follow each other, and against them the deceived heart has no defence.

Presently the storm comes up with tremendous wind, and the hailstones are hurled forward like terrible artillery, and the naked soul finds its refuge utterly swept away; not a vestige of it remains. Refuge fails the man, and his soul, unhoused, unsheltered, starts back in horror. It starts back in vain. God has now to be met, and the soul has no hiding-place. The fire eyes of the Most High are burning the heart through and through, and rocks and hill refuse a shelter. God grant that this may not be your case, and that it may not be mine. May it never be said of us, "When they shall say, Peace and safety; then sudden destruction cometh upon them, as travail upon a woman with child; and they shall not escape." Let us fly to Jesus at once. Let us most solemnly exercise faith in Him now. I pause while this is done. Is it so? Have you rested upon the Son of God for every thing? Then you may go forward, and neither fear hailstones nor coals of fire, for he that believeth in Him shall never be confounded.

Another impressive picture is set before us in the text. "The flood shall overflow his hiding-place." Imagine one who in the time of Noah's flood does not choose to enter into the ark, for he does not care to be tied down to God's way of deliverance. Salvation by an ark is too simple, too childish; he wants a more philosophic way. Besides, he does not care to be cooped up with Noah and a handful of narrow-minded people, who shut themselves in and shut everybody else out.

He has broader views, and therefore he has found a shelter on the side of the hill, in a great cave where thousands can assemble, and enjoy a liberty denied them within the pale of the ark. It is utterly preposterous to suppose the flood will ever reach so high as this elevated cave. It is hundreds of feet above the plain, and in the judgment of the wisest men it is more than safe.

After a day or two of extraordinary rain the man would look down from his hiding-place and see the waters covering all the lower area, and creeping up the valleys foot by foot, and he would remark upon the abundance of rain, but scoff at the idea of a general deluge. He would be easy, hoping that the rain would cease, but as it continued he would begin to think, "I may not be quite so safe after all." Imagine his horror when the flood at last fills up the ravine, and creeps up the rocky steep. With cruel lip, seeking his destruction, the water threatens the cave wherein he thought to dwell so safely. At last it penetrates his hiding-place, it climbs to the very roof, it sweeps over his head, and his false confidence has proved his ruin. Such will be the end of all who hide themselves, but hide not in Christ.

I will tell you in what fashion this overthrow will come. First, the mirth of the mind is damped with doubt. The man does not feel so easy as he used to be; he is afraid that God's Word may be true, and that things will go amiss with him. Soon the doubt has oozed into his refuge, and become a pool of fear: the man is sadly afraid, and the dread saturates and dissolves all his joy. The truth of God's Word still further comes home to his conscience, and he begins to be more and more alarmed: nor does he continue long in one stay, for he is growing distressed; the waters are evidently advancing upon him, and he cannot escape. He has come to be altogether dismayed; he hardly knows what will become of him; and within a little while, unless God's mercy shall prevent and enable him to find the true shelter, he will be drenched in despair and washed away in terror. At last he cannot believe that there is any salvation possible for him; he hears death and hell approaching, and his flesh creeps with horror.

Let him alone, and you will find him filled with terror. If his conscience is really awake he will dread to go to sleep at night lest he should never wake again. I have seen such in their dying moments afraid of every thing, fearing alike to live or to die. At last the man is taken away, and where is he? Lost, lost, lost! The hail has swept away his refuge, and the flood has overwhelmed his hiding-place. He hath perished forever from the presence of the Lord and from the glory of His power. None can find a ransom for him; he rejected the foundation which God laid, and sought to find a refuge for himself, and he has been taken away in his presumption.

III. Time fails us, but I want you to learn

THE LESSON OF WARNING

which I have just strength enough to indicate in a few words. May the Holy Spirit bless it, though I am scarcely able to express my thoughts.

The first lesson of warning is—let us build on God's foundation. He knows better than we do what is right and safe. Come, ye wise people, be as children and believe your God. Come, ye who like something of your own imagining, and yield your own fancies for once. Indulge your whims upon some common business, but in this matter it will be safer surely to believe God's Word than to continue dreaming and devising for yourself.

You may be a very intelligent person, but will you compete in intelligence with God? Very likely you may know a hundred times more than I do; you may know a thousand times more if you choose to think so, but you cannot have a better hope than mine, for I rest on Jesus Christ alone. You may have what hope you like, but I would not change with you for all your learning. My hope lies in simply coming to Jesus, and depending upon Him, and learning how to love Him. I recommend the same to you. Come, and from the love of Jesus learn how to be a Christian; learn to be holy; learn to be unselfish; learn to live according to God's Word.

There is a power about faith in Christ to give a man the mastery over himself, a power to be found nowhere else. I have seen the drunkard, the thief, the harlot, believe in Jesus Christ and become converted, and from that very day they have become gracious, godly, pure-minded people. I have never seen any thing else make such a change in men as faith does. We may surely speak as we find, and use a remedy of which we see the cure. We have, moreover, tried it ourselves, and therefore we speak what we do know. Therefore come and rest in Jesus, and when you come to die you will at least be able to feel, "I have God's sanction for the foundation I have built upon, and therefore it cannot fail." O may the Holy Spirit bring you to this!

Again, let your refuge be wholly built up of divine truth. Do not try to comfort yourself with a lie. Dear friend, let truth be all in all to you. Counterfeit coin enriches no man. Have nothing to do with false and flattering teachings. If your hope is not built on solid, substantial matters of fact, give it up, and get one that is. If your hope of being saved depends on a dream, or a voice you thought you heard in the air, or some other such nonsense, put it away.

Build upon your Lord's life, death, and resurrection; build upon God's promises; build by the work of the Holy Ghost with faith, and you shall have the reward of eternal life. In a word, rest on Jesus, the eternal Son of God, made flesh, and bleeding to the death for man; build on His complete work and there only, and then if winds blow and waters rage you shall be safe, safe forever. God bless you, for Christ's sake. Amen.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON'S SERMONS ARE PUBLISHED AND INSERTED IN THIS JOURNAL WITH HIS CONCURRENCE, AND REVISED BY HIMSELF.

THE LONDON BUTCHERS' FESTIVAL.

SOMETHING like an ovation was accorded to Mr. Henry Varley as he presented himself to the vast company that filled the Metropolitan Tabernacle (Mr. Spurgeon's) on Oct. 14th. It was his first public introduction to his old friends the journeyman butchers of Smithfield Market since his return from Australia. The occasion was the butchers' annual festival, originated some fourteen years ago by Mr. Varley and his friends. For some years it has been held in the Tabernacle, and now it threatens to overflow even that prince of meeting-houses.

Mr. Varley stated that they had been obliged this year to forego the company of the men employed in the Bermondsey skin market, for want of room. He hoped these brethren would not reward them with "a tanning;" if so, the butchers would be obliged to give them "a hiding" in return. Mr. Varley only meets the butchers face to face once a year, and he makes the most of his opportunity. The points on which he dwelt chiefly were intemperance and gambling. These he strongly denounced, and earnestly besought his hearers to forswear them at once and forever. He drew special attention to the illegal and lawless proceedings of certain members of the betting fraternity who frequented the market, inducing the butchers to bet until some of them have scarcely a shilling left to go home with.

Passing from these matters Mr. Varley said that one of the swiftest ways to destruction was for a man or any number of men to come in contact with saving truth and to reject it. Nothing was so hardening as that. With the deepest sorrow he had seen scores of men in the market, who, he believed, were far worse to-day than they were three years ago.

Then came an address by Mr. Spurgeon, who heartily welcomed the butchers, and thanked them for their generosity in connection with the recent bazaar at the Tabernacle. He referred to the notion entertained by some that the interests of masters and men are conflicting. This he scouted as an absurdity, and counselled them to "pull together." Though they lived by killing, that was no reason why they should seek to kill one another. He would raise everybody's salary all round, though he was of opinion that many men could raise their own salaries.

If a man makes himself worth more it would soon be discovered, and if he is worth more he ought to have more. Turning to the questions of drunkenness, gambling, bad language, and improvidence, Mr. Spurgeon, in a tone of playful banter, which is perhaps more effective than mere denunciation, appealed to them not to disgrace "the sky blue" [referring to the color of the English butchers' dress] and destroy their manliness by such evil practices. He backed up his appeals by some terrible illustrations of the tyranny of drink that had come under his own notice.

"I do not know how it is with you in the market, Mr. Spurgeon continued—but working men often act very unjustly towards Christian men who work with them. I know some Christian men who have a hard time of it in the shops where they work. Their fellow-workmen are always jeering and jesting at them, calling them hypocrites, and I don't know what. If they are hypocrites, call them so—if it is any business of yours; but if they are sincere why should they be set upon? I have known drunkards, swearers, and loose-living men whom their fellows have not avoided; on the contrary, they have said they were jolly good fellows.

But the moment these men have been converted, and have become honest, sober, decent members of society, all the others have been down upon them. Such things ought not to be. This is a free country, and if you have a right to swear I have a right not to swear. If one man has a right to drink, another man has a right to be sober. If you have a right to stop away from church on Sunday, I have a right to attend it. It is not fair that working-men should become the objects of petty persecution. Don't do it, you fellows of the true blue; let the sneaks do it. If you do not care to go to heaven, let another man go. By the way, do you know the way to heaven? It is "the first turning to the right, by the cross, and straight on."

AT SINGAPORE BARRACKS.

Recollections by Major Malan.

My First Desire to Show what a Christian Officer could do for Soldiers in a Desolate Place—It is Fulfilled at Singapore—Dreadful State of the Barracks Producing Drunkenness—Nature and Mode of Great Improvements Introduced.

FROM the time that God in His mercy led me to believe His Word my whole heart was set on trying to glorify Him in the army. My desires were all to this end; and when our desires are in accordance with His will, we may leave them to Him to fulfil according to His infinite power and wisdom. "In all thy ways acknowledge Him, and He shall direct thy paths" (Prov. 3:6).

Often and often, when riding or walking alone, I had thought, "How I should like to be in command of a body of our men in some desolate island or solitary place, where there was nothing comfortable, and every thing for the men's comfort depended on me! How I should like to show them what a Christian commanding officer could do! I would let them see, by God's grace, that a Christian can work as well as any other man." This desire had recurred again and again in my mind, and various were the plans I had formed for certain contingencies.

The island of Singapore was the place in which this desire was to be fulfilled. Thither, in His own time, God led me. I found, on my arrival there, that the men of my regiment were in a state of the utmost discomfort. The barracks were only recently occupied, and had been built in the centre of a tropical jungle. The vegetation was luxuriant enough all round; but as it swarmed with cobras, rats, frogs, and mosquitoes up to within a few feet of the very doors of their barrack-rooms, it can be believed that there was not much comfort.

The snakes came into barracks at pleasure, the frogs croaked all night, the mosquitoes gave the men no sleep. This is not exaggerated. Soldiers who have lived in barracks under such circumstances know how true this sketch is. Add to this intense heat—Singapore being within a few miles of the equator—and the reader can picture to himself the condition of things. There was no clear space for out-door games; and a small parade ground and the high roads, with jungle on either side, were the only places for exercise.

My brother major had done his best to find amusement for the men, had got such things as he could procure in Singapore, and had opened a recreation-room. But this could not, of course, obviate the discomfort of the barracks; and the heat, and sleepless nights, and no out-door recreation, caused a crowded canteen and a great deal of drunkenness. When men do not know better, and have no higher source of power against misery, they will drink.

Such was the state of things when I was put in command of those barracks. I saw the great need of some earnest and decisive measures to check the drunkenness by rendering the men more comfortable; but the obstacles appeared insurmountable. There was one resource for me, before which all difficulties vanish, and that was prayer. I felt that I was responsible, alike to God and to my country, for the lives of these men; and that, unless something was done, many of them would perish by drink, and others would commit fearful crimes.

I had studied the history of courts-martial, and I knew what things men have done in India under similar circumstances, simply to escape, by means of transportation, from such a state of misery. I remembered Solomon's prayer for wisdom, and I opened my Bible, and earnestly did I pray it: "Now, O Lord God, let Thy promise be established; for Thou hast made me. . . . . Give me now wisdom and knowledge, that I may go out and come in before this people: for who can judge?" (2 Chron. 1:9, 10).

The Tanglin Barracks, at Singapore, are situated on two high plateaux, on one of which stand nine bungalows, and on the other two, forming the hospital. These large buildings, so placed as to allow a free circulation of air between them, covered a large extent of ground. To clear the jungle all round them to a sufficient distance was no easy matter. It is one thing to cut down cover in England, another to clear jungle on the equator.

Any encroachment on nature there is vigorously defended by the red ant. When any one has had half a dozen of these down his back he does not care for more. This rendered it impracticable for me to employ my fellow-soldiers in clearing the jungle. Moreover, the constant heavy tropical showers make vegetation so rapid that, unless every shrub is not only cut down but rooted up, the jungle will grow again as strong as ever in a few months. There was another difficulty—the barracks were thatched, and there was a certain danger in burning the jungle within a few feet of those large roofs.

I rode round the barracks day by day after my arrival thinking. On one occasion I saw a large black cobra, which had been killed in a barrack-room in the morning. I had prayed to God and I felt it to be my duty, for my men's sake to work, leaving the result in His hands. Th jungle must be cleared.

The first beginning was that part which form the garden, between the barracks and the cricke ground. It was then jungle, so high that, stanc ing in the road at the bottom of the path, yo could not see the bungalow above it. I wante to make a short cut for those on duty betwee the main road and the guard and orderly-room

This was begun by the defaulters—men und punishment; but finding that they were annoye by the red ant, I determined to employ nati labor, and sent my own gardener and a coolie cut down the remainder.

The wonderful change the clearing of this made in the appearance of the barracks—remc ing gloom, and letting in light—and the inter which the men took in this first beginning, couraged me to go on. Happily for my m the officer commanding the troops at Singap took a deep interest in the British soldier, a when I told him my plans for their comfort, once offered to help me, out of a public fund his disposal for the improvement of Governm property.

With this help, with some assistance from the canteen fund, and giving the men the services of my Malay gardener and coolie, I determined to work in earnest. I issued an order that men who were willing to work for the public benefit and for the improvement of Government property should be excused all parades except commanding officer's parade once a week; names to be sent into the orderly-room. I had the willing consent of the whole detachment—400 men. I obtained pickaxes, spades, wheelbarrows, and grass knives from the commissariat.

Then I put the eight Malay coolies under my gardener—a very intelligent man, who was not a little proud of his authority—and gave him my directions as to the clearing of the jungle. As fast as it was cut down by the Malays the British soldiers gathered it, and then, with the pickaxes, they dug up the roots. I had four companies, and I generally worked two at a time in different places.

I was one day going round the barracks on duty, not long after the first clearing had been made, when I halted outside a barrack-room which stands above the cricket ground. Looking down upon what was then thick jungle between me and the canteen, I said to my sergeant-major, "Sergeant-major, what a capital place this would make for a cricket ground! I'm an old cricketer; I used to be very fond of cricket. I'll tell you what it is, we'll make a cricket ground. It would be good amusement for the men."

I looked at his face. There was a very placid smile upon it; and while he stood strictly at attention, he looked at me, as much as to say, "If you had the whole army here you would not do it." Within six months of that time the jungle was gone, and there, in its place, was a cricket ground, having a turfed level ninety yards long, forty wide, and this level having been made in the slope of a hill!

How often, after it was finished, as I rode or walked up to the hospital to talk to some sick comrade, have I seen the slopes of the barracks covered with men watching their comrades at play; and how I have lifted up my heart in thanks and praise to God, who gave me the wisdom, energy, and faith in Him to attempt and carry out such an undertaking!

REVOLUTIONARY EUROPE.

Nihilism in Russia—Socialism in Germany—Communism in France—Nascent Socialism in England —America—European Thrones only Supported by Military Force—Conscripted Soldiers Democratic—Coming Increase of Priestly Authority—Tendency toward War, not Peace.

Notwithstanding the present revival of trade in America and consequent improvement in the iron and coal markets in England, there are abundant premonitory signs of an approaching "distress of nations with perplexity," and of the latter day unparalleled "time of trouble," preparatory to the Second Coming of Christ (Dan. 12:1, 2; Matt. 24:21; Rev. 16:12–21, etc.).

These premonitory signs were with singular ability grouped together in an article in a London daily paper—the Pall Mall Gazette of October 8th—which is characterized as describing in a calm and comprehensive manner a condition of things which demands the serious consideration of thoughtful men and women everywhere. May the Church of the Living God be led into deep searchings of heart and be instant in prayer that she may have such understanding of these signs of the times that she shall know what, as the Lord's Israel, she ought to do. The Pall Mall Gazette says:

"It is a commonplace among English Radicals that the revolutionary epoch in politics is virtually closed. That they should entertain such an opinion in the existing state of the world proves how completely they have lost the power of appreciating the real drift of events. The truth is, we apprehend, that since the outbreak of the French Revolution what we may call the volcanic forces of society were never so threatening as at the present time; and their action was much less diffused then than it is now.

"NIHILISM AND PANSLAVISM IN RUSSIA.

"At that time Russia, for instance, was hardly affected by the wild passions which convulsed Western Europe; but in our day the majority of her population are profoundly discontented. The more moderate section of the community would doubtless be satisfied if some approach were made to the establishment of constitutional government. The Nihilists as a body, however, demand nothing short of complete social reorganization, and their agitation is made all the more dangerous by the fact that it is associated with a vehement enthusiasm for the scheme of a vast Panslavonic empire. Moreover, agrarian discontent has largely increased of late in Russia, and the government is evidently disturbed by the progress it has already made.

"SOCIALISM IN GERMANY.

"In Germany the police have succeeded for the moment in silencing the Socialists; but no sensible German imagines that the party has been broken up or even weakened. The Socialist leaders themselves do not hide their conviction that Prince Bismarck did them excellent service in treating them with undue severity; indeed, some of them assert that at the next general election for the Imperial Parliament they will be able to double the number of their representatives.

"COMMUNISM IN FRANCE.

"The Imperialists, the Legitimists, and the Orleanists, however widely they may differ on other subjects, are agreed in believing that France has still before her a period of revolutionary excitement; and though the Communist rising was rigorously suppressed, it does not follow that Communist sentiment and opinion were suppressed also. The politicians who admire the Radicals Blanqui and Rochefort may think it expedient to keep in the background for a time; but it would be unreasonable to suppose that they have abandoned what were quite recently their most fervent beliefs, or that they would fail to take advantage of an opportunity favorable to their hopes.

"BUDDING SOCIALISM IN ENGLAND.

"England herself is not, perhaps, quite so safe from the general peril as she is usually represented to be both here and on the Continent. At this moment an agitation of a distinctly Socialistic character is being carried on in Ireland; and although we need not fear that Englishmen of any class in our day would go so far as to clamor for the death of landlords who insist on their legal rights, there are symptoms of change among ourselves which it would be folly to neglect.

"The English working classes seem to be indifferent to the proposals which the Liberals hope to carry after regaining office. They manifest but a languid interest in schemes for the redistribution of seats and for the extension of the franchise; and most of them have no friendship for a so-called 'reform of the land laws' which seems designed to bring as much land as possible into the hands of prosperous manufacturers. What they really care about is the relation of capital and labor; and it is easy to detect in many of the speeches and writings which are understood to represent their genuine opinions a 'note' that has hitherto been absent from English politics.

"In disputes between employers and employed there is an exasperation of feeling which was unknown to previous generations except in times of severe distress. The conviction that labor is inadequately rewarded at all times, and that wages ought to be regulated by some other law than that of supply and demand, is steadily gaining ground. English as well as other men are capable of being misled, and it appears certain that many of our fellow-countrymen have begun to accept principles which, if logically carried out, lead to Socialism.

"AMERICA.

"In America a considerable party has been formed whose aims are of the most extreme Socialist character—a fact which is not only noteworthy as another sign of an almost universal tendency, but because working men in England are naturally more apt to accept American doctrine on such matters than the teaching of French and German reformers.

"EUROPEAN THRONES ONLY SUPPORTED BY MILITARY FORCE.

"The leading Continental nations are very much in this position—they depend for the maintenance of order on their armies. But for the great military force at their disposal the thrones of 'the three Emperors' of Russia, Germany, and Austria would be far less stable than they are; nor is it certain that M. Grévy would be long in the Elysée if the French Republic trusted solely to moral support. People on the Continent have become so accustomed to this state of things that few of them reflect upon it.

"In all great historical epochs public order has been secured chiefly by the existence of institutions in harmony with the general sentiment; and when rulers have been compelled to rely principally upon physical force, an outburst of destructive passion has rarely been far off. What makes the present position of Europe yet more exceptional is, that the weapon of military force, which is alone regarded as effective against revolution, may at any moment break in the hands of those who use it. Hired mercenary troops are, as a rule, the ready instrument of the government which pays them; but

"NATIONAL ARMIES OF CONSCRIPTED SOLDIERS, such as those which now prevail all over the Continent, can be trusted only when the executive power fairly represents popular aspirations. It is well known that in Russia and Germany every regiment contains men in sympathy with Communists and Socialists. How far the evil has spread no one can tell; but Socialist agitators, who recognize as clearly as their opponents the more important points in the situation, spare no pains to influence the soldiery who belong to the working class, where their principles are most prevalent, and their success may already have been greater than is commonly believed.

"Another ominous fact is, that the enemies of existing institutions are not all of them mere ignorant fanatics. Herr Bamberger quite recently warned the Germans that one of the chief dangers of the new movement was that it received support from writers of considerable intellectual eminence. A good many men of ardent temperament, being destitute of the religious faith which would have given them an outlet for their feelings, find a substitute for it in devotion to vague schemes for the regeneration of mankind. Agitators of this kind bring to their work an amount of zeal which would have won for them a high place as Jesuit missionaries, and which is all the more likely to be lasting because of its apparent disinterestedness.

"It is probable that one of the first results of the strong revolutionary impulse in Europe will be an "INCREASE OF PRIESTLY AUTHORITY.

"There is hardly a continental country in which the cry has not been raised that the evils which threaten society are due to the decay of religion, and the clergy of all persuasions are profiting by the general alarm. They proclaim that unless they are allowed to control education ruin must overtake society, and the frightened middle class is beginning to ask whether, after all, their pretensions are wholly baseless. The constituencies of Prussia are apparently about to send to Berlin a Parliament which will place the schools of that country under the sway of the Ultramontanes and the extreme section of the orthodox Lutherans.

"In France the Government has been made aware that public opinion would not support it in depriving the Jesuits of their present hold over the educational system of the nation; and one of the principal aims of the new Austrian Ministry must be to restore to the Church some of the powers which were recently taken from it. The influence of Communism, therefore, tends to divide society into two classes widely separated from each other—Socialists without any belief in the creeds handed down from preceding generations, the other and Ultramontanes subject to an exacting ecclesiastical tyranny.

" TENDENCY TOWARD WAR, NOT PEACE.

" The same causes may be expected to have a profound effect on the action of Government. Prince Bismarck has more than once appeared to imply that the demand of workmen for State aid in the establishment of productive associations is worthy of consideration and the existence of a 'Christian Socialist' party in Germany, which is to some extent favored by the Court, is an indication that the German Government may promote Socialism in some form.

" Probably, also, some of those who control the political destines of Europe will sooner or later believe themselves compelled to divert popular attention from home difficulties by the excitement of war. The Russo-Turkish war was caused in part by the Czar's dread of Nihilism, and the fear of Socialism may easily lead in other countries to similar consequences. The masses can never be satisfied while excessive military burdens cripple industry; and Bismarck, at least, may hope that another great war would enable him to reduce these burdens by half."

THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

(Continued from page 895.)

A WELCOME BEQUEST.

OUTER things at Eureka House looked wondrously little changed to Ellen Morris. What stranger would have deemed that the pleasant English country-house, with its velvet lawn, its neatly clipped yews, its flower-beds bright with flowers, had been the scene but a week before of a death, and a death so fearful! The ruts in the gravel-drive had been made by the wheels of a hearse, but nature had smiled as brightly as the black procession had moved past the laurel border, as if some bridal train had gone by!

So exactly did the lodge and its grounds now look as they had looked a twelvemonth before, that it almost seemed as if Ellen had but awoke from a long terrible dream, and that she would find her mistress reclining as usual on her sofa with her knitting in her hand, and perhaps catch a glimpse of her master, in his blue spectacles, stooping over his desk!

Alec Stewart met Robert and his sister at the door of Eureka House; he had been waiting for their arrival. The old servant's usually gloomy face wore a more kindly expression than was often seen on his hard features, as he rung the hand of Ellen Morris. He then turned to her brother.

" Tell Effie," said Alec, " that Miss Temple wishes me to remain with her here; she is now my mistress, and says that I am never to leave her. I am trusted with the charge of arranging, and packing, and numbering my poor master's collection; it is going off to London next week, cobras and all.

" I can scarcely believe yet that all will so soon be cleared off. Depend on't, we'll be having mothers' meetings, and Bible classes, and children's feasts, and all that kind of thing, some day in the big room in which the books, the bottles, and the beetles, the cases of butterflies and the cases of shells, the skulls, and the adders used to be kept!

" Poor master! poor master! he little thought how soon all would be changed in his house!" And with a sigh to the memory of one for whom few others breathed a sigh, the old butler led the way to what was still the Museum.

Edith passed almost all her time in this room, painful as were to her the associations which it brought to her mind. Miss Temple was engaged in arranging for the removal of the collection which Mr. Vernon had bequeathed to the nation, and also in looking over his papers, for she was his sole executrix as well as his heiress.

Edith's earnest hope was that she might find amongst these papers that recipe for the cure of snake-bites which would be of such priceless value to the world. The death of the discoverer of the antidote did not weaken his niece's faith in the balsam, for in his case the remedy had not been applied until life had been almost extinct.

So anxious was Edith that mankind should not lose the benefit of Mr. Vernon's discovery, that she would readily, nay joyfully, have exchanged all the property which he had left her for one scrap of paper containing the recipe for his balsam.

But the philosopher, in his dread of any one's finding out his secret, and so robbing him of his expected reward, had delayed committing his recipe to paper. To write it out to his dictation had been, indeed, one of the employments which Mr. Vernon had destined for his niece on that " to-morrow " which his eyes were never to see. The philosopher's great secret perished with him' and—far less to be regretted—so did the thoughts on—or rather against—revealed religion, with which the unhappy sceptic had intended to startle the world.

Miss Temple, attired in mourning, was seated at the desk before which she had passed so many wearisome hours in writing to her uncle's dictation. She was using, in making memoranda of Mr. Vernon's property, the very paper and pens which he had provided for her to write out his infidel book.

His museum, as yet, looked quite unchanged, save by the absence of the wire-covered case containing the serpents. With feelings of horror the heiress of the dead man had regarded that case, and, until it could be sent to London, had ordered its removal to another part of the house. Edith could not have looked without a shudder upon those adders, remembering the fate of their owner.

Edith rose from her seat on the entrance of Ellen and her brother, whom she received with her wonted kindness of manner. When, at the lady's desire, they had taken seats, she at once proceeded to business.

" I asked you to come here, Ellen," said Miss Temple, addressing her late aunt's attendant, " that I might myself tell you of what has afforded me sincere satisfaction. I found, on opening my poor uncle's will, that he has given a strong proof of his regret for—for what happened last autumn. Save the bequest of his collection to the nation, Mr. Vernon left but one legacy, and that was to you."

Miss Temple turned and read from the parchment will which lay on the table before her, "I give and bequeath to my late servant, Ellen Morris, one thousand pounds, duty free, in consideration of my having, by mistake, done her a wrong."

" A thousand pounds!" exclaimed the astonished Ellen and her brother in a breath.

" I am very thankful that my uncle has thus remembered you," continued the lady, who, had he not done so, would have herself supplied the omission. " It is interesting, it is gratifying to me, to find that this will is dated the very day after that on which Mr. Vernon saw my dear aunt's ring on my finger. This proves that my uncle lost no time in trying to repair a wrong, when he discovered that one had unintentionally been committed."

Edith was pleased to be able to say a kind word of the dead, thankful to have something to lighten the gloom which shrouded the memory of him who had passed from the earth.

Ellen was moved to tears by the unexpected good news, which came to her like a sudden rain upon a dry and parched-up land. She had suffered so much, she had become so accustomed to look on life as a dreary desert, that she could hardly at first believe that joy and gladness might yet be her own.

Not that Ellen was covetous of wealth, or loved money for its own sake; no, the lust of the eye had never been her besetting temptation; but the gold bequeathed to her would give her the means of repaying her debt to her brother, would enable the Hollands and herself to remain in their own happy home.

It was this thought which made Ellen so joyfully smile through her tears as she turned towards Robert and said, " You and dear Effie will never leave England and Salem now!"

Robert too was glad to remain in his English home, and though he always felt bitterly the wrong Mr. Vernon had done his sister, he was grateful for the aid which came from the philosopher's will. Effie too was delighted to stay at Salem, and the little farm-house was the home of a happy family.

That this is a changing world is an observation often made with pensive sadness, and yet how frequently have we cause to bless Providence that this is a world of change.

Certainly Alec Stewart looked as if some softening change had passed over him, as on a clear September day he walked up the little path from the gate to the door of his niece's home. The hard, severe expression had passed away from his eyes; it almost seemed as if his cheek had fewer furrows, his brow fewer wrinkles, than when, in the opening chapter, he was introduced to the reader. Alec looked with pleasure at the climbing rose-bush, still whitened with bloom, which mantled the dwelling, and the boughs of the orchard trees bending under the weight of rosy fruit.

Even Alec could now drink in pleasure from the sound of murmuring bees and the cheerful cackle of poultry. Effie was singing within, at her work, and Alec stopped for a moment before he entered the dwelling.

" Yes, Salem is a choice little nest," muttered the old man to himself, " though I say still that I would never give such a name to any spot on this sinful earth."

Alec carried into the house a parcel which, strange as it seemed to Effie, looked exactly like that which he had brought to her as a present just before her marriage. He found her in her pretty little parlor, with Ellen Morris at her side. Across Effie's knees again lay her wedding-dress of gray silk; the sisters were engaged in doing something to its gay pink trimming.

" What, Effie, busy with your finery?" cried Alec, with a little of his old roughness of manner, as, after kissing his niece and shaking hands with her sister, he took a chair and sat down beside them.

" I find that my husband thinks that my dress will look better, more suitable, without this quilling," said Effie, using her scissors briskly to remove the adornment which she had sewn on with such pride.

The young wife was now watchful against her besetting folly, fondness for dress, that form of the love of the world which she had found to be such a snare. Her ornament should be, Effie thought, the same which Miss Temple always wore—the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit, such as becomes a Christian woman.

If Robert were pleased—and Robert was pleased with his wife's more simple attire—Effie would no longer care to attract the admiration of other eyes than those of her husband.

" Well, Effie, my girl, have you no curiosity to know what I've brought in this parcel?" asked Alec, tapping with his bony finger the brown paper cover.

Effie's reply was a smile.

" I've a notion that you did not care much for that first present which I made you," observed the old man; " leastways, I judged as much from your looks. I dare say that you've shoved my picture into the hay-loft—or may be into the fire!"

" No, indeed," replied Effie, who was smiling no longer; " the picture is hung up where I can see it most often, and the text-card, 'Love not the World,' is beneath it. That picture does me almost as much good, I think, as Miss Temple's present to me on my marriage, though Robert and I use every day that little book which she gave me."

" You see, Effie, I prized my old picture," said Alec, " though I fancied somehow that you did not. So, thinks I to myself, I'll exchange that print for another that looks newer and brighter. But since you care for the old print, never will old Alec take it away; you shall have this to hang beside it, for as they are of the same size and are framed alike, they will make a good pair.'

While Alec was speaking, he removed the own paper, and he now held up to the view of ie and Ellen a beautiful engraving. The sub- t of the picture was Moses lifting up in the derness the brazen serpent, that the Israelites tten by fiery snakes might look upon it and e.

Effie and her sister greatly admired the print, d agreed that it would look very well as a pair the picture of the wreck.

"It's not the mere look of the thing that I'm nking about," observed Alec Stewart; "some- w the two subjects seem to my mind to fit o each other. The one shows death and ruin, l the other life and rescue."

"You learn much from Miss Temple," ob- ved Ellen.

"I have learned much," replied Alec, with ing. "Though gray hairs are on my head, I not too old to gain knowledge; nay, rather, older I grow I find I've the more to learn; I've some things to unlearn besides. You " he continued very gravely, "a death like t of my poor master was enough to make a reflect, though he should never have re- ted before.

"That death seemed to my mind a kind of able; I could never see an adder again with- thinking of the old Serpent, and the poison er his fangs. But my lady has taught me to k not only of the venom, but of the cure. T ook at what the Serpent has done, and is do- in this poor sinful world, would bring our rts to despair if we could not also look up- d in hope to Him who has bruised the Ser- t's head.

When my lady unclasps her Bible and asks lessing on her reading, I say to myself, 'In . Book lies the recipe for the cure of the on of sin; and that cure is faith in the Son od, who died for sinners.'" he old man spoke with deep emotion, for Miss Temple's teaching had been blest to his . His past life, full of trouble, now seemed to a discipline which had prepared the soil for good seed, which was now bringing forth d fruit.

esently Robert came in from his work, and our gathered round the family table—a pleas- happy party.

e little home at Salem became one of the ntest, cheeriest spots in England, where peace harmony rested like an atmosphere of light. ert paid no more visits to the "Crown," and wife faithfully sought to make his home an ctive place to him. Miss Temple lived at ka House, and gave her life to the one object rving the Master she loved so well, and do- His work among all classes of her neighbors. often visited Salem, and, like Alec, her faith- ervant, confessed that the little farm had an opriate name.

, with calm rest and joyful hope filling the s of all concerned, we take leave of them, write

END OF THE STORY OF EFFIE HOLLAND.

HE MESSAGE TO THE CHURCHES.

Lesson for Nov. 30. Rev. 3:1 12. Golden Text, ver. 11. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

HE message to the churches, which is con d in Rev. 2 and 3, was no doubt in the first nce a direct commission to each of the ches in Asia which are here addressed by . But at the same time it seems to have a etical signification, and we can easily de- he description of the Christian Church in al during successive ages, in these appeals her Lord and Head. In the message to hurch at Ephesus we detect the first falling from "first love" and "first works." In o Smyrna, the times of persecution: "Fear of those things which thou shalt suffer," -with this church no fault is found; to Per- s, the rising of heresies within the church; hyatira, the supremacy of Rome—" that n Jezebel."

en in the message to the church of Sardis, which begins our subject, we come to the time of the Reformation: "These things saith He that hath the seven spirits of God, and the seven stars; I know thy works, that thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead." This is the true description of the great body of those who came out from the errors of Rome, who changed with the times: they got a name to live—the truth in doctrine, without the power of real spiritual life; and there are tens of thousands in our Protestant lands to whom this applies in the present day. Oh how often do we hear men and women saying that they have been brought up religiously, that all these things—Christian doctrine, pious habits, etc.—are theirs from childhood; and yet, unconsciously to themselves, the life is wanting: "thou hast a name that thou livest, and art dead."

The Lord's appeal is, "Be watchful, and strengthen the things which remain, and are ready to die; for I have not found thy works perfect before God." No lack was found in the works of Thyatira; but the works of Sardis were wanting. There is something heartrending in the thought, that men who escape from legality, and know the glorious "liberty wherewith Christ hath made us free" (Gal. 5:1), should presume upon that liberty, and say, We are saved by Christ; what need is there that we should deny ourselves and live so unlike the world? We are not going back unto legality again. Alas! this has been too much the tone of Protestantism since the time of the Reformation; liberty has been used "for an occasion to the flesh," and God has not found our works perfect before Him.

"Be watchful." How many have failed through the want of watchfulness and recollectedness of spirit! There is all the difference between a legal watchfulness, when our eye is ever on ourselves, and a divine watchfulness, in which the eye is ever on Him. Then "strengthen the things which remain, that are ready to die," i.e., do not tolerate lukewarmness. Then "Remember therefore how thou hast received and heard, and hold fast, and repent." We are responsible for all we have received and heard. It is a humbling and bitter truth, that with the influx of life and knowledge, which came in at the time of the Reformation, Christian holiness lowered its standard, so that, with all her fearful errors, the Church of Rome has remained by her writings a standing witness to saintliness of life.

The coming of the Lord is made a threat to Sardis (ver. 3), while it is a promise to Philadelphia (ver. 11): "Thou hast a few names even in Sardis which have not defiled their garments; and they shall walk with me in white: for they are worthy." Those who lead holy lives in the midst of a church which is lifeless—these the Lord calls "worthy." Therefore, courage, you who bear in a hidden martyrdom the burden of dead congregations upon your hearts, who cannot hide from yourselves the state of things around you. There is One who understands you, and who mingles His tears with yours; you are not alone, and as you walk with Him here, you shall walk with Him in white hereafter. This is the only church in which the Lord says any thing about the names of His people; here they are twice mentioned: "Thou hast a few names even in Sardis, etc." "He that overcometh, the same shall be clothed in white raiment; and I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before my Father, and before His angels." Because they are few, so much the more precious are they.

To all the seven churches there is the same exhortation: "He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches." It is as though He had to look long and far to find an ear on the strain for His voice. Let us hear especially what he has to say to the churches of Philadelphia and Laodicea, for they describe the times in which we are now living. First the Lord speaks of Himself as He that is holy, He that is true, He that hath the key of David, He that openeth and no man shutteth, and shutteth and no man openeth (Isa. 22:22), and He says, "I know thy works: behold! I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it." Now in the wonderful opening of China, Japan, India, Africa, and then nearer home, Italy, Spain, France, etc., to the preaching of the Gospel, we see the open door which no man can shut; and let all who have souls upon their hearts know that a door which seems to be shut cannot remain so at the present time. He who has the key is with us, and no human opposition has power to stop us; we have neither to consider circumstances nor people, but the Lord's will and the Lord's Word alone.

"Thou hast a little strength, and hast kept My Word." By the blessing of God, our age is one of Bible study, and the Lord recognizes it: "thou hast kept My Word." And again (ver. 10), "Because thou hast kept the Word of My patience, I will also keep thee from the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth." This passage we have before noticed a few weeks since as a promise of exemption from the time of the great tribulation. That which we have to consider in this message to the church in Philadelphia most especially is, the great responsibility which lies upon us because God has set before us an open door. There is no excuse in our days for a disobedience to the command of the risen Jesus: Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature (Mark 16:15); we are witnesses to Him (Luke 24:48), and we are guilty if we do not bear our witness.

It would seem as though a special reward, which may be lost or won, belongs to this church of Philadelphia: "Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown." Thus it is possible to lose a crown which is held out to us. The hours before the Lord comes are so precious, the issues at stake are so great, the call to a life of separation unto God so urgent, and the answer to that call is so rare, so little understood, that the warning to hold fast is indeed needful. And may we not imply that those who do not hold fast, and who do lose their crown, will not be kept from the hour of temptation, etc.? (ver. 10.)

But "him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of my God;" not only a living stone, but a pillar of beauty and of strength; "and he shall go no more out: and I will write upon him the name of my God, and the name of the city of my God, New Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from my God: and my new name"—the name of the bride, the Lamb's wife, Rev. 21:9, 10, and the name of the bridegroom. Is not this to say that Christ will make up the number of those who shall be His bride from this church of Philadelphia, or "brotherly love," as the name means, and which is beautifully significant of the love which exists between Christians of all denominations in our own day, who are following the Lamb at any cost.

If it is so—and in these things which are not clearly revealed we dare not be absolute—then the church of Laodicea represents those who are left behind when the wise virgins go out to meet the bridegroom; those who have no oil in their lamps, who must be purified, and made white, and tried. But before the time of trouble comes, the Lord sends a message to arouse these sleepers from their sloth, and says, "I know thy works that thou art neither cold nor hot: I would thou wert cold or hot." Better to be altogether without Christ, than to have Christ and to remain lukewarm about His cause, about lost, perishing sinners. The tone of the Laodiceans is, "I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing"—self-satisfaction while souls are perishing, looking only to the salvation of their own souls resting in the work of Christ, without doing any thing for Him; and He says thou "knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked: I counsel thee, etc." (ver. 18.) "As many as I love I rebuke and chasten;" and no Christian will ever be purified without chastisement. God teach us all He has to say to us through these messages to the churches.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Speech of the English Prime Minister at the annual banquet of the Lord Mayor of London is always anticipated with considerable interest, as foreshadowing to some extent the policy of the government for the ensuing year. It will be remembered that on former occasions warlike expressions from Lord Beaconsfield excited some alarm. This year that statesman has delivered a speech of a more reassuring character. He said, the aspect of affairs was much more satisfactory than when he last spoke on a similar occasion. Business was now being done which three months ago would have been deemed impossible. The opinion of Her Majesty's Government was that the revival was of a permanent and lasting character. He thought official returns demonstrated that fact, because they showed the revival was not local, but universal. During a period of unprecedented depression there had not been a single meeting to express discontent with the national institutions. He wished brethren in Ireland would be a little more emulous of this example. He was at a loss to comprehend how the Irish people had brought themselves to believe that the best remedy for economical distress was political agitation and social confusion.

It was anticipated that Lord Beaconsfield would throw some light on the relations of England with Turkey and the future of Afghanistan, but the Premier was reticent on both points. The speech, if not absolutely encouraging hopes of peace, is not disquieting, and may therefore be considered negatively satisfactory.

In Afghanistan the Suspicion which Rested on the Ameer of complicity in the massacre of the British, and which was temporarily removed, is again settling down on him. It has been discovered that, on the night before the battle of Charasiab, he was visited in his tent by Naib Mahomed, who commanded the enemy next day, and it is also stated that a plan for his escape from the English camp has been found out. Yakoob Khan is now practically a prisoner. A sentry is constantly on duty inside his quarters, and a strong guard is on duty outside.

The mystery as to what has been done with the bodies of Major Cavagnari and his companions has not yet been solved. British relations with the tribes are assuming a more satisfactory aspect, it is reported; but the treachery of the Afghans will necessitate the presence of a considerable force if British ascendancy is to be maintained at Cabul.

The Pope Sent an Address to the Italian Church Congress, at Bologna, recently, in which he spoke of the desirability of reinstating him in his ancient rights, so that he can apply the remedies required by the evils existing in Italy. He also referred to the renown of the Pontifical See in other centuries, when it admitted no other limits on the globe than those of its own divine jurisdiction. He said it should be the desire of Italians to restore, as far as possible, the integrity and plenitude of that religious and civil liberty of which the Vicar of Christ is in need. The wretched condition of the States of the Church while under the rule of the Popes were a scandal to Europe. History shows the remedies spoken of either are unknown to the Popes, or they have been culpably negligent in not applying them when they had opportunity. "God has numbered their kingdom and finished it," for they have been "weighed in the balances" and have been "found wanting."

The Most Sanguinary Naval Fight of Modern days occurred November 8th, at the capture of the Peruvian ram Huascar, which has done such notable service in the South American war. There were two hundred and sixteen men on the Peruvian vessel, and of these only eighty-six survived, and they were all badly wounded. The two Chilian vessels which effected the capture were the Cochrane and the Blanco, both heavily armed ships. The admiral commanding the Huascar was killed, and the three principal officers who successively assumed command after his death were shot down almost instantaneously. The scene on board must have been horrible. An eye-witness writes:

"After an hour and a half's fighting the ram was almost shot to pieces. Still, she discharged her sole remaining cannon at long intervals, as the very turret itself, only thirty feet in diameter, was choked up with the debris of the shattered gun and the bodies of the dead and wounded. Below, in the dark passages and narrow compartments of the ship, the scene was frightful. The dying and those who had perished were heaped indiscriminately together, and every few moments a shot from the enemy came crashing through the sides of the doomed vessel."

When at length a boarding party secured the vessel she seemed a veritable shamble. Scenes of carnage like this, show how fearful are the passions of which the heart of man has been the home since the Fall.

Reform in Turkey is being Insisted Upon by the British Minister at Constantinople, but the Sultan, true to the character of his race, is apathetic in the matter. The British Minister is said to have threatened to send for the fleet if the concessions demanded were not promptly made. He has also protested to the Porte against the appointment of Kaimtl Pacha as Counsellor to the Grand Vizier. Kiamtl Pacha was recently dismissed from the Governorship of Aleppo at the joint request of the English and French Ambassadors, because of his oppression of the Armenians at Zeitchun. It is reported that Hafuz Pacha, who is appointed Minister of Police, is the same whose punishment was demanded in Lord Derby's celebrated dispatch after the Bulgarian atrocities.

These appointments indicate that British influence at Constantinople is not so powerful as was believed, and they confirm the suspicion that the Sultan is negotiating with a view to an alliance with his late antagonist, Russia. If this is so, diplomatists believe a general European war cannot be averted.

Mrs. Henry Varley Vouches for the Truth of two cases which have come under her own notice of excellent young men ruined by the Argyll Rooms, the most notorious dancing saloon in London, which the authorities ordered to be closed last year on account of its infamy. In one case a family had at its head a devoted Christian husband and wife, with a bright happy home, cheerful and intelligent society, and a number of sons and daughters, most of whom had decided early for Christ. One of the sons had occupation near the Argyll Rooms, and by some means found his way to the amusements inside its walls. He became acquainted with one of the poor girls frequenting there, and in a few short months became entangled, and so disgusted with himself that despair took hold of him, and one morning he was a suicide.

The other case was that of a son in a prominent Christian family in a northern manufacturing town. He came to London, and was urged by his mother to seek out the friendship of a minister, then pastor of a church near London. But led by some evil companions once to visit that snare of the devil, he repeated his visits. An unholy alliance with one of the girls with whom he danced was formed, and extravagance marked his career. Money must be had for his fast life, and he robbed his employer. Late one Saturday evening the minister and his wife were summoned to Newgate prison to see the son of the northern citizen—a felon! Early on Monday they visited him. The bitterness of remorse and guilt was upon him. The depths to which he had fallen he now realized. But it was too late, for justice had hold upon him, and his trial ended in penal servitude.

A Heathen in London.—At an Inquest reported in the London Telegraph of October 30th, a boy aged fourteen testified: "I cannot read or write. I have never been to school or chapel. I never knew it was wrong to tell a lie. I never heard of God." The boy is described as an under-sized, sickly-looking, half-fed child, and the day before had been "in charge" of a van jointly with another boy of thirteen, when a wagon coming along knocked his comrade down and, the wheel passing over him, killed him. I is humiliating to think that with all the effort put forth by the Christian Church to evangeliz the world, and the distances missionaries trave to preach the Gospel in savage lands, it shoul be possible for a boy in London, fourteen years age, to make such a confession. He must hav come in contact with Christian men every da but it appears "no man had cared for his soul."

Prince Bismarck has Earned the Name of t Man of Iron, but his life shows he is not destitu of the softer qualities which characterize c dinary mortals. An incident related by a frier of the Chancellor's proves his susceptibility the tender passion. "In his rambles among t Tyrolese Mountains, Prince Bismarck, then si ply Herr von Bismarck, was obliged to have r course at Mitterhad, a small village near Mera to the hospitality of a well-to-do farmer, call Holgner, with whose only daughter Josefa, a bea tiful girl, he fell in love. His affections were ciprocated by the fair one, but the father, a big ed Roman Catholic, interposed, stoically forb ding all further intercourse with the heretic P testant, who, after vain endeavors to appease t animosity of the parent, finally left Mitterh and reluctantly withdrew his suit.

"The poor girl, whose love and sympath were so rudely tried, had eventually to marr Catholic farmer at Salzburg, where she died af giving birth to a daughter. In one of his vi to Gastein, Prince Bismarck, whose name ha the mean time become famous all over the wo retraced his steps to the scene of his early mance, and on hearing of the sad fate of his mer love transferred his interest to her ch The latter, now grown and regarded as the picture of her mother, recently celebrated wedding, on which festive day she was grati by a kind letter and costly presents from mother's rejected suitor."

The London "Lancet," the organ of medical profession, gives utterance to a not warning on the subject of drinking. It s "We hear fearful stories about certain fash able establishments in London, where bo and glasses are kept for the use of ladies find it inconvenient, if not dangerous, to ind in alcoholic propensities at home, and we k that the 'city' (our down town) matutinal of sherry at 11 A.M., followed by intermi drams throughout the working hours of the with the addition of bitters when the cl hour arrives, is by no means given up in Court (the London Wall Street) and Cornh

---

Spurgeon's Autograph Album; containin Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's and Mrs. Spurgeon's graphs, may be obtained at 63 Bible Hous through any bookseller. Price 75 cents. The and Trowel says: "Our young friends deli possessing birthday albums, and here is one w fit for a queen. We will say nothing of the con but the binding is simply gorgeous. . . . a dainty birthday present, and is equal to an have gone before it; we think we might vent say that it is second to none. Facsimiles of tographs of the pastor and his wife are given i proper places."

The following works by the same eminent pr may also be obtained at the CHRISTIAN H Office, 63 Bible House:

"The Treasury of David." Containing an nal Exposition of the Book of Psalms; a Col of Illustrative Extracts from the whole range o ature; a series of Homiletical Hints upon every verse; and list of writers upon each Five volumes. Price, per vol., $3.

"John Ploughman's Talk; or, Plain Adv Plain People." Price, cloth, 60 cents; pap ers, 40 cents.

"The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit." Sermons. Preached and revised during th 1878. Price $2.50.

"Twelve Sermons on Various Subjects." Portrait. Price 35 cents. A remittance mus pany every order.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

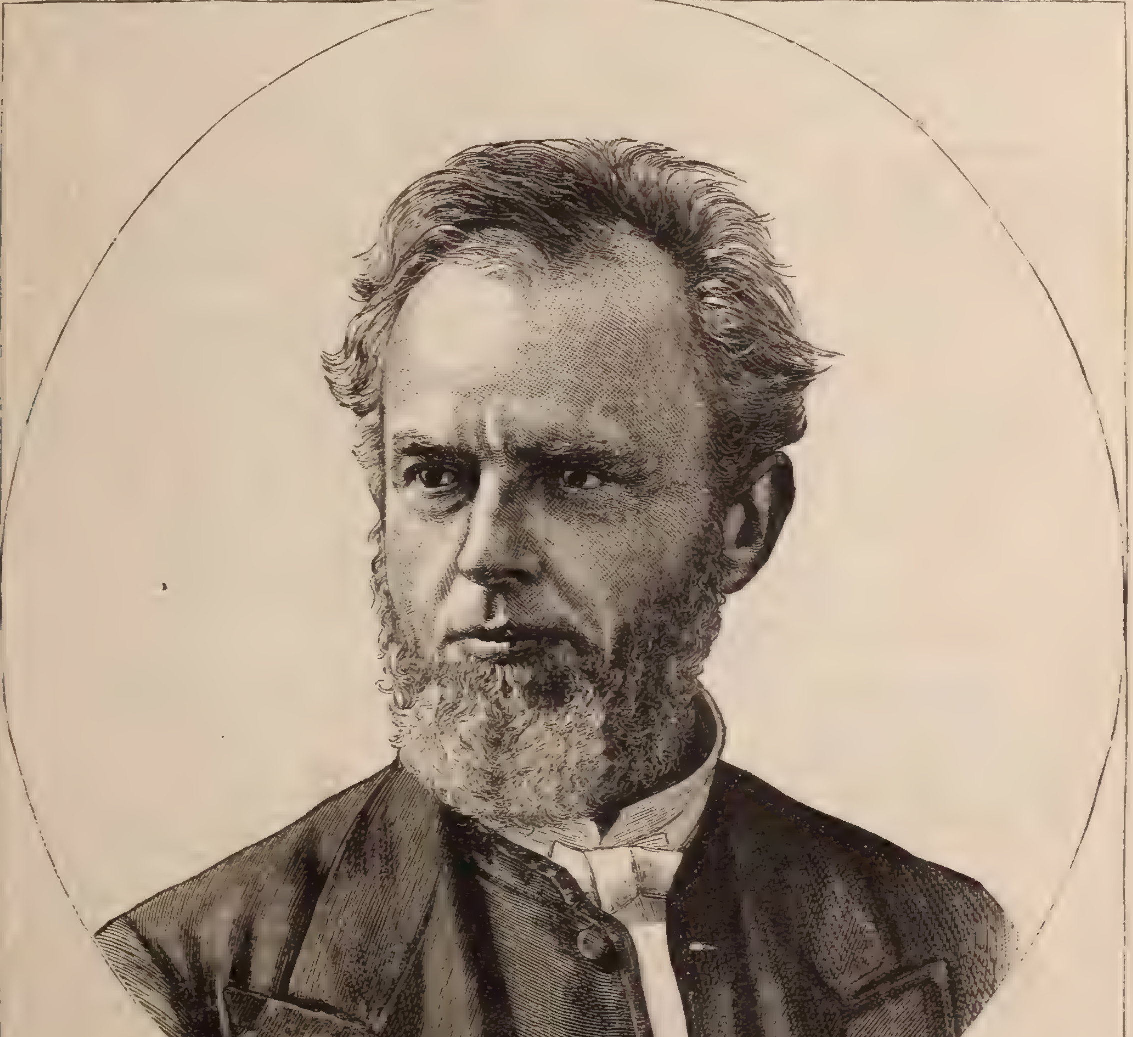
This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc. The Circulation is 165,000 Copies.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1879. 13th Year. No. 58—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAIT OF THE REV. CHARLES F. DEEMS, D.D., LL.D., of New York, with Sketch of his Life.
WHAT RELIGION MAY DO FOR A FAMILY. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE. A Thrilling Serial Story by the Author of "Felicia Cuffe."
GOD'S PURPOSE IN SICKNESS, by Mrs. M. Baxter.
COMING POPISH STRUGGLES, by Rev. C. H. Hamilton—The Iron Egg and Four Diamonds.
CURRENT EVENTS: The Forthcoming Session—Niagara Falls—A Perilous Adventure with a Bear—A Remarkable Conversion—Danger of Sleeping in Church—A Prayer-Meeting on a Battlefield, etc.
AN INTERVIEW WITH STANDING BEAR AND BRIGHT EYES.
SATAN IN A RAGE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
A WEIGHT OF WEALTH. A New Serial Story.
The Heavenly Song: S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
FOREIGN TOPICS: Trouble in Ireland—Children for Sale—Drunkenness of Children in France—Losses in Business—Prince Bismarck's Troublesome Visitors—The Expenses of the Evangelical Alliance, etc.

Cut



REV. CHARLES F. DEEMS, D.D., LL.D., Pastor of the Church of the Strangers, New York.

REV. CHARLES F. DEEMS, D.D., LL.D.

Early Years—Appointed Professor in University of N. C.—His Various Labors—Visits Europe—Settles in New York—The Church of the Strangers—Its Origin and Growth—An Anniversary Sermon—Mr. Vanderbilt's Gift—Dr. Deems' Talents—His Power of Work—The Sunday Magazine—His Division of his Time—Story of his Punctuality—His Writings—"That Great Book"—His Preaching—Its Practical Character—Proposed Trip to Palestine—"The Sisters of the Stranger."

THE Church of the Strangers, in Mercer Street, New York, though comparatively new, has come to be recognized among the foremost churches of this city; and its influence for good is felt not only throughout the United States, but in other and distant countries.

In this case we can give our readers no more suitable and welcome portrait than that of the man whom the Lord has chosen to be at the head of the organization which is working so much good for His kingdom.

Charles F. Deems was born in Baltimore, Md., on the 4th of December, 1820. His father was a Methodist minister, and his training was an object of special care with him and with his mother. Having been early converted, and choosing the profession of the ministry, he was sent, at the age of fifteen, to Dickinson College, in Pennsylvania, where he graduated with credit in 1839. He then received an appointment as North Carolina agent of the American Bible Society. Two years afterward, at the immature age of twenty-one, he became Professor of Logic and Rhetoric in the UNIVERSITY OF NORTH CAROLINA.

Within a year of that time Dr. Deems married the lady who has now been his devoted companion for thirty-seven years, and who is as much respected and beloved by his parishioners as any pastor could wish his wife to be. She was a native of New York State.

After occupying the Professor's chair in North Carolina University for five years, he was invited to the chair of Natural Science in Randolph Macon College, Virginia. In 1846 he was elected a delegate to the General Conference in St. Louis; and while on duty there he was called to the Presidency of the Greensboro' Female College in North Carolina. In that important position he remained five years, and won the warmest encomiums from the friends of education in the South. While there he received the degree of D.D., in 1852, from the Randolph Macon College. His second degree, of LL.D., was conferred on him the year before last by the University of North Carolina.

In 1858, after several years, of ordinary pastoral work, Dr. Deems was again elected a delegate to the General Conference.

In 1860 he spent six months in a visit to England and the continent of Europe. He landed again in New York the day after Abraham Lincoln's election as President, and as he came up from the Battery and noticed the returns posted up at the Herald office, he took in the prospect at once, and went home prepared for the outbreak of civil war.

Soon after his return he was offered the Professorship of History in North Carolina University, but declined it. He organized a male and female school in Wilson County, N. C. Moreover, during the five years previous to 1865 he was Presiding Elder of the Wilmington and Newbern District in the same State.

In the year just named Dr. Deems came to little dreaming of the work God had set for him in this great city. He made a start in journalism, for which he has had a strong taste all his life, and hoped by that means to promote union and good-fellowship between the North and the South. For although himself a Southerner born, he has all his life known how to love men as sons of God and citizens of the world.

NEW YORK,

He was then much straitened in circumstances, and having barely sleeping accommodation for his family, was obliged to seek the shelter and warmth of a neighboring billiard saloon for a study, and there, amid the incessant knocking of the balls, he wrote on his knee most of the articles for his journal, a paper about the size of the New York Observer, which, as a leading publisher in this city said, attained greater success in one year than any other paper he had known. But his life from that time comes to be identified with the history of

THE CHURCH OF THE STRANGERS.

A lady who heard Dr. Deems preach in Jersey City extorted a promise from him that he would preach a few times in New York; so he hired the small chapel of the University for one month, and became personally responsible for the rent.

The first sermon was preached on the 22d of July, 1866, fifteen persons, inclusive of the five members of the preacher's family, comprising the congregation. As he was not bound by his promise for more than a month, the Doctor announced on the third Sunday to his hearers, who had largely increased in numbers, that his course of services would terminate the following week, for he was unable financially to go on. A gentleman present at once proposed that a collection should be taken at each service to defray expenses, and Dr. Deems was urged to continue to preach every Sunday morning. To this he consented.

Meanwhile, the preacher's eloquence and earnestness becoming more widely known, his congregation grew rapidly, until the little chapel was too crowded for comfort. An Executive Committee of gentlemen of different denominations was formed, and a resolution was passed to continue to keep the place open for public worship. The church was called "The Strangers' Sunday Home." Before the beginning of another year Dr. Deems was invited to become president of a college; but his people, who had become warmly attached to him, begged him to stay with them. Although there was no prospect that they could support him, and although the permanency of the enterprise was very uncertain, he consented, after consultation with the bishops of his own denomination, to remain where he was, and declined the presidentship.

But the accommodation was too narrow for the congregation, and it became necessary to look for a more spacious room. At that time the large chapel of the University was occupied by the Rev. Dr. Francis L. Hawks, who was a warm personal friend of Dr. Deems's, and took a deep interest in his movements. On the 26th of September, 1866, this good man was called to the Church Triumphant, and his people vacated the large chapel on the last of April, 1867. Then Dr. Deems entered it with his congregation in the following month.

But his flock was still without church organization. There were many regular attendants, and others offered their church letters, desiring to be identified with the important work growing up under the zealous pastor; but these had never been formed into a church, as that word is usually understood. So, after continued prayer and deliberation, and after consultation with godly men, it was determined to organize a "free and independent" church of Jesus Christ. This resolution was carried out on the first Sunday in January, 1868, when thirty-two persons enrolled themselves, and thus formed the Church of the Strangers in the City of New York. The Apostles' Creed was incorporated into the ritual.

The new Church grew steadily, each communion season adding new members to its roll, some on confession of faith, others by letters from churches of all the denominations—Congregational, Baptist, Dutch Reformed, Lutheran, Independent, Methodist Episcopal, Presbyterian, Protestant Episcopal, Southern Methodist Episcopal, and Wesleyan. In an delivered by Dr. Deems in 1871, in which he gave a history of the Church of the Strangers, he mentioned some of the discouragements which attended the enterprise. He said: "Still there were great drawbacks to our work. We were up three flights of stairs, in a hire chapel, from which we might be ejected at th close of the year.

ANNIVERSARY SERMON,

"We were afloat. Men do not like to mak an attachment to an unsettled enterprise. W had no committee-room, no Sunday-School, n place for social prayer, without heating up tha large chapel. While devoting myself to the pas toral work of a parish circle twelve miles in di ameter, many weary hours were spent in askin whereunto all this would lead, and whether i would not end in a failure. God only knows th heart-throbs that would have been spared, bu which doubtless were necessary for disciplin if we could have foreseen what was in store f us."

But God was providing what was needed b putting it into the heart of Cornelius Vanderbil Esq., to purchase the Mercer Street Presbyteria Church, and present it to Dr. Deems for the u of his congregation. The gift was joyfully a cepted, the necessary repairs were made, D Deems assuming the responsibility of the outla and the church was opened for service on t first Sunday in October, 1870. Many emine clergymen and other gentlemen took part in t exercises, which continued for several day Sermons and addresses were delivered, a prayers offered by the Rev. Drs. Moran North Carolina, Munsey of Baltimore, Bac of New Haven, Konig of Hungary (Europ Marshall of Mississippi, DeWitt, Holdic Skinner, Prentiss, Booth, Durbin, Schaff, H ton, John Cotton Smith, Crooks, Armita Prime, and Mingins, and the Hon. William Dodge.

It was a time of delightful reunion. branches of the Christian Church saw how g it was to have a free church, in friendship w all the other churches, independent, and wit basis upon which all Christians unite, devot itself to the interests of strangers.

It is well to explain precisely in the church thus opened, which we can do by quoting another extract from the a versary sermon of 1871. Dr. Deems's w were: "There is one which we are happy t able to set right. It has been said that as C modore Vanderbilt has settled this prop upon Dr. Deems for the term of his natural when he dies the church will go to the Com dore's heirs. This is not so. Nine trust duly elected according to the laws of New Y become residuary trustees; and they and t successors are to keep this property in trust that there shall be a free church for stranger New York forever. It can never revert. It not only a free, but a full gift."

THE PROPRIETORSHIP

Dr. Deems has acquired a reputation America and Europe for all that makes Christian gentleman. Possessing more ordinary intellectual ability, and having atta a ripe scholarship, he is well fitted to be, i words of one of his admirers, "a succe leader in the grand work to which he is dev his life." His warm heart and ever-ready pathy win for him the confidence of all wh proach him, and in many respects he is emi ly qualified for the duties of a pastor.

An indefatigable worker himself, he poss the faculty of developing the latent capabi of others, and of putting to use the sm talent in those about him. If there is wo them, he brings it out. Many a young man his success in life to an impetus given him b Deems; and to many young women his v of good counsel and encouragement have p the starting-point for careers of usefulnes honor.

His energy is untiring, and his executive ity remarkable. With a wide parish, exte beyond the far from narrow limits of hi congregation, and including any stranger i York who looks to him for pastoral care, h finds time for editorial work. He has for years conducted the Sunday Magazine, pub by Frank Leslie, which has met a degree cess that is perhaps unprecedented in the would refer to a passage in the Book of Job, and we pray the power and wisdom of the Holy Ghost in the name of the Lord Jesus for this object.

In Job 33 : 14–28, we find Elihu, who was, according to Job's wish (9 : 33), "in God's stead" (ver. 6); explaining to the patriarch God's dealings with him and with others, "For God speaketh once, yea, twice, yet man perceiveth it not." Now is sickness His first and chosen language, or His second language, which He is driven to use when the first call does not succeed? The sequel shows us—first, He speaks "in a dream, in a vision of the night," etc.,—i.e., by His Holy Spirit; secondly, by sickness (ver. 19–22). And what is His object? "Then He openeth the ears of men, and sealeth their instruction."

Our loving God is always seeking to gain our ear, that He may teach us to know Him. He cannot be happy in us, and we cannot be happy in Him, unless a real and mutual understanding is created and subsists between Him and us. If we are not brought into such a position that He can say to us all which lies upon His heart, our education for heaven is at a standstill. God's lessons are everywhere and at all times. There is an intensity of meaning hidden in all the little things of daily life, and blessed is he who can add his testimony to that of Paul, and say, as one of God's instructed ones. "We know that all things work together for good to them that love God, to them who are the called according to His purpose" (Rom. 8 : 28).

The Lord Jesus Himself became a learner for our sakes. He says (Ps. 40 : 6), "Sacrifice and offering Thou didst not desire; mine ears hast Thou opened." And not only once for all were they opened. He says (Isa. 50 : 4, 5), "The Lord God hath given Me the tongue of the learned, that I should know how to speak a word in season to him that is weary; He wakeneth morning by morning, He wakeneth mine ear to hear as the learned. The Lord God hath opened mine ear, and I was not rebellious, neither turned away back." And as the Son of Man, His leading was so clear that though He said, "I can of mine own self do nothing," and "The words that I speak unto you I speak not of Myself;" yet He added, "As I hear, I judge: and My judgment is just: because I seek not Mine own will, but the will of Him that sent Me" (John 5 : 30; 14 : 10). If he needed the opened ear, how much more do we?

God openeth the ears of man, and sealeth his instruction, "that He may withdraw man from his work" (see margin), "and hide pride from man." "He that is entered into his rest hath ceased from his own works as, God did from His" (Heb. 4 : 10)—i.e., He has learned that He is crucified with Christ, that in his own person and by his own efforts he can only fail, but in Christ's person, by virtue of His life, and under the authority of His Name, all that God commands has become a glorious possibility. Fruitless, hopeless sighing after an unattainable standard which is cruelly far off, gives way to a calm faith that God "worketh in Him both to will and to do of His good pleasure" (Phil. 2 : 13); and while God thus holds His right place with him, He brings him to a full obedience to His will.

But if man will not hear the voice of the Spirit of God speaking directly, by His word or His providence, then God must use to secure his attention and to carry on the education which his Father's heart longs to see progressing in His creatures. Thus "he is also chastened with pain upon his bed, and the multitude of his bones with strong pain, so that his life abhorreth bread, and his soul dainty meat. His flesh is consumed away that it cannot be seen, and his bones, that were not seen, stick out. Yea, his soul draweth near unto the grave, and his life to the destroyers." This is not an isolated passage. In Lev. 26 : 14–16, and in Deut. 28 : 15, 21, 22, 27, 28, 58–61, sickness of every kind is declared to be the consequence of not hearkening to the Lord. In the New Testament (1 Cor. 11 : 29–32), Paul says, in connection with the unworthy partaking of the Lord's Supper, "For this cause many are weak and sickly among you, and many sleep. For if we would judge ourselves we should not be judged." The consequence of hearkening to the voice of the Lord is declared to be the exemption from sickness (Exod. 15 : 26; 23 : 20–25; Deut. 7 : 12–15; Ps. 105 : 37). These passages are enough to convince us that, in God's intention, sickness is not God's chosen provision for the education of His children.

ANOTHER MEANS

In the passage we have taken from Job it appears very clearly that as soon as the mind of God is understood by the sick person, healing follows. "If there be a messenger with him, an interpreter, one among a thousand, to show unto man His uprightness, then He is gracious unto him, and saith, Deliver him from going down into the pit; I have found a ransom. His flesh [which was consumed away that it could not be seen] shall be fresher than a child's. The soul which drew near unto the grave, and the life to the destroyers, regains power: "he shall return to the days of his youth." And what brings about this marvellous change? God's declaration, "I have found a ransom." He who took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses, and on whom the Lord laid the iniquity of us all, has made provision in His redemption work for soul and body; Isa. 53 : 4–6, "By whose stripes we are healed."[*]

But the sick man must first receive the messenger, the interpreter of God's mind. Instead of being full of his own work and his pride (verse 17), he must learn to be nothing and to understand Christ's work and His mind. In fact, he must be reduced to a listening attitude, and brought into the very relation to God which He sought to establish by His first call to him, "in a dream, in a vision of the night." He must become a learner, and be brought to understand the language of the Spirit, otherwise it were better for him to retain his sickness. Whether the interpreter, the messenger, is Christ Himself (Cant. v. 10), or a servant of God who leads the sick person to an understanding of His mind, the truth is the same as to

GOD'S PURPOSE IN SICKNESS

—to draw man from himself to live Christ.

But some may say that this would be to condemn all God's sick ones as those who have been inattentive to His voice and have refused to be led by the Spirit. We must not shrink from any of the positive conclusions to which we are led by any truth which is evident in God's Word. But perhaps in looking a little nearer into the history of the early Church, where conversion and healing went always hand in hand, we may find some light upon our path. It is very evident that the voice of the Spirit of God was understood in the early Church in quite another manner than is at present the case. When Ananias and Sapphira were guilty of acting a lie, it needed no investigation of man to bring it to light; the Holy Ghost made it known to Peter, and the judgment, direct from God, followed immediately. In such a state of things, half-hearted men feared to join a Church where the bracing air of heaven was so strong and pure (Acts 5 : 13). Alas! it is not so now.

If our presumption is correct—that God's first language is that of His own blessed Spirit, and that sickness is His second language—then it is clearly evident that in measure as the first is not heard by the Church of Christ, He must use the second more largely: and this is the fact which we have before our eyes; a Church in which the living members are more frequently instructed, guided, guarded, and purified by sickness than by the direct working of the Holy Ghost. And this position is accepted by the Church at large as the normal state of things, so that the ordinary teaching on the subject of sickness is that it should be accepted, with the help of medical alleviation, as God's chosen means of education. And this very state of things precludes the possibility of judging individual invalids whose whole instruction has lain in this direction.

But if it is not in accordance with the Word of God, is it not time that to the direct guidance and teaching of God's Spirit, that we should learn to "suffer according to the will of God" (1 Peter 4 : 19), instead of suffering that from which He Himself commands us to seek deliverance (James 5 : 14), and for which He Himself has made provision (Matt. 8 : 16, 17). In the unhealthy state of the nerves, and often of the judgment, induced by sickness, the sufferings which we are called upon to bear for Christ's sake—in family circumstances, in the contempt of the world, in the coldness of Christian brethren who do not understand a whole-hearted surrender to the cause of Christ, in the burden of souls, etc.—become almost intolerable. And thus, while in a few blessed cases of sickness the soul surmounts the circumstances of pain and weariness, and marvellous testimony is given by some sufferers to God's wondrous grace, yet the majority of invalids are more or less slaves to their bodily condition and so are a loss to the Church at large.

WE SHOULD RETURN

And again, are we not responsible for every ray of light upon the mind of God, which He vouchsafes to give us? and ought we, as His children, to reject any portion of His Word because others ignore it? If we shrink from a path to which God's Word calls us, a path of faith and consecration as regards our bodily health, does it not prove that the life of faith is not a ruling power in our souls? Does it not disclose a secret mistrust of God, as though He were "a hard man," and not a loving Father? Is it not to act as though confidence in Him were the sure way to entail more suffering, and as though we were safer in our own keeping than in His? It is only when all the threads of our being—spirit, soul, and body—are in His hands, that He can work out uninterruptedly His whole will in us.

In the passage from Job which is before us (verse 26) we see how spiritual blessing accompanies the healing of the body as soon as the mind of God has been understood by the invalid. "He shall pray unto God, and He shall be favorable unto him, and he shall see His face with joy, for He will render unto man His righteousness." This implies and with it comes the power of testimony. "He shall look upon men and say, I have sinned and perverted that which was right, and it profited me not; He hath delivered my soul from going down into the pit, and my life shall see the light" (marginal rendering). His "whole body is full of light, having no part dark" (Luke 11 : 36). The testimony of many who have experienced healing by faith in God's Word confirms the truth that obedience to God's commands, whether that in Jas. 5 : 14, or in any other part of Scripture, cannot entail other than blessed consequences, so that the fear of losing spiritual blessing in seeking for healing at God's hands is groundless. The wisdom of our heavenly Father is to be trusted.

A CLOUDLESS EXPERIENCE,

As to the question of remedies, which so many raise, the same God who makes use of sickness as a school for those of His children who have not yet found their way into His chosen school can and does also use doctors and medicine for those who have not learned to trust implicitly in Him. But few doctors are in a position to discover to the patient what God has to say by the sickness, and healing without knowing it might prove no blessing. Again, when we take the Lord for our Physician, according to James 5 : 14, and believe that He has undertaken the cure of our bodies, are we free to ask Him at the same time to guide us in the choice of another physician, or that other in the choice of remedies?

---

[*] The Hebrew word translated "griefs" in Isa. 53 : 4 is the same as that translated "disease" in 2 Kings 1 : 2; 8 : 8, 9; 2 Chron. 16 : 12; 21 : 18, etc.: and the same as "sickness" in Deut. 7 : 15; 28 : 59, 61; 1 Kings 17 : 17; 2 Kings 13 : 14; 2 Chron. 21 : 15, 19; Ps. 41 : 3, etc. The Hebrew word translated "sorrows," in the same verse, is the same as "pain" in the following four passages: Job. 14 : 22; 33 : 19; Jer. 15 : 18; 51 : 8. It means pain, but it is used for "sorrow," as being the cause of pain.

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, November 19th, at 3.15 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A Lull in the World of Politics has followed the excitement of the elections. This is refreshing, and would be still more enjoyable if it were of longer duration. But as Congress will meet December 1st the interval of repose is a brief one.

The session immediately preceding a Presidential election is usually characterized by proceedings designed to influence that contest, each party concentrating its energies on such measures as it considers most likely to advance the interest of its candidate for the Presidential chair; and this session will probably be of that character. The questions which agitated the extra session will, it is expected, be allowed to rest. The President's message will deal principally with financial questions, having special reference to a resumption of funding operations. The opening of the fishery question with Great Britain will probably be the only foreign topic of interest.

The annual report of the Postmaster-General has been published. He recommends Congress to appropriate the necessary funds to enable him to make contracts with American steamship lines for carrying the mails to the West Indies and the Spanish Main. He says that his reasons for doing this are primarily to promote American commerce, encourage American shipbuilding, and establish such postal facilities as will bring the countries named into closer relations with the United States.

The Report of the Indian Bureau will be read with interest. The Commissioner says that the only sure way to make Indians advance in civilization, under the best conditions to promote their welfare, is to give each head of a family 160 acres of land and to each unmarried adult 80 acres, and to issue patents for the same, making the allotments inalienable and free from taxation for twenty-five years. Complimentary reference is made to the education of Indian youth at the Hampton Institute, under the conduct of General S. C. Armstrong, and also to the similar school just opened at Carlisle, Pa., by Captain R. H. Pratt, U.S.A., where 158 Indian children of both sexes, selected mostly from the Sioux and the wild tribes of the Indian Territory, are now receiving common-school and industrial education. There are already 13,350 of them under instruction—namely, 6,250 in the five civilized tribes, and 7,100 at the agency schools.

Niagara Falls.—A Proposal was made by Lord Dufferin the late Governor-General of Canada, shortly before his retirement from office, to the State of New York through Governor Robinson, that the Government of the State and the Government of the Dominion should combine to set apart for public uses the land near the Falls. The proposal came up November 20th in a tangible form at the meeting of the Commissioners of the State Survey. It was unanimously resolved that the State ought to acquire the lands on the American side from which the best views of Niagara can be had, and a committee was appointed to present a report to the Legislature after conferring with the Canadian authorities. The extortions practised by private owners at the Falls have been for a long time a subject of complaint by visitors, and the scheme proposed will, it is thought, remove the scandal and by a uniform scale of fees pay for the cost of management.

Father McNamara, the Irish Roman Catholic priest who broke loose from the Pope's authority three years ago and founded the "Independent Catholic Church," was installed as Bishop of that Church on Sunday evening, November 16th, at the Standard Hall, New York. The place was packed to the door, and many persons were obliged to remain outside. Father McNamara's movement is a very important one. He has not adopted all the evangelical doctrines, but he utterly repudiates the two great Romish heresies of the Pope's immaculate holiness and of the power of priests to forgive sins. He uses the Protestant Bible and Sankey's hymns, and he preaches free salvation by the blood of Jesus Christ. At his installation as bishop he accepted the Bible as the only rule of faith and containing all truth essential to salvation; he promised to preach Christ as the only way of life, and he renounced the doctrines of the mass and of transubstantiation, while he partook of the elements of bread and wine as simple emblems of the broken body and shed blood of the Son of God. Four Roman Catholic priests have joined him, and he has succeeded in releasing at least one nun from the untellable thraldom of the Convent. Being personally an Irishman, Father MNamara is directing his first and main efforts to free his own countrymen from the bonds of Rome.

Lottery Swindles are being Fought by Postmaster-General Key. He has given orders to postmasters not to pass through the mail the circulars or the money-orders of lottery dealers, and it is expected that he will propose legislation dealing with newspapers which publish lottery advertisements. In New York, where a large proportion of the tickets are sold, post-office orders addressed to lottery agents are not to be cashed. In this way it is hoped that a check will be put to the schemes by which foolish persons allow themselves to be victimized.

A similar infatuation prevails in Asia, for a letter from India states that the kingdom of Burmah is not only cursed with a drunken monarch, but lotteries have been introduced, and such is the spirit of speculation which has taken possession of the people in Mandalay, the capital of the kingdom, that Burmese parents are selling their daughters in order to obtain the means of purchasing lottery tickets, and robberies of the winning ticket-holders are common.

A Perilous Adventure with a Bear is Reported from Stroudsburg, Penn., as having occurred in the woods about four miles from that village on November 10th. A lumberman named Daggers saw a bear crouched on two limbs of a tree thirty feet from the ground. He fired at it, and the bear fell wounded, but not fatally.

This placed the hunter in great peril, for the bear was furious from its wounds, and attacked Daggers at once, giving him no opportunity to reload his gun. The dog sprang fearlessly at the bear, but was caught in the powerful fore-paws of the latter and crushed to death in an instant, without retarding in the least the advance of the bear on the hunter. It rushed at Daggers with distended jaws. He struck it with all his strength over the head with the butt of his gun, which was shivered to pieces, and apparently had no effect on the bear. Daggers kept the barrel of the gun in his hand, and drew his hunting-knife. As the bear rushed upon him he thrust the gun-barrel in its mouth and plunged his knife into its vitals. Daggers backed away from the bear, with the intention of dodging behind a tree and then escaping to a safe distance, but before he could take a step the bear grasped him by the shoulders. A desperate struggle ensued, the bear endeavoring to get the hunter in its hug, and Daggers putting forth every effort to prevent it. Finally, by the tearing loose of his clothing under the sharp claws of the bear, he escaped once more. The flesh on his shoulders was badly torn, and Daggers grew faint from the pain. The bear followed him up so closely that they were again in hand-to-hand contest.

The bear was visibly growing weaker, and the hunter's strength was also gradually leaving him. He tried to run, but could not, and the result now depended on whether the hunter or the bear gave out first. For several minutes they struggled together among the scrub-oaks until Daggers felt that he could hold out no longer, although the bear staggered and fell, and rose with difficulty. The hunter took two or three quick steps to one side, and fell to the ground unconscious. He does not know how long he lay insensible, but when he revived he tried to get up and could not. He dragged himself to the foot of a hemlock tree and rested his back against the trunk. Almost within his reach the great bear lay dead.

A spiritual conflict, of which this incident is a thrilling reminder, is described in the sermon by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, entitled "Satan in a Rage," which we publish in this number of the CHRISTIAN HERALD.

President Lincoln's Ebony Cane was in the possession of the late Dr. Joseph P. Thompson, whose portrait and life appeared in a recent number of this journal, and by him was treasured as a precious relic. In his will now published he thus directs the disposal of that and other treasures: "The ebony cane, used by President Lincoln and presented to me by Mrs. Lincoln after his death, I give and bequeath to the New York Historical Society. The cane belonged first to Henry Clay, of Kentucky; was given by him to Judge W. H. Robinson, of Missouri; by him to Cassius M. Clay, of Kentucky; by him to President Lincoln; and by Mrs. Lincoln to myself as a friend whom her husband greatly honored. To my beloved friend and physician, Dr. G. Curtli, of Berlin, I give and bequeath my set of medallions of Nomini Illustri in four frames, my 'Roman Lamp of Christian Faith,' and the owl in my library, to recall my sage counsel of many years."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Meetings at Cleveland were thronged to the last by anxious crowds. One who witnessed the scenes there writes: "There are many conversions. Next spring's record will probably show large gains, but the results are not to be measured in Cleveland churches. Mr. Moody has been preaching to Northern Ohio. Excursion after excursion, with its ten or twenty packed cars, has daily swelled the throng at the Tabernacle. Ministers and people have gone home with a mighty baptism. The effect on the preachers of the city cannot be estimated. There will be less of rhetoric and more simple Saxon and the Holy Ghost. A most marked change has come in not a few pulpits already. The pews look up in surprise and tearful gladness at the transformed pulpit that pleads, as never before, "O my beloved people, let us return unto the Lord, and He will have mercy upon us, and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon."

Plans for Rebuilding Tremont Temple, Boston, have been accepted, and it is believed that within six months the work of reconstruction will be completed. The new roof will probably be finished before winter. Several changes are contemplated in the new structure. Its seating capacity will be made larger than before, and it is believed that room will be made for 2700 people. A new organ is among the plans, and a broader entrance will be constructed.

Major Whittle, the Evangelist, Assisted by Mr. McGranahan, will work during the coming winter in Dayton, Ohio.

"Suffocated by the Fumes of Malt," was the erdict of a coroner's jury empannelled to inestigate the deaths of a woman and her child t Williamsburgh last week. The child, who vas eight years old, had climbed on to a cistern ised for storing malt, and peering down through . hole at the top, was observed to become dizzy nd fall through. His mother seized a ladder nd went to his rescue, but did not come up gain. An alarm was given, and some men 'ent into the cistern, and brought both mother nd child out, but both died from the effect of the ases generated by the malt, and the men who escued them emerged in a fainting condition. Ve are familiar with the ravages of this enemy f our race at another stage of its use, but this alamity shows that in all stages it is a dangerus foe to humanity.

A Remarkable Conversion was Related by Mr. Moody a few days ago. In one of the meetigs at Cleveland, Mr. Moody read a letter om a lady in Baltimore giving the news of the ath of a wayward son for whom prayer had freuently been offered in Mr. Moody's meetings. e died of thirst in the Rocky Mountains ; and a cleft of a rock near his body was found an nfinished letter to his mother, telling of his nversion through a hymn his mother had nt. It was the hymn so often sung by Mr. nkey :

"Where is my wandering boy to-night?"

A Disaster on Lake Ontario is Reported from swego, N. Y. On November 17th, the steam opeller Seymour, of Ogdensburg, left Cape Vinnt, at the foot of the lake, at 1 P.M., having tow four tugs, three dredges, and eight scows Buffalo. The tow belonged to John Hulsler the latter city.

At the start the weather was comparatively m, although there were indications of a comig storm. In the night the gale broke upon e little fleet. The sea ran very high, and presely the whole fury of the storm swept down on the vessels. The captain of the Seymour s in easy distance of the ports of Oswego, ngston, Coburg, Port Hope, and Broxton, and is supposed that he tried to reach one of em, but the tempest proved too strong for n.

The vessels were all unsuited to baffle the ves,and the frailer ones were torn adrift and bene unmanageable. The scows capsized, the cles of the tugs parted, and three of them went wn. The Seymour could do nothing but take e of herself or pick up some unfortunate mber of the other crews who had been washed rboard. Six lives were lost and the survis were so near perishing that they had given all hope of reaching land.

he Rev. J. T. Harrison, of the Methodist Crch, Brooklyn, is conducting a series of reval meetings in the Wharton Street Methost Church, of Philadelphia. In the course even weeks nearly 500 persons, it is hoped, e found peace in believing, and crowds still ege the church doors for admission.

Prayer Meeting on the Battlefield of Anam was held the night after the battle. It is s described by the sole survivor, now a sucful preacher in the Episcopal Church in the st :

Exhausted with marching and hard fighting, ad thrown myself on the ground seeking p. Another day would soon dawn, and pers another hard fight was before us, and tired re must have rest. It was late. There was oar of cannon or rattle of musketry heard ; ead and the dying lay all around us. I had lain long before Sergeant C. came to me and d me if I would come and pray with him and e of his comrades. Of course, tired as I I got up and gladly went with him. For could tell where we might all be before anr sun had set. We found four young men. were six in all. A little company gathered e on the damp ground on that sad night to to Him who only has power to bless and to

But what became of them? Where are they all now? At Fredericksburg one of the number fell mortally wounded into the arms of Corporal G., and with his last breath spoke of his trust in the Saviour. At Chancellosrville another fell, we know not where ; but as we were going into battle he said to a companion that his hope was in Christ, and He would take care of him, living or dying. At Gettysburg E. and C. were instantly killed. The day before, in a conversation with them, they both said they had peace and confidence in Christ and His promises. Another, the fifth, came out of battle with his limb terribly shattered, and died soon after—died, as he said, happy in his Saviour's love. And now I am the only one left. Five of that little band who met to pray and talk of Jesus and His love on that field of blood and death are gone to the eternal world, and I only, who tell the story, am left."

Who is to Pay Archbishop Purcell's Debts is a question still unsettled. The appeal sent out to the Roman Catholic churches for aid has produced about $75,000, a sum insufficient to pay even the interest due to the depositors in the Cincinnati arch-episcopal bank. Many of the creditors have been utterly ruined, and large numbers are in actual need of food and clothing, for a large proportion of the sufferers by the failure of the bank were among the working classes, and those who had saved their deposits with difficulty out of their scanty earnings.

The question is now mooted whether the ecclesiastical property held by the Romish Church in the name of the Archbishop ought not to be sold for the benefit of the creditors. It was stated emphatically by Archbishop Purcell's friends at the time of the discovery of the debt that he had not used the money for his own purposes, but for the church, in erecting buildings and maintaining schools. If this be the case, although the church may not be legally responsible for the debt, she is so morally ; it is a matter of simple justice for her to refund the money.

A Kindness Done Many Years Ago has brought forth fruit after many days. The wife and daughter of the murdered Agent Meeker relate that they received much kindness during their captivity in the Indian camp from the squaw Susan,and they believe they owe their lives mainly to her efforts. It now comes to light that Susan was herself once rescued from death in a romantic manner. She was captured by a band of Arapahoes, who put up a stake at the mouth of the Cache La Poudre River, intending to burn her to death. The commanding officer at Fort Collins, having heard of the proposed barbarity, by alternate threats and promises obtained Susan's release. It probably was in remembrance of this that she was so devoted to Mrs. and Miss Meeker.

Fine Churches were Charged by Dr. Tudor of St. Louis, at the recent Evangelical Alliance Conference, with being one cause why the masses do not go to church in cities. Dr. Tudor said : "Our fine fashionable churches deter the poor, argue the question as we may. 'Go to your church with this bonnet? And it is all the bonnet I have!' is the irresistible argument on the other side."

The Danger of Sleeping in Church was Illustrated in Brooklyn on Sunday, November 16th, when a lady in a fashionable church in Bedford Avenue fell asleep and did not awake at the conclusion of the service. Her head had fallen below the level of the top of the pew, and the sexton did not notice her when he put out the lights and closed the church. Late in the evening the sleeper waked, and was alarmed at her lonely condition. She rattled at a stained-glass window and shouted until the police hurried to her assistance. The sexton, who had the keys of the church and outer iron gate, was not to be found. A key was found in the possession of one of the trustees. With this the woman was released from her imprisonment, thankful to have escaped from a night's enforced occupation of the empty church.

SATAN IN A RAGE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Woe to the inhabiters of the earth and of the sea! for the devil is come down unto you, having great wrath, because he knoweth that he hath but a short time."—REVELATIONS 12 : 12.

I. How Satan Knows when his Time in a Soul is Short—1. When he Finds he is not so Welcome as he used to be—2. When his Accommodation is Curtailed—3. When he Hears Christ Knocking—4. When a Writ of Ejectment is Applied for—5. When he Finds the Holy Spirit at Work—II. How he Displays his Wrath—1. By Persecution — Instance of a Persecuted Young Man—2. By Suggesting Doubts—3. By Arousing the Passions—4. By Accusations—5. By Prmopting to Blasphemy—III. How Satan's Tactics Should be Met—1. Get him out Quickly—2. Cry to the Strong for Strength—3. Gather Courage from the Thought his Time is Short.

THE great battle in the heavenlies has been fought ; our glorious Michael has forever overthrown the dragon, and cast him down. In the highest regions the great principle of evil has received a total defeat through the life and death of our Lord Jesus. For human sin atonement has been made, and the great quarrel between God and man has come to a happy end. Everlasting righteousness has been brought in, and the peace of God reigns in heaven. The conflict henceforth rages here below, and in these inferior regions the prince of this world is warring mightily against the cause of God and truth. Much woe does this cause to the sons of men—woe which will never end till his power is altogether taken away.

Observe concerning our arch-enemy that he exercises forethought and care as to the evil enterprise to which he has set his hand. Whatever foolish men may do, the devil thinks. Others may be heedless and thoughtlesss, but he is anxious and full of consideration. He knows that his time or "opportunity" is short, and he looks forward to its close, for he is no careless waster of time and forgetter of the end. He values his opportunity to maintain his kingdom, to distress the people of God, and to dishonor the name of Christ, and since it is but a short one he treats it as such.

Among men there are some who know a great many important matters, but act as if they did not know them : their knowledge is so much waste stored up in the lumber-room of their minds and never brought into the workshop to be used for practical purposes. For instance, we know our mortality, and yet live as if we never meant to die. There is great necessity for many of us to pray, "Lord, teach us to number our days, that we may apply our hearts unto wisdom." We must know that our time is short, and that our life will soon come to an end, and yet we fail to know it practically, for we are not as earnest as dying men ought to be. In this the arch-enemy is not so foolish as we are, for he so well knows that his time is short that he remembers the fact, and is actuated by it.

Note well the direction in which this knowledge operates upon him. It excites his emotions. The deepest emotion of which he is capable is that of anger, for he knows not how to love. Wrath is his very soul, as hatred is his very life ; he knows nothing of gentleness, nothing of affection, and therefore the fact that his time is short moves within him his master passion, and he hath great wrath. His evil nature is all on fire, and his excitement is terrible.

Nor is the result of knowing that his time is short merely emotional on the part of the arch-enemy, for in consequence of his great wrath he is moved to make earnest efforts. His energy is excited, he persecutes the woman whose seed he dreads, and he pours floods out of his mouth against her. There is nothing which Satan can do for his evil cause which he does not do. We may be half-hearted, but he never is. He is the very image of ceaseless industry and indefatigable earnestness. He will do all that can be done in the time of his permitted range. We may be sure that he will never lose a day.

The text tells us that the shortness of Satan's opportunity excites his wrath, and we may gather a general rule from this one statement—namely, that in proportion as the devil's time is shortened his energy is increased, and we may take it as an assured fact that when he rages to the uttermost his opportunities are nearly over. He hath great wrath, knowing that

HIS TIME IS SHORT.

I hope there will be something of instruction in this, and somewhat of comfort for all those who are on the right side. May the Holy Ghost make it so.

It shall be seen, even to the last hour of history, that the devil rages the more when his empire is the nearer to its end. At the very last he shall go about to deceive the nations which are in the four quarters of the earth, Gog and Magog, to gather them together to battle. They shall come up in great hosts, fierce for the conflict, to "the battle of the great day of God Almighty," at Armageddon. It shall then seem as if the light of Israel must be quenched, and the truth of God utterly extinguished; but in that dread hour the Lord shall triumph gloriously, and he shall smite his adversaries to their final overthrow.

Now what is true on a great scale is true in the smaller one. Missionaries in any country will generally find that the last onslaught of heathenism is the most ferocious. We shall find, whenever the truth comes into contact with falsehood, that when error is driven to its last intrenchments it fights for life, tooth and nail, with all its might; its wrath is great because its time is short. In any village or town in England, or in any other country, whenever the opposition to the Gospel reaches its most outrageous pitch, and men seem as if they would murder the preacher of the Word, you may reckon that the power of the oposition is almost over.

The same truth will apply to every individual man. When God begins His great work in a sinner's heart, to lead him to Christ, it is no bad sign if the man feels more hatred to God than ever, more dislike to good things than before; nor need we despair if he is driven into greater sin than ever. The ferocity of the temptation indicates the vigor with which Satan contends for any one of his black sheep. He will not lose his subjects if he can help it, and so he puts forth all his strength to keep them under his power, and he is especially vigilant and furious when the power of grace is about to prevail for their salvation. I will not, however, dwell upon this point, because it is to be the subject of our discourse.

The general fact is further illustrated in the cases of many believers. There are times when in the believer's heart the battle rages horribly, when he hardly knows whether he is a child of God at all, and is ready to give up all hope. He cannot pray or praise, for he is so distracted; he cannot read the Scriptures without horrible thoughts. It seems as if he must utterly perish, for no space is given him in which to refresh his heart, the attacks are so continual and violent. Such dreadful excitements are often followed by years of peace, quiet usefulness, holiness, and communion with God. Satan knows that God is about to set a limit to his vexations of the good man, and so he rages extremely because his opportunity is short.

I thought this morning that I would call attention to one particular instance of the fact which is seen in the soul that is coming to Christ, in whom Satan often hath great wrath, knowing that his time is short. My object is to comfort those who are awakened, and are seeking the Saviour. If they are sore beset, I long that they may find peace and rest and hope very speedily. When the poor man who was possessed with an evil spirit was being brought to Christ, we read that "as he was a coming, the devil threw him down, and tare him." That is the way with the great enemy: when he is about to be cast out his energy is more displayed than ever, that if possible he may destroy the soul before it has obtained peace with God. May the sacred Comforter help me while I try to speak encouragingly upon this subject.

I. Our first head shall be,

HOW DOES SATAN KNOW

when his time is short in a soul? He watches over all souls that are under his power with incessant maliciousness. He goeth about the camp like a sentinel, spying out every man who is likely to be a deserter from his army. In some men's hearts he dwells at ease, like a monarch in his pavilion; their minds are his favorite mansions; he goes in and out whenever he pleases, and he makes himself wonderfully much at home.

In such a case all the man's faculties are so many chambers for Satan to dwell in, and his emotions are so many fires and forges for Satan to work with. But by and by, if divine grace interposes, there comes a change, and Satan, who has lived there twenty, thirty, forty, fifty, sixty years, begins to think that he shall not be able to keep this residence of his much longer.

1. He perceives that his time is short, and I suppose he perceives it first by discovering that he is not quite so welcome as he used to be. The man loved sin, and found pleasure in it, but now sin is not so sweet as it was; its flavor is dull and insipid. The charms of vice are fading, and its pleasures are growing empty, vain, and void, and this is a token of a great change. Once, whenever a pilgrim sin came that way, the soul kept open house to entertain it with all hospitality, but now it is not half so eager; even the home-dwelling habitual lusts do not yield so much content as aforetime, neither is so much provision made for them.

The black prince and his court are out of favor, and this is an intimation that he must soon be gone. When sin loses its sweetness, Satan is losing his power. The adversary perceives that he must soon stretch his dragon wings when he sees that the heart is growing weary of him and is breaking away from his fascinations.

2. He grows more sure of his speedy ejectment when he does not get the accommodation he used to have. The man was once eager for sin; he went in the pursuit of vice, hunted after it, and put himself in the way of temptation, and then Satan reigned securely; but now he begins to forsake the haunts where sin walks openly, and he abandons the cups of excitement which inflame the soul; you find him going to a place of worship, listening to a sermon, whereas before he frequented the theatre, and enjoyed a loose song at a music hall. The devil does not like this change, and takes it as a warning that he will soon have to give up the key.

The man does not drink as once he did, nor swear as once he did; nor does he yield himself up with readiness to every temptation. The fish is getting shy of the bait. The awakened man has not decided for Christ, but he is no longer at ease in bondage, no longer the glad slave of iniquity. He is on the wrong road, but he does not run in it; on the contrary, he pauses, he heaves a sigh and wishes he could leave the evil road; wishes he knew how to leap a hedge and get into the narrow way. Satan marks all this, and he says to himself, "There is not the preparation made for me that there used to be, there is little readiness to run on my errands, and therefore I perceive that my time is short."

3. He is still more convinced of the shortness of his possession of a man's heart when he hears knocking at that heart's door a hand whose power he has felt. He knows the kind of knock it is: a gentle, but an irresistible knocking upon the heart. Continual, perpetual, persevering, the knock of one who means to enter; the knock as of one that hath a hole in his hand. He knocketh not as one whose power lies in a blow, but as one whose tears and love are his battery of attack. He hath an energy of compassion, an irresistibleness of gentle love; and as Satan hears his knock, and perceives that the tenant of the house hears it too, and is half inclined to open the door, he is afraid.

When the heart relents at the sound of the gospel summons, he trembles more. If the knocking still continues, waking up the tenant in the dead of night, a sound heard amid the noise of traffic and above the laughter of fools, he says, "My time is short." He knows the hand which broke his head of old, and its knocking is ominous to him.

4. Another indication to the enemy that his time is short is when he knows that the tenant of the house steals away sometimes to court, and asks for a warrant of ejectment against him. You know what I mean—when the man feels that he cannot himself get rid of sin, and cannot in his own strength conquer Satan, and therefore cries, "O God help me, O God for Christ's sake drive out the old dragon from my soul, I beseech thee." This is asking for a warrant of ejectment, this is going to the court of heaven and pleading with the great King to issue a summons, and send his officer to turn out the intruder, that he may no longer pollute the spirit. "Ah," saith the evil one, "this is not the place for me much longer; behold he prayeth." More fierce than the flames of hell to Satan are the prayers of convinced sinners: when they pray he must be gone. He must cry "boot and saddle" when men sound the trumpet of prayer. There is no tarrying in the camp any longer when the advance guard of prayer has come to take possession.

5. One thing more always makes Satan know that his time is short, and that is when the Holy Spirit's power is evidently at work within the mind. Light has come in, and the sinner sees and knows what he was ignorant of before Satan hates the light as much as he loves darkness, and, like an owl in the daylight, he feels that he is out of place. Life comes in, too, by the Holy Ghost. The man feels, he become sensitive, he becomes penitent, and Satan, wh loves death, and ever abides among the tombs is bound to fly before spiritual life.

The Holy Spirit is beginning to work upo the man very graciously, and Satan knows ever throb of the Spirit's power, for it is the death o his power, and so he saith, "I will go to th place from whence I came out, for this hous trembles as if it were shaken with earthquak and affords me no rest." Joyful tidings for heart long molested by this fierce fiend! Awa thou enemy: thy destructions shall soon come t a perpetual end!

II. This brings me, secondly, to notice tha inasmuch as the shortness of his tenure excit the rage of Satan, we must next observe

HOW HE DISPLAYS HIS GREAT WRATH.

His fury rages differently in different persor

1. On some he displays his great wrath by st ring up outward persecution. The man is not Christian yet; he is not actually converted y but Satan is so afraid that he will be saved that sets all his dogs upon him directly. The poor so goes into the workshop, and though he wou give his eyes if he could say, "I am a Christian he cannot quite say so; and yet his workma begin to pounce upon him as much as if he w in very deed one of the hated followers of Jes They scoff at him because he is serious and sob because he is beginning to think and to be cent, because he begins to listen to the Gos and to care for the best things.

Now if the grace of God be not in awakened man, and his reformation is onl spasm of remorse, it is very likely that he be driven back from all attendance upon means of grace by the ribald remarks of the godly, but if the Lord Jesus Christ has re been knocking at his door, and the Spirit of has begun to work, this opposition will answer its purpose. The Lord will find wi for this poor soul that he may flee away from trial which as yet he is not able to bear. I h sometimes known such opposition even ten undo Satan's work, and answer quite the o site purpose.

I know one who was much troubled a the truth of Scripture and about the doct of the Gospel, although he was a sincere sear into the truth. He commenced to attend this house of prayer, and to listen to the Gospel, rather as an inquirer than as a believer. As yet he could not say that he was a Christian, though he half wished he could. Now it came to pass that the opposition which he immediately received from the world strengthened his faith in the Bible, and became a sort of missing link between him and the truth.

The sneers of his comrades acted in this way. He said to himself, "Why should they all attack me on the bare supposition of my being a Christian? If I had been a Mohammedan or a Jew they would have regarded me with curiosity, and let me alone; but inasmuch as they only suspect me of becoming a Christian they are all down upon ne with contempt and anger. Now (said he) why is this? Is not this a proof that I am right, and that the Word of God is right, for did it not say that there should be enmity between the seed of the serpent and the seed of the woman?"

The devil did not know what he was doing when he opposed that young man and made a believer of him by that which was meant to drive him into unbelief. If the men of this world oppose the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ more iercely than any other, surely it must be that here is something special in it, something opposed to their sinful ways or to their proud hopes, something which is of God. That was he inference which my young friend drew from he treatment he received, and that inference stablished him in the faith. Thus, you see, Satan often hopes to save his dominion when his ime is short by vehement persecution against he awakened sinner.

2. Much worse, however, is his other method of showing his wrath—namely, by vomiting oods out of his mouth to drown, if possible, our new-born hope. When the hopeful hearer s yet has not really found peace and rest, it will ometimes happen that Satan will try him with oubts and blasphemies and temptations such s he never knew before. The tempted one has een amazed, and has said to himself, "How is his? Can my desire after Christ be the work f God? I get worse and worse. I never felt o wicked as this till I began to seek a Saviour." et this is no strange thing, fiery though the ial be.

3. At such time, also, Satan will often arouse l the worst passions of our nature, and drive them nto unwonted riot. The awakened sinner will e astonished as he finds himself beset with mptations more base and foul than he has ever lt before. He will resist and strive against the sault, but it may be so violent as to stagger m. He can scarcely believe that the flesh is o utterly corrupt. The man who is anxiously eking to go to heaven seems at such a time as he were dragged down by seven strong demons the eternal deeps of perdition. He feels as if e had never known sin before, nor been so mpletely beneath its power. The Satanic oopers sleep as a quiet garrison while the man under the spell of sin, but when once the heart likely to be captured by Immanuel's love the fernal soldiery put on their worst manner, and ample down all the thoughts and desires of the ul.

4. Satan may also attack the seeker in another rm—with fierce accusations and judgments. He es not accuse some men, for he is quite sure them, and they are his very good friends; but en a man is likely to be lost to him, he alters s tone and threatens and condemns. He es, "What, you be saved! It is impossible! u know what you used to be. Think of your st life." Then he rakes up a very hell before e man's eyes. "You!" saith he; "why, ever ce you have pretended to be a little better, d have begun to attend the means of grace, u know you have looked back with a longing e, and hungered for your old pleasures. It is ite out of the question that you should be a vant of Christ! He will not have such a tat- demalion as you in his house. The great Cap- n will never march at the head of a regiment ich is disgraced by receiving such as you.

Bunyan describes Apollyon as standing across the road and swearing by his infernal den that the pilgrim should go no further; there would he spill his soul. Then he began to fling at him all manner of fiery darts, and among them was this one, "Thou didst faint at first setting out, when thou wast almost choked in the gulf of Despond. Thou wast almost persuaded to go back at the sight of the Lions. Thou hast been false already to thy new Lord!"

Think for a moment of the devil chiding us for sin! Oh! that the poor burdened soul could laugh at this hypocritical accuser, for he hates to be despised, and yet he right well deserves it. Laugh at him, O virgin daughter of Zion, for this great wrath of his is because his time is short. Who is he that he should bring an accusation against us? Let him mind himself; he has enough to answer for. When he turns an accuser it is enough to make the child of God laugh him to scorn. Yet it is not easy to laugh when you are in this predicament, for the heart is ready to break with anguish.

5. Once more. Satan at such times has been known to pour into the poor troubled mind floods of blasphemy. I do not recollect as a child having heard blasphemy. Carefully brought up and kept out of harm's way, I think it could only have been once or twice that I ever heard profane language; and yet, when I was seeking the Lord, I distinctly remember the spot where the most hideous blasphemies that ever passed the human mind rushed through my mind. I clapped my hands to my mouth for fear I should utter one of them. They were none of my inventing, neither had I revived them from my memory: they were the immediate suggestions of Satan himself, who was determined, if possible, to drive me to despair.

Read the story of John Bunyan's five years of torture under this particular misery, and you will see how Satan would say to him, "Sell Christ, Sell Christ, Give up Christ," and as he went about his daily business he would have it ringing in his ears, "Sell Christ, Sell Christ." When at last, in a moment of worry, he thought he said, "Let him go if He will," then came the accusation, "Now it is all over with you. Jesus will have nothing to do with you, you have given him up. You are a Judas, you have sold your Lord." Then when the poor man sought the Lord, and found peace again, some other dreadful insinuation would dog his heels.

John Bunyan was too precious a servant of the devil for him to lose him readily, and the enemy had perhaps some idea of what kind of servant of God the converted tinker would become, and what sort of dreams would charm the hearts of many generations, and so he would not let him go without summoning all the tribes of hell to wreak their vengeance on him if they could not detain him in their service. Yet Bunyan escaped, and so will others in like case. Oh, bondslave of the devil, may you have grace to steal away to Jesus! Hasten away from Satan's power at once, for otherwise he will, as long as he has any opportunity, manifest his great wrath toward you.

III. Thirdly, and briefly, let us think—

HOW ARE WE TO MEET ALL THIS?

How must Satan be dealt with while he is showing his great wrath because his power is short?

1. I should say, first, if he is putting himself in this rage, let us get him out all the more quickly. If he would remain quiet, even then we ought to be anxious to be rid of his foul company; but if he shows this great rage, let us out with him straight away. In God's name let the dragon be smitten if he must needs be raving. If there is any opportunity of getting him out, back door or front door, straight away, do not let us loiter or linger even for a single hour; a devil raging, making us blaspheme, and then accusing us, tempting us and betraying us, is such a dangerous occupant of a heart that he is not to be borne with. Out he must go, and out at once. Better have a den of lions dwelling in our house than the devil within our heart.

Lord, turn him out at once by thine own grace. We decide once for all to wage war with him; we will linger no longer, we dare not; we will procrastinate no more, it is more than our lives are worth. Nay, not to-morrow, but to-day out must the tyrant go. Nay, not after we leave this Tabernacle, but here, in this very pew, O Lord, drive the old dragon from his throne with all his hellish crew! That is the first advice I give you, let the enemy be cast out at once by grace divine.

2. And the next thing is, inasmuch as we cannot get him out by our own unaided efforts, let us cry to the strong for strength, who can drive out this prince of the power of the air. There is life in a look at Jesus Christ, and as soon as that life comes, away goes this prince of darkness as to his domination and reigning power. Oh! soul, there is nothing left for thee but to look to Jesus Christ alone. Worried as thou art, and almost devoured, now is thy time to put thy trust in Jesus, who is mighty to save.

What canst thou do against Satan? Thou wouldst fain be rid of him, what canst thou do? Do nothing but this: Cry to his Master against him. He is mighty, set the Almighty One upon him. He accuses thee, refer him to thine Advocate. Thy sin he brings before thee, throw the blood of atonement in his face. Here is a text that will drive him down to his den: "The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin." And, "This is a faithful saying, and worthy of all acceptation that Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners, of whom I am chief."

Have done with battling with the wily foe; do not answer the old deceiver. If he tells thee thou art a blasphemer, own it; if he says thou art utterly lost, own it; and then cast thyself at Jesus' feet, and He will overcome thy foe and set thee free.

3. One more comfort for you, and it is this: The more he rages the more must your poor, troubled heart be encouraged to believe that he will soon be gone. I venture to say that nothing will make him go sooner than your full belief that he has to go. Courageous hope is a weapon which he dreads. Tell him he must soon be gone. He has been accusing you, and pouring venom into your ear, and making you believe that it is your own blasphemy, whereas it is not yours but his. Say to him, "Ah, but you will be gone soon. You may rage, but you will have to be gone."

"I have full possession of you," he says, "soul and body, and I triumph over you." Say to him, "And would you triumph over me as you do if you did not know that you will soon be driven out?" "Ah," saith he, "you will be lost, you will be lost." He howls at you as if ready to devour. Say to him, "If I was sure to be lost you would not tell me so; you would sing sweet songs in my ears, and lure me to destruction; you have to go, you know you have." "Oh," saith he, "it is impossible you should be saved; you will be damned; you will have the hottest place in hell." "Yes," say you, "but who sent you to tell me that? You never spoke the truth yet. You are a liar from the beginning, and you are only saying this because you have to go. You know you have to go."

Tell him so, and it is not long before he will depart. Say, "Rejoice not over me, O mine enemy; though I fall yet shall I rise again." Tell him you know his Master. Tell him he may nibble at your heel, but you recollect one that broke his head. Point to his broken head—he always tries to hide it if he can. Tell him his crown is battered to pieces, and tell him where that deed was done, and by whose blessed hand; and as you tell him these things he will shrink back, and you shall find yourself alone with Jesus.

Then will Jesus say to you, "Where is thine accuser?" You will look around, and the enemy will be gone; and then your blessed Master will say, "Neither do I condemn thee: go and sin no more." The Lord grant us to get such a riddance of our arch-enemy, and to get it this very moment, for Christ's dear sake. Amen.

STANDING BEAR AND BRIGHT EYES.

H. H. writes to the Independent:

Standing Bear is one of the chiefs of that Ponca tribe whose removal from their own lands to the Indian Territory has been the subject of much discussion in the newspapers. He is journeying now through our principal cities and towns, for the purpose of soliciting money, to enable his tribe to recover their lands. He is accompanied by Mr. Tibbles, a Western lawyer and editor, who was the instrument of his rescue, by habeas corpus, from the United States troops at Omaha, and by two Omaha Indians, Miss Susette La Fleche and her brother, who act as interpreters. Miss La Fleche is known in her tribe as "Bright Eyes," and the Indian name of her father, who is the head chief of the tribe, is "Iron Eyes;" but her maternal grandfather was half French, hence the name La Fleche. She is a well-educated, graceful, winning, lovely girl, has been a teacher in the school on the Omaha Reservation, and speaks English so quaint, so simple, and yet so stately in its very simplicity, that one is lost in wonder until he learns that the only book of value this Indian girl owns is a little edition of Shakespeare, which she won as a prize at school and knows wellnigh by heart.

Standing Bear is a man sixty years old. His face is a gentle one, and stamped with unutterable sadness. His whole bearing is dignified and courteous. His silence is as eloquent as speech, and his gestures are so full of significance, of fire, of point, that' watching them closely, one can often foretell the import of his sentences before Bright Eyes translates them.

I studied the faces of these two, as they were taken by Mr. Houghton, the publisher, through room after room of the busy Riverside Press. Bright Eyes was eager, interested, observant. No process was too complicated for her attention, and her delight was a beautiful thing to see. Standing Bear was interested and observant; but his face saddened moment by moment, and when Mr. Houghton asked him to say a few words to the workwomen, one hundred of whom came crowding up, listening intently, these were the first words he said:

"We are weak and you are strong. It is because we had no books that we are weak and my people are in distress."

Later, they were presented to Professor Longfellow and his daughters, at Mr. Houghton's house. The author of "Hiawatha" seemed no stranger to Bright Eyes; and, when he paid her the courteous compliment of calling her "Minnehaha," she received it with exquisite grace and pleasure, which became a great chief's daughter. The sadness of Standing Bear's face was pathetic.

"He feels much sadder when he is in homes like this," said Bright Eyes. "It makes him think more how different it is for his people. In the public places he does not think so much."

I will give in Standing Bear's own language, word for word, his story of the removal of his tribe from their home. It may not be amiss to preface it by the quotation of a few words from the last treaty which our Government made with them.

We have made four treaties with the Poncas—the first in 1817, the second in 1828, the third in 1858, the fourth in 1865.

This last treaty begins as follows:

"In consideration of military services, and of other lands ceded to the United States, the Government of the United States cede and relinquish all title and interest in the following described territory."

Then follows a description of certain townships and sections.

And it was from this land, thus "ceded and relinquished"—not "set apart for use and occupancy"—that the Poncas were removed by the armed forces of the United States Government. No official document, no other man's narrative—no, not if a second Homer should arise to sing it—could tell the story so well as Standing Bear tells it.

"We lived on our land as long as we can remember. No one knows how long ago we came there. The land was owned by our tribe as far back as memory of men goes.

"We were living quietly on our farms. All of a sudden one white man came. We had no idea what for. This was the inspector. He came to our tribe with Rev. Mr. Henmaie. These two, with the agent, James Lawrence, they made our trouble.

"They said the President told us to pack up; that we must move to the Indian Territory.

"The inspector said to us, 'The President says you must sell this land. He will buy it and pay you the money, and give you new land in the Indian Territory.'

"We said to him: 'We do not know your authority. You have no right to move us till we have had council with the President.'

"We said to him: 'We will see the President first.'

"He said to us: 'I will take you to see the new land. If you like it, then you can see the President and tell him so. If not, then you can see him and tell him so.' And he took all ten of our chiefs down. I went, and Bright Eyes's uncle went. He took us to look at three different pieces of land. He said we must take one of the three pieces, so the President said. After he took us down there, he said, No pay for the land we left.

"We said to him: 'You have forgotten what you said before we started. You said we should have pay for our land. Now you say not. You told us then you were speaking truth.' All these three men took us down there. The man got very angry. He tried to compel us to take one of the three pieces of land. He told us to be brave. He said to us, 'If you do not accept these, I will leave you here alone. You are one thousand miles from home. You have no money. You have no interpreter and you cannot speak the language.' And he went out and slammed the door. The man talked to us from long before sundown till it was nine o'clock at night.

"We said to him: 'We do not like this land. We could not support ourselves. The water is bad. Now send us to Washington, to tell the President, as you promised.'

"He said to us: 'The President did not tell me to take you to Washington; neither did he tell me to take you home.'

"We said to him: 'You have the Indian money you took to bring us down here. That money belongs to us. We would like to have some of it. People do not give away food for nothing. We must have money to buy food on the road.'

"He said to us: 'I will not give you a cent.'

"We said to him: 'We are in a strange country. We cannot find our way home. Give us a pass, that people may show us our way.'

"He said: 'I will not give you any.'

"We said to him: 'This interpreter is ours. We pay him. Let him go with us.'

"He said: 'You shall not have the interpreter. He is mine, and not yours.'

"We said to him: 'Take us, at least, to the railroad. Show us the way to that.'

"And he would not. He left us right there. It was winter. We started for home on foot. At night we slept in haystacks. We barely lived till morning, it was so cold. We had nothing but our blankets. We took the ears of corn that had dried in the fields. We ate it raw. The soles of our moccasins wore out. We were barefoot in the snow. We were nearly dead when we reached the Otoe Reserve. It had been fifty days. We stayed there ten days, to strengthen up, and the Otoes gave each of us a pony. The agent of the Otoes told us he had received a telegram from the inspector, saying that the Indian chiefs had run away; not to give us food or shelter or help in any way. The agent said: 'I would like to understand. Tell me all that has happened. Tell me the truth.'"

(This Otoe agent afterward told Bright Eyes that when the chiefs entered his room they left the prints of their feet in blood on the floor as they came in.)

"Then we told our story to the agent and to the Otoe chiefs—how we had been left down there to find our way.

"The agent said: 'I can hardly believe it possible that any one could have treated you so. That inspector was poor man, to have done this. If I had taken chiefs in this way, I would have brought them home. I could not have left them there!'

"In seven days we reached the Omaha Reservation. Then we sent a telegram to the President: asked him if he had authorized this thing. We waited three days for the answer. No answer came.

"In four days we reached our own home. We found the inspector there. While we were gone, he had come to our people and told them to move.

"Our people said: 'Where are our chiefs? What have you done with them? Why have you not brought them back? We will not move till our chiefs come back.'

"Then the inspector told them: 'To-morrow you must be ready to move. If you are not ready, you will be shot.' Then the soldiers came to the doors, with their bayonets; and ten families were frightened. The soldiers brought wagons; they put their things in and were carried away. The rest of the tribe would not move.

"When we got there, we asked the inspector why he had done this thing; and he got very angry.

"Then we said to him: 'We did not think we would see your face again, after what has passed. We thought never to see your face any more. But here you are.'"

(The fine and fiery scorn of Standing Bear's gestures at this passage was something which could not be described.)

"We said to him: 'This land is ours. It belongs to us. You have no right to take it from us. The land is crowded with people, and only this is left to us.'

"We said to him: 'Let us alone. Go away from us. If you want money, take all the money which the President is to pay us for twelve years to come. You may have it all, if you will go and leave us our lands.'

"Then, when he found that we would not go he wrote for more soldiers to come.

"Then the soldiers came, and we locked ou doors, and the women and children hid in th woods. Then the soldiers drove all the peopl the other side of the river, all but my brothe Big Snake and I. We did not go; and the so diers took us and carried us away to a fort an put us in jail. There were eight officers wh held council with us after we got there. Th commanding officer said: 'We wish to kno why you are here.' The officer said: 'I hav received four messages telling me to send m soldiers after you. Now, what have you done.'

"Then we told him the whole story. Th the officer said: 'You have done no wrong. Th land is yours. They had no right to take it fro you. Your title is good. I am here to prote the weak and I have no right to take you; bu am a soldier and I have to obey orders.'

"He said: 'I will telegraph to the Presider and ask him what I shall do. We do not thi these three men had any authority to treat y as they have done. When we own a piece land, it belongs to us till we sell it and pock the money.'

"Then he brought a telegram, and said had received answer from the President. T President said he knew nothing about it.

"They kept us in jail ten days. Then th carried us back to our home. The soldiers c lected all the women and children together; th they called all the chiefs together in counc and then they took wagons and went round broke open the houses. When we came b from the council, we found the women and c dren surrounded by a guard of soldiers.

"They took our reapers, mowers, hay-ra pades, ploughs, bedsteads, stoves, cupboards, very thing we had on our farms, and put them n one large building. Then they put into the vagons such things as they could carry. We old them that we would rather die than leave ur lands; but we could not help ourselves. 'hey took us down. Many died on the road. 'wo of my children died. After we reached the ew land, all my horses died. The water was ery bad. All our cattle died; not one was left. stayed till one hundred and fifty-eight of my eople had died. Then I ran away, with thirty f my people, men and women and children. ome of the children were orphans. We were hree months on the road. We were weak and ick and starved. When we reached the Omaha Reserve, the Omahas gave us a piece of land, and e were in a hurry to plough it and put in wheat. While we were working, the soldiers came and rrested us. Half of us were sick. We would ather have died than have been carried back; ut we could not help ourselves.'

It was while this little band had stopped to est, under guard of their military escort, near Omaha City, that Mr. Tibbles went out to see hem. Standing Bear said to him, then:

"I have done no wrong, and yet I have been rrested twice. Tell me, now, does your law eally do this thing?"

Mr. Tibbles thought not; the highest legal uthority in the State thought not; and the Inians were set free by legal process. But now ehold how the curse of the helpless clings to hem. Being declared "persons" and free, and o longer "wards of the Government," they annot be allowed to go on any Indian Reservaon. They must live as best they can at large mong the white people, who hate and distrust hem. There are only eight men in the band; nd there are fifteen children, mostly orphans—he children whose parents died of exposure and ardship and bad water and malaria—fifteen chilren and six women to be supported.

They are living about seventy-five miles north f the Omaha Reserve. The Omahas help them l they can, and the men work whenever they n get work to do; but no farmer in the Westn country will hire an Indian, if he can help it. he eight men and the six women, with the fifeen children, will see hard times before spring. hey could have planted wheat; but they were ot let out of jail last spring till too late for that. hey have lost even the privileges of slavery; nd, as yet, freedom offers them very little in xchange.

Rejoicing in Privation.—Johannes Bruce, the ounder of the order of Carmelites, though a oman Catholic priest, was a saint indeed, disnguished by his love to God, and his faith. ne day the members of the convent found, that eir whole stock of food was a single piece of dry ead. They sat down and asked God's blessing on this crust. They had scarcely returned to eir cells when the bell rang and a man enred with a large basket of provisions, which ere carried with a letter to the prior, who was n his knees praying. He read; the letter dropd from his hands and he began to weep bitrly. The porter, surprised, said, "Why do u weep?" Johannes replied, "Brother, I do t weep without reason. Think how weak the rd must see our faith to be, since He is unlling to see us suffer want a single day without nding visible aid."

At the Conference of the Evangelical Allice at Edinburgh on October 30th, Dr. hite, of New York, gave an interesting acunt of what is being done in the Southern ates among the freedmen to prepare them r Christian work. It is expected, he said, that a few years they will be able to provide such supply of missionaries as would do more to ristianize Africa than could be done by any ropean agency with white men. They had ready eight colleges and eleven normal and ghteen initiatory schools, with 7000 emancipated aves in them, ranging from twenty to forty years age. They had eleven missionaries in the field.

COMING POPISH STRUGGLES.

By Rev. C. H. Hamilton, Rector of Horne, England.

The Tactics of Rome—Revival of her Spiritual Power—New Policy of the Vatican—Bismarck and the Ultramontanes — Rome's Increasing Activity—Testimony of the Press to her Continued Vitality—Corrupted Christianity in League with Antichrist — Rome's Triumph, and Final Destruction.

THE Church of Rome has ever shown a consummate ability in her tactics to meet the ever-changing wants and tastes of each succeeding age. But in one respect alone we mark no change: she has been from the earliest period of her history the consistent and uncompromising foe of light and knowledge and intellectual liberty, and has never hesitated to use whatever weapon the times have placed in her hand to arrest the advance of truth and slay its apostles. Rome is ever wise in her generation: never scrupulous in the use of means, whether it be royalty or revolution, the domain of law or the camp of sedition, so long as it will minister to the revival of her power, she has been ever ready to seize the opportunities of the hour, and with consummate skill to turn them to her own account. Now she is seeking to establish her sway over the masses, not, however, with any intention of elevating them, but lending her aid for the suppression of law and order which stand in the way of her return to power.

Leo XIII., one of the shrewdest Pontiffs that have occupied the chair of St. Peter, has more accurately gauged the spirit of the times than the Pope who preceded him. Though the stubborn resistance of Pius IX. no doubt served a purpose and confirmed the attachment of his own subjects, this defiant attitude could never advance the cause of Rome by a single step. The new Pope has reversed these tactics of passive resistance, and under his directing influence the Church is everywhere resuming her activity. The adherents of the Papacy are no longer commanded to abstain from taking any part in the election of councillors and deputies, and this influence is beginning to affect sensibly the control of states and governments.

Already there are strong evidences of a clerical reaction and revival of the Papal power in the kingdoms of Italy and France. In the latter country the Ultramontanes are preparing to war on the question of education, and are raising successfully the old cry that religion is in danger. In Germany a new and unexpected power has been recently placed in their hands. The returns of the late elections show that the two great parties in the State are evenly balanced, and consequently the Ultramontane deputies have it in their power to turn the scale which way they please, and practically control the action of the Legislature.

It is very curious to watch the course Prince Bismarck has elected to pursue in this singular turn of events. Not much more scrupulous than Rome herself in the use of means, provided they will further his political purpose, it seems that he is about to strike hands with his old enemies and enlist them in his service. He will find that he is playing with an edged tool. The Jesuits are at least his equals in craft and design, and we may be pretty sure that the substantial advantages arising out of this strange compact will rest on their side. Probably when they have served his purpose he will seek (as he has done in more than one former instance) to dispense with their services, and may then discover that they have used their opportunity so well in strengthening their position in the Empire that they cannot easily be dislodged. So stubborn has been their resistance to the laws levelled against their ecclesiastical claims that even he has been fain to come to terms with the Papacy instead of continuing to wage open war with it. Rome has winning cards in her hands, and we may trust her to play them well.

Turning for a moment to our own land, we cannot conceal the melancholy fact that Rome is displaying increased activity and daily putting forth more daring claims in this the most Protestant country in Europe. Every year her standing army is largely augmented; the ranks of her priesthood receive new additions; new centres of power for aggression, convents, monastic buildings, homes of refuge are erected, and a steady stream of secession has set in toward her pale—bringing rank, wealth, fashion, and even intellect, as proselytes to her faith. No wonder Rome's hopes are high and her zeal revived when she sees this brightening prospect of a fresh lease of power in every land.

That the belief here expressed in the continued vitality of Rome is shared by the secular press, a brief extract from one of the leading daily newspapers will testify. It appeared recently in an able article under the title, "The Papacy in Italy":

"For many years past it has been clear that the power of the Papacy, so far from being dead or dying, is in truth the most permanently important of the elements which have to be reckoned with in shaping and in forecasting the future of Italy. . . . . The temporal power of which the Pope has been deprived is of comparatively small moment. It was material, and could be attacked by force of the commonest kind. But the spiritual power that remains to the Pontiff is endowed with this peculiarity, that it is much increased by the destruction of his merely temporal and material sovereignty. Moreover, it is not a power which could be readily measured, and yet to a more marked degree it is a power that could not be attacked by force of a common or easily applicable kind.

"The Church of Rome has latterly shown a disposition to sever the ties which bound it to the civil governments of the world, and to ally itself with the dangerous and disaffected classes."

Thus we may look to see Rome more and more completely identified with the spirit and aims of democracy. With her ready power of adapting herself to the conditions of the ever-changing times, she will yet be seen courting the alliance and even wearing the colors of red-handed revolution. The book of the Revelation represents her to our view attired in this scarlet livery. And when the last days of this world's troubled history are rapidly drawing to a close, and the Antichrist is revealed as the head and front of human wickedness in opposition to Jehovah, apostate Rome, then become the centre in which every phase of corrupted Christianity is merged, will be ready to ally herself to the man of sin, and will give her power to the maintenance of his lawless throne.

Her dream of universal sovereignty will then be realized, but as a dream it will vanish away. Judgment swift and terrible is at hand for her and the partners of her dark apostasy. "The adversaries of the Lord shall be broken in pieces." Then shall He come "whose right it is to reign," and take to Him His great power, and execute judgment upon the ungodly in His fiery indignation. Purged from the defiling presence of infidelity and sin, the rod of the oppressor broken, and the triumph of rebellion forever ended, the throne of creation shall be restored to her rightful Lord, and "the kingdoms of the world shall become the kingdoms of our Lord and of His Christ." "Even so come, Lord Jesus." Amen!

A Preacher on the Walls.—"Some years ago," says a writer, "when I was in the habit of visiting the theatres, I used to observe in the upper story of a railway depot a kind of revolving light made use of for advertising purposes. I have often since thought what an excellent plan it would be to bring home solemn thoughts to the minds of the many who leave the theatres between 10.30 p.m. and midnight. Many a poor, sin-burned, heart-sick soul might by this means be brought to the loving, compassionate Saviour. Single words or short sentences from God's Word might be made to pass in succession before the passing crowds while those engaged in the operation were offering up prayer for a blessing upon the effort."

A WEIGHT OF WEALTH.

Clifford Grange.

THE village of Clifford, on the sea-coast of old England, consisted of a straggling street of fishermen's houses, stretching in a single line from the shore inland, with scattered cottages and humble farmsteads dotted about the slopes on each side of the deep valley running down to the sea. There was no pier, and there were no lodging houses. The nearest town was five miles off by the nearest road—a rough, and wind-swept path over the cliffs—and seven full miles if you traversed the whole length of the valley in order to reach the highway.

The bay, where it emptied itself, had a small ridge of pebbly beach, beyond which lay a tract of firm, bright sand, stretching in a narrow belt for miles under the cliffs when the tide was out. Almost every man in the village owned some small boat of his own, for the railway was far off, and the inhabitants of Clifford preferred launching their rude, safe fishing craft, and running round with the tide to the neighboring markets, to travelling along the dusty, hot highway, whenever they had any of the produce of their fields or their nets to dispose of.

The whole parish, almost to a single field, was the property of one land-owner—old Charles Clifford, of Clifford Grange, whose ancestors had dwelt there for many generations, gradually rising from the position of farmer to that of gentleman, and as gradually adding field to field until the whole of the parish, with the small living attached to it, had come into their hands. The old man now in possession was past eighty. He had been cast in a somewhat rougher mould than his immediate forefathers, and instead of taking any part in the affairs of the county, had led a homely, rustic life, fishing in his own boat, farming his own fields, and ruling his tenants, both farmers and fishermen, with a high hand.

He had not married till late in life, and when his only son and heir was born he was already sixty years of age—a strong-willed, selfish man, neither able nor willing to learn any lesson disagreeable to his egotism. He idolized his boy, the son of his old age, but he did not suffer this idolatry to interfere with the supreme worship of himself. He could not have more perfectly succeeded in ruining his son by indulgence if he had set that end before him as a definite aim.

Master Charlie, as he was called by all the village, grew up wild, ignorant, and reckless, a torment to the men, and a terror to the women of the place. He would not go to school, and the tutors provided for him at home found him unmanageable and incorrigible, but were laughed at or scorned by his father if they made any complaint against him. "The boy can always be managed by me," he said. So true is the Word of God, "He that spareth his rod hateth his son ; but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes" (Prov. 13 : 24).

Mrs. Clifford, who was more than thirty years younger than her husband, had been a widow with one child when she married a second time. Until this marriage her life had been spent in large towns—chiefly in London—amid the constant bustle and stir of a populous community. She had been fascinated by the seclusion and quiet of Clifford Grange, and fancied a perpetual peace must reign there.

Moreover, she was a penniless widow, dependent upon relations who kept her grudgingly ; and her young son was a heavy burden to her. She was not fit to maintain herself, or at least thought so. She had never been willing to work steadily, or to do any thing that might be at the moment irksome to her.

When old Charles Clifford had unexpectedly asked her to become his wife, she had consented with alacrity, believing that henceforth she would have her own way in every thing. "Better be an old man's darling than a young man's slave," she had said to herself. But as soon as her child was born she was set on one side, and treated, even with regard to his training, as a complete cipher, being hardly more than the housekeeper of Clifford Grange, which from that epoch became the kingdom of the son and heir of Clifford.

Ernest Wren, her elder boy, was ten years of age when his half-brother was born. He was already a thoughtful, advanced lad, prematurely wise from knocking about in the world during the homeless years of his mother's widowhood. He was old enough to feel a sharp pang of resentment at her second marriage, a step which throughout his whole after-life he never fully forgave. But the change was attended with many advantages to him.

Old Charles Clifford was not unkind to the fatherless boy, and in a rough fashion of his own he tried to make a man of him. He succeeded in training the town-bred lad into a capital sailor, and a still better farmer. The quiet, beautiful country life won all Ernest's affections, which had so little else to cling to.

The bright, changeful sea, never bearing the same aspect long ; the dangerous cliffs, which he soon learned to scale with the most venturesome of the village urchins ; the wild slopes of the deep valley, with their elegant birch trees and ferns and flowers that lived all the winter through ; the large, well-stocked farmstead adjoining the Grange ; the Grange itself, with its low, wainscoted rooms, and long, dark lobbies, and high-roofed attics, set in the gables—all these took almost the place of human friendships, and awoke in his heart the strong, deep love which no one about him cared to cherish.

It was a heart-breaking trial to Ernest when he was banished from Clifford to a school in London. But the boy distinguished himself at school, having one object before him—that of quickly learning all he had to learn, so as to get back to his beloved Clifford. He won prize after prize, bringing them home at each holiday, with a secret sense that nobody really cared for his success. His master urgently represented to his step-father that he merited an university education, and old Charles Clifford consented to it, reflecting that the present vicar of Clifford was an old man, and that the living was in his gift. It would probably be the cheapest and best way of providing for his wife's son.

Ernest cared for nothing so much as coming back to Clifford. The old vicar died opportunely, and he succeeded him, having a few months before married the daughter of one of his former masters. Thus, at twenty-four years of age, he settled down for life as vicar of Clifford-on-the-sea.

There had been no great love between the half-brothers. Each regarded the other with contempt ; Ernest after a quiet fashion, Charles after an ostentatious one. The old man was roughly good-natured to his step-son, but he idolized his heir. Mrs. Clifford favored sometimes one, and sometimes the other, according to the caprice of the moment ; but her whims were of no weight with any of the three men belonging to her, over whom her shallow and fickle nature had no influence.

The parishioners, with the exception of four or five scampish young men, suspected of poaching, petty larcenies, and similar misdemeanors, were all strongly attached to Master Ernest, the quiet, pleasant lad who had grown up among them, and who was now their own young, friendly parson, not over-strict, and not too long in his sermons. Master Charlie had grown up among them also, but he was headstrong and domineering, and there was a secret dread of his succession to the estates, which could not be very far off now, and which was looked forward to as a great though inevitable calamity to the whole parish.

As might have been foreseen, as soon as Charles was but little more than a boy, his strong, uncurbed will came into frequent collision with the strong, uncurbed will of his aged father. Old Charles Clifford grew more obstinate and tyrannical as he advanced in years, and began to sink under the infirmities of his great age. His increasing deafness and dimness of sight made him increasingly suspicious and unreasonable.

On the other hand, his son could not submit to any control, and it was enough for him to know that his father had forbidden a thing to cause him ardently to desire to do it. Time after time violent quarrels arose, in which Ernest played the part of peacemaker, the old man being always more readily pacified than his son. But there could be no lasting peace between them. Threats were constantly bandied to and fro—on the one hand of disinheritance, on the other of running away and never more being heard of.

At length young Charles put his threat into execution. When he was little over eighteen he disappeared suddenly, and completely, and no inquiry or search availed to procure a solitary trace of him. Some of the fishermen whispered that he must have been seized with cramp whilst bathing and been carried away by the tide ; but there was no evidence to support this suggestion, and it did not receive a moment's credence at the Grange. Old Charles Clifford knew, though he never betrayed the secret, that a large sum of money had disappeared from the cabinet in his bedroom at the same time as his hopeful son.

Two other events had checkered the somewhat monotonous life of the young vicar of Clifford—the birth of a little daughter, and the death, a few months later, of his wife, who was some years older than himself, and who might be said to have chosen and married him rather than he her. Both of these events took place three or four years before Charles's disappearance.

If it were possible for us to take our last journey as we take other journeys, half the terror of it would be gone. We shrink more perhaps from going alone than from entering into an utterly unknown state of existence. Could we only say to one or two of our dearest, most familiar friends, "Come, I will bid good-by to this worl next week if you will go with me. Let us haste to that better land, of which we have so ofte spoken, and so often heard, in our hours of sorrow"—then we might set about our preparations for that great migration with an unusua courage and cheerfulness, as if we were merel flitting to some new home across the seas.

But we are called to pass singly to that far-off mysterious shore in darkness and silence, hearing nothing, seeing nothing, knowing nothing Against our will we are stripped of all our customary surroundings, even of the outer self, s much better known to most of us than the hidden, lonely, living soul, which alone has to pas the unseen boundary. It is not change tha daunts us ; it is the utter, absolute strangenes of that future world, and of our place and bearin in it. As the old Book has it, "they shall b afraid of that which is high, and fears shall b in the way, and the almond-tree shall flouris and the grasshopper shall be a burden, and desi shall fail : because man goeth to his long hom and the mourners go about the streets" (Eccle 12 : 5).

The extreme age of old Charles Clifford, stan ing on the brink of the grave one January nigh did not make the strangeness of the change le painful to him. He had lived so long in this li that the brief, fleeting visions one catches n and then of another world must long since ha ceased to visit him, if indeed they had ever visit him at all. The curtain had become darker a more closely drawn between him and the wo to come.

He was clinging with fierce tenacity to t worn-out, half-paralyzed frame which had be his tenement so long. If he might have his w he would rather remain thus, bed-ridden a barely alive, than venture into the thick darkn he was about to enter. His white head tos to and fro on his pillow, and he groaned i patiently. How poor and short a time it w since he was a boy !

It did not seem long since he was a lad scra bling up the cliff, and hanging by strong yo hands to any jutting crag, or root of ivy, wh the tide roared far below him against the ro e had been dreaming a good deal of his boy-ood of late, going back to the smallest memo-es of childish trifles. Was it a token that his orn-out, sickly spirit was about to enter into me new youth? Truly it is no idle warning at opens the chapter of the Bible from which e have just quoted, "Remember now thy eator in the days of thy youth, while the evil ys come not, nor the years draw nigh, when ou shalt say, I have no pleasure in them."

There was no trace of youth in his withered, llow face, or in the hands, with their hooked d shrivelled fingers, clutching the bedclothes gher up his shoulders. It was difficult to be-ve that such decrepit old age had ever known ildhood. Bleared and sunken eyes looked out nly and anxiously from under his bushy eye-ows. They could not rest upon an object that d not been familiar and unchanged to them many years. This chamber, which had been s own for more than seventy years, in which had slept and waked night and morning, was s altered than he was himself.

There was the same old carved cabinet where father, and his grandfather before him, had pt their deeds and papers of value; the same king-glass which had reflected his own face ce it was the smooth, beardless face of a boy; e same windows looking out upon the old un-anged landscape.

Was it possible that he was really going to it all the old possessions, never to return to em; his home, which had grown so much a t of himself that he could not conceive of life any kind apart from it? Would he never see sun rise again through the eastern window? y, would the sun rise at all, or the dawn break ough gray clouds upon that unknown world? uld there never more be a farm for him to e over? No fishing or hunting? No tides wing and ebbing? No dinners and suppers? long nights of unbroken sleep?

His face had been turned to the wall for a nute or two, but at these dread questions tossed over again on his pillow, and gazed with a troubled gleam in his eye, looking comfort to the faces of his wife and step-s.

They were sitting on the hearth together, talk-in so low a tone that the old man's deaf and lous ear could not catch a word, though he quite still, and listened eagerly. They did glance toward him, and he felt neglected aggrieved. Already they were drifting away m him; he was losing his power over them. own forlorn loneliness smote him more pain-y, as he watched them, their heads almost ching each other, as they continued their ear-t conversation. They were discussing some ns and schemes with which he could not in-ere. There would be no more planning and eming for him. There was no more for him do in the world—except one thing.

Ernest!" he cried, so sharply and loudly t it made them both start and hurry toward bed, "I must speak to you alone. Send r mother away till I want her."

Can I do nothing for you before I go?" she ed kindly, for she had been a good nurse to , and was willing to do her duty by him to last.

No; just do as I bid you. You never do as 're told," he answered peevishly.

Without a word she walked quietly out of the m. Ernest stood still, looking down thought-v on the dying old man. There was not much ction in his steadfast gaze, though there was e sadness and sympathy; but he waited in nce, as if used to his step-father's querulous per, and the dim, mournful eyes of the old were fastened upon him.

I am going fast," he said sorrowfully.

rnest neither contradicted nor reassured him. knew that this was old Charles Clifford's last —perhaps his last hour. He held his peace from good words, for he knew how quickly old spirit of tyranny and opposition was sed.

(To be continued.)

THE HEAVENLY SONG.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 7th. Rev. 5. Golden Text, verse 12. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE read of old songs and new songs in the Word of God. Perhaps the earliest is that mentioned in Job 38 : 7 at the time of the creation, "when the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy."

It is natural when one sings to hold one's head up. Song is made to go upward as though its very meaning were praise; the very birds look up when they begin to sing. Thus when Moses and the children of Israel sung their song of deliverance on the promise side of the Red Sea, Moses said, "I will sing unto the Lord." This is the right direction for song—singing unto the Lord.

The song in the chapter chosen for our subject is a new song, but it is not the first new song in the Bible. Perhaps Ps. 33 : 3, 4 is the first, and the subject of it is the Word of the Lord: "For the Word of the Lord is right." Then there is the new song of David: "He brought me up also out of an horrible pit, and out of the miry clay, and set my feet upon a rock, and established my goings; and He hath put a new song into my mouth, even praise unto our God" (Ps. 40 : 2, 3).

Then there are the two millennial psalms—96 and 98—both new songs of the coming glory of the reigning Messiah. In Ps. 144 : 9 David sings a new song, which is a song of deliverance, and such a song can we ever sing when we perceive how strong is our position in the Lord who fighteth for us, and that "we are more than conquerors through Him that hath loved us" (Rom. 8). They who never sing new songs never have new experiences. Like the children of Israel in the desert, they are always going over the same ground, never getting a stage farther on their journey. "Every scribe which is instructed unto the kingdom of heaven is like unto a man which is an householder, which bringeth forth out of his treasure things new and old," new songs as well as new knowledge, for the Spirit of God in us is unfailing, like "a well of water springing up unto everlasting life" (John 4 : 14), which never runs dry.

The song of our subject is sung in heaven. God was on the throne, and in His hand a book which no man could open, or read, or even so much as look upon—a book which seems to contain the unfolding of God's purposes. The Apostle John was looking on, for a door in heaven was open to his gaze, and he wept much because no one was found worthy to open the book, etc. And one of the four and twenty elders who sat round about the throne spoke to him and said, "Weep not; behold, the Lion of the tribe of Judah, the root of David, hath prevailed to open the book, and to loose the seven seals thereof. And I beheld," he writes; "and lo! in the midst of the throne and of the four beasts, and in the midst of the elders, stood a Lamb as it had been slain." Jesus by His blood prevails.

"He came and took the book out of the hand of Him that sat upon the throne. And when he had taken the book, the four beasts and four and twenty elders fell down before the Lamb, having every one of them harps, and golden vials full of odors (or incense), which are the prayers of saints." These, then, the living creatures, and the four and twenty elders, are the singers of the song. They are but twenty-eight in all, and they seem to stand in a priestly character before God on behalf of others, for they it is who present "the prayers of the saints at the time when this vision shall be realized yet these are not angels; they themselves are redeemed: but are they not the first fruits who follow the Lamb whithersoever He goeth, the fathers, who know Him which was from the beginning, and who having the spirit of the bride are found in the very midst of the throne, and round about the throne, instead of adoring afar off."

And what is their song? They sang a new song, saying, "Thou art worthy to take the book, and to open the seals thereof: for Thou was slain, and hast redeemed us to God by Thy blood out of every kindred and tongue and people and nation; and hast made us unto our God kings and priests, and we shall reign on the earth." "Thou wast slain and hast redeemed us." Who? Representatives from all the people and languages on the face of the earth; thus we gather that the number is in itself figurative. And they are all royal priests—priests after the order of Melchizedek. They have learned subjection on the earth, they have learned to occupy with the Master's goods, and thus they are in a position to reign. Having learned priestly work on earth, they are still in heaven priests unto God, and they shall reign on the earth.

Jesus said unto His disciples (Matt. 19 : 28, 29). "Verily, I say unto you, that ye which have followed Me, in the regeneration when the Son of Man shall sit in the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones judging the twelve tribes of Israel. And every one that hath forsaken houses, or brethren, or sisters, or father, or mother, or wife, or children, or lands, for My Name's sake, shall receive an hundred fold, and shall inherit everlasting life." These are conditions attached to reigning with Christ. It is not simply he that believeth, but he that having believed follows Christ, and is ready to leave all for Christ, who shall hereafter reign with Him. Rom. 8 : 17 says the same thing: "heirs of God, and joint heirs with Christ, if so be that we suffer with Him, that we may be also glorified together."

The company of them who came out of (the see Greek) great tribulation, and have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb (Rev. 7 : 14, 15), are not crowned; they are "before the throne," but not in the midst of the throne; they serve Him day and night, He dwells among them, and wipes away all tears from their eyes; but it is never said that they reign, or that they are kings and priests. We read of the bride, and again of the guests, "they which are called unto the marriage supper of the Lamb" (Rev. 19 : 7, 9). And while so little of these things is revealed to us, yet there is enough to make us see that there is a salvation so as by fire, and there is "an abundant entrance;" there is a heaven of joy, but there is also a reign with Christ; there is a call to be His bride, one soul, one mind, one being with Him here, that we may be so hereafter; and there is a possibility of losing this "mark for the prize of our high calling," and some one else taking our crown (Rev. 3 : 11).

Now is the time; it is high time to awake out of sleep. Tremendous issues may hang upon what we may regard as trifles. "He which is faithful in that which is least is faithful also in much." There is a following of Christ, a kingly and a priestly attitude to take and to maintain in every simple detail of our lives. The atmosphere of the human life of Jesus is still on earth for us to breathe. His life, His death, are ours. If we would sing in heaven, "Thou art worthy," let our devotion to Him on earth say, "Thou art worthy." Worthy of my suffering and of my service, worthy of my time and of my strength, let our whole way of life run counter to the world's boast, "We will not have this man to reign over us" (Luke 19 : 14). Let us be kingly, royal in our bearing, seeing all things and doing all things in the dignity of our eternal life, and then our life shall sing His worthiness.

The song from heaven seems to wake up song among the angels; "And I beheld, and I heard the voice of many angels round about the throne; and the beasts and the elders; and the number of them was ten thousand times ten thousand, and thousands of thousands, saying with a loud voice, Worthy is the Lamb that was slain to receive power and riches and wisdom and strength and honor and glory and blessing." Their song in its turn wakes the whole universe, until "every creature which is in heaven, and on the earth, and under the earth," respond in adoring praise, one vibration of unmingled worship, without one discordant note, to Him who gave His life for us.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Intense Excitement in Ireland has been aroused by the arrest of three men named Daly, Killen, and Davitt, who took part in a public meeting at Gurteen, County Sligo, on November 2d. The arrests were made November 19th, the charge against the accused being sedition and conspiracy, and using language in public calculated to provoke a breach of the peace.

The action of the Government has aroused a feeling of bitter hostility in Ireland, and mass meetings are being held to protest against the arrest. A meeting was held in Dublin November 21st, at which six thousand persons were present. Mr. Parnell, M.P., the leader of the Home Rule party, spoke, condemning the Government in strong terms, but warning the people against illegal measures. Speaking in the name of his party he said: "The only end and aim which we have proposed to ourselves throughout is this, that the people of Ireland shall own the soil of Ireland."

It is stated that Mr. Parnell's language at the land meetings will be brought before the House of Commons with a view to silencing him in the House.

The cable says the Government are placed in possession of much information by landlords in connection with the rent agitation in Ireland, which, for obvious reasons, the landlords cannot make public. These statements show that some tenants who are in position to pay their rents and are willing to pay are kept from doing so by fear of outrage from others who cannot or will not pay. It is understood that a large number of processes of ejectment have been and will be applied for.

The constabulary is under arms day and night in many towns in Ireland, and the military garrisons are being strengthened.

Turkey has Renewed her Promises of Reform in response to the urgent representations of the British Government. The Sultan pledges his word that there shall be no unnecessary delay in the introduction of the reforms demanded by England, and Lord Salisbury, the British Foreign Secretary, has given assurances that his Government fully understands the financial and other difficulties of the Porte, and does not wish to complicate the situation by menace. An Englishman has been appointed the representative of the Sultan to superintend the introduction of reforms throughout Asia Minor. The relations of the two governments have, in consequence of these pledges, become more cordial.

A Terrible Earthquake Occurred in the province of Kansuh, China, beginning on June 29th, and continuing in shocks till July 11th. The most tremendous of the shocks occurred on July 1st, when immense damage was done. Temples, "yamens," city walls, shops, and private dwellings were destroyed, and in several instances completely swallowed up, the destruction extending over thirty cities and villages. In the city of Chieh Chow two officials with their entire households were thus ingulfed and disappeared. The loss of life was very severe, but at present it is impossible to ascertain either the number of fatalities or the loss of property. Great distress has, however, been caused by the catastrophe, and the Emperor, in a recent decree in reply to a memorial, expresses sympathy with the surviving sufferers, and orders the memorialist to use every effort to relieve them. Kansuh is an inland province to the north-west, and communication with it is very slow. This will account for the length of time which elapsed before news of the disaster reached the coast.

The Rev. C. H. Spurgeon took leave of his students at the College November 7th, as he went to Mentone, in France, on Monday, November 10th, where he expects to spend eight weeks, and the prayers of the readers of this paper are requested for the re-establishment of his health and the success of his great work during his absence. By arrangement with his publishers we shall be able to insert each week one of his unpublished evening sermons preached during the past summer.

Death in the China Mission Field has been busy, many zealous workers having been summoned home. The death of Bishop Russell, of North China, occurred October 5th. He first went to China in 1847, and was one of the two first English missionaries at Ningpo. Rev. Hugh Ritchie, of Formosa, senior missionary of the Presbyterian Church in China, has died of fever. Mr. Ritchie had labored in that field heartily and successfully for twelve years. The typhus fever which recently was so prevalent in China, following the famine of the previous year, numbered among its victims six Protestant missionaries. We erect statues to men who have died fighting for their country in war, but these noble Christian heroes have fallen in a higher warfare, the warfare of Christ against sin and Satan, and their lives have been sacrificed for the good of the world.

Prince Bismarck and his Tiresome Visitors.—The German Chancellor is said to have been asked by Lord Russell, the British Minister, recently, how he managed "to get rid of that class of importunate visitors whom he could not well refuse to see, but whose room he found preferable to their company." "Oh!" replied the Chancellor, "I have a pretty simple method. My wife knows them pretty well, and when she sees that they are with me, she generally contrives to come in and call me away upon some pretext or other." He had scarcely finished speaking when the princess put her head in at the door, and said, "Otto, you must come and take your medicine; you ought to have had it ten minutes ago." Lord Odo Russell was not long in coming to the conclusion that "his room would be preferable to his company;" so he instantly left.

Losses in Business, like Other Troubles, are fraught with valuable lessons to the Christian, but it frequently happens that the irritation they produce prevents the sufferer learning them. An incident occurred recently at Clapham England, which shows how an earnest Christian may bear such losses not only with fortitude, but in a spirit of childlike docility which no mere formalist can attain. One morning Mr. Thornton, a merchant at Clapham, received notice of a failure by which he would lose a sum equivalent to half a million dollars. On the same morning a minister from the country called at his counting-house to ask a subscription for an important object. Hearing that Mr. Thornton had suffered that loss he apologized for having called. But Mr. Thornton took him kindly by the hand: "My dear sir, the wealth I have is not mine, but the Lord's. It may be that He is going to take it out of my hands, and give it to another; and if so, this is a good reason why I should make a good use of what is left." He then doubled the subscription he had formerly intended to give.

The Expenses of the Conference of the Evangelical Alliance at Bâle have been paid by the Christian brethren in that city. The British churches forwarded to them a donation of $1000 toward the fund, but the Bâle committee returned the money, saying that their own contributions had been so large that they did not need aid from their foreign brethren, and they have on hand a considerable balance beyond their wants! This liberality is a substantial proof of the sincerity of the Christian spirit in that city.

The St. Louis brethren of the Evangelical Alliance paid all the expenses of the late Biennial Conference in St. Louis, without calling upon the Executive Committee in New York, or upon friends in other places. It has been the experience of St. Louis and of Bâle that the meetings of the Alliance were a privilege the necessary expenses of which they should discharge cheerfully.

The Missionaries of the China Inland Mission at Kin-chan have, it appears, received offers from Chinese parents to sell them girls for their school. The following are the terms proposed by parents: "1. That the betrothal money be fixed at $60, the half of which is to be given to the parents, and half to the school superintendent to use on behalf of the girl at her marriage. 2. That the parents be allowed to receive half their money now and half at the girl's marriage. 3. That the feet be unbound. 4. That the betrothal of the girl be entirely in the hands of the school superintendent. 5. That she may not return home before her marriage. 6. That, i the parents recall her after the three months probation they repay the school for the girl' board at the rate of $2 per month.

The Prevalence of Drunkenness among French children is asserted by a writer in the London Gentleman's Magazine. "Again and again a hotel tables," he says, "I have seen childre scarcely more than babies suffering distinctl from alcohol. It is, as travellers in Franc know, the custom in all districts south of th Loire to supply wine gratis at two meals, break fast and dinner, at which the residents in hotel eat in company. Repeatedly, then, i the hotels in French watering places, I hav watched children of five years old and upwar supplied by their mothers with wine enoug visibly to flush and excite them. At Sable d'Olonne one little fellow, whose age could n be more than six, drank at each of two consecu tive meals three tumblers of wine slightly dilute with water. The result was on each occasio that he sprawled over the table, and ended l putting his head in his mother's lap and fallin asleep."

Fifty-nine Students have been Graduate from the College at Beyrout, an institution e tablished by American Protestants, during th past ten years. Four of the graduates are no engaged in the college, ten are practising me cine, two are druggists, eleven are medic students, while eighteen are missionary teache preachers, and translators. From the medic department forty-six students have been grad ated, and from the pharmaceutical, five. At t celebration of the tenth anniversary of the c lege an alumni association was formed.

A Determined Suicide in Russia is Announc The young Countess Vera Koscheleff disappear two days after her betrothal, and wrote that "s was going to bathe in a river on her Crimean tate, and would never return." Her body w found there, sewn in a large straw sack, w the seams in the interior, showing that she h sewn herself deliberately in it, as a letter n her said, "from her extreme fear of crawf and water beetles." It is strange that one w had the audacity to take her own life should h shown fear in such paltry matters.

An English Officer's Humane Spirit w shown in his last moments in Zululand. Capt Edgell when shot at Ulundi, fell back into arms of a comrade, exclaiming as his last wor "See that the men spare the wounded. Sp the wounded."

Spurgeon's Autograph Album; containing Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's and Mrs. Spurgeon's a graphs, may be obtained at 63 Bible House, through any bookseller. Price 75 cents. The S and Trowel says: "Our young friends deligh possessing birthday albums, and here is one whi fit for a queen. We will say nothing of the conte but the binding is simply gorgeous. . . . Th a dainty birthday present, and is equal to any have gone before it; we think we might ventu say that it is second to none. Facsimiles of th tographs of the pastor and his wife are given in proper places."

The following works by the same eminent prea may also be obtained at the CHRISTIAN HE Office, 63 Bible House:

"The Treasury of David." Containing an C nal Exposition of the Book of Psalms; a Colle of Illustrative Extracts from the whole range of I ature; a series of Homiletical Hints upon a every verse; and list of writers upon each P Five volumes. Price, per vol., $3.

"John Ploughman's Talk; or, Plain Advic Plain People." Price, cloth, 60 cents; paper ers, 40 cents.

"The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit." Sermons. Preached and revised during the 1878. Price $2.50.

"Twelve Sermons on Various Subjects." W Portrait. Price 35 cents. A remittance must pany every order.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

ub·hed at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.
s Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr.
LAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, or some other it Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc. The Circulation is 165,000 Copies.

gle Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, DECEMBER 4, 1879. 13th Year. No. 59—New Series.

ENTS OF THIS NUMBER:
RAIT AND LIFE OF THE
E REV. J. MULLENS, D.D.,
View of Calcutta.
S IN WALL ST. A New Ser-
by Dr. Talmage.
D PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE.
rilling Serial Story, by the Au-of "Felicia Cuffe."
NT EVENTS: The President's ge—Ways and Means—Death Millionaire—Moody and Sankey
. Louis—A Hundred Intentions
e Mass—A Panic in a Church—Young Ladies Imprisoned in me—An Affecting Incident—ksgiving at Five-points—A Pa-Narrative—The Soldier-Bishop
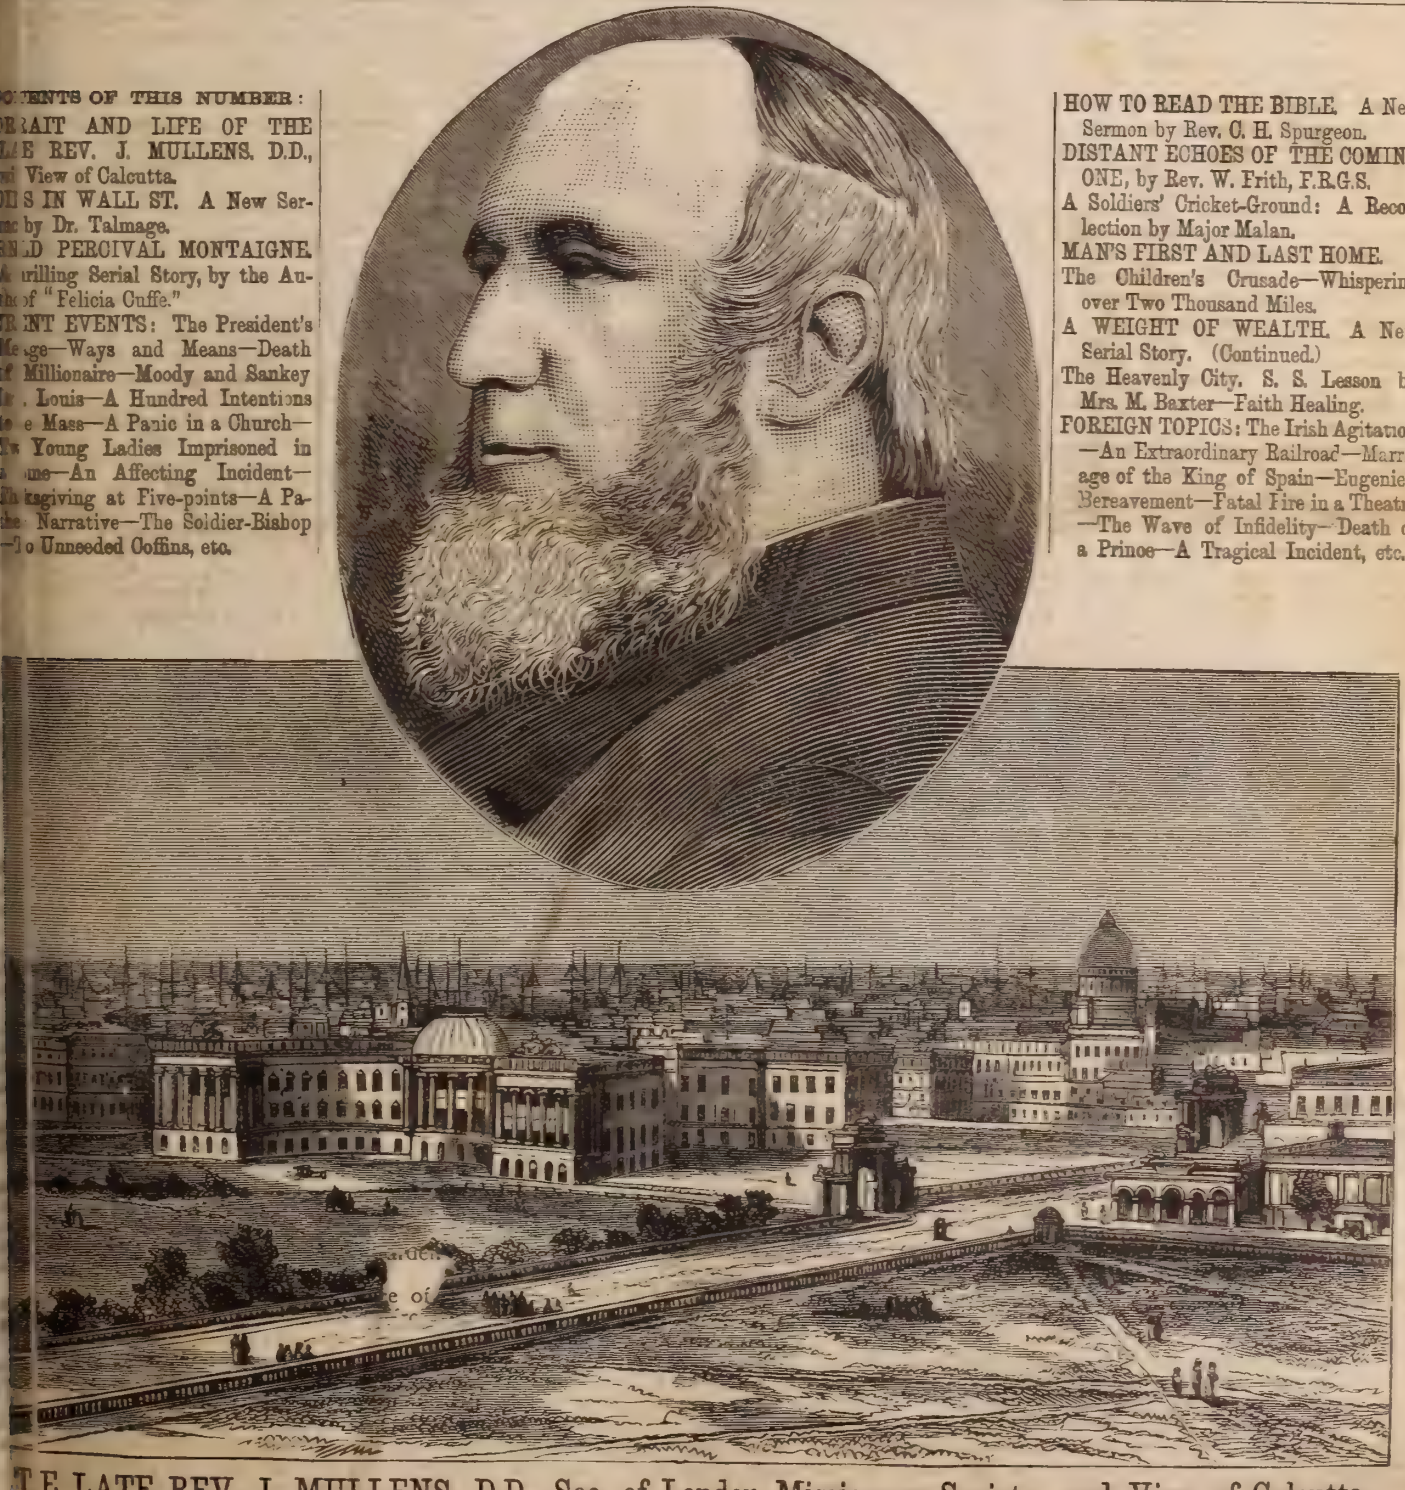
—o Unneeded Coffins, etc.

HOW TO READ THE BIBLE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
DISTANT ECHOES OF THE COMING ONE, by Rev. W. Frith, F.R.G.S.
A Soldiers' Cricket-Ground: A Recollection by Major Malan.
MAN'S FIRST AND LAST HOME.
The Children's Crusade—Whispering over Two Thousand Miles.
A WEIGHT OF WEALTH. A New Serial Story. (Continued.)
The Heavenly City. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter—Faith Healing.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The Irish Agitation—An Extraordinary Railroad—Marriage of the King of Spain—Eugenie's Bereavement—Fatal Fire in a Theatre—The Wave of Infidelity—Death of a Prince—A Tragical Incident, etc.



E LATE REV. J. MULLENS, D.D., Sec. of London Missionary Society, and View of Calcutta.

THE LATE REV. J. MULLENS, D.D.,

Foreign Secretary of the London Missionary Society.

Birth and College Life—Entrance into the Mission Field—Married Life—A Visit to England—Speech on the Massacre of Missionaries at Cawnpore—Appointment as Foreign Secretary to the London Missionary Society—A Hindoo Professor's Despair of Hindooism—Dr. Mullens' Memorable Report of 1877—Lord Northbrook's Tribute to his Worth—His Journey to Central Africa—His Lamentable Death.

JOSEPH MULLENS was born in London, England, September 2d, 1820. His father was a deacon of the church at Barbican Chapel, formerly the scene of the labors of the Rev. Dr. Arthur Tidman, who for many years vigorously discharged the duties which afterward devolved upon Dr. Mullens as his successor in connection with the London Missionary Society. Dr. Tidman, as he watched the boy who Sunday after Sunday accompanied his father to chapel, could hardly have thought that among the young people of his congregation there was one listening to him who by and by would be so closely associated with the Society in the prosperity of which, even before he was officially connected with it, he took so deep an interest.

Dr. Tidman, it is well known, was instrumental in introducing several of the young men of his church to the work of the mission field; and Joseph Mullens, at the close of his school-days at Mill Hill, having become a member of the church at Barbican, and having shown aptitude for the ministry, was encouraged by his pastor to seek admission into Coward College, which has since been amalgamated with Homerton and Highbury into the institution now known as New College, London.

The young man's application to be received as a student was granted, and while going through his course at Coward College he graduated B.A. at the London University. In 1843 he went out as a his field of labor being Calcutta, the capital city. Two years later he married the daughter of the Rev. Alphonse François Lacroix, who for many years had been the devoted missionary of the London Society in Calcutta. In a touching memoir of Mrs. Mullens, written by her sister after her death, we have a glimpse of their early married life:

MISSIONARY TO INDIA,

"Her husband stood on a level with herself. They read together, or, when they did not take up the same books, he was accustomed to talk over with her the results of his studies, and describe to her all new facts in history, politics, and science in the religious world at large, and especially in the field of missions. She did the same with him."

In her Bengal Girls' Boarding School she had an important sphere of action, for while her husband was contending with the difficulties of educated young Indians, Mrs. Mullens was quite as earnest in moulding the characters of many of the future wives and mothers who would ere long be exerting an influence that would be potent for good or evil. So delicately yet strongly did she accomplish her task that it was afterward said, "Hers was the most useful life in Calcutta."

It is interesting to note that, in commencing his work as a missionary, the subject of our sketch wisely made it his business to win the attention of those who, on the ground of their educational attainments, might even be called cultivated Indians. He showed them that he was no stranger to the difficulties in their way when asked to renounce the faith of their fathers and to accept the Gospel. He would say to them, "I know the difficulties of habit and feeling and of social position. But I know the awful consequences of not being a Christian, the dreadful punishment of irreligion and unbelief in the eternal fires of hell; and in love I warn you, in love I invite you, in love to you I seek your eternal welfare. You who fear the present consequences of becoming a Christian, remember the future condition of him who is not so. 'Whosoever shall be ashamed of Me in this evil generation, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed when He comes in the glory of the Father and of the holy angels to reward every man according to his works.'"

After he had labored about ten years in India he undertook an inquiry into the results attained in that country by missionary effort, and endeavored to make what was then regarded as a complete and connected survey of the entire field of its operations, as well as to estimate the position which had been secured. He entered into extensive correspondence with the secretaries of missionary societies, and with individual missionaries in every part of India, Burmah, and Ceylon. These inquiries were received in the kindest spirit, and called forth a hearty response.

After long study he prepared a pamphlet, enriched with valuable quotations from the papers and letters communicated by missionary brethren. Unhappily, however, two thirds of the manuscript were lost in the wreck of a mail steamer, and he had nothing to do but to set about the work again, and to reproduce, as far as possible, from his notes some of the facts which previous study had placed at his command.

In 1861 Dr. and Mrs. Mullens visited England, and some of his speeches during that visit will never be forgotten, especially his speech upon at Cawnpore during the Indian mutiny, as follows:

THE MASSACRE OF THE MISSIONARIES

"Unwittingly, after the outbreak at Futtehgurh, the missionaries quitted one scene of peril only to fall more directly into the tiger's jaws. Terror by night, the arrow flying by day, were their constant portion. They were pursued, plundered, fired upon, but ran the gauntlet as they best could, and at last arrived at Bithoor, ten miles from Cawnpore, the residence of Nana Sahib. They found, to their dismay, that Cawnpore was in the hands of the Mahratta, and that the bridge of boats provided for their passage was guarded. . . . At length they reached Cawnpore. An hour afterward they were led out on the plain, and were all ruthlessly shot.

"Peace be to their unburied ashes!" cried the speaker, and as he did so, in tremulous tones, there was scarcely a dry eye in Exeter Hall. "May their precious names never be forgotten! May the turf be green upon the soil stained with their honored blood! May the pearly dew and the refreshing rain fall gently upon the sod, and while the winds of heaven breathe over it soft and low, may a voice ever rise before the footstool of mercy, 'Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do!'"

It was the knowledge of his large experience that, in 1866, induced the Directors of the Society to appoint him to the Foreign Secretaryship, in connection with the late Dr. Tidman, while Rev. W. Fairbrother and Rev. R. Robinson, who were then giving valuable assistance generally, were set over the Home Department. The speech which Dr. Mullens delivered on the occasion of his appearing before the Society for the first time in this capacity was one which excited the fervent enthusiasm of a crowded meeting.

"Six years ago," he said, "I stood on this platform to say to the members of this Society 'Farewell' on my return to India. Now I come back, not as an invalid, and not from any wish or purpose of my own, but I am here at your invitation to transfer to the work of the Society at home all the affection, the service, and the consecration I have endeavored to give in twenty-two years in your service. Fresh from the field of labor, you will naturally ask me, in Scriptural language, 'Watchman, what of the night?' You have labored during thirty years, you have expended on the missions of India and China something like three quarters of a million of money, you have sent out during the last twenty years more than one hundred missionaries, you have maintained in India and China a steady staff of sixty men, and within the last three years you have increased it to nearly eigh Others have been working in like manner. Y may well ask me, 'What of the night?' Let t answer be, 'Night there is, indeed, but t morning is dawning of a day that shall be glo ous indeed.'"

In conclusion he said,

"IDOLATRY IS DECAYING

and dying from the affections of its votaries. will only sum it all up in a single word—a w uttered by a Hindoo professor in the city Bombay, when he said, 'Hindooism is sick u death. I am fully persuaded that it must f only let us stand by it as long as it surviv Look abroad upon our Indian empire, look the vast provinces which God has put under rule. We have a Government wise, experienc just; our trade is extending; our comme is calling forth all the energies of the land its supply of labor; education is high and gre our universities are well-based and give a h tone to that education.

"Throughout the presidencies the native all ranks can now without difficulty get sph for themselves within the Government, and not goaded on to rebellion. I have seen nat sitting as judges in the highest court of ap and giving a wise and an efficient aid. I seen that the most wonderful progress has t place in our Indian empire during the last s years, since the mutiny broke out. An indesc ble advance has taken place in the spirit of Government, in the character of its meas in the laws it has passed, and in the whole and manner in which its work as a Govern is carried on. My brethren, we have the w land before us, and we have the command, and possess it.'"

As Foreign Secretary of the London Mis ary Society Dr. Mullens's labors were b means light, although few men have w perhaps with more apparent ease. His re have been beautifully called "truth se music;" but while his large audience has the truth and the music, the year's wo which the report is the crown, to say noth the composition of the report itself, might tax the energies of the strongest man.

In concluding his report for 1877, he "The children of the Egyptian fellah lis name of Jesus; the scholars of our Hot schools, with wondrous harmony, sing th iour's praise. Zulus and Kaffirs, Basuto Bechuanas, have gathered into Ch churches and read in their own tongue th drous Word of God. No superstition is enough to withstand His truth; no condi too degraded to be reached by His forgivi healing power. None are too vile for th purify and save. Come, then, to His f nations and people, dwellers in these new We seek not your gold and diamonds, you and pearl. 'We seek not yours, but you.'"

How much of the glorious work thus d as wrought through the instrumentality Congregational missions is due to the ind ble energy of Joseph Mullens will never b known. But the following high tribute Earl of Northbrook, the late at the Annual Meeting of the London M ary Society, at which the above report wa was given to his usefulness:

VICEROY OF INDIA,

"I believe," said the noble Earl, "t now an earnest desire among the higher of ladies in India to acquire a thorough education, and that desire can hardly b f unless by the self-sacrifice of Englis will devote themselves to this w ong been connected with India, an we the names of those men who ha looked up to more than others in the mis field there. This I know, that your Secretary, Dr. Mullens, is one of those all others, has been looked up to as th of missionary work."

Dr. Mullens well thought out every took, and well digested the probable re his past official acts. It is stated that dia he was accustomed to walk upon the flat of of his house, after the other inmates had tired to rest, meditating upon the events of e past day, and lifting up his heart in prayer.

HIS LAST ENTERPRISE.

Early this year Dr. Mullens determined to sit Central Africa, that he might form a cor- ct estimate of that hitherto unknown land as uture mission field. He arrived at Zanzibar June last, and on Saturday, July 5th, he was ported to have reached, with his party, a place lled Kitange, 150 miles from the coast.

After ascending a high hill for the purpose of aking observations, he discovered that he had ken cold. At this juncture Dr. Baxter, a edical missionary attached to the Church Mis- nary Society, who was returning to Zanzibar m Mpwapwa, met Dr. Mullens and his party. nding that the Doctor was determined to push six miles further, that he might spend the bbath in the Church Missionary camp, Dr. xter returned with him.

Upon their arrival at a place called Rubeho, . Mullens showed signs of exhaustion, and his petite had failed him. Dr. Baxter shared his t with him, and watched him with some xiety. By Tuesday Dr. Mullens had so far re- vered as to be able to walk eight miles to new nping ground. The walk much exhausted n, and he incautiously drank too freely of very d water. This brought back heavy vomiting, m which he had previously suffered.

During the night Dr. Mullens sent for Mr. uthon, the physician of his party, and asked n to give some advice with respect to a trou- some complaint from which he had been icted for many years. After a time his trou- e was met, and he dozed off to sleep. Next , Wednesday, the 9th, he was decidedly rse, and suffered a great deal of pain. The medical men never left him for any appreci- e time after this. Inflammation of the bowels l set in, and he sank into delirium, and died m exhaustion, at 5.20 A.M., on Thursday, July h.

he body was taken to Mpwapwa, twenty-nine es distant, and on Saturday morning was ied in the Church Missionary Society's burial und at that place.

CALCUTTA.

ALCUTTA is a city of comparatively modern gin, being only one hundred and fifty years . It is built on a deep tidal river, the Hoogh- an outlet of the sacred river Ganges. By ans of this water communication the products the richest granaries of India are brought to cutta for shipment or redistribution.

t is composed of villages which became rap- united when the position was recognized as headquarters of the trade of the Indian Con- nt. The flags of all nations may be seen fly- on the banks of the Hooghly, along which city extends for seven miles.

is larger than any city in the United States. v York, and perhaps Philadelphia, alone ex- ted. Its population ten years ago was 800,- ; of these about 30,000 are English, German, Armenian, and may be called the Christian ulation.

alcutta is called "The City of Palaces." view, which embraces the commercial part he city, presents but few of the larger build- . The open space in front is the Meidan, ch is an open grassy plain used for recrea- . It is two miles long, and out of it has taken the land for the pleasure garden of Viceroy's palace.

he Government House, the residence of the eroy, Lord Lytton, appears in the front of picture, surmounted by a dome. The spire behind is that of St. John's Church, which used as the English Cathedral until the h nobler structure, St. Paul's, the present edral, was built. The latter building lies far to the left in the English quarter to ap- in our view.

he dome in the background to the right of the view is that of the General Post-Office, which has been recently erected. Beside several handsome mosques, etc., there are nine Episcopal churches, one Established Church of Scotland, and one Free Church (the latter two, which are similar in their construction, are very handsome); two Congregational, three Baptist, and one Wesleyan. Of the European clergy there are thirteen Episcopal chaplains, two of the Church of Scotland, and seven Nonconformist pastors. There are also one Greek priest, nineteen Roman Catholic priests, and five Armenian clergymen.

Of the work of the religious institutions Dr. Mullens's last report spoke most hopefully. He admitted that the European population did not occupy all the accommodation which was provided for them, but he added that the churches were never better attended, and general English society was never more orderly than it was then. The improvements in social and public morality over the old days is wonderfully great.

FAITH HEALING.*

AT a convention at Old Orchard, Me., on Wednesday, July 30th, a meeting was held to receive the testimonies of such as had been healed of diseases by faith.

Dr. Cullis read James 5 : 14, 15 : "Is any sick among you? Let him call for the elders of the church, and let them pray over him, anointing him with oil in the name of the Lord. And the prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord will raise him up: and if he have committed sins, they shall be forgiven him." He then proceeded to state how he came to claim this promise. "I had come to the practice of believing God, and in my reading, coming to this passage, said: 'Is that true?' 'It must be, yes: Lord give me faith to claim it.' I then began to inquire if in modern times it had been claimed anywhere. I heard of the 'Life of Dorothea Trudel,' who was said to have proved the words true; sent for it and read it. Now I said to God: 'I will claim the promise, and use it, wherever you give me the opportunity.'

"The first case was that of a woman whose possible cure required the use of the knife, and that would be dangerous. I sat down by her side, and said: 'I have been interested in that word in James, "the prayer of faith shall save the sick;" wouldn't you like to try it?' Her reply was: 'I have no feeling on the subject, but I am willing to claim God's Word.' The next day she walked three miles, and was healed of her disease. I could give you hundreds of such cases.

Mr. McKenney said: "Five years ago, while residing in Portland, Me., I had a disease to which nothing but the surgeon's knife could give promise of cure. I wrote to Dr. Cullis for a room in a hospital. He said: 'Why not take advantage of the promise in the Epistle of St. James, 5 : 14, 15?' I said: 'I will try it, and believe God. We knelt down together, the doctor laid his hand upon me, and I was healed in body, and fully saved."

A lady said: "Thirty years ago the Lord healed me of a disease through prayer. Nineteen years ago my boy had a fever which left him a cripple. One side perished. We took him from one surgeon to another in vain. Then I resorted to the Great Physician. One day I said: 'He is able to save. Now is He willing? He had taken from us two beautiful boys, and left only this cripple. One day I took him on my lap, and he slid down to the floor and ran and is an athlete now, twenty years old."

Rev. F. D. Sanford said: "I was suffering many years from dyspepsia and neuralgia, and was prostrate. Could not eat any thing solid. Every thing distressed me. In the church where I was to labor six persons had claimed the promise, and I was conscious of Jesus saying to me, 'Be ye whole.' Though I had not had a whole night's rest for a long time, I ate heartily that day, and slept like a baby, and have not lost a night's rest since from that cause."

Mrs. Fellows, of Springfield, said: "I suffered a year and a half from a tumor, which I supposed to be of a cancerous nature. Dr. Cullis prayed for me, asking that the tumor might be removed, and all the disease in my system be cured. He said: 'Reckon yourself healed, and you are healed.' At once I felt the sweet blessing of my Saviour, and as I went downstairs I realized that the weight was gone, and walked to the station. Two days after I discovered that there was no tumor left, and I have had no trouble since."

Miss Sisson, six years missionary in India, now of New London, Conn., said: "In India I had a sunstroke, followed by fever, which attacked the brain, and made all mental effort impossible without sensations in my head like the strokes of a trip-hammer. After making any exertion I wanted to sleep for days. I went to Boston for help. I belived in the Word of God, but was not sure that it was His will to heal me, though I thought He would in His time. Some months later there was to be a convention in New London, where I resided. I was still in my feeble state, but said: 'Lord, let me go to the first meeting and pray for it.' He did so.

"The next morning it was suggested, 'You askasked the Lord to let you go yesterday; perhaps He will do it to-day.' I went again, and stayed a while, when my throbbing head compelled me to retire. The next day a friend said: 'You asked the Lord yesterday, and He permitted you to go. Try it to-day.' Again I went, but could stay only a little while. It was the same in the afternoon. The next day Mrs. Whitney was speaking on the words, 'He is the God of all flesh.' I am very fond of that little word 'all,' and the thought came, 'Why not ask the Lord to cure me?' I asked Him, and said, 'I am healed,' and listened to what she said. Soon the question came to my mind, 'Where is that terrible distress in your head?' and I have not known it since."

Miss Leavitt, of Portland, said: "Six years ago last October some remember how sick I was. For nearly a year I had lost my voice by paralysis of the throat, which the doctors said could not be cured. A friend mentioned to me Dr. Cullis, and I embraced the idea of going to see him. I had settled the matter with my Heavenly Father. The doctor asked me, 'Are you ready to be healed?' My answer was, 'Yes.' He said, 'They that trust in Him shall not want any good thing.' We knelt and prayed, and then I lifted up my voice in the thanksgiving. With my voice came also cleansing from all sin, and since then the Lord has sent me up and down in His work."

In closing the meeting, Dr. Cullis referred to the case of Rev. J. S. Inskip, who was much disabled from the effects of sunstroke. "For months he was not able to preach. One day he and Rev. W. McDonald dined with me, and I said to him, 'Why don't you get cured?' He replied, 'I am getting cured.' 'But,' said I, 'you may be cured now,' and called his attention to James 5 : 14, 15. Said he, 'Oh, that was written for the early disciples.' I replied, 'Suppose you leave out some of the other precious promises—i.e., "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest,"' and read to him the word of promise. He said, 'Let me see it,' and took the book and read it. At once he said, 'I believe it.' The next day he preached three times.

"Some people yield to the first discouragement, like my little boy, who after we had gotten to bed one night, was suffering severely from earache. I did not feel like getting up to wait on him, so I said, 'Charlie, ask Jesus to take the earache away.' I heard him say, 'Jesus, take my earache away.' In a minute he was asleep. In an hour or two he awoke with it again. I said, 'Ask Jesus again to take it away.' He said, hastily, 'I've asked him once, and that's enough.' A good many people act in that way. They try once, and won't try again."

---

* From Times of Refreshing, a monthly Record of Christian Life and Christian Testimony, published at the Willard Tract Repository, 239 Fourth Avenue, New York.

DOINGS IN WALL STREET.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, Nov. 30, 1879.

"Riches certainly make themselves wings - they fly away as an eagle toward heaven."—Proverbs 23 : 5.

The Flying Capacity of Riches—Nefarious Practices in Wall St—Early History of the Street—I. Wall St. a Type of Integrity and Villany—A Seven-times-heated Furnace—Benevolence in Wall St.—Financial Wreckers—No Place for Men whose Principles are not Settled—Men who have been Swallowed in the Vortex—Heroism in Wall St—II. Wall St. a Type of Speculation and Gambling—The Stock Dealer's Business Legitimate—The Line Drawn—The Passion for Stock Gambling—Not Peculiar to America—The Tulip Mania in Holland—The Mississipi Scheme in France—The South Sea Bubble in England—The Oil Mania in 1864—A Young Man becoming Insane by Success—The Tragedy—George Peabody's Encouragement—An End to be Dreaded.

Money is a golden-breasted bird with silver beak. It alights on the office-desk, or in the counting-room, or on the parlor centre-table. Men and women stand and admire it. They do not notice that it has wings larger than a raven's, larger than a flamingo's, larger than an eagle's. One wave of the hand of misfortune and it spreads its beautiful plumage and is gone—"as an eagle toward heaven," my text says, though sometimes I think it goes in the other direction!

What verification we have had of the flying capacity of riches of late in Wall Street! Encouraged by the revival of trade, and by the fact that Wall Street disasters of other years were so far back as to be forgotten, speculators ran up the stocks from point to point until innocent people on the outside supposed that the stocks would always continue to ascend.

They gathered in from all parts of the country. Large sums of money were taken into Wall Street, and small sums of money. The crash came, thank God, in time to warn off a great many who were on their way thither; for the sadness of the thing was that a great many of the young men of our cities who had saved a little money for the purpose of starting themselves in business, and who had $500, or $1000, or $2000, or $10,000, went into Wall Street and lost all. And if there ever was a time for the pulpit to speak out in regard to certain kinds of nefarious enterprises, now is the time.

Stocks rose and fell, and now they begin to rise again, and they will fall again until thousands of young men will be ruined unless the printing-press and the pulpit of the Lord Jesus Christ give emphatic utterance. My counsel is to countrymen, so far as they may hear of this discourse, if they have surplus, to invest it in first mortgages and in Government bonds, and to stand clear of the Wall Street vortex, where so many of late have been swamped and swallowed. What a compliment it is to the healthy condition of our country that these recent disasters have in no wise depressed trade! I thank God that Wall Street's capacity to blast this country is gone forever.

Across the island of New York, in 1685, a wall made of stone and earth, and cannon-mounted, was built to keep off the savages. Along by that wall a street was laid out, and as the street followed the line of the wall, it was appropriately called Wall Street. It is narrow, it is short, it is unarchitectural, and yet its history is unique. Excepting Lombard Street, London, it is the mightiest street on this planet. There the Government of the United States was born. There Washington held his levees. There Mrs. Adams and Caldwell and Knox and other brilliant women of the Revolution displayed their charms. There Witherspoon and Jonathan Edwards and George Whitefield sometimes preached. There Dr. Mason chided Alexander Hamilton for writing the Constitution of the United States without any God in it.

There negroes were sold in the slave-mart. There criminals were harnessed to wheelbarrows, and, like beasts of burden, compelled to draw, or were lashed through the street behind carts to which they were fastened. There, fortunes have come to coronation or burial, since the day when reckless speculators, in powdered hair and silver shoe-buckles, dodged Dugan, the Governor-General of his Majesty, clear down to yesterday at three o'clock.

The history of Wall Street is to a certain extent the financial, commercial, agricultural, mining, literary, artistic, moral, and religious history of this country. Only a few blocks long, it has reached from the Canadas to the Gulf of Mexico, from San Francisco to Bangor. There are the best men in this country, and there are the worst. Every thing, from unswerving integrity to tip-top scoundrelism—every thing, from heaven-born charity to bloodless Shylockism.

I want this morning to put the plough in at the curbstone of Trinity and drive it clear through to Wall Street Ferry; and so it shall go, if the horses are strong enough to draw the plough.

A TYPE IN THE COUNTRY.

I. First of all, Wall Street stands as a type in this country for tried integrity and the most outrageous villany. Farmers who have only a few hundred dollars' worth of produce to put on the market have but little to test their character; but put a man into the seven-times-heated furnace of Wall Street excitement, and he either comes out a Shadrach, with hair unsinged, or he is burned into a black moral cinder. No half-way work about it.

If I wanted to find integrity bomb-proof, I would go among the bankers and merchants of Wall Street; yet, because there have been such villanies enacted there at different times, some men have supposed that it is a great financial debauchery, and they hardly dare go near the street, or walk up and down it, unless they have buttoned up their last pocket, and had their lives insured, or religiously crossed themselves.

Yet, if you start at either end of the street, and read the business signs, you will find the names of more men of integrity and Christian benevolence than you can find in the same space in any street of any of our cities.

When the Christian Commission and the Sanitary Commission wanted money to send medicines and bandages to the wounded, when breadstuffs were wanted for famishing Ireland, when colleges were to be endowed and churches were to be supported, and missionary societies were to be equipped for their work of sending the Gospel all around the world, the first street to respond has been Wall Street, and the largest responses in all the land have come from Wall Street.

But while that street is a type of tried integrity on the one hand, it is also a type of unbounded swindle on the other. There are the spiders that wait for innocent flies. There are the crocodiles that crawl up through the slime to cranch the calf. There are the anacondas, with lifted loop, ready to crush the unwary. There are financial wreckers, who stand on the beach praying for a Caribbean whirlwind to sweep over our commercial interests.

Let me say it is no place for a man to go into business unless his moral principle is thoroughly settled. That is no place for a man to go into business who does not know when he is overpaid five dollars by mistake, whether he had better take it back again or not. That is no place for a man to go who has large funds in trust, and who is all the time tempted to speculate with them. That is no place for a man to go who does not quite know whether the laws of State forbid usury or patronize it.

Oh! how many men have risked themselves in the vortex and gone down, for the simple reason their integrity had not been thoroughly established. Remember poor Ketcham, how soon the flying hoofs of his iron grays clattered with him to destruction. Remember poor Gay, at thirty years of age astonishing the world with his fortunes and his forgeries. Remember that famous man whose steamboats and whose opera-houses could not atone for his adulterous rides through Central Park in the face of decent New York, and whose behavior on Wall Street, by its example, has blasted tens of thousands of young men of this generation.

I hold up the polluted memory to warn young men, whose moral principles are not thoroughly settled, to keep out of Wall Street. It is no place for a man who shivers under the blast o temptation. Let me say also to those who are doing legitimate business on that or similar streets of which that is a type, to stand firm in Christian principle. You are in a great commercial battle-field. Be courageous. There is such a thing as a hero of the bank and a hero o the Stock Exchange. You be that hero.

I have not so much admiration for the French Empress who stood in her balcony in Paris, and addressed an excited mob and quelled it, as have admiration for that venerable banker on Wall Street who, in 1864, stood on the steps o his moneyed institution and quieted the fears o depositors, and bade peace to the angry wave o commercial excitement. God did not allow th lions to hurt Daniel, and He will not allow th "bears" to hurt you. Remember, my friend that all these scenes of business will soon have passed away, and by the law of God's eterna right all the affairs of your business life will b adjudicated. Honesty pays best for both worlds.

SPECULATION AND GAMBLING

II. Again, I have to remark that Wall Stree is a type throughout this country of legitimat speculation on the one hand, and of ruinou gambling on the other.

Almost every merchant is to some extent speculator. He depends, not only upon th difference between the wholesale price at whic he gets the goods and the retail at which he disposes of them, but also upon the fluctuation o the markets. If the markets greatly rise, h greatly gains. If the markets greatly sink, h greatly loses.

It is as honest to deal in stocks as to deal i iron, or coal, or hardware, or dry-goods. H who condemns all stock-dealings as though the were iniquities simply shows his own ignorance Stop all legitimate speculation in this country and you stop all banks, you stop all factories you stop all storehouses, you stop all the grea financial prosperities of this country.

A stock-dealer is only a commission-me chant under another name. He gets his commission on one style of goods. You, the groce get your commission on another style of goods The dollar that he makes is just as bright an fair and honest a dollar as the dollar earned b the day laborer.

But here we must draw the line betwee legitimate speculation and ruinous gambling You, a stock operator without any property behind you, financially irresponsible, sell one hundred dollars of nothing and get paid for i You sell one hundred shares at ten thousan dollars at thirty days. If at the end of thirt days you can get the scrip for nine thousan dollars, you have made a thousand. If at th end of thirty days you have to pay eleven thou and, then you have lost a thousand. Now tha is trafficking in fiction, that is betting o chances, that involves the spirit of gambling a much as anything that ever goes on in the lowest gambling hell of New York or Brooklyn.

At certain times, almost every prosperou merchant wakes up, and he says: "Now, I hav been successful in my line of trade, and I hav a tolerable income; I think I shall go down Wall Street and treble it in three week There's my neighbor. He was in the same lin of business; he has his three or four hundre thousand dollars from the simple fact he wen into Wall Street. I think I shall go too."

Here they come, retired merchants, who wan to get a little excitement in their lethargic vein Here they come, the trustees of great property to fool every thing away. Here they come, me celebrated for prudence, to trifle with the livel hoods of widows and orphans. Do you wond that sometimes they become insane? It is insanity. Do you know there are hundreds young men in Brooklyn and New York who ar erishing under the passion for stock-gambling?

o you know that in all Christian lands this is ıe of the greatest curses? Do you know that, hile I stand here this morning, there are hunreds of men in this house in peril.

THE MANIA IN OTHER LANDS.

It is not peculiar to mercurial Americans.
h no! Almost every nation has indulged in . The Hollanders, the most phlegmatic peo-e in the world, had their gambling scene in 583. It was called the tulip mania. It was a peculation in tulips. Properties worth half a illion dollars turned into tulips. All the Hol-nd nation either buying or selling tulips. One .lip-root sold for two hundred dollars, another r two thousand.

Excitement rolling on and rolling on until his-ry tells us that one Amsterdam tulip, which as supposed to be the only one of the kind in l the world, actually brought in the markets
,816,000! That is a matter of history. Of urse the crash came, and all Holland went wn under it.

But France must have its gambling expedi-on, and that was in 1716. John Law's Missis-ppi scheme it was called. The French had ard that this American continent was built ıt of solid gold, and the project was to take it ross the ocean and drop it in France. Excite-ent beyond any thing that had yet been seen in e world. Three hundred thousand applicants r shares. Excitement so great that sometimes e mounted military had to disperse the crowds at had come to get the stocks. Five hundred mporary tents built to accommodate the peo-e until they could have opportunity of inter-ewing John Law.

A lady of great fashion had her coachman up-t her near the place where John Law was pass-g, in order that she might have an interview th that benevolent and sympathetic gentle-an! Stocks went up to two thousand and fifty r cent, until one day suspicion got into the arket, and down it all went—John Law's Mis-sippi scheme—burying its projector and some
. the greatest financiers in all France, and was most as bad as a French revolution.

Sedate England took its chance in 1720. That ıs the South Sea bubble. They proposed to ansfer all the gold of Peru and Mexico and the ands of the sea to England. Five millions' rth of shares were put on the market at three ındred pounds a share. The books open, in a w days it is all taken, and twice the amount bscribed.

Excitement following excitement, until all nds of gambling projects came forth under the ng of this South Sea enterprise. There was a ge company formed with great capital for pro-ding funerals for all parts of the land. An-her company with large capital, five million unds of capital, to develop a wheel in perpet-
.l motion. Another company with a capital of ur million pounds, to insure people against ss by servants. Another company with two illion five hundred thousand pounds capital to ansplant walnut trees from Virginia to Eng-ıd.

Then, to cap the climax, a company was rmed for

"A GREAT UNDERTAKING, body to know what it is." And lo! six huned thousand pounds in shares were offered at e hundred pounds a share; books were ened at 9 o'clock in the morning and closed 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and the first day it ıs all subscribed. "A great undertaking, nody to know what it is." An old magazine of ose days describes the scene (Hunt's Magane). It says:

"From morning until evening Change Alley ıs full to overflowing with one dense moving ass of living beings, composed of the most in-ngruous materials, and in all things save the ad pursuit wherefor they were employed utterly posite in their principles and feelings, and far under in their stations in life and the profesons they follow. Statesmen and clergymen serted their high stations to enter upon this great theatre, of speculation and gambling. Churchmen and Dissenters left their fierce disputes and forgot their wranglings upon church government in the deep and hazardous game they were playing for worldly treasures and for riches, which, if gained, were liable to disappear within an hour of their creation.

"Whigs and Tories buried their weapons of political warfare, discarded party animosities, and mingled together in kind and friendly intercourse, each exulting as their stocks advanced in price, and grumbling when fortune frowned upon them. Lawyers, physicians, merchants, and travelling men forsook their employment, neglected their business, disregerded their engagements, to whirl along in the stream, to be at last ingulfed in the wild sea of bankruptcy.

"Females mixed with the crowd, forgetting the station and employment which nature had fitted them to adorn, and dealt boldly and extensively, and, like those by whom they were surrounded, rose from poverty to wealth, and from that were thrown down to beggary and want, and all in one short week, and perhaps before the evening which terminated the first day of their speculation. Ladies of high rank, regardless, of every appearance of dignity, and blinded by the prevailing infatuation, drove to the shops of their milliners and haberdashers, and there met their stock-brokers, whom they regularly employed, and through whom extensive sales were daily negotiated. In the midst of the excitement all distinctions of party, and religion, and circumstances, and character were swallowed up."

But it was left for our own country to surpass all. We have the highest mountains, and the greatest cataracts, and the longest rivers, and, of course, we had to have the largest swindle. One would have thought that the nation had seen enough in that direction during the morus multicaulis excitement, when almost every man had a bunch of crawling silk-worms in his house out of which he expected to make a fortune.

But all this excitement was as nothing compared with what took place in 1864, when a man near Titusville, Pa., digging for a well, struck oil. Twelve hundred oil companies call for one billion of stock. Prominent members of churches, as soon as a certain amount of stock was assigned them, saw it was their liberty to become presidents, or secretaries, or members of the board of direction.

Some of these companies never had a foot of ground, never expected to have. Their entire equipment was a map of a region where oil might be, and two phials of grease, crude and clarified. People rushed down from all parts of the country by the first train and put their hard earnings in the gulf.

A young man came down from the oil regions of Pennsylvania utterly demented, having sold his farm at a fabulous price, because it was supposed there might be oil there—coming to a hotel in Philadelphia, at the time I was living there, throwing down a five-thousand-dollar check to pay for his Monday meal and saying he did not care any thing about the change! Then he stepped back to the gas-burner to light his cigar with a thousand-dollar note. Utterly insane.

The good Christian people said, "This company must all be right, because Elder So-and-so is president of it, and Elder So-and-so is secretary of it, and then there are three or four highly professed Christians in the board of directors. To join this company is almost like joining the church!" They did not know that when a professed Christian goes into stock-gambling he lies like sin!

But alas! for the country; it became

A TRAGEDY,

and one thousand million dollars were swamped. There are families to-day sitting in the shadow of destitution, who but for that great national outrage would have had their cottages and their homesteads. I hold up before the young men of this congregation these four great stock gambling schemes that they may see to what length men will go smitten of this passion, and I want to show them how all the best interests of society are against it, and God is against it, and will damn it for time and damn it for eternity.

Oh! men of Wall Street, and of all streets, stand back from nefarious enterprises, join that great company of Christian men in New York and Brooklyn who are maintaining their integrity, notwithstanding all the pressure of temptation. In the morning, when you open business in the broker's office or in the banking-house, ask God's blessing, and when you close it pronounce a benediction upon it. A kind of business that a man cannot engage in with prayer is no business to do.

I wish that the words of George Peabody, uttered in the hearing of the people of his native town—Danvers, Massachusetts, I wish that those words could be uttered in the hearing of all the young men of this congregation and all the young men throughout the land. He said:

"Though Providence has granted me unvaried and universal success in the pursuit of fortune in other lands, I am still in heart the humble boy who left yonder unpretending dwelling. There is not a youth within the sound of my voice whose early opportunities and advantages are not very much greater than were my own, and I have since achieved nothing that is impossible to the most humble boy among you."

George Peabody's success in business was not more remarkable than his integrity and his great-hearted benevolence. I pray upon you God's protecting and prospering blessing. I hope you may all make fortunes for time and fortunes for eternity.

Some day when you come out of your place of business, and you go to the Clearing-house, or the place of custom, or the bank, or your own home, as you come out of your place of business, just look up at the clock of old Trinity and see by the movement of the hands how your life is rapidly going away, and be reminded of the fact that before God's throne of inexorable judgment you must yet give account for what you have done since the day you sold the first yard of cloth or the first pound of sugar.

I pray for you all prosperity. Stand close by Christ, and Christ will stand close by you. The greater the temptation, the more magnificent the reward. But alas! for the stock gambler—what will he do in the judgment? That day will settle everything. That to the stock-gambler will be a "break" at the "first call." No smuggling into heaven. No "collaterals" on which to trade your way in. Go in through Christ, the Lord, or you will forever stay out.

God forbid that after you have done your last day's work on earth, and the hushed assembly stands around with bowed heads at your obsequies—God forbid that the most appropriate text for your funeral oration should be "As a partridge sitteth on eggs and hatcheth them not, so he that getteth riches, and not by right, shall leave them in the midst of his days, and at the end he shall be a fool." Or that the most appropriate funeral psalm should be the words of the poet:

> "Price of many a crime untold,
> Gold, gold, gold, gold."

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it and for its weekly circulation of more than 150,00- copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening o God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

A Strange Refuge.—A Family of Emigrants were recently found occupying a tomb in a cemetery near Providence, R. I., that had been left open. When discovered they had had possession a week, and were using the coffin shelves to put their dishes on.

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance

A Thrilling Story by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 918.)

Alick Gogharty Declares Percival's Innocence to the Chief of Police—Policeman Malone Interrupts the Chief's Reply—He Reveals Haley's Intended Assassination of Percival—He Furnishes Conclusive Evidence of Haley's Untruthfulness—Mr. Lemaire Summoned to Hear Percival Acquitted.

"YIS, that's it," replied Rowley. "The ropes almost eat their way to the very bone, yer honor, and when released Mr. Montaigne couldn't for a long time stand on his feet, for they lost their power, an' more nor that, the gettin' o' it back agin wor nothin' less nor agony."

"Yes," remarked the chief; "but only think of the color put upon all this by the informer Haley! His deposition runs thus: 'The tied man would have remained bound until death for all that Mr. Montaigne ever did for his release;' which is true—the villain!—but with malignant deception true, for, suppressing the individuality of the captive, you perceive," he said to his colleagues at hand, "he adds the odium of his captivity to his sufferings. I declare I never in all my experience came across such a piece of devilish ingenuity."

"But it is a wonderful thing to me," said the chief, also addressing one or two of his colleagues near him, "that if what this man says be true—and I must say it has about it the ring of truth—I wonder, I say, that Mr. Montaigne did not bring the hand of the law upon these scoundrels and punish them. It was certainly wrong of him not to do so, and you see how his omission to perform this public duty has eventuated in his own personal injury."

"I beg your pardon for interruptin' yer honor," said Rowley, "but I think I can explain all that, and it's me noshun, too, that, when ye hear me out, in place o' blamin' me landlord, ye'll altogether excuse him. In thim bad times, yer honor, a Ribbonman meself, I had a friendship for Ribbonmin, and I got Mr. Montaigne, on the road to his uncle's, to where I was takin' him, to solemnly promise me, yer honor, that he would let bygones be bygones, would never tell what had happened, and would take no steps, good or bad, to bring me comrades to justice. Like a gintleman that he is, he has kep' his word, yer honor, and I am downright sartin that if it wor not for me, yer honor, ye would never have heard a word about it. No, if it cost him his liberty, aye, his life, my truth-keepin' landlord wouldn't have brathed, I'm confident, a syllable about it."

Up to this point Alick, who kept his stand near Rowley, observed a perfect silence, but now he thought that matters had reached a stage that made a word from him expedient. When he caught the chief's eye he said, "It was I, sir, who, at some personal inconvenience, secured the attendance here of the man who has just spoken. Mr. Montaigne, I have the honor to say, sir, is my friend. Under the oath of a false and perjured witness, he is enduring, you must see, sir, an enormous wrong, for the whole of Haley's deposition, taken from beginning to end, amounts, as has been proved, to a gigantic lie. You may think, sir, I speak warmly," said Alick; "I do, for I feel so, and I am persuaded, sir," he added, "from what you have just heard from my brave and honest friend here, Rowley Quinn, that my opinion of this wretched informer Haley's affidavit is shared, sir, by yourself. I therefore respectfully but firmly call upon you, sir, to quash the whole of this base man's lying deposition, and the proceedings founded upon it, and I ask you without loss of time to bring about the release of my friend. Release, you are aware, sir, will be no atonement for the grievous wrong which has been done him; it will at best be only a poor and feeble reparation, but such as it is, I demand it."

The chief had come pretty nearly to Alick's estimation of Haley's affidavit. Yet he was reluctant to openly admit it. Alick's boldness, too, and implied rebuke of the authorities for their easy belief and over-hasty action, somewhat nettled him; and besides this, it would not do at the present crisis of affairs over the country to let it appear that he and those who acted with him had abused their power—had no just ground for what had been done.

He therefore replied, rather tartly, "I would have you to remember, Mr. Gogharty, that it is by mere sufferance, sir, that you are at all allowed to be present at this investigation."

"Granted," said Alick; "but now that I am here you will not, surely, gag my speech, especially when you owe it to me that you are put in the way of rectifying an egregious blunder."

The description was strong, and the chief felt it; and it stung him all the more because it was true. With a stern look he therefore addressed Percival's advocate, saying, "You speak, sir, in a way that I think is not warranted. I am prepared to admit that the first portion of Haley's deposition is false—if you like, basely false. I presume I may admit so much," he said, looking at his colleagues; "but you see, sir," he said, again turning to Alick, "that there are two parts in the information, one having respect to Mr. Montaigne's very young days, and the other to his life in Dublin; and it is upon this latter part of the affidavit, sir—a part which has not been at all impugned—that we have acted in putting Mr. Montaigne in security.

"Look here, sir. Leaving out altogether the scene in the Ribbon Lodge, this man distinctly swears that he has seen this Mr. Montaigne, and that several times, at the Capel Street Confederate Club, the worst in the city, and our own detective, Mr. Fox, confirms this statement, besides adding to it some other suspicious facts. This, however, I allow would not fully condemn Mr. Montaigne; but now comes something which I think, without question, does.

"On the — of April, at a meeting held between eight and ten o'clock—you see sir, we know all about it; we have our own means for this, which I will not explain, but which you can imagine, sir, if you like—at this meeting, I repeat, it was resolved by those present that civil war should be begun. And Mickey Haley positively swears that this Mr. Montaigne was present—was the most unmeasured in his language of all those leaders of sedition, and advocated even the most atrocious methods of rebellion. This was, I say, no longer ago than on the night of the — of April, and, of course, sir, the authorities were compelled to take action in the matter, and would not at all be justified in suffering such a firebrand as this to be at large, and particularly at the present time."

At this stage of the chief's speech, which was delivered with considerable energy and oracular distinctness, a policeman stepped forward, and raising his hand in military salute, begged his chief's permission for two or three words.

It will be at once conjectured who he is. He is Policeman Malone, fulfilling his promise to Lucie. Without going home even for refreshment after his long hours of duty, he had hastened to the office in Castle Yard, and taking his stand near the wall, was present during the most important part of Rowley Quinn's statement. Like the others around him, he burned with indignation under the revelation of Haley's lies, and when Rowley ceased speaking, was on the move toward the centre-table in the office to give his quota of evidence, when Alick's assumption of the affair checked him and held him back—and that it was so was fortunate. When he heard the date and hour of the confederate meeting at which it was sworn by Haley that Percival was present, he repeated the act which he had performed before Lucie. He put his hand into his breast pocket, drew forth his memorandum book, and conned his notes. Now, holding forth the book in his hand, he asked permission to read what he had there put down.

"Yes, Malone," said the chief with a nod. "Yet what can it have to do with the presen case?"

"Listen, sir, and judge for yourself," sai Malone, again giving the salute. "On the – of April, at a quarter to ten o'clock, I challenge a man who was looking from a height over th Dodder River. He said his name was Micke Haley, and that he was looking at the gentlema and lady on the opposite side of the river, walk ing in the moonlight. He acknowledged tha he was marking them in spite. What follows,' said Malone, "I put down when I got home for somehow I got it into me mind that I hadn' seen the ind o' the business. This same gentle man and lady I had observed walking up an down the road opposite for more than an hou before this, and they did not leave for home un til on toward eleven o'clock. That's what I'v down, sir," said Malone, handing the note-boo to his chief to examine. "You'll say, sir, I hav no doubt, that the lady and gentleman spent good dale o' their time in perambulatin'. S they did, sir, and they done the same for night and nights before the wan I've named, and fo many a night after. When I noticed it, sir, had, of course, me own idaya about it; and find I wasn't at all out; and, more nor tha though it may sound quare, I have the lady' own word for it. It's the owld story over agai sir; they war busy courtin' "—and as Malon said this he grinned.

"But what I want to be at, sir, is this. I coorse it follows that all this Haley has swor so glibly about Mr. Montaigne being on th night of April the — at the confederate mee ing in Capel Street is ridiculous nonsense fro first to last, and is nothing but a shameful pac of lies."

At these words Alick and Rowley Quinn we so elated that the former clapped his hands, an the latter thumped his heavy stick on the floo and shouted out "Hooray!"

"Order!" sternly cried the chief. "If th unseemly conduct is repeated I will clear t room."

"I beg your pardon, sir," said Alick. "I fo got myself; but I hope that, under the circun stances, you will forgive me. Mr. Montaig sir, is, as I have said, a dear and close friend mine, and the perfect vindication of his cha acter now achieved so rejoiced me that I w borne beyond myself. I'll not repeat my offenc sir, but most assuredly I will repeat my demar for the release of Mr. Montaigne, and that wit out the delay of a single hour."

The chief bit his lip. He was not a harsh unamiable man, yet the outspoken testimony Constable Malone did not altogether please hi at all events he would much have preferred th his damaging statement—utterly annihilati every pretence of the authorities for putting keeping Percival in custody—had been given secret, when none but officials were near, for well knew how such a high-handed act of t executive as, in unwonted times, had be practised upon our hero, and which was on rendered possible by the suspension of the co stitutional rights of a British subject, would blazed abroad and made a handle of by assailan of the authorities.

With a firm countenance fixed upon Alick, therefore said,

"Of course, sir this affidavit of Haley's is n worse than worthless—I quite admit that; i deed, by what my subordinate has stated, it utterly demolished. But then, sir, steps wh we, the police, under a sense of public duty, ha considered it necessary to take, cannot be qu so hastily altered as you seem to imagine."

"More is the pity!" broke in Alick. " haste can be too great, sir, for remedying an justice."

"Ah, well, yes, that's true," replied the ch evidently a little embarrassed; "and theref I am going to take the needful steps for Montaigne's freedom. Mr. Wade," he add speaking to one of his colleagues, "will you good enough to step up to Mr. Lemaire's a tell him I should like to see him."

Alick, taking some umbrage at Mr. Lemaire's aring and tone in regard to Percival, had not en him since the evening he left his house to tch Rowley Quinn to Dublin, and he felt not ogether comfortable at the prospect of now eing him. Mr. Lemaire, who was found in his ice, at once responded to the call of the police ief, and when he entered his office was not a tle startled at sight of Alick, and did not, on part, feel quite easy in his presence. Both, fact, were conscious of an unpleasant estrangent. He therefore distantly saluted Alick, and more.

'Mr. Lemaire,'' the chief said, "it gives me ry great pleasure to inform you that Haley's idavit has been demonstrated false from top bottom, and Mr. Montaigne's character stands solutely clear and unimpeached. I say it in e presence of all in this office, for your gratiation, sir, so that any idea abroad to the contry may be publicly set right. I deeply regret, , that we, the police, and I in special, include self—that we, I say, deceived by a perfidious th, have been led into an act hurtful, as I know, your feelings, Mr. Lemaire, and certainly rsh as regards the imprisoned gentleman. ease, sir, see, at your first convenience, that e wrong is undone. My chief reason for askg you to come here, Mr. Lemaire, is that I ay thus openly entrust to you the necessary asures for Mr. Montaigne's discharge from stody.''

It scarcely needs to be said that Mr. Lemaire s delighted at this surprising piece of news, his thoughts at once turned to Lucie. "Dear l!" he said within himself, "thank God, a ight morning has come after your night of sorw, and one that I feel you deserve for your movable fidelity.''

(To be continued.)

ISTANT ECHOES OF THE COMING ONE.

Rev. W. Frith, F.R.G.S., Author of "Vox Dei," etc.

National Agitations Precursory to the Formation of the Ten Kingdoms of the Ten Horns—2. The Gradual Return of the Jews to Palestine——3. Prevalence of a Form of Godliness without the Power.

THE most devout and diligent students of od's Word, of all Christian denominations, are ming to be of "one heart and of one mind,'' that the remoter signs and antecedents of the cond Advent'' are beginning to appear. And so, it becomes all who thus give attention to is solemn and interesting theme to have a clear tline of this truth in our minds.

And as the silvery morning, with its dewy eshness and inspiring breezes, calls us to arouse om our slumbers and prepare to meet the rising n, so the present prophetic daybreak is calling the sleeping virgins to arise and shine, for, Behold, the Bridegroom cometh.'' And while e world is busy in its unbelieving course, let be "as men who wait for their Lord.''

The true and proper attitude of "the faithful Christ Jesus'' is to be that of "virgins'' who e waiting for "the Bridegroom.'' They should characterized by self-abnegation and unworldess—"denying ungodliness and worldly lusts, d living godly, righteously, and soberly in is present world.''

This habit will of course make them appear mewhat singular, and "men wondered at.'' ill, it will secure to those who thus walk a stfulness of spirit, a cheerfulness of heart, and ietness of conscience to which those who follow "the fashion of this world'' will be comparave strangers. Jesus will then give them His llowship, and they will realize "the peace of od that passeth all understanding,'' and "the y of the lord will be their strength.''

AND JESUS IS COMING.

1. The signs that are antecedent to that great isis are beginning to appear. The agitation mong the nations of the European continent is e precursor, we believe, of the formation of ose ten Gentile kingdoms which it is propheticlly declared shall exist at "the time of the end,'' when "the fulness of the Gentiles shall have come in.'' This is clearly taught by the ten toes on the great image of Daniel. And this, perhaps, will involve terrible wars and political convulsions, which will materially alter the geographical boundaries of the continental nations. Still, "the Word of the Lord shall stand, and He will do all His pleasure.''

The "Eastern Question'' will find its true solution in this issue. Man is playing his part; but God's hand is in it all. There are "wheels within wheels,'' but "the spirit of life is in the wheels'' (Ezek. 1:21). It is never more true than in the great events of history (which is often "prophecy fulfilled'') that "the lot is cast into the lap, but the whole disposing thereof is of the Lord.'' Men may appear to be shrewd and clever diplomatists, and sit in the conclave of councils, and deliberate in the synodical assemblies, and hold an international congress; nevertheless, it is still true, "by ME kings reign and princes decree justice.'' And it is only on this principle that the fulfilment of this and all other prophecy relative to the nations can be consummated.

But this is true: "The Most High ruleth among the children of men.'' "He putteth down one and setteth up another.'' The rise and fall of Babylon "is of Him.'' The establishment of kingdoms and "the ruin of empires'' is according to His will. His declaration is, "I WILL WORK, and who shall let it?'' (Isa. 43:13). His voice to each of us is this: Restless child, "be still, and know that I am God: I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth.''

This is one of the antecedent signs of the Second Advent of our blessed Lord—He is forming the ten kingdoms, of which the Man of Sin, the coming Antichrist, will be the head.

2. Another sign is this: the gradual to their own land in unbelief. This has already begun. There is both Jew and Gentile testimony to this fact. The Jews, both in Jerusalem and in other parts of the Holy Land, are largely on the increase. Dr. Edersheim says, "the return of the Jews to their own land may be said to have already commenced.'' This has been reiterated in other quarters. And the Jews in Jerusalem at this time may be said to be not only in excess of what they have ever been since the time of Titus, but they are full of hope and enterprise; and though still in "blindness,'' and ignorant of the terrible trial ("the time of Jacob's trouble''—Jer. 30:4–9; 18:22) that awaits them when the "Assyrian'' and "THE ANTICHRIST'' shall come up and besiege their loved Jerusalem; yet they are "planting and building, marrying and giving in marriage'' in the land of their fathers.

RETURN OF THE JEWS

And though "the veil is upon their hearts,'' and they are, to a large extent, "a hissing and a by-word among the nations'' (Jer. 25:9), yet they are quite unconsciously fulfilling the prophetic Word. The Lord in His providence is calling them back to "the city of their solemnities.'' The Word is gone forth, which MUST be fulfilled, "I will say to the north, give up; and to the south, keep not back: bring My sons from far, and My daughters from the ends of the earth'' (Isa. 43:6). This, we believe, is beginning to have its incipient fulfilment; and though it may be some years before we see Israel in their own land; yet the command to restore and return has gone forth—the result will be, "Israel shall be gathered;'' "I the Lord will hasten it in His time.'' of godliness,'' without the power of it. This is painfully patent to all who are waiting for their Lord. At no period in the past history of the world has there ever been so much profession of religion. But may we not say, without any breach of charity, that if the test our Lord gave is to be applied, "by their FRUITS (i.e., PRINCIPLES and practice together) ye shall know them,'' how small a remnant would be left! Compare, or rather contrast, the lives of thousands "who profess and call themselves Christians'' with the life required by the Divine standard; and how painful and saddening the discrepancy!

3. A further sign is, the

PREVALENCE OF "A FORM

The Lord requires a rigid nonconformity to the world, in its maxims and fashions and expediencies, while too many, alas! are as indulgent in "the pomps and vanities'' of "this present evil world'' as if there were no other life; and the course of our being terminated under "the shadow of death.'' The Scriptures say, "Be not conformed to this world;'' "if any man love the world, the love of the Father is not in him.'' And ITS AUTHOR makes no mistakes! Yet this is the feature of this age to too great an extent.

A "form of godliness,'' a splendid ritual, a sensuous worship, an ecclesiastical millinery, and a theatrical performance—these, to a large extent, are the religions of the many! And where it is otherwise—even where there is "a sound creed'' and an "orthodox faith''—there is too often a low state of spiritual life, "itching ears,'' mere literary criticism, and "a restraining prayer before God;'' while many, as Doeg, the Edomite, are "detained before the Lord during divine worship; and their reluctant hearts, like the fool's eyes, are going to and fro in the earth.'' And of too many the Lord Himself might say, "This people draw near to Me with their lips, while their heart is far from Me.''

This is, indeed, a dark picture; but it is true to the facts of life! And if we are true (even approximately) in our chronology, the prophecy and the fulfilment correspond (Matt. 24:12).

We live under the shadow of the coming apostasy. The clouds of the impending storm are gathering, and the mountains of human guilt are drawing those clouds to a centre, till there shall be a time of trouble indescribable! (Mark 13:19).

This is a remote prognostication, that "He who shall come will come'' (Heb. 10:37). Blessed are they who are ready.

Meanwhile, what is our office? If His people, it is clear and plain. It is no way difficult to ascertain what should be our position. "Let your loins be girt about with truth, and your lamps burning, and ye yourselves like unto men who wait for their Lord.''

Religious Degeneracy of the World.—Mr. J. A. Froude, in the course of an article in the North American Review, writes thus of the state of religion throughout the world: "In every corner of the world there is the phenomenon of the decay of established religions. In Catholic countries as well as in Protestant, nay, among Mohammedans, Jews, Buddhists, Brahmans, traditionary creeds are losing their hold. An intellectual revolution is sweeping over the world, breaking down established opinions, dissolving the foundations on which historical faiths have been built up. Science, history, philosophy, have combined to create universal uncertainty, and Catholic France and Italy are no better off in this respect than Germany or England or America.'' How important it is for Christians to remember the apostolic warning: "Seeing ye know these things before, beware lest ye also, being led away with the error of the wicked, fall from your own steadfastness'' (2 Peter 3:17).

A Silly Custom, Known as Blessing the Dog, was observed November 3d by the Duc d'Aumale, one of the pretenders to the throne of France. The ceremony took place at his estate of Chantilly, the Duc and many titled guests assembling at the church before daybreak. The party were attired in costumes exactly like those worn in days gone by, when the King of France invited his Court to follow him to the chase. Gravely seated on the steps of the altar, "Rabagas,'' the best and oldest dog of the pack, was sprinkled with holy water, and the Orleans cockade was attached to his neck; he received them with some surprise, but committed no indecorum. Last year the dog so blessed, showed his canine contempt for the proceedings by devouring a wax candle. Mass over, the Orleans princes and 300 guests hunted a stag.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, November 26th, at 3.15 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Message to Congress deals principally with the important topic of finance and civil-service reform. On the former subject the President recommends Congress to suspend the coinage of silver dollars till some international agreement can be reached in regard to the ratio at which the "market value" of a silver dollar can be kept equal to that of a gold one. That is to postpone the attempt to return to a double standard.

In regard to the paper currency, the President regards the retirement of United States notes in their capacity as legal tender in private contracts as "a step to be taken in our progress toward a safe and stable currency which should be accepted as the policy and duty of the Government, and the intert and security of the people."

In reference to civil-service reform, the President declares that his views are unchanged. He alludes with satisfaction to the results of competitive examination so far as it has been tried, and protests against partisan removals from office. He also recommends legislation with a view to the protection of civil servants from levies for political purposes.

The Causes of the Outbreak of the Ute Indians appear to have arisen mainly through a misunderstanding on the part of the red men, induced by their knowledge of previous breaches of faith on the part of the government at Washington. Agent Meeker urged them to plough the land and to acquire other habits of civilized life. But the Indians believed that if they adopted Mr. Meeker's suggestion they would be merely preparing the land for the occupation of the whites, who would claim it as soon as it had been brought under cultivation. This belief rendered them reluctant to abandon the mode of life to which they had been accustomed, and produced a feeling of distrust in their minds against the agent. Mr. Meeker was impatient with them because they did not follow his advice, and so ill-will smouldered between the two parties which the advance of Major Thornburgh fanned into a blaze. In the catastrophe which followed we are reaping the harvest of years of fraud and wrong-doing, of broken promises and cancelled treaties, the issue of the rapacity and greed of unscrupulous men.

The Subject of Ways and Means, if not a fascinating subject, is one of pressing importance nationally as individually. The report of the Secretary of the Treasury just issued will therefore be carefully read, and its statements and recommendations well weighed and considered. As it is the first report since the resumption of specie payments, it is this year unusually interesting. Mr. Sherman estimates the revenues for the current fiscal year at $288,000,000, and the expenditures, exclusive of the sinking fund, at $238,269,135. Should Congress increase the appropriations beyond the power of the surplus to meet them, the Secretary advises the restoration of a moderate duty on tea and coffee, and the levying of an internal tax on the manufacturers of opium.

In treating the question of the retirement of United States notes, the Secretary makes the recommendation that the resumption fund be set apart for the redemption of United States notes, and that the notes redeemed shall only be issued in exchange for or in purchase of coin or bullion. The prevailing high prices for public securities, the general feeling of confidence, and the influx of specie to the country, large beyond precedent, all suggest that the present would be an excellent time to invest a portion of the sinking fund in United States notes, and retire and cancel them, thus reducing the maximum of the amount in circulation to $300,000,000, the figure fixed by the Resumption Act.

Death of a Millionaire.—Peter Goelet, an old and highly esteemed citizen of New York, and one of its largest land-owners, died at his residence November 21st. Mr. Goelet was a man of great sagacity and industry, and accumulated a fortune estimated at twenty million dollars. He was descended from a French Huguenot who fled from his native land after the revocation of the Edict of Nantes, and arrived in New York in 1697. He is said to have been charitable without ostentation, and during the war took a special interest in one of the New York regiments, expending money freely to relieve the sufferings of the members who returned sick or disabled, and of the families of those who were killed.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have Commenced work in St. Louis. On November 22d about fifty ministers assembled by invitation to meet the evangelists for consultation in the Hall of the Young Men's Christian Association. Mr. Moody stated his preference for the plan of districting the city, and appointing a business committee of laymen to arrange with him all details. He objected to any thing that might take the form and have the effect of "red tape;" he feared he would at some unguarded moment break the tape and then "somebody might get into trouble." The next step was to appoint a clergyman, one from each denomination, to district the city and report to a permanent committee of laymen, such as Mr. Moody requested. This was done, and the report was adopted and the committee discharged. All the ministers will throw open their churches, or close them as may be thought best, and attend the meetings and work as directed in their several districts. They will meet in mass when called upon by Mr. Moody to see whether the plan adopted is having the desired result in the conversion of souls, and to have further conference. All the ministers are united.

A Panic in a Church Occurred at Waynesboro', Penn., on November 24th, which at one time threatened to involve the loss of many lives. Considerable interest had been excited in the neighborhood by a discussion on the subject of baptism then going on at the Lutheran Church, and the building was filled with a crowd of over 800 people. Both the floor and the galleries were densely packed. Shortly before seven o'clock a bench in the church broke, making a cracking noise, and some one in the congregation called out, "The building is falling!" A scene of the wildest excitement followed. A general rush was made for the doorways, which were soon blocked up by the frightened crowd, and, to add to the terror, the railings in the front of the gallery gave way, precipitating the occupants on the heads of those below. The trampling of the crowd and the floors raised a cloud of dust, through which the lighted lamps could only be seen dimly, and another cry, "The building is on fire," caused all to redouble their efforts to escape. But they were so tightly wedged that movement was almost impossible. The ministers present endeavored to allay panic, but their voices were drowned by the c and groans of the people. Not until the bui ing had been almost emptied did the peo realize that at no time had there been any ca for alarm. On an examination being made was found that many were seriously inju although, providentially, no lives were lost.

A Subscriber, Renewing his Subscription 1880, writes: "It is my paper; I take no ot but our local. Thank God for such a publi tion. I wish it was in every household. I ke it on my desk in the store. Several travell tell me they are going to take it another ye I loan mine until they are pretty well worn o If I had $100 to spare I would send one to eve family here that I could next year. I shall ha to thank God as long as I live for those bless heart-stirring words of Talmage, Spurgec Moody, and not less Punshon and Mrs. Baxter, and all the other dear ones whose nam are in 'the Lamb's book of life.' How I long to shake hands and let my eyes feast looking into their dear faces! I seem to ta with them now. 'Oh, blessed home,' where shall see as we are seen, and learn the de meaning of things that have been!"

A Hundred Intentions to One Mass.—Fath McNamara, speaking at Clarendon Hall on Su day evening, November 23d, explained ho many priests of the communion he has le "lump" their masses. An "intention" in t Church of Rome means the purpose for whi any person requests a mass to be said and pa for it; and a law of the church is that no ma shall be said unless its specific "intention" be the mind of the officiating priest at the tim But Father McNamara declares that the pra tice is quite common for a priest to receive t money for one hundred intentions, and then clear them all off with a single mass. He sa no political schemers come near the Roman Cat olic priesthood in the wholesale character their dodges. The deception of saying one ma for a hundred or so was exposed in Germa several years ago.

Thanksgiving Day at Five Points.—A R porter of the Daily Witness entered the Hous of Industry at Five Points, New York, Noven ber 27, and there witnessed an interesting scen which the liberality of some Christian peop had rendered possible. He writes:

"Nearly four hundred children were at wor at one time on the wholesome viands provide in abundance, and the scene was one not to easily forgotten. They were of all nationaliti and colors, the quaint garb of the little Italia children provoking some amusing comment On his way downstairs the reporter struc upon what resembled a Thanksgiving dinner Liliput. Twenty diminutive feasters we seated at a table not three feet high, in little arm chairs, enjoying the viands with a grave de corum and solemn countenances, totally diffe ent from the abandon characterizing the part above stairs. The eldest had barely reached th mature age of three years, and the rest were between that period and at twelvemonth younge But little conversation was carried on at th board, and the nurses, gigantic in comparison waited in solemn silence. The visitor coul hardly tear himself away from such a novel an interesting spectacle."

A New York Bell in China.—Some time ag the Woman's Board of New York sent to th Chinese mission a church bell. Mr. Farnha acknowledging its arrival says: "A tower forty three feet high has been erected, and the bel placed therein. A bamboo pole rises hig above the tower, from whose top every Sabbat morning a blue flag with a white star is unfurled It can be seen above the Chinese houses at great distance, and the people have alread learned its meaning. It announces the Christia Sabbath to thousands and tens of thouands." This flag unfolded to the breeze, exhibiting its single star, like the Star of Bethlehem, calls the benighted heathen from their dumb and senseless idols to worship the living Jesus.

The Obstacles in the Way of the Reformaion of criminals are almost insurmountable. A tatement made by the warden of the State rison at Bangor, Me., shows how a sincere attempt to reform was thwarted by the cruel prejudices of a heartless woman. A young woman, who served out a sentence of five years' imprisonment, found means of education, and becoming thoroughly reformed and a Christian, left he prison fully determined in God's strength to ead an honest life. She was employed by a dry-goods firm in Portland as saleswoman, and gave erfect satisfaction to her employers, till one day wealthy lady of the place entered the store and ecognized her. Calling the proprietor aside, he told him that the girl had been in the State rison. He replied that he knew it, but that he had done her duty faithfully, and that they ere well satisfied with her. "Well," said the dy, "if you keep her in your store I will either trade with you myself nor suffer any of y friends to, if I can help it." So the proprietor, rather than lose his customer, called in the oor girl and discharged her.

An Affecting Incident, showing the Value of ersevering prayer, is related by Mr. Moody. A short time after I got here I received a letter om Scotland. It was sent to a minister and e forwarded it to me. It was the breathing of loving father. He asked us to look out for s boy, whose name was Willie. That name uched my heart, because it was the name of my wn boy. I asked Mr. Sawyer to try and get on e track of that boy some weeks ago, but all s efforts were fruitless. But away off in Scotnd that Christian father was holding up that y to God in prayer, and last Friday, in yonder om, among those asking for prayers was that illie, and he told me a story there that thrilled y heart, and testified how the prayers of that ther and mother in that far-off land had been strumental in effecting his salvation. Don't u think the heart of that father and mother ll rejoice? He said he was rushing madly to struction, but there was a power in those ayers that saved that boy. Don't you think, y friends, that God hears and answers prayers, d shall we not lift up our voices to Him in ayer that He will bless the children He has ven us?"

Two Young Ladies were Imprisoned for half day on the dome of the St. Louis Court House ently. They had gone up to the top, counting e steps as they went, and after enjoying the prosct had found that they could not open a door ding back to the stairway by which they re to return. After six long hours of anxiety d weariness, one of them thought of a device obtaining release. She wrote a few words paper, clamped the slip under the blade of her n-knife, and tossed it into the street. A young n picked up the knife and read these words, itten on the tag in a delicate hand: "We fastened in the dome! For mercy's sake t us out!" He showed the slip to the janitor, d rushing up the winding stairs, opened the or at the top. The girls received him with rs of joy and thankfulness, only regretting ey had not thought of the plan of attracting ention earlier.

How many young people there are whose dless footsteps have led them into a position initely more perilous than that of these young ies—positions where they are held captive by tan at his will; and though a means of escape available, yet comparatively few of them take vantage of it.

Two Unneeded Coffins have been Provided the present Sheriff of Scott County, Va. ring the late war Major Wood was the capn and Wilhelm the Lieutenant of the same npany. They had an agreement that in the ent of either being killed the survivor was to ve the remains of the fallen one cared for, d sent to friends at home. At the battle of Dowell, Wilhelm received what was pronced by the surgeons a mortal wound. od, true to the agreement, made the necessary arrangements for forwarding the body of his comrade to his friends, and had a coffin made to contain the remains. But Wilhelm providentially recovered, and the coffin was used for a comrade killed in the battle. Again, at one of the terrible battles fought by the forces of General Lee, Wilhelm received another pronounced mortal wound. The last wound was by far the more dangerous, so Wood again had Wilhelm's coffin made and provided burial clothes, also wrote for the father of the dying man. Wilhelm lingered on for many days, with his coffin ready to receive him when he breathed his last. But at last he rallied, and the second coffin was used for another occupant. Wilhelm completely recovered, and is now sheriff of the county. Like Hezekiah, he must feel that his life is peculiarly the gift of God (Isaiah 38 : 15).

A Pathetic Narrative is Given in the New York Times of the death of a young lady named Ida Richards, at Norwalk, Conn. Her lover had been injured in an accident; he had been caught in the machinery about which he was employed, and mangled terribly. She hastened to his bedside, and found the wreck of a strong man. She nursed him with all care and tirelessness, but he died. Ida Richards was a working girl, and a provident one. She had saved a little money, and with it she purchased a lot in Pine Island Cemetery, and there she buried the body. She stood by as they covered the grave, and they were obliged to leave her there; for she said she wanted to watch the place alone. In this dreary spot the girl threw herself upon the grave. The sun was low down in the west when they left her there, and after nightfall, when her friends went to remove her, they found her dead.

If a merely human love was thus powerful enough to stop the course of life at the death of its object, how ought the love of Christ to constrain Christians, so that they "should not henceforth live unto themselves, but unto Him who died for them" (2 Cor. 5 : 15).

A Soldier Bishop.—Dr. Gallaher, the New Episcopal Bishop of Louisiana, was formerly a Confederate soldier, who fought throughout the Civil War. During the greater part of the time he was Adjutant-General of Buckner's division. After the war he determined to consecrate his life to the service of God. He studied theology, was ordained in 1869, and has since been a rector in New York and in Baltimore. The Louisville Courier Journal says that soon after his going to Baltimore a stranger was heard inquiring of a lady in a street-car if she had heard Colonel Gallaher preach. "Colonel Gallaher!" she replied; "I did not know we had any colonels preaching in Baltimore." "Yes, madam," replied the gentleman, "go and hear him preach, for he is a good preacher; and more than that, madam, he was a good soldier." The soldier-bishop is evidently one of those men who attend to the Preacher's injunction: "Whatsoever thy hand findeth to do, do it with thy might" (Eccles. 9 : 10).

A Conscience Quickened by Conversion.—A Burlington, Vt., journal says: "About ten years ago the buildings of a person residing in a town some forty-five miles from Montpelier were damaged by fire. They were insured, and the case was duly settled and no more thought of it. On Friday last the person drove to Montpelier, appeared before the insurance company, and gave himself up, stating that he made a false estimate of the losses sustained by the fire. He had recently experienced the power of Divine grace in his heart, and his mind could not be at rest until he had made a clean disclosure of the whole thing to the company and settled for the same. Although a poor man, with a large family to support, he had come all this distance to give himself into the hands of the law. The matter was satisfactorily adjusted, and he departed for home a happier man."

The Prophetic News and Israel's Watchman (London) for November may be obtained at the office of the CHRISTIAN HERALD at six cents a copy.

HOW TO READ THE BIBLE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"Have ye not read? . . . Have ye not read? . . . If ye had known what this meaneth."—MATTHEW 12 : 3–7.

The Worthless Studies of the Pharisees—The Saviour's Cutting Reproof—What is Meant by a True Reading of the Scriptures?—I. An Understanding of them—1. To Understand there must be Diligent Reading—2. A Mind well Awake—3. Devout Meditation—The Mothers in the Balearic Isles—Squirrels in the Beech Tree—4. Constant Prayer—5. The Use of all Means and Helps—II. A Search for the Spiritual Meaning—1. Of the Historical Passages—2. Of the Ceremonial Precepts—3. Of the Doctrinal Statements—Anecdote of a Welsh Preacher—III. Such a Reading is Profitable—It Begets Spiritual Life—Gives Comfort—Nourishment—Guidance.

THE scribes and Pharisees were great readers of the law. They studied the sacred books continually, poring over each word and letter. They made notes of very little importance—but still very curious notes—as to which was the middle verse of the entire Old Testament, which verse was half way to the middle, and how many times such a word occurred, and even how many times a letter occurred, and the size of the letter, and its peculiar position.

They have left us a mass of wonderful notes upon the mere words of Holy Scripture. They might have done the same thing upon another book for that matter, and the information would have been about as important as the facts which they have so industriously collected concerning the letter of the Old Testament.

They were, however, intense readers of the law. They picked a quarrel with the Saviour upon a matter touching this law, for they carried it at their fingers' ends, and were ready to use it as a bird of prey does its talons to tear and rend. Our Lord's disciples had plucked some ears of corn, and rubbed them between their hands. According to Pharisaic interpretation, to rub an ear of corn is a kind of threshing, and, as it is very wrong to thresh on the Sabbath day, therefore it must be very wrong to rub out an ear or two of wheat when you are hungry on the Sabbath morning. That was their argument, and they came to the Saviour with it, and with their version of the Sabbath law.

The Saviour generally carried the war into the enemy's camp, and he did so on this occasion. He met them on their own ground, and he said to them, "Have ye not read?"—a cutting question to the scribes and Pharisees, though there is nothing apparently sharp about it. It was a very fair and proper question to put to them; but only think of putting it to them. "Have ye not read?" "Read!" they could have said, "Why, we have read the book through very many times. We are always reading it. No passage escapes our critical eyes." Yet our Lord proceeds to put the question a second time—"Have ye not read?"—as if they had not read after all, though they were the greatest readers of the law then living.

He insinuates that they have not read at all; and then He gives them incidentally the reason why He had asked them whether they had read. He says, "If ye had known what this meaneth," as much as to say, "Ye have not read, because ye have not understood." Your eyes have gone over the words, and you have counted the letters, and you have marked the position of each verse and word, and you have said learned things about all the books, and yet you are not even readers of the sacred volume, for you have not acquired the true art of reading; you do not understand, and therefore you do not truly read it. You are mere skimmers and glancers at the Word: you have not read it, for you do not understand it.

I. That is the subject of our present discourse, or, at least, the first point of it, that, in order to the true reading of the Scriptures,

THERE MUST BE AN UNDERSTANDING of them.

1. I scarcely need to preface these remarks by saying that we must read the Scriptures. You know how necessary it is that we should be fed upon the truth of Holy Scripture. Need I suggest the question as to whether you do read your Bibles or not? I am afraid that this is a magazine-reading age—a newspaper-reading age—a periodical-reading age, but not so much a Bible-reading age as it ought to be. In the old Puritanic times men used to have a scant supply of other literature, but they found a library enough in the one book—the Bible. And how they did read the Bible!

How little of Scripture there is in modern sermons compared with the sermons of those masters of theology—the Puritanic divines! Almost every sentence of theirs seems to cast side-lights upon a text of Scripture; not only the one they are preaching about, but many others as well are set in a new light as the discourse proceeds. They introduce blended lights from other passages which are parallel or semi-parallel thereunto, and thus they educate their readers to compare spiritual things with spiritual. I would to God that we ministers kept more closely to the grand old book. We should be instructive preachers if we did so, even if we were ignorant of "modern thought," and were not "abreast of the times." I warrant you we should be leagues ahead of our times if we kept closely to the word of God.

As for you, my brothers and sisters, who have not to preach, the best food for you is the word of God itself. Sermons and books are well enough, but streams that run for a long distance above ground gradually gather for themselves somewhat of the soil through which they flow, and they lose the cool freshness with which they started from the spring-head. Truth is sweetest where it breaks from the smitten Rock, for at its first gush it has lost none of its heavenliness and vitality. It is always best to drink at the well and not from the tank. You shall find that reading the word of God for yourselves, reading it rather than notes upon it, is the surest way of growing in grace. Drink of the unadulterated milk of the word of God, and not of the skim milk, or the milk and water of man's word.

But now, beloved, our point is, that much apparent Bible reading is not Bible reading at all. The verses pass under the eye, and the sentences glide over the mind, but there is no true reading. An old preacher used to say, the Word has mighty free course among many nowadays, for it goes in at one of their ears and out at the other; so it seems to be with some readers—they can read a very great deal, because they do not read any thing. The eye glances, but the mind never rests. The soul does not light upon the truth and stay there. It flits over the landscape as a bird might do, but it builds no nest therein, and finds no rest for the sole of its foot. Such reading is not reading. Understanding the meaning is the essence of true reading. Reading has a kernel to it, and the mere shell is little worth.

2. Now if we are thus to understand what we read, or otherwise we read in vain, this shows us that when we come to the study of Holy Scripture we should try to have our mind well awake to it. We are not always fit, it seems to me, to read the Bible. At times it were well for us to stop before we open the volume. "Put off thy shoe from thy foot, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground." You have just come in from careful thought and anxiety about your worldly business, and you cannot immediately take that book and enter into its heavenly mysteries.

As you ask a blessing over your meat before you fall to, so it would be a good rule for you to ask a blessing on the Word before you partake of its heavenly food. Pray the Lord to strengthen your eyes before you dare to look into the eternal light of Scripture. As the priests washed their feet at the laver before they went to their holy work, so it were well to wash the soul's eyes with which you look upon God's word, to wash even the fingers, if I may so speak the mental fingers with which you will turn from page to page—that with a holy book you may deal after a holy fashion.

3. If these things be so, you will see at once, dear friends, that, if you are to understand what you read,

YOU WILL NEED TO MEDITATE

upon it. Some passages of Scripture lie clear before us—blessed shallows in which the lambs may wade; but there are deeps in which our mind might rather drown herself than swim with pleasure, if she came there without caution.

There are texts of Scripture which are made and constructed on purpose to make us think. By this means, among others, our Heavenly Father would educate us for heaven—by making us think our way into divine mysteries. Hence He puts the word in a somewhat involved form to compel us to meditate upon it before we reach the sweetness of it. He might, you know, have explained it to us so that we might catch the thought in a minute, but He does not please to do so in every case.

I have heard that the mothers in the Balearic Isles, in the old times, who wanted to bring their boys up to be good slingers, would put their dinners up above them where they could not get at them until they threw a stone and fetched them down; our Lord wishes us to be good slingers, and He puts up some precious truth in a lofty place, where we cannot get it down except by slinging at it; and at last we hit the mark and find food for our souls. Then have we the double benefit of learning the art of meditation and partaking of the sweet truth which it has brought within our reach.

We must meditate, brothers. These grapes will yield no wine till we tread upon them. These olives must be put under the wheel, and pressed again and again, that the oil may flow therefrom. In a dish of nuts you may know which nut has been eaten, because there is a little hole which the insect has punctured through the shell—just a little hole, and then inside there is the living thing eating up the kernel. Well, it is a grand thing to bore through the shell of the letter, and then to live inside feeding upon the kernel. I would wish to be such a little worm as that, living within and upon the Word of God, having bored my way through the shell, and having reached the innermost mystery of the blessed Gospel.

The Word of God is always most precious to the man who most lives upon it. As I sat last year under a wide-spreading beech I was pleased to mark with prying curiosity the singular habits of that most wonderful of trees, which seems to have an intelligence about it which other trees have not. I wondered and admired the beech, but I thought to myself, I do not think half as much of this beech tree as yonder squirrel does. I see him leap from bough to bough, and I feel sure that he dearly values the old beech tree, because he has his home somewhere inside it in a hollow place; these branches are his shelter, and those beech-nuts are his food. He lives upon the trees. It is his world, his playground, his granary, his home; indeed, it is every thing to him, and it is not so to me, for I find my rest and food elsewhere.

With God's Word it is well for us to be like squirrels, living in it and living on it. Let us exercise our minds by leaping from bough to bough of it, find our rest and food in it, and make it our all in all. We shall be the people that get the profit out of it if we make it to be our food, our medicine, our treasury, our armory, our rest, our delight. May the Holy Ghost lead us to do this and make the Word thus precious to our souls!

4. Beloved, I would next remind you that for this end we shall be COMPELLED TO PRAY.

It is a grand thing to be driven to think, it is a grander thing to be driven to pray through having been made to think. Am I not addressing some of you who do not read the word of God, and am I not speaking to many more who do read it, but do not read it with the strong resolve that they will understand it?

Do you wish to begin to be true readers
Will you henceforth labor to understand Then you must get to your knees. You mus cry to God for direction. Who understands book best? The author of it. If I want to as certain the real meaning of a rather twisted sen tence, and the author lives near me, and I ca call upon him, I shall ring at his door and say "Would you kindly tell me what you mean b that sentence? I have no doubt whatever that i is very clear, but I am such a simpleton that cannot make it out. I have not the knowledg and grasp of the subject which you possess, an therefore your allusions and descriptions are be yond my range of knowledge. It is quite withi your range, and commonplace to you, but i is very difficult to me. Would you kindly e plain your meaning to me?" A good ma would be glad to be thus treated, and woul think it no trouble to unravel his meaning t a candid inquirer. Thus I should be sure to ge the correct meaning, for I should be going t the fountain-head when I consulted the autho himself.

So, beloved, the Holy Spirit is with us, an when we take His book and begin to read, an want to know what it means, we must ask t Holy Spirit to reveal the meaning. He will n work a miracle, but He will elevate our mind and He will suggest to us thoughts which wi lead us on by their natural relation the one the other, till at last we come to the pith a marrow of His divine instruction. Seek, the very earnestly the guidance of the Holy Spiri for if the very soul of reading be the unde standing of what we read, then we must prayer call upon the Holy Ghost to unlock t secret mysteries of the inspired Word.

5. If we thus ask the guidance and teachi of the Holy Spirit, it will follow, dear friend that we shall be ready to

USE ALL MEANS AND HELPS

toward the understanding of the Scriptur
When Philip asked the Ethiopian eunuch wheth
He understood the prophecy of Isaiah he plied, "How can I, unless some man shou guide me?" Then Philip went up and open to him the Word of the Lord.

The Lord Jesus Christ pleases to give m knowledge of His Word, and more insight into to some of His servants than to others, and it ours joyfully to accept the knowledge which gives in such ways as he chooses to give it. would be most wicked of us to say, "We w not have the heavenly treasure which exists earthen vessels. If God will give us the heav ly treasure out of His own hand, but through the earthen vessel, we will have it;
we think we are too wise, too heavenly mind too spiritual altogether, to care for jewels wh they are placed in earthen pots. We will hear anybody, and we will not read any thing cept the book itself, neither will we accept a light, except that which comes in through crack in our own roof. We will not see by other man's candle: we would sooner remain the dark."

Brethren, do not let us fall into such fo
Let the light come from God, and though a ch shall bring it, we will joyfully accept it. If one of His servants, whether Paul or Apollos Cephas, shall have received light from Him, hold, "all are yours, and ye are Christ's, Christ is God's," and therefore accept of light which God has kindled, and ask for gr that you may turn that light upon the Word that when you read it you may understand it.

II. But now, secondly, and very briefly, let notice that in reading we ought to SEEK OUT THE SPIRITUAL TEACHING of the Word. I think that is in my text, cause our Lord says, "Have ye not rea

Then, again, "Have ye not read?" and then says, "If ye had known what this meaneth and the meaning is something very spirit
The text he quoted was, "I will have me and not sacrifice"—a text out of the prop Hosea. Now the scribes and Pharisees were for the letter—the sacrifice, the killing of buck, and so on. They overlooked the spiritual meaning of the passage, "I will have mercy, and not sacrifice"—namely, that God prefers that we should care for our fellow-creatures rather than that we should observe any ceremonial of His law, so as to cause hunger or thirst, and thereby death, to any of the creatures th his hands have made. They ought to have passed beyond the outward into the spiritual, and al ur readings ought to do the same.

Notice that this should be the case when we read the historical passages. "Have ye not read what David did, when he was an hungered, and they that were with him; how he entered in the house of God, and did eat the shew bread, which was not lawful for him to eat, neither for them which were with Him, but only for the priests?" This was a piece of history, yet they ought so to have read it as to have found spiritual instruction in it. I have heard some stupid people say, "Well, I do not care to read the historical parts of Scripture." Beloved friends, you do not know what you are talking about when you say so.

say to you now by experience that I have sometimes found even a greater depth of spirituality in the histories than I have in the Psalms. ou will say, "How is that?" I assert that when you reach the inner and spiritual meaning of history you are often surprised at the wondrous clearness—the realistic force—with which the teaching comes home to your soul. Some of the most marvellous mysteries of revelation are better understood by being set before our eyes in the histories than they are by the verbal declaration of them. When we have the statement to explain the illustration, the illustration expands and vivifies the statement.

or instance, when our Lord himself would explain to us what faith was, he sent us to the history of the brazen serpent; and who that has ever read the story of the brazen serpent has not felt that he has had a better idea of faith through the picture of the dying snake-bitten persons looking to the serpent of brass, and living, than in any description which even Paul has given so wondrously as he defines and describes.

Never, I pray you, depreciate the historical portions of God's word, but when you cannot get good out of them, say, "That is my foolish head and my slow heart. Oh, Lord, be pleased to clear my brain and cleanse my soul." When He answers that prayer you will feel that every portion of God's word is given by inspiration, and is and must be profitable to you. Cry, "Open thou mine eyes, that I may behold wondrous things out of Thy law."

. Just the same thing is true with regard to the ceremonial precepts, because the Saviour goes on to say, "Have ye not read in the law, how that on the Sabbath days the priests in the temple profane the Sabbath, and are blameless?"

There is not a single precept in the old law that has an inner sense and meaning; therefore not turn away from Leviticus, or say, "I cannot read these chapters in the Books of Exodus and Numbers. They are all about the tribes and their standards, the stations in the wilderness and the halts of the march, the tabernacle and furniture, or about golden knops and bowls and boards and sockets and precious stones, and blue and scarlet and fine linen." No, but look at the inner meaning. Make thorough search; for as in a king's treasure that which is the most closely locked up and the hardest to come at is the choicest jewel of the treasure, so is it with the Holy Scriptures.

Did you ever go to the British Museum library? There are many books of reference there which the reader is allowed to take down when he pleases. There are other books for which he must write a ticket, and He cannot get them without the ticket; but they have certain choice books which you will not see without a special order, and then there is an unlocking of doors, and an opening of cases, and there is a watcher with you while you make your inspection. You are scarcely allowed to put your eye on the manuscript for fear you should blot a letter out by glancing at it; it is such a precious treasure; there is not another copy of it in all the world, and so you cannot get at it easily.

Just so, there are choice and precious doctrines of God's word which are locked up in such cases as Leviticus or Solomon's Song, and you cannot get at them without a deal of unlocking of doors; and the Holy Spirit himself must be with you, or else you will never come at the priceless treasure. The higher truths are as choicely hidden away as the precious regalia of princes; therefore search as well as read. Do not be satisfied with a ceremonial precept till you reach its spiritual meaning, for that is true reading. You have not read till you understand the spirit of the matter.

3. It is just the same with the doctrinal statements of God's word. I have sorrowfully observed some persons who are very orthodox, and who can repeat their creed very glibly, and yet the principal use that they make of their orthodoxy is to sit and watch the preacher with the view of framing a charge against Him. He has uttered a single sentence which is judged to be half a hair's breadth below the standard! "That man is not sound. He said some good things, but he is rotten at the core, I am certain. He used an expression which was not eighteen ounces to the pound."

Sixteen ounces to the pound are not enough for these dear brethren of whom I speak; they must have something more and over and above the shekel of the sanctuary. Their knowledge is used as a microscope to magnify trifling differences. I hesitate not to say that I have come across persons who

"Could a hair divide Betwixt the west and north-west side"

in matters of divinity, but who know nothing about the things of God in their real meaning. They have never drank them into their souls, but only sucked them up into their mouths to spit them out on others.

Did you never hear a sermon as to which you felt that if Jesus had come into that pulpit while the man was making his oration, He would have said, "Go down, go down; what business have you here? I sent you to preach about Me, and you preach about a dozen other things. Go home and learn of Me, and then come and talk." That sermon which does not lead to Christ, or of which Jesus Christ is not the top and the bottom, is a sort of sermon that will make the devils in hell to laugh, but might make the angels of God to weep, if they were capable of such emotion.

You remember the story I told you of the Welshman who heard a young man preach a very fine sermon—a grand sermon, a highfaluting, spread-eagle sermon; and, when he had done, he asked the Welshman what he thought of it. The man replied that he did not think any thing of it. "And why not?" "Because there was no Jesus Christ in it." "Well," said he, "but my text did not seem to run that way." "Never mind," said the Welshman, "your sermon ought to run that way." "I do not see that, however," said the young man. "No," said the other, "you do not see how to preach yet. This is the way to preach. From every little village in England—it does not matter where it is—there is sure to be a road to London. Though there may not be a road to certain other places, there is certain to be a road to London. Now from every text in the Bible there is a road to Jesus Christ, and the way to preach is just to say, 'How can I get from this text to Jesus Christ?' and then go preaching all the way along it." "Well, but," said the young man, "suppose I find a text that has not got a road to Jesus Christ." "I have preached for forty years," said the old man, "and I have never found such a Scripture, but if I ever do find one I will go over hedge and ditch but what I will get to Him, for I will never finish without bringing in my Master."

Perhaps you will think that I have gone a little over hedge and ditch to-night, but I am persuaded that I have not, for the sixth verse comes in here, and brings our Lord in most sweely, setting Him in the very forefront of you Bible readers, so that you must not think of reading without feeling that He is there who is Lord and Master of every thing that you are reading, and who shall make these things precious to you if you realize Him in them.'

A PROFITABLE READING.

III. Lastly, such a reading of Scripture as implies the understanding of and the entrance into its spiritual meaning, and the discovery of the divine Person who is the spiritual meaning, is profitable, for here our Lord says, "If ye had known what this meaneth, I will have mercy, and not sacrifice, ye would not have condemned the guiltless." It will save us from making a great many mistakes if we get to understand the word of God, and among other good things we shall not condemn the guiltless.

I have no time to enlarge upon these benefits, but I will just say, putting all together, that the diligent reading of the word of God with the strong resolve to get at its meaning often begets spiritual life. We are begotten by the word of God: it is the instrumental means of regeneration. Therefore love your Bibles. Keep close to your Bibles.

There was never a soul that did sincerely seek for Jesus in the Word but by and by He stumbled on the precious truth that Christ was near at hand and did not want any looking for; that He was really there, only they, poor blind creatures! were in such a maze that they could not just then see Him. Oh, cling you to Scripture. Scripture is not Christ, but it is the silken clew which will lead you to Him. Follow its leadings faithfully.

When you have received regeneration, and a new life, keep on reading, because it will comfort you. You will see more of what the Lord has done for you. You will learn that you are redeemed, adopted, saved, sanctified. Half the errors in the world spring from people not reading their Bibles. Would anybody think that the Lord would leave any one of His dear children to perish if he read such a text as this: "I give unto My sheep eternal life, and they shall never perish, neither shall any pluck them out of My hand?" When I read that, I am sure of the final perseverance of the saints. Read, then, the Word, and it will be much for your comfort.

It will be for your nourishment too. It is your food as well as your life. Search it, and you will grow strong in the Lord and in the power of His might.

It will be for your guidance also. I am sure those go rightest who keep closest to the book. Oftentimes when you do not know what to do, you will see a text leaping up out of the book, and saying, "Follow me." I have seen a promise sometimes blaze out before my eyes, just as when an illuminated device flames forth upon a public building. One touch of flame and a sentence or a design flashes out in gas. I have seen a text of Scripture flame forth in that way to my soul; I have known that it was God's word to me, and I have gone on my way rejoicing.

And, oh, you will get a thousand helps out of that wondrous book if you do but read it; for, understanding the words more, you will prize it more, and as you get older the book will grow with your growth, and turn out to be a graybeard's manual of devotion just as it was aforetime a child's sweet story-book. Yes, it will always be a new book—just as new a Bible as if it was printed yesterday, and yet it will be a deal more precious for all the memories which cluster round it.

As we turn over its pages how sweetly do we recollect passages in our history which will never be forgotten to all eternity, but will stand forever intertwined with gracious promises! Beloved, the Lord teach us to read His book of life which He has opened before us here below, so that we may read our titles clear in that other book of love which we have not seen as yet, but which will be opened at the last great day. The Lord be with you, and bless you.

A SOLDIERS' CRICKET GROUND.

A Recollection by Major Malan.

Difficulties in making the Cricket Ground Surmounted by Prayer and Personal Exertions—Danger from the Burning of the Jungle Averted by Prayer—Good Turf Providentially Provided—Another Space Twice as Large Cleared—Flower Gardens Made—The Soldiers' "Morale" Wonderfully Improved—My First Desire thus Granted.

THE making of the cricket ground in the jungle at Singapore Barracks, of which mention was made in a previous account, was a work of very great labor. The cutting of the jungle and rooting up the trees was the least part of it. Day by day I committed my work to God in prayer, and I felt sure that He would bring it through. I should otherwise have suffered a great deal of anxiety. It was wonderful how He guided and strengthened me. I knew nothing of engineering, and yet here I was making a level in a slope without either knowledge or instrument. I never thought about this until it was finished.

Morning and evening I was the first at the work, the last to leave it. I gave the men sometimes a day off, sometimes a morning or evening, but with every party I worked. God gave me the strength for it, for I often felt ready to drop. The physical exertion and the heat of the sun, under which I often stood, though I did not allow the men to remain under it, sometimes nearly exhausted me.

When the jungle was cleared it had to be burned. On this occasion, after it was fired a breeze sprung up, and drove the flames down toward a little thatched building near the canteen. I saw the flames almost touching it, and high over it. If that building caught, the canteen would go too, and then, if the wind increased, the barracks! I had ordered the bugler to sound the assembly, and then I prayed, "Lord, change the wind." Almost at that moment, to my inexpressible relief, the wind changed and turned the flame right round.

When the jungle was cleared, there was a large hole to be filled at the foot of the slope in order to make a level. This was done by cutting large sods, and handing them down from man to man. I laid almost every one with my own hands. Then there was making the level. The British soldier worked morning and evening, the Malays midday, using the wheelbarrows as well as navvies. The level finished, there was one thing more wanted for a good cricket ground—good turf.

This I had discovered about half a mile from the barracks when carrying out the Queen's Regulations that officers are to make themselves acquainted with all the roads in the vicinity of their barracks—a most wise and necessary order. Every morning after work I would ride out for half an hour, following the roads away from the barracks. In so doing I found some beautiful turf, the only real turf I saw in Singapore. It belonged to an old Chinese gentleman, who very kindly gave it to me for the cricket ground.

This turf was brought to barracks by carts; but the larger quantity of the turf for the sides of the ground was cut in different places round the barracks, and drawn by the men in hand-carts with fife and drum. So many loads formed a day's task. Often they would finish their work before breakfast.

Last of all there was the rolling of the ground. This was done by means of a large Government roller, which had been used with bullocks for the parade ground. My men soon got it on to the cricket ground, and a company at a time rolled it along to the fife and drum. Thus this work was complete. "No one but you ever thought it would be finished," was the remark one of my brother officers made to me. Except the Lord had put it into my heart, and given me the wisdom, I should never have done it.

It had been a great pleasure to me working with the men, especially as the occupation of their minds and bodies had done their whole morale a great deal of good. They all looked much healthier and brighter. The number of cases of drunkenness for the six weeks preceding the commencement of the work had been ninety-two; for the six weeks after it had commenced fifteen, in four hundred men.

This cricket ground was only a part of the work. We afterward cleared a space twice as large, and made three more practice grounds. The whole barracks were surrounded with flower gardens. The laying out and arranging these was a delightful relaxation for me. Then on the other side of the barracks we built a gymnasium, with a large flight of steps to it. The steps in the garden were made by my men. When it was all finished I felt that the Lord had fulfilled the first desire of my heart. He had given me command of a body of British soldiers, in circumstances, to them, of very great discomfort, and by His guidance and blessing He had enabled me to do as much as could be done to make them comfortable.

"If you had not come here, sir, very few of us would ever have left this," was the remark made to me by a soldier who seldom spoke to me, a few days before we embarked for Africa. If God had not sent me there I believe that many of them would have filled a drunkard's grave, and not a few would have committed such serious crimes as would have sent them into penal servitude. I thank God that I did not lose one man in either way.

My comrades took great interest in their gardens. The flowers and shrubs with which they were adorned were such as I have since seen in conservatories in England. The stately scarlet Dracona flourished luxuriantly; the Alamanda Scholli strove to light up the very gardens with its large golden flowers; and the red, white, and yellow laurel retained their beauty, as did the others, all the year round. Balsams blossomed everywhere, and sowed themselves. There were beds of roses, and of many flowering tropical shrubs, the names of which I know not. Summer never ends at Singapore, and flowers bloom in January as in July.

Officers of the American, French, and Austrian navies, who came to call on us, were much struck by the appearance of the barracks, and could hardly believe that the British soldier had been able in such a climate to do such work.

Not only the body of men who were then serving under me reaped the benefit of these labors. The other wing of the regiment was afterward sent down from Hong Kong, and I could not help thanking God that He had enabled me to do so much for their comfort also. Two other regiments have since then been quartered in these barracks.

In looking back on this period of my service I ask myself this question: What was the power which upheld me through all this severe exertion? Was my own glory or pleasure the motive? Certainly not. I had no thought of either. What was it then which guided and helped me? It was the earnest desire to obey the command in God's Word, "Render unto Cæsar the things which are Cæsar's."

I had been intrusted by the Government of my country with the care of so many soldiers and of so much property. The welfare of those soldiers and the improvement of that property were my first duties according to the will of God. It was because I delighted myself in the will of the Lord in these duties to Him that He gave me the desire of my heart.

There is an all-important principle involved in this question. The internal peace of nations is concerned in it. The Word of God has been set aside for centuries by professed preachers of Christ's Gospel. They have taught that the glory of God absolves from allegiance to Cæsar. Nothing could be more contrary to the commands of God.

Had the rulers of Europe understood God's Word, and maintained its principles, they would have repressed that greatest of evils, a false system of religion, their lands would not have been deluged with innocent blood, and the name of the Lord Jesus Christ would not have been so grievously wronged.

The priest may teach that God is glorifi when the law of the State is opposed; the infi that man's reason is magnified when God's W is deposed. Against both stand eternally t words of the Lord Jesus Christ, who is Himse in His own person, the Infallible Word of G "Render unto Cæsar the things which a Cæsar's; and unto God the things that a God's" (Matt. 22 : 21).

MAN'S FIRST AND LAST HOME.

By William Maude.

Man's First Home a Garden—His Second Hom City—A Disappointing Contrast—Compens ing Considerations — Man Perfected in t Heavenly City—I. Perfected by the Experien of Toil and Suffering—II. Perfected in Soc Union—1. A City's Complex Relationship—A City's Diversity of Rank and Office—A Cit Mystical Unity—III. Perfected in Eternal D ration and Unchangeableness—IV. Perfected all the Divinest Element of Eden-Life—C clusion : Are we Citizens of this Heavenly Cit

MAN'S first home was a Garden—a Paradi having within its heaven-appointed boundar deep groves of matchless beauty and retireme orchards whose trees were laden with the choic fruits the as yet unfallen world could produ and an exuberant profusion of the most exquis flowers. Its climate was perfect; the heat w attempered to the most enjoyable degree, a the seasons added only variety to its sources enjoyment without involving any of the viol alternations of heat and cold from which ev the inhabitants of the most favored regions the earth now suffer.

As the sun rose in the morning it disclo such a scene of loveliness as earth has ne since beheld; the air laden with the most quisite odors and vocal with the song of swe throated birds; while as the shadows of ev ing gathered around, the soft and dying bree like a mother's soft hand on the forehead c drowsy child, lulled Adam, "the son of Go to his calm and safe repose, God drawing arou him the star-gemmed curtains of the night, a stretching over him the outspread wings of H omnipotence and love.

This, the first home of man, is thus describe the beginning of the book of Genesis: "And t Lord God planted a garden eastward in Ede and there He put the man whom He had form And out of the ground made the Lord God to gr every tree that is pleasant to the sight and go for food; the tree of life also in the midst of garden, and the tree of knowledge of good a evil. And a river went out of Eden to wa the garden; and from thence it was parted, a became into four heads. The name of the fi is Pison; that is it which compasseth the wh land of Havilah, where there is gold, and gold of that land is good: there is the bdelli and the onyx stone. And the name of the sec river is Gihon; the same is it that compass the whole land of Ethiopia. And the name the third river is Hiddekel; that is it wh goeth toward the east of Assyria. And fourth river is Euphrates. And the Lord G took the man, and put him into the garden Eden to dress it and keep it" (Gen. 2 : 8–1 a city of almost inconceivable magnitude, stupendous altitude, of magnificent architect decoration. Its foundations of immova strength; its walls blazing with radiant spl dor; its streets not laid with common ear but translucent gold; and its light not tha either sun or moon but the Shekinah-gl with which God ever veils His immediate ma fested presence.

Man's last home, when redeemed and glorifi is a City—

THE NEW JERUSALEM—

Of this, the last home of man, we have als wondrous description almost at the close of volume of inspiration: "And He carried away in the spirit to a great and high mount and showed me that great city, the holy Jeru lem, descending out of heaven from God, hav the glory of God; and her light was like unt e most precious, clear as crystal ; and had a great and high, and had twelve gates, and he gates twelve angels, and names written eon, which are the names of the twelve tribes srael. On the east three gates ; on the h three gates ; on the south three gates ; on the west three gates.

And the wall of the city had twelve foun- ons, and in them the names of the twelve tles of the Lamb. And he that talked with ad a golden reed to measure the city, and gates thereof, and the wall thereof. And ity lieth foursquare, and the length is as e as the breadth ; and he measured the city the reed, twelve thousand furlongs. The th, and the breadth, and the height of it are l. And he measured the wall thereof, an dred and forty and four cubits, according to measure of a man—that is, of the angel.

And the building of the wall of it was of er ; and the city was pure gold, like unto glass. And the foundations of the wall he city were garnished with all manner of ious stones. The first foundation was jas- the second, sapphire ; the third, a chalced- ; the fourth, an emerald ; the fifth, sar- x ; the sixth, sardius ; the seventh, chryso- ; the eighth, beryl ; the ninth, a topaz ; the h, a chrysoprasus ; the eleventh, a jacinth ; twelfth, an amethyst. And the twelve gates twelve pearls ; every several gate was of pearl, and the street of the city was of pure , as it were transparent glass. And I saw temple therein : for the Lord God Almighty the Lamb are the temple of it. And the had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, ine in it : for the glory of God did lighten it, the Lamb is the light thereof" (Rev. 21 : 2).

THE CONTRAST

een these two homes is great, startling, at sight—may we say it ?—even in some sense ppointing. We most of us sympathize, we ehend, with the poet when he says, "God e the country, but man made the town," we delight to fly, whenever opportunity rs, from the smoke, the crowd, the turmoil, the strain of the great city, to the whole- e air, the exquisite peace, the calm repose, me sweet rural paradise, where, as never d the busy haunts of men, we feel at home nature and her God.

nd though in that holy city—the new Jeru- m—which is to be man's last gorious home— e shall be neither the sorrow nor the sin, weariness nor the distraction of the cities of nations as they now exist ; yet even so, we a latent feeling that the sweet groves of n would be better than the almost oppressive y of Jerusalem ; and that we should feel con- usly nearer to God as we heard His voice ing amid the trees of the garden in the cool he day ; then as we listened to the rush of chariot wheels through the great city, gh its streets be paved with "patins of ht gold," and its palaces are ablaze with ls.

the latter case our instinctive feeling seems e expressed in the words of Balaam : "The d his God is with him ; the shout of a King mong them ;" while in the former case we better hope to share the blessed experience braham when God "talked with him, even man talketh with his friend."

evertheless, it needs only a little earnest litation, under the Spirit's teaching, to con- e us that the Divine order is at once the , the wisest, and the most blessed. Sym- cally—and while we do not deny the literal tence of either the garden or the city we t by no means overlook their profound spirit- and symbolical significance—the city is far dvance of the garden ; the one must of neces- precede the other, and it is as impossible, as ould be undesirable, that the city should have man's first home, and the garden his last, hat the paradise regained should be simply reproduction of the paradise lost. The truth his conclusion might be established by many considerations ; we shall, on the present occasion, adduce only four.

I. In the first place, viewed typically, the city, as contrasted with the garden, represents humanity as perfected by the experience of

TOIL AND SUFFERING.

The popular conception of man's moral and spiritual elevation in the garden of Eden is in accordance neither with the analogy of nature nor the teaching of revelation. That conception is strikingly expressed by one of our great divines, Dr. South, when he says, "An Aristotle was but the rubbish of an Adam, and Athens but the rudiments of Paradise."

But where do we find the evidence of this? On the contrary, does not St. Paul distinctively tell us that "The first man Adam was made a living soul ; the last Adam was made a quickening spirit? Howbeit that was not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural (literally 'animal') and afterward that which is spiritual. The first man is of the earth, earthy ; the second man is the Lord from heaven. As is the earthy, such are they also that are earthy ; and as is the heavenly, such are they also that are heavenly. And as we have the image of the earthy, we shall also have the image of the heavenly" (1 Cor. 15 : 45–49).

Eden was the fair sweet home of man's primeval innocence, and Adam was but as a happy child rejoicing in its beauty and sporting amid its flowers. Every thing around him was in harmony with, and, as it were, reflected, the childhood of our race, the untried as well as unspoiled goodness of humanity as it came from the Creator's hands. As naturally and spontaneously as the flowers bloomed, and the fruit ripened in Eden, so naturally, without toil or suffering, but as by a sweet law of goodness, did man in his innocence display the beauty of sinlessness and render to his Maker the tribute of his obedience and love.

Yet this garden of God, though a present blessedness and a gracious prophecy, had no past ; it grew, it was not builded. It was planted ere man was placed in it ; no previous creature toil was involved, nor, in bringing it to perfection, was man in any sense "a fellow-laborer with God."

Not so as regards the city ; that may truly be described as the crystallization of a history at once most glorious and most terrible. Those mighty and resplendent walls! through what long ages of unremitting toil were they built up, with the blood of how noble an army of martyrs are their stones cemented, what rivers of tears have washed them smooth, and with what divinely-inspired patience of hope have they been polished till they thus reflect the glory of rising and setting suns! Those streets of gold! Did you ever think why they are said to be "as it were transparent glass?"

Ah! it is because of the awful fires of affliction, trial, and judgment through which even the fine gold had to pass ere it could form a pavement which angels almost fear to tread, and which even the once-pierced feet of Immanuel can touch without pollution. Those high towers, how often their bells sounded rejoicingly when some terrible enemy was overthrown, or some great deliverance vouchsafed! and tolled mournfully when famine stalked through the silent streets, or death laid low the noble and the good! though now the days of Zion's warfare are accomplished, and there shall be no use for bells save to sound over the rejoicing city the peal of everlasting jubilee.

Oh, how full of living memories is the city! and as the white-robed citizens welcome each new-comer and say to him, "Walk about Zion, and go round about her, tell the towers thereof : mark well her bulwarks, consider her palaces," how will they continually point out a spot forever associated with some terrible tragedy or some heroic deed, till house to house shall seem to utter speech, and the whole city reveals the entire history of man transfigured and glorified in the light of God's infinite wisdom, power, and love!

(To be concluded.)

THE CHILDREN'S CRUSADE.

By Rev. A. A. Ramsey.

IN the early summer of the year 1213 a strange-looking boy was noticed wandering from town to town in the southern provinces of France

He was not of the vagrant pauper class. His hand was never outstretched for alms. His voice never sank into the murmur of a beggar's whine.

Nor did he belong to any of the tribes of pilgrim mountebanks and strolling musicians so numerous in those days. He carried neither wizard's wand nor minstrel's harp. An unusual saintliness of mien distinguished him ; and wherever he went he chanted in reverent tones the solemn words, "Lord Jesus, give us back the Holy Cross!"

Occasionally he paused to engage in silent prayer ; but, with little intermission, his march was steadily pursued ; while with unwearying constancy and unabated fervor he reiterated the impassioned cry, "Lord Jesus, give us back the Holy Cross!"

Soon his presence in a neighborhood excited amazement and awe. He was hailed and revered as the messenger of Heaven. The village through which he condescended to pass was deemed more highly favored than if an angel had stood in its streets. The house wherein he lodged for a night was esteemed as blissful an abode as Eden.

But, after a while, alarm began to mingle with the wonder and awe which this strange youth everywhere excited. His example became as powerful and contagious as a plague. An appalling infatuation seized on all the boys of similar age. No sooner was his voice heard in any town or hamlet than out they rushed from their homes, mustered in his track, and accompanied him blindly whithersoever it pleased him to direct his course. Bolts and bars were useless to restrain them. Prayers and tears were unavailing to divert them from their purpose. From the moment that the spell of this strange leader came upon them, they hastened to forsake father, and mother, and all the dearest associations of life, that they might swell the train that thronged the enthusiast and chant with him, "Lord Jesus, give us back the Holy Cross!"

Boys came to him by scores, by hundreds, by thousands, until the ever-increasing host grew so vast that no city would consent to receive them within its walls.

Towards the shores of the Mediterranean Sea their leader pressed, reclining in a chariot lined with cloaks, and followed by an immense excited throng, who filled the air with their sonorous chant, "Lord Jesus, give us back the Holy Cross!"

In struggling for the coveted place nearest to the sacred car, and for the honor of touching a thread of their saintly leader's robe, the weaker among them were trampled to death ; and, in the end, all who took part in this fanatical crusade perished—mutilated and famished on the land or drowned in the sea.

This is an incident from the history of what are termed "the dark ages." It is our privilege to live in a more enlightened era.

The crusade of the "Holy Cross" was but idle pastime for the boys of those days. But what is needed to-day is a real crusade against evil in the name of the Lord Jesus Christ, "who gave Himself for our sins, that He might deliver us from this present evil world" (Gal. 1 : 3, 4).

Whispering over two Thousand Miles was a feat accomplished lately by Mr. Robert A. Packer, superintendent of the Pennsylvania Railroad, who for two hours conversed pleasantly with his wife and friends at Syra, Pa., by Edison's telephone. The party were at North End, Nebraska, and the wires of two companies being connected at Chicago, communication with Mr. Packer at Syra became easy. The distance between the two places is two thousand miles, but every whisper was distinctly audible.

This conversation with unseen friends illustrates the communion the Christian enjoys with Him whom having not seen he loves. (1 Pet. 1 : 8).

A WEIGHT OF WEALTH.

(Continued from p. 927.)

The King of Terrcrs.

"I WAS nearly sixty when my son was born," the dying man went on, "and my head was white as snow. People called me old then, but I felt like a lad. Aye! it was like being a lad again to have Charlie all in a frolic about me. He was a bolder, a merrier lad than thee. 'Ernest was born to be a parson, with no spirit in him,' I said; and Charlie was born to be a roistering squire. Charlie could never have turned out a milksop."

"He was very brave and bold," said Ernest in a soothing tone.

"I doted on every hair of his head," he moaned; "it's cruel of him to forsake his old father—cruel and thankless. I have cursed him hundreds of times for it. How long is it since he went away, and we've never heard a word of him, good or bad?"

"Four years last September," he answered.

"Four years last September! And the rascal knows I'm over eighty-three! He doesn't care to see his old father's face again. Yet I was very good to him. You've been more like a son to me, Ernest, though there's not a drop of my blood in your veins. I've all along said you were like a son to me, and I swore to make you a son in my will. All the neighbors know that.

"'Ernest Wren shall be my heir, and take the name of Clifford,' I've said wherever I went. 'I'll cut the runaway off with a shilling,' I've said, and he deserves it. All the country knows. 'If he isn't at home before I die, he shall rue it,' I've said. Church, market, and everywhere, I've said the same words. Ought I to stick to them, Ernest? Would God Almighty be angry if I broke my word? Is there aught in the Bible about keeping fast by one's bitter curses?"

He had raised himself upon his pillows, and stretched his yellow, shrivelled face toward Ernest, with a passion of anxiety in every line of it. A vehement struggle was going on in his mind. He dared not, on the very threshold of the unseen world, commit any fresh offence that might endanger his own welfare there; yet he could not bear to keep his bitter threats against his only son.

It was a moment of fierce inward conflict with Ernest also. He knew well that Charles had been disinherited, and he himself put in his place, and all his future in this life depended upon his next word. Yet he stood there as a minister of Christ to teach the dying man all he would receive of divine truth.

"On the contrary," he said distinctly and slowly, "God requires of you to forgive every one that has trespassed against you. It is your bounden duty to pardon your son."

"Ah, I do, I do!" cried the old man with a sudden burst of tears and sobs. "Oh, I forgive him! I love him! I dote upon him still, Ernest! He must be my son again. I believe now in God Almighty, if He orders me to forgive my own son. I was afraid I must stick to my word and my curses. Oh, God bless you, Charlie! my boy, my son!"

He had fallen back upon his pillows, and lay shaking with sobs. Ernest's face was pale and set as he waited for this paroxysm to pass over. "Forgive, and ye shall be forgiven," he said, after a painful effort to speak clearly. "'For if ye forgive men their trespasses, your heavenly Father will also forgive you.' 'Be ye kind one to another, tender-hearted, forgiving one another, even as God, for Christ's sake, has forgiven you.'" Ernest felt as if he was reading the words of some solemn sacrament. Death had not yet lost its sacred mystery for him.

Old Charles Clifford lay still for a quarter of an hour to recover his strength for further speech after his fit of sobbing was over. But Ernest did not move away. He stood with his arms folded and his head bowed down, waiting in profound patience for the next word of the dying lips, though the pause seemed intolerably long.

"Ernest," he said at last, opening his dim-sighted eyes, "you know I made a will after Charlie ran away, making you my son. It's in the old cabinet there, and my will when he was born, leaving it all to him. I meant to burn the new one the very day he came home again; but he's never come! Here's the key; bring them both to me. I'll burn it now, because I've forgiven him from the bottom of my heart, for he's my only son, born when I was sixty years of age; and why should I leave what I've got to another man's son?"

He muttered the last words to himself; but Ernest's ear caught every one of them. He found the key mechanically, and unlocked the cabinet door. In a drawer within lay two packets, tied and sealed. His hand shook a little as he took them out, and he dropped them hastily on the old man's bed, as though the very touch of them was a pain to him.

With crooked, palsied fingers the dying man took them up, and looked at them through his bleared eyes. "Call your mother in," he said sharply and suspiciously. Ernest hastened to the door and called aloud, without leaving the room. She was not far away, and the next moment she was standing by her husband's bed.

"Take this packet," he said to her, "and drop it in the fire, and let me see it burn away to a cinder. Ernest, you put this one back in its safe place. That's my last will, and you can testify I'm of sound mind."

It was four o'clock in the morning when Ernest left Clifford Grange to return to his own home. Old Charles Clifford was dead, and his death had been a depressing one, so completely had the selfishness of his nature displayed itself, even in the solemn hour of passing away. A stormy wind was driving the thin clouds hurriedly across the sky, where the waning moon shone out now and then with a fitful and watery light. He could not see the sea along the deep lane he was treading, with tall hedgerows on each side; but the moan of it filled the silent air of the night, mingling with the rush of the wind through the leafless trees overhead.

There was no other sound except his own lingering and tardy footsteps. He turned round, and stood longer than he was aware of, gazing at the gabled front of the Grange which stood on the brow of a low rocky hill, with the sheltering cliffs behind, its high roof and strong stacks of chimneys looking black in the fitful moonlight. He knew every stone of the pile of building. It had been the only home he had ever known, though he had had but a step-son's place in it. He had never forgiven his mother for marrying old Charles Clifford; but he had long ago acknowledged the advantages that had accrued to him because of it.

But were they real advantages? he asked himself at this moment. Mr. Clifford had given him a college education, and bestowed upon him the small living in his gift. He had drifted into taking orders and becoming a clergyman, because his step-father, with his strong and domineering will, had so ordered it. But who could tell him what he might have become, by his own exertions, had his mother remained a poor widow?

His heart felt very sore as he stood gazing at the black gabled roof of the Grange. He had just been passing through a vehement struggle with a strong temptation; and his victory, so far from making him feel triumphant, had left him depressed and disappointed. He had wished in his inmost heart that it had not fallen to his lot to impress upon the conscience of the dying man the duty of pardoning his graceless son. He had seen the will destroyed which would have made him master of the estate, Clifford of Clifford, in the place of his half-brother. It had been promised to him scores of times, with many an oath; and although he had always disclaimed the promise, even to himself, the hope had unconsciously sprung up in his heart that some day the old place, so dear to him and so little cared for by Charles, might become his own.

It was true that he had been a better son to the old man than Charles had ever been. H had worked for him, submitted to him, carri out his schemes, and waited dutifully upon h whims year after year, whilst Charles had act like the spoiled scapegrace that he was. H had mocked at his father, assiduously oppos him in his plans, done his best to supplant hi and at last deserted him in his old age; yet n Charles was to come into the kingdom, be t young squire, and squander away the money h father had accumulated, simply because he h been born to it, whilst he who had acted the be ter part must go back, for the remainder of t long life stretching before him, to the sm vicarage and scanty stipend of his seaboard pa ish, so ignorant he still was of the deep trut "A man's life consisteth not in the abundance the things which he possesseth" (Luke 12:15

Until now he had not felt deeply discontent with his position, but he had not known befo how much he was unconsciously building up his stepfather's reiterated promises. It was st three hours before the break of day, yet he f reluctant to go home and wake up his elde maid servant to admit him into his cheerle house. It was better out here in the stillness the night, for there was no sleep possible whi thoughts were hurrying faster than the flyi clouds overhead through his wakeful brain. I could hardly confess to himself that his mo was any thing more than the depressing a weary sadness of witnessing the passing aw into impenetrable mystery of an utterly selfish a unenlightened soul.

Slowly he turned his back upon Cliffo Grange, and slowly he paced the long deep la which led down to the little fishing villa where every house was closed and no sign of l was to be seen. The cottages were all r homesteads to him, every one of whose inmat he had known from boyhood; and now that was their pastor, he was not wilfully neglect of his duties to them, distasteful as they were him.

Ernest delighted in dwelling amongst peo whom he knew closely. Possibly the absence any strong home affection had made him mo dependent upon the good will of the outer cir of neighbors. He was very popular with his rishioners, though few of the rough men co overcome their reluctance to attend the chur which they were accustomed to look upon a safe and warm shelter for women folk, and such among themselves as had grown too rh matic to brave all weathers on the beach.

From this little strip of shingly beach, wh the boats were now lying above high-wa mark, a narrow and somewhat dangerous p wound upward, round the face of a rock t stood well out to sea, on the highest point which stood a little light-house. Long ago, some far-away dark age, it had been a sm chapel or chantry belonging to an abbey so miles inland; and it looked still like a dimi tive church, with its low porch and dwarf squ belfry, which now held the lantern burn brightly toward the sea. Ernest knew very w that this spot was the favorite haunt of his s faring parishioners on a Sunday, and he felt wonder or resentment at it.

It was dark, for the faint ray of the wan moon hardly touched the glistening whiten of the foam as the sea roared and broke i flecks upon the rocks below; and he co scarcely trace the black outline of the cliff stret ing on each side of the "Lantern Hill," as it called. But he had no need to see the fami prospect. He could name every crag and he land on either side; and as the strong weste breeze blew the spray into his face, he knew most to a foot how high the tide had risen the jagged rocks beneath him.

He sat down on a rude seat under the lig house tower, turning a sad-set face to the d sea. Why, he asked himself at this mom had he suffered himself to be over-persuaded his mother, and coerced by his step-father, drifted by circumstances, into entering Church? His heart was not in his work.

ischarged his duties conscientiously, and would t wilfully omit one of his obligations; but ey were a weariness, not a delight, to him. s desire was for other pursuits. When the en about him talked of their fishing and farmig, their horses and their boats, he could enter sily and cordially into their interests; but when ey were dying, and looked to him to give them mfort and counsel for their souls, he was at a s. He had found himself tongue-tied and emirrassed at his step-father's death-bed. It ought t to have been so.

Perchance if he had himself had more love of d and knowledge of Jesus Christ, he might ve awakened some answering emotion in the parting spirit, and it would have passed into other world with less of earth's ignorance and rdness about it. He felt bowed down by his ise of unfitness for his office. There had been nes before this when the same wretched despondency had breathed over him, but now he d fallen into a dark and deep degree of it. If had been what he ought to be as a minister Christ, would his step-father have gone from s life in so dense an ignorance of the charact of God, and the nature of the revelation rist had come to bring? (Heb. 9 : 12).

But irksome as the yoke was, he must bear it. ere had been a half-dream in his mind of givig up his living to his old friend Britton, if the ate should ever come to him. It amazed and imed him to discover how active had been anticipations of supplanting his half-brother; what freedom there would have been in it for nself! How well he could have filled the offi of owner and master, squire and magistrate! arles would do mischief in each of these sitions—Charles, the ignorant, reckless spendift, as selfish as his father, with low habits dering on vices. Ernest had always despised arles while he envied him. He had continuy drawn comparisons between them, and in these comparisons his own character and conct stood out well; yet Charles was to be mas of Clifford!

At last Ernest roused himself from his long verie, stood up shivering, and lifted his soft cap m his head, to let the keen sea-breeze cool his obbing temples. The thoughts that had ssed through his mind he could utter to no n; and he must guard himself against enterning them again, even as passing guests. It s a poor man's life he was going back to, omed to it for the remainder of his days; for Charles came into unconditional possession it s little help his mother would get from her unger son, and she would become an adional burden upon him.

Two hundred a year was the full value of his le living. Poverty had not yet looked in rough his window, for old Charles Clifford's de would not have brooked the idea of any e belonging to him being in low condition; now Charles was master he would spend all himself in riotous living. His step-father's t coherent words haunted him as he retraced way homeward: "Ernest has always been a od son to me; I wish I'd done something for n, but it's too late now."

Ernest's vicarage was built in the shadow of church—a small, low house, not much better in the best of the village dwellings; yet such it was he had been content with it until his unger brother disappeared, and his step-father entatiously and continually proclaimed him r to Clifford Grange. Since then he had, unares to himself, looked upon it as a merely porary abode which answered his purpose ll enough till he could move into a larger habition. Now it must be his home for life, for nest had no desire to quit Clifford, for which felt an almost passionate love, and no ambin apart from his beloved village tempted him. had never left it as a boy without suffering m that strange malady, half physical and half ntal, which we call homesickness; and to be ished from it altogether would have seemed him like tearing up his life by the roots.

(To be continued.)

THE HEAVENLY CITY.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 14th. Rev. 21 : 21; 22 : 5.
Golden Text, Heb. 11 : 10. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

THE golden text for to-day opens up our subject by telling us that the man whose faith constituted him the father of all them that believe "looked for a city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God;" and in this expectation he, and the heirs with him of the same promise, "confessed that they were strangers and pilgrims on the earth" (Heb. 11 : 13). What then are the foundations of the city? "Other foundation can no man lay than that is laid—Jesus Christ" (1 Cor. 3 : 11). But the wall of the city had twelve foundations, and in them the names of the twelve apostles of the Lamb." And again, Paul writes (Eph. 2 : 20), "Ye are built upon the foundation of the apostles and prophets, Jesus Christ being the head corner-stone."

It would seem as though the city were built of "living stones"—i.e., redeemed souls," but some representative stones, the apostles and prophets, are with their Lord, foundation stones on which the weight of the building rests.

But what then is this city of which we are speaking? Does it exist now, or will it be in the future? We read in Rev. 21 : 2: "I John saw the holy city, new Jerusalem, coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband." And again (vers. 9, 10): "There came unto me one of the seven angels . . . saying, Come hither, I will shew thee the bride, the Lamb's wife. And He carried me away in the Spirit to a great and high mountain, and showed me that great city, the holy Jerusalem, descending out of heaven from God, having the glory of God." Thus we see that the city is the glorified church of Christ, the bride of the Lamb.

The apostle says (ver. 22), "And I saw no temple therein; for the Lord God Almighty and the Lamb are the temple of it." Here on earth we make distinctions between exterior and interior worship. There are none such in heaven; there is no outward and inward there: there every thought will be worship, and His presence the holy place. David said, "One thing have I desired of the Lord; that will I seek after: that I may dwell in the house of the Lord all the days of my life, to behold the beauty of the Lord, and to inquire in His temple." David, thy prayer shall be answered them. Have we David's longing? If not, how can we wish for a life of constant adoration in heaven?

"The city had no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine in it: for the glory of God did lighten it, and the Lamb is the light thereof." Just what God's children now experience in their souls, the light-giving presence of God which discovers and detects all things, which puts every thing in a true light, and before which nothing can remain hidden; this will be the light of that city which is called the bride, the Lamb's wife. Now are we shrinking from being stripped and laid bare by our faithful God? do we dread to find out our sins? have we a sensitive care for our reputation before men like Saul, who said (1 Sam. 15 : 30), "I have sinned, yet honor me now, I pray thee, before the elders of my people, and before Israel." Is it not patent to all who reflect about it, that if we cannot endure the searching eye of God here, and if we shrink from His all-discovering light, then we are not honest in desiring to spend all eternity in the very fulness of its blaze.

We read on, "And the nations of them which are saved shall walk in the light of it, and the kings of the earth do bring their glory and honor unto it." Here it is clear that in the time of the millennium, after the marriage of the Lamb has been consummated, the church in glory will be made a blessing to those living upon the earth. It is not quite easy to understand the expression, "The nations of them which are saved." Does it mean saved from the great time of tribulation? or does it mean those who have received salvation from their sins? In any case the church which (in Gal. 4 : 25, 26) the Apostle Paul contrasts the Jerusalem which now is with the future church glorified, and says, "Jerusalem which is above is free, which is the mother of us all;" and he quotes (ver. 27) from Isa. 54, applying distinctly to the church of Christ, what is there prophesied of Jerusalem, her fruitfulness, her return from widowhood, her union with Christ as her Spouse: "For thy Maker is thine Husband; the Lord of hosts is His name." And oh, how blessed is the promise with which that chapter closes, "No weapon that is formed against thee shall prosper; and every tongue that shall rise against thee in judgment thou shalt condemn. This is the heritage of the servants of the Lord, and their righteousness is of Me, saith the Lord."

And this heritage is ours while the city is building, while the stones are being hewn out of the quarry and prepared by the various dispensations of God's providence and love for their place in the building; for the city as yet has no existence but in the plans of the great Builder. That which is important for us is to know what are our privileges and responsibilities during the time which elapses until the bride shall be fully adorned for her husband. First, are we living stones? Have we left the quarry of our own natural self-life? Are we one with God about His purpose, to appropriate us as an integral part of His church, so that we have renounced all will about ourselves? do we exist for Him alone, and do we act as though we did?

We find in the words chosen for our subject what is the character of the city: "The street of the city was pure gold, as it were transparent glass. Transparent—this is the true character of such as are walking in the light. Any thing which is opaque intercepts the view. Self is opaque. If any one would see Christ through us, they must be unable to see any thing of self in us.

Then "the gates of it shall not be shut at all by day; for there shall be no night there." There is no enemy to guard against, there is no need for rest; every effort strengthens, no lassitude, no weariness, no fear. "And there shall in no wise enter into it any thing that defileth, neither whatsoever worketh abomination or maketh a lie: but they which are written in the Lamb's book of life." Why should a lie be mentioned more than any other sin? Because every sin comes from a lie about ourselves or a lie about God? "He that doeth truth cometh to the light," etc. (John 3 : 21). Oh, how strong is the call to be pure from all sin, to have and to maintain a conscience "void of offence toward God and toward man!"

We read next of the "pure river of the water of life proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb," and the tree of life, forbidden after the fall, is here growing again. Death had entered Eden, and the tree of life must be guarded by a flaming sword; but life reigns in the new Jerusalem, and the tree of life reappears, bearing twelve names of fruits, yielding her fruit every month; and "the leaves of the tree were for the healing of the nations." Healing will be as general there as hopeless, incurable sickness is now. "The inhabitant shall not say, I am sick; the people that dwell therein shall be forgiven their iniquity" (Isa. 33 : 24). "And there shall be no more curse." Sickness, sorrow, death, are curses in themselves, but then all these things which come of sin shall be forever done away.

Then "the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it;" no disputed sway. "And His servants shall serve Him: and they shall see His face, and His name shall be in their foreheads." What kind of service? Could He train us here in work with souls, except it were to practise there some mission to lost worlds or races? But that will be service in the light, whereas now it is often in the dark; now we know in part both the condition of others and the mind of God · these shall He know even as also we are known. "And there shall be no night there; and they need no candle, neither light of the sun; for the Lord God giveth them light: and they shall reign forever and ever."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Agitation in Ireland continues with unabated energy. Meetings are being held to protest against the arrest of the three speakers at the Gurteen meeting, and though the leaders in their public speeches advise the people to keep within the law, the country abounds with evidence that a different interpretation is put upon their language. Threatening notices and acts of violence are the practical comments upon their words. "These," says the London Times, "are evil omens for the winter, which is beginning to be felt." A disquieting characteristic of the demonstrations has been observed everywhere, but is more noticeable in Sligo than at other places, which is that the processionists exhibit a certain military order and discipline evidently the result of training.

Lord Beaconsfield has had a consultation with Mr. Callan, an Irish Member of Parliament, and conferred with him on a scheme for effecting some alleviation in Irish distress. It appears that the wet weather which prevailed during last summer has rendered unfit for use, the peat used by the Irish peasantry for fuel, and the Government scheme is to send a large quantity of coal to Irish ports to be sold at cost price.

The Marriage of the Young King of Spain to the Archduchess Marie Christine of Austria was celebrated at Madrid November 29th. The troubles domestic and regal which have assailed Alphonso XII. since he ascended the Spanish throne have attracted to him general public sympathy, and that of a more personal character than usually falls to the lot of monarchs. It is not yet two years since he was married to his cousin the Princess Mercedes, whom he tenderly loved. A brief period of five months' happiness flew past, and at its close he was a mourner at his wife's obsequies. A scarcely less bitter pang rent the young man's heart when, a short time afterwards, the sister of his late wife also died. The double blow prostrated him, and it is rumored that but for urgent reasons of state having regard to the future tranquillity of Spain, induced him to again enter wedlock.

The young Queen is described as being exceedingly attractive in appearance and manner, and is said to have won the hearts of those who have come in contact with her.

A Lady Nurse in War.—One of the English ladies who have been engaged in the self-imposed mission of tending the sick and the wounded in South Africa writes: "My boots are worn out; my dresses remind me of a tramp's, being merely held together by one or two patches of a different color; my under-linen is threadbare; my boots are worn out, so I think I shall soon go about barefooted like the Kaffirs. I cannot describe half the amusing shifts we are put to, such as rolling pastry with the broom-handle or a bottle, and drinking tea out of a condensed milk tin; cooking our food on three bars over a wood fire, which, when the wind is in a particular way, makes one's eyes smart as if one had been crying; to say nothing of being obliged to wait till the dinner is cooked, for fear of its being stolen by dogs or Kaffirs. At one station there were but two nurses for one hundred patients."

A Tragical Incident which Occurred in Switzerland last month is another instance of sin leading to despair and misery. The London Telegraph of November 15th states that a young doctor, recently appointed to the post of town physician in a Swiss bourg, had for some years previous to his appointment lived a life of sin with the wife of a friend. Shortly after his appointment, however, he contracted a matrimonial alliance with a young lady of respectable family, and was just starting upon his wedding trip with his bride, when the partner of his guilt appeared in the station, and flung herself down upon the rails as the train commenced to move. The engine passed over her body, mangling it horribly, and the bridegroom was summoned in his medical capacity to the spot where the unfortunate woman's mutilated remains had been deposited. Unnerved by the terrible sight, he uttered a loud cry, and fell upon the platform in a state of insensibility. Some of the bystanders acquainted his bride with the cause of the suicide commited almost before her eyes, whereupon she turned with loathing from the senseless form of her husband. She at once went back to her father's house, leaving him to the indignation of the crowd assembled in the railway station, who tried to lynch him; and he was rescued with great difficulty by the police and station officers. To complete the horrors of this dismal story, the husband of the unfortunate lady who perished under the wheels of the locomotive, went raving mad upon hearing of her awful death and its cause, and is at present the inmate of a lunatic asylum. When will men and women learn that "the end of those things is death"? (Romans 6 : 21.)

In the South American War a Victory has been won by the forces of Chili. Telegrams from Valparaiso announce that a fierce engagement was fought near Iquique about November 15th, when the Chilians were completely victorious. The defeat of the allied forces is described as crushing. This victory gives the Chilians command of the Peruvian coast from Pisaqua to Iquique, and destroys all possibility of Peru and Bolivia recovering the territory which is in dispute. A Peruvian army of 11,000 men was reported to be advancing in the rear of the Chilian forces, but this movement was probably suspended, as it could not overtake them in time to provoke a diversion in favor of the allied forces in the neighborhood of Iquique. The Chilians may now menace Arica, and even attack Callao and Lima.

"The Most Extraordinary Railroad in the world, perhaps," says the London Echo, "has now been completed. It is a line up the slopes of Mount Vesuvius, from the level of the Neapolitan Bay to the very edge of the crater. The construction of the line, of course, has been peculiar; it is laid upon a solid pavement of masonry, believed to be perfectly secure from the overflows on either side of lava; there is no locomotive, but a powerful traction engine at either end, and the methods of draught are by steel ropes working on grooved wheels; and should these break there is scarcely a possibility of the train receding downwards at a dangerous pace or to any considerable distance. Comparatively inexpensive as the construction of this miniature railway is, it may prove an exceedingly profitable speculation, considering the perpetually increasing numbers of tourists from the New World and all parts of the Old who flock to that scene and centre of historical marvels."

Dead Sea Products.—A French Company is said to have been recently formed for the purpose of utilizing the products of the Dead Sea. An engineer last May visited the ground, to report upon the feasibility of procuring from its waters and shores natron, salt, petroleum, sulphur, and other chemical substances, to be brought by a small steamboat to the north-west shore, near Jericho, and thence to be carried to the Mediterranean Sea at Joppa. At the same point on the sea a small factory will be put up, to reduce crude materials to pure and more compact state. Should the scheme assume a practical shape it will do much to bring about that development of trade with the Eastern shores of the Mediterranean which the study of prophecy leads us to expect.

Eugenie, Ex-Empress of the French, has suffered another bereavement. Her mother died at Madrid November 21st. The ex-Empress was then on her way to visit her. She applied to the French Government through the British Embassy for permission to pass through Paris, and the permission was readily granted. It must have been a sad visit to the scenes of her youth and gayety. A cable despatch says: "Her Majesty started for the Orleans station at seven. The party drove rapidly through the streets, and it was noticed that the Empress, seeming to be wholly absorbed in her thoughts, never glanced at the familiar spots where the happy days of her life were spent. Most of those who saw her face compared its former beauty, so well remembered, with the wan and haggard look that it wore now. Indeed, the Empress is changed beyond the expression of words. Her form is bent and she is prematurely old."

Fatal Fire in a Theatre.—The Toronto Grand Opera House was totally destroyed by fire November 29th. The conflagration was first noticed by a policeman, who immediately gave an alarm. When the Fire Brigade reached the spot, a few minutes afterward, the building was one mass of flame. The firemen had no sooner got to work than they noticed a man lodged behind a chimney on the roof. The man was instantly rescued from his perilous position. He proved to be Thomas Scott, the gas engineer of the theatre who occupied a room on the top flat. In accents of agony and horror he told the firemen that there were three people in the room from which he had escaped. The firemen attempted to reach the window of this room by means of ladders, but were driven back by the intense heat and the three unfortunate persons perished in the fire. Their bodies were recovered after the fire had been got under, but they were charred to an unrecognizable mass.

Death of Prince Alamayu.—This young man who was the son of the late King Theodore o Abyssinia, died November 14th, at Leeds, England, of pleurisy, at the age of nineteen. At th capture of Magdala, the capital of Abyssinia, in 1869, he was brought into the English camp with his mother, who was at that time dying of consumption, and before she expired she handed th child over to the care of Captain Speke, afterwards called by the prince "Father Speke," whi acted as his guardian until the captain's unfortunate death by being shot through the accidenta discharge of his gun while climbing over a stil on a shooting excursion. Prince Alamayu (th meaning of which is "I've seen the world") wa then sent by the English Government, whose war he became, to Rugby. Two months ago he was removed to finish his education at Professor Ransome's residence in Leeds, where he was attacke by broncho-pleuro-pneumonia from a violen cold. He was sensible to the last moment, an quite reconciled to his fate. Shortly before h death he remarked that he was not afraid to di

The Wave of Infidelity Sweeps On.—Pro Van Oosterzee, an evangelical professor in Ho land, recently declared: "A wave of infidelit is steadily advancing over Protestant Europ and not even the most favored country will e cape it. They have had it in Germany, and no we have it in Holland; they are beginning to g it in Scotland. In twenty years they will hav it to the full, and all their theology will not sav them." There is reason to fear the profess is right, but the Bible-reading habits and stron practical piety of Scottish Christians, we ma hope, will be used by God to stem the flood.

Spurgeon's Autograph Album; containing tl Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's and Mrs. Spurgeon's aut graphs, may be obtained at 63 Bible House, through any bookseller. Price 75 cents. The Swo and Trowel says: "Our young friends delight possessing birthday albums, and here is one which fit for a queen. We will say nothing of the conten but the binding is simply gorgeous. . . . This a dainty birthday present, and is equal to any th have gone before it; we think we might venture say that it is second to none. Facsimiles of the a tographs of the pastor and his wife are given in the proper places."

The following works by the same eminent preach may also be obtained at the CHRISTIAN HERA Office, 63 Bible House:

"The Treasury of David." Containing an Ori nal Exposition of the Book of Psalms; a Collecti of Illustrative Extracts from the whole range of Lit ature; a series of Homiletical Hints upon alm every verse; and list of writers upon each Psal Five volumes. Price, per vol., $3.

"John Ploughman's Talk; or, Plain Advice Plain People." Price, cloth, 60 cents; paper c ers, 40 cents.

"The Metropolitan Tabernacle Pulpit." Fi Sermons. Preached and revised during the y 1878. Price $2.50.

A remittance must accompany every order.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

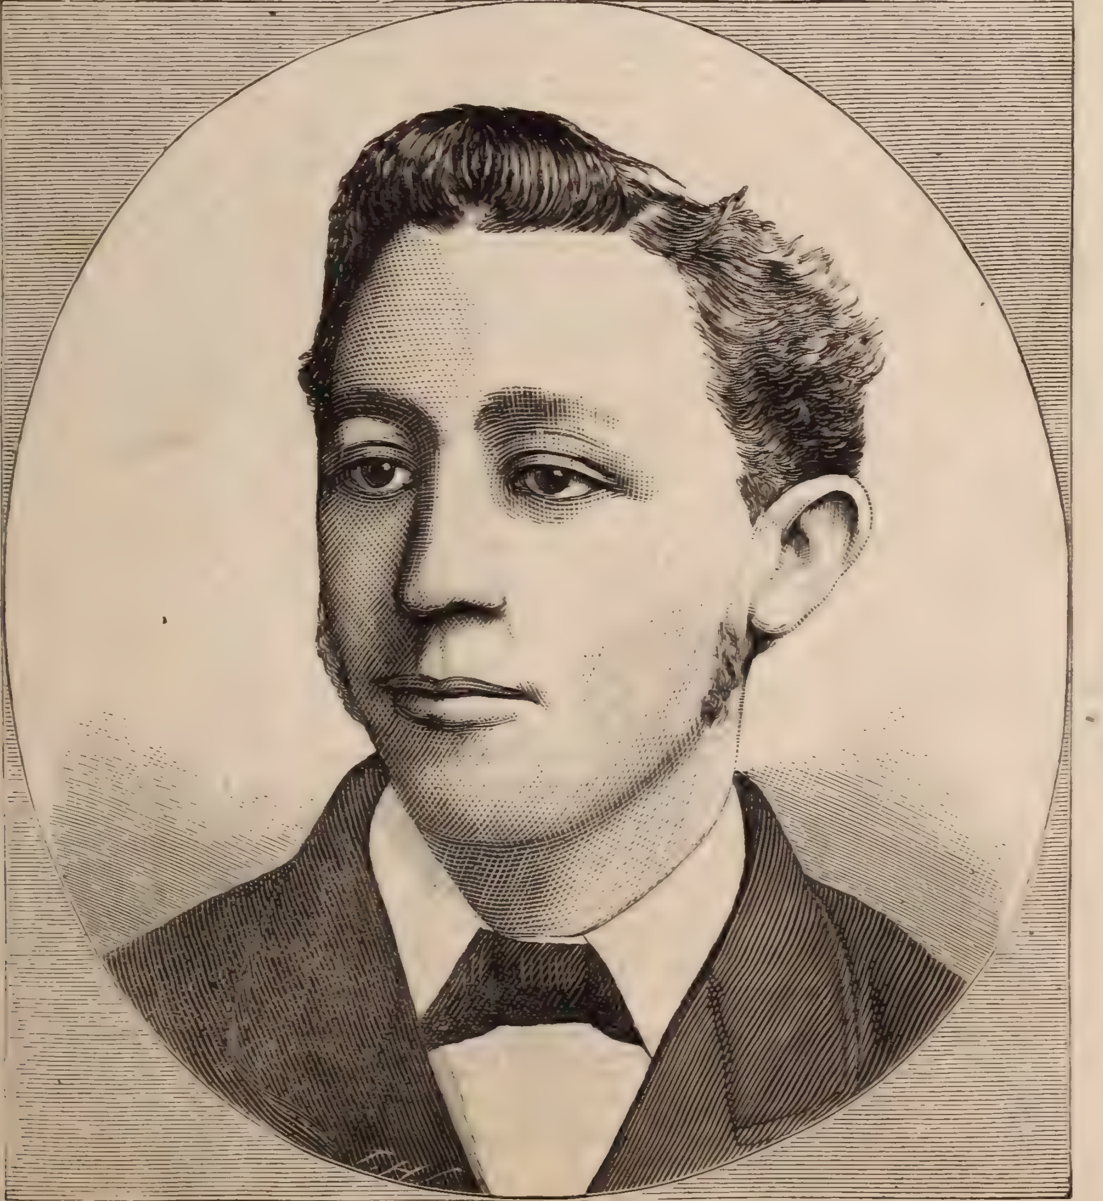
Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

is Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, or some other Em ent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc. The Circulation is 165,000 Copies.

ngle Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, DECEMBER 11, 1879. 13th Year. No. 60—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAIT OF REV. CHARLES SPURGEON, with Sketch of His Life.
T DISPOSITION OF CHRIST. A New Sermon by Talmage.
Important Announcement by Dr. Talmage.
AROLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE. A Thrilling ial Story by the Author of "Felicia Cuffe."
THE ELDER BROTHER. A Sermon by Rev. Chas. F. Deems, D.D., LL.D.
CURRENT EVENTS: Meeting of Congress—Attempt to Assassinate the Czar of Russia—Another Arrest in Ireland—Fire in a Hospital—A Desirable Madness—Death of a Whole Ship's Crew—A Lady's Hair Given Away—Tobacco in School—Boy Pirates, etc.
MARVELLOUS ANSWER TO PRAYER.
THE DROMEDARIES. A New Sermon by Rev. C H. Spurgeon.
Man's First and Last Home. (Concluded.)
ROMANISM AND THE COMMON SCHOOLS.
Scenes of Inhuman Barbarity in Russia.
A WEIGHT OF WEALTH. A New Serial Story. (Continued.)
The Last Words. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.



REV. CHARLES SPURGEON, One of the Twin Sons of Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

REV. CHARLES SPURGEON.

His Birth, Early Education, and Membership in the Band of Hope—His Conversion—His Baptism with His Brother—His First Evangelistic Work in Chatham Road, Wandsworth Common—He enters the Pastor's College—Called to be Pastor at Greenwich.

Charles Spurgeon was born in Nightingale Lane, Balham, in the environs of London, on September 20th, 1856. He is one of the twin sons of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, the foremost preacher of the age, and who has been called by Carlyle "the last of the Puritans." Thomas, the other twin son, who, it will be remembered by our readers, was the subject of a portrait and biography in this paper on May 15th this year, has lately returned to Australia for three years for the benefit of his health.

The progress of these two young preachers is wonderfully promising, and bids fair to maintain in its honored position that name which among so many Christian families has become a household word.

At the age of nine, Charles, with his brother Thomas, was invited to a public meeting at the Metropolitan Tabernacle, convened by the United Kingdom Band of Hope, in January, 1865. He said, before the numerous congregation, that he had always been an abstainer, and, amidst cheering, was presented with a silver medal as a memorial of this event. In the cause of temperance he has since labored heartily, and to the present moment his interest in that noble work remains unabated.

Charles Spurgeon was educated at Camden House School, Brighton. Here he was noted as a cricketer, and one of the most active in every sport. Although not so distinguished as his brother in the scholastic department, he nevertheless always acquitted himself honorably, and succeeded in obtaining some handsome prizes.

After a creditable course of study, school was quitted by the brothers in 1874. They returned to Balham, and prepared for the great business of life. Here their pathways, which had hitherto run from infancy in the same direction, began to diverge. Thomas took the route of art, and attained some considerable proficiency in engraving; while Charles, whose perseverance was combined with a firm will, entered the office of a City shipping firm.

Charles Spurgeon's conversion took place while he was living at Brighton. He was riding a blind pony, and was accompanied by a Christian friend. Their conversation turned into a religious channel. It came on to rain, and they sought shelter under a tree. Charles dismounted, and they both knelt down upon the grass, while his friend offered up a prayer. It was during this short season of communion that the glorious sunshine of truth broke in upon his young heart, and his warm affections and services were henceforth devoted to his Lord. This was the turning-point, to which the religious and prayerful home training of him had long been leading up.

Both the brothers were baptized together about that period by their father in the Metropolitan Tabernacle, and unitedly admitted into church fellowship. Following upon this step came the desire to prosecute some work for the Lord. This was sought prayerfully, and when found, was earnestly followed out in heartfelt dependence for wisdom and strength upon Him who is the "rewarder of all those who diligently seek Him."

The early training of these youths was singularly advantageous, and they enjoyed home privileges which peculiarly fitted them for the ministry.

The cry raised from Macedonia, long ages past, "Come over and help us," was raised from a little mission in the densely populated neighborhood of Chatham Road, Wandsworth Common, and reached Nightingale Lane, where it was readily responded to by the twin brothers. They visited this place and found that meetings were being held in the cottage of a gardener, Mr. Rides, who was somewhat at a loss to find speakers, and through whose efforts, extending over a period of years, this mission was established. This good man was universally respected and esteemed among his neighbors; and his zeal and untiring energy proved a very effectual help to the cause.

Here they labored together, and soon the project of erecting a chapel, formed originally by Mr. Rides, was taken in hand by the two brothers. It was nearly completed when ill-health compelled Mr. Thomas Spurgeon to sail for Australia. In the little mission-room a farewell meeting was held. The place was crowded, and the meeting very affecting. The expressions of love and sincere admiration from these humble but earnest Christians must, indeed, have been gratifying to him, as a proof that the evangelistic work had not been unsuccessful.

Left to pursue this work alone, Mr. Charles Spurgeon felt the increase of labor it entailed. He was then in business, and besides the services on Sunday he held two, and often three, week-night meetings.

At last the commodious and comfortable building was finished, and duly opened by a sermon preached within its walls by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon. The labors of his son Charles were thus augmented. He had the sole care of this chapel; the only assistance he received was rendered by a young friend in some minor affairs.

Although his father never sought to persuade him to become a preacher, doubtless it was an answer to many prayers breathed by the parents when Charles felt constrained to withdraw from commercial pursuits, to enter the Pastor's College, with a view to the ministry, in 1877.

Here, on account of his superior education, he speedily became one of the first scholars, adding to the Latin and Greek, in which he was already proficient, Hebrew and general theological studies.

In the meanwhile it became evident that he was pre-eminently suited for a wider sphere of Gospel work than that of Chatham Road Chapel. The congregations could not be large in so small a chapel; and although he did not use long words or eloquent similes which were above the intellectual capacities of his hearers, yet his sermons were manifestly suited for a more educated class.

Upon leaving this sphere of work he, with Mr. Thomas Spurgeon (who had now returned from Australia), was presented by the congregation with a handsome testimonial, consisting of twenty-two volumes of theological works.

Occasionally he had preached sermons in different parts of England, which were attended with great success, very many souls being converted. Among other places he visited, were Cambridge, Oxford, the Isle of Wight, and several of the large manufacturing towns. All this blessing portended for him a position which has since been realized.

In 1879 he received a call from the congregation at South Street, Greenwich. He had preached there once or twice, and at each service the handsome structure was crowded. The call was, after prayerful deliberation, accepted, and Mr. Charles Spurgeon entered upon his first pastorate this autumn, at the age of twenty-three.

The church to which he was called had relapsed into a lukewarm and indifferent state, the numbers being few and no pastor at its head. These difficulties Mr. Spurgeon saw and grappled with. The battle against indifference was gained, and he has been greatly blessed by the Holy Spirit to the salvation of many souls in Greenwich. The building, which was nearly empty, is now filled with nearly a thousand hearers.

Some sceptical people (and where are they not?) expressed an opinion that the crowds were drawn by the magic of his father's name, and that the excitement would only prove a nine-days' wonder. Subsequent events have shown how groundless were their opinions and baseless their expectations.

We feel assured that Mr. Charles Spurgeon has a future of great usefulness before him. He is a popular preacher, because simple, fervent, and evangelical. At times his disco warms into the rich glow of an unconstrai and natural poetry. The chief characteristic his sermons are their very practical turn, an earnestness of manner which seldom fails to m the hearts of his hearers. We trust that readers will pray for the Holy Spirit to upon him and his Gospel ministrations.

The presence of his son in London is a g comfort and encouragement to the Rev. C Spurgeon during his stay at Mentone, wher has gone for rest and renewal of strength, a ready announced in this journal.

The following cheerful letter from him ir retirement will be of interest to all. It is dressed—

To my Church, Congregation, and Sermon Readers.

Dear Friends: During my absence you pect to hear from me by means of a little no the end of the weekly sermon. The kindl terest which suggests this expectation is precious to me, and therefore I will not d point it. I would run the risk of being egot cal rather than treat Christian affection coldness. There is none too much of it ir world, and where it survives it deserves t cultivated. More than most men I am fav with brotherly love, and I am most grateful f

I have commenced a short period of re this delightful region. Taking the advic physicians, I left before rheumatic affections prostrated me, and I am in hope that I sh this genial climate escape my usual attack. gather strength, and then return in the m of January fortified to endure the rest o winter. On former occasions the major pa my vacation has been spent in slowly recov from weakness of body and depression of s but this time I trust it will be used in gath thoughts and storing force for future use. for me that it may be so, for I would fain on the work of the Lord without the serious drances caused by the sicknesses of former y

Dear friends at home, I entreat you suffer ing to decline. Cheer by your presence who preach for me. Keep up the prayer-ings and the week-night services, and sustai offering for the College, which is at pr somewhat behind. It will need more tha ($194) each week to make up the £1879.

The weekly sermon is always carefully pre by me, and it will not be less interesting be it does not happen to have been preache Sunday. The discourse will be as new to of my readers as if it were delivered yeste since they have never seen or heard it b I hope to write a few sermonettes under the trees, and I will do my very best to make interesting. I pray my readers, therefore, imagine that my absence from London will any difference to the weekly publication of sermons. I hope that a little thoughtful r will enable me to preach better when I re but otherwise my temporary absence from land will not affect the regular weekly is the Tabernacle Pulpit.

A month or so ago the sermon en "Among the Lions"[*] excited unusual int I hope that the present sermon, entitled Dromedaries," will be found equally u though it is not a solace for the slandere a stimulus for the active.

With fervent Christian affection,
Yours most heartily,
C. H. Spurgeon

Mentone, Hotel de la Paix, Nov. 14, 187

A Judge's Testimony to the Morality Jews was given last week in Philadelphia. Briggs, in sentencing a Jew for burglary "You are the first Israelite I have eve convicted of crime. There is no class of that can claim such a record for the obse of the law as your people, and I am very this has happened."

---

[*] Published in The Christian Herald of Oc 23d.

THE ELDER BROTHER.

A Sermon by Rev. Charles F. Deems, LL.D.

"He was angry, and would not go in."—Luke : 28.

Twofold Parable—The Prodigal Sinner and the Pharisaic Sinner—The Elder Brother's Bad Traits—1. He was Bad-Tempered—2. He was Envious—3. He was Unfraternal—4. He was a Slanderer—5. He was a Liar—6. He was Mercenary—7. He was Disobedient—8. He was a Hypocrite—The Grand Lesson of the Text—No Hate in the Father's Heart.

It is quite remarkable that preachers so often teach about the Prodigal Son, and so seldom have any thing to say of the Elder Brother; and when they do, that that something is so exceedingly and adroitly apologetic.

Now the parable opens with the saying that a certain man had two sons, and goes on to show that the father was unfortunate in the fact that both his sons were sinners. And the parable describes these men as representative and typical men, showing the two types of sin: the one, the outbreaking Prodigal type; the other, the sneaking Pharisaic type. So that every man in his course of sin may probably be found to be in one of these two categories He is at all times the Prodigal Sinner or the Pharisaic Sinner. We come to-day to consider this Elder Son, who had all the bad traits of his brother save two, and then perhaps had seven additional ugly, sinful characteristics.

. In the first place, he was generally a uncomfortable individual. That is shown in the whole story that is told of him. Whenever he appears, it makes us feel as though we did not want to have him too near us—a very bad characteristic for any man, Christian or otherwise. His father knew that he was an unpleasant person; he had probably seen this disposition manifested before.

BAD-TEMPERED,

It is remarkable when the younger son was coming in, penitent and falling upon his father's neck, and the father falling upon this son's neck, and there was a fatted calf killed, and feasting and music in the house, that the elder brother was not there, and that his father did not call him in. His father knew that, however correct he might be externally, he was an exceedingly uncomfortable son; that there was something in his style of behavior which would put a chill on the festivities should that son come in when they were at their height.

And now, dear brethren, let me stop awhile to warn you against being ill-tempered. You know some baptized Christians with whose outward demeanor you can find no fault; but somehow they act as a kind of rasp; they dash the blessedness of society with a coldness and bitterness that makes society feel that they are very unpleasant kind of Christians. If you call the attention of one such man to his unfortunate characteristic, he will reply, "Yes, but that is my natural temperament; I cannot help it."

This elder brother might have said the same. But, my friends, it is very far from being the Christian temper, very far from making you useful; and if the Christian temper comes out in your life, it will make you manly and agreeable. I do not believe in that kind of Christianity which makes men rough and ugly. I do not believe in that kind of Christianity which allows you to shelter your lack of manners behind your "frankness." I tell you the greater part of your "frankness" is want of good breeding.

This elder brother was

ENVIOUS

of his repentant brother. He inquired of the domestics, and learned from one of the servants that his brother had come, and instead of being glad at once, he began to be jealous and envious. While that brother was gone he had had full sweep; he was glad he had been gone, and every time he heard of some forlorn scoundrel that had been hanged in a distant place he hoped it was his brother, and said, "Good riddance to bad rubbish; I shall never be troubled with him again." But by and by his brother came home, and the dancing and the music made discord in his ear. "He was angry, and would not go in." "I will not see my brother in his prosperity; I thought he was dead, done for, gone out of my way; that I could come in and take the whole of my father's affection and estate; but here this fellow comes back and makes all this joy and gladness." His conduct shows all this.

You have seen Christian men that are just that way—Christian men that always groaned whenever any one else shouted—that always grew uncomfortable just as other people grew happy—in whose eyes the blazing light from festive scenes wrought a strange kind of darkness—on whose ear fell the gladness and music and dancing noise of the world around them, and made them feel most miserable. Haven't you often seen that kind of Christian? And that is one reason, dearly beloved brethren, why some men do not like Christianity. They say, "This is a bitter, dark kind of religion."

Again, many Christian men would like to go in the way of sinners. Their conduct shows that they envy sinners. Such a Christian man says, "Here I am, going to the sanctuary every Sunday, fasting on Fridays, giving a portion of my goods to the poor; here I am, denying myself, and taking up my cross, and here are these sinners of the market, these sinners of the ballroom and the theatre—their eyes stand out with fatness, they have more than heart could wish, they are thriving in all their business and pleasure." Men of this temper sit down in the church of God and are envious! Being children, elder brothers in their Father's house, they are envious of the joys that sinners have! Oh! my Christian friends, why should you envy sinners? Why should you, as the Psalmist says, "be envious of evil-doers?" Instead of being jealous, for charity's sake, let them have a little joy, for consider the darkness and bitterness that are to come after.

But in this case there was an additional thing against the brother. Joy on this occasion was natural and wholesome. They ought to have had music in the father's house when this son who had been lost was found again. It was right. It was ordered by the father. And just while they were rejoicing over the son that had come back, the elder brother was angry and would not go in.

3. There is a third thing in the young man that ought to be noticed. All along he had been

UNLOVING TO HIS BROTHER.

I want to call the attention of you who are Christian people—for I am speaking now to "good" people, and not to prodigals—to the absolute necessity of being humane if you are Christian, and the certainty, if you are not humane, that you are not Christian. The world looks in upon the Church and says, "Behold these professors of religion; there is many a man in the common walks of life more charitable, more humane, with a greater chord of tenderness in his heart than these people." And they tell the truth, and you know it.

There is the great argument of the apostle John: "If you do not love your brother whom you have seen, how can you love God whom you have not seen?" 1 John 4:20. If that poor fallen woman, having flesh and blood like your wife, your daughter, your mother, does not stir your heart with tenderness and pity and Christian affection, how can you love God whom you have never seen? I appeal to you, my dear friends, on this ground very earnestly. Mark that this elder son, when he was speaking to his father, speaking of his own and only brother, instead of saying, "When this, my brother, returns," called him "this thy son!" Never in this narrative does it appear that the word "brother" was upon his lips.

Put this to your hearts and consciences, you fine, you well-to-do men, you decent Christian people; have you never felt, when you have looked upon the outcast and the sinner, "Yes, I suppose, somehow, distantly, he is my brother?" You have come upon the relationship by going around through God, and making the road as long as you pleased, saying, "Yes, I suppose he is a child of God, and therefore he is my brother," but you feel that there is a great distance between you and this unwashed sinner of the Five Points.

Why, if he had been the right kind of a brother, and had seen the younger son going astray, he would, some evening, have said to him, "Come, brother, let us sleep together to-night; I feel that I should like to lie in your arms again, just as when we were little boys." And then, when the night was on them, he would have gone over his life and said: "Brother, do you not recollect such and such things of our dead mother?" And those old scenes would have been brought up and talked over, and then the boy would have been melted. And then the elder would have told the younger many sweet things his father had said of him, and have assured him of his father's love.

And when the boy went to his father and said, "Give me that portion that belongs to me," the brother would have used persuasives to detain him: and when he started out in the road his brother would have put the best horse before the best carriage and gone after him and said, "Come back, dear brother, I will give you half of the remainder of the estate; come back, I will give you all." But it would seem that he never placed one single straw of influence in the way of that brother, to keep him from going away from his father's house; even as our brothers stray away from God, because we do not try to keep them in the family.

And when the prodigal came back, there was no rejoicing in the elder brother's heart. He ought to have known, when he saw the light in his father's house, and heard the rejoicing and dancing, that there was something good going on; but, instead of entering promptly, he sent for the servant to come out, and asked about this thing, and when he heard what the rejoicing was for, he was angry, and would not go in.

Ah! my friends, Christianity—Christ's blessed Christianity—will never take this world until it beget in Christians a love for all their human kith and kin—until humanity be a precious thing in our sight, and the bond of all humanity be recognized by us.

There is a little poem of Leigh Hunt's—a little poem that is worth all the things that have been written in the Edinburgh Review from the first number down to the present time, and will be remembered when all the great articles of the great writers in that famous periodical shall be forgotten. It will do me good to repeat them:

"Abou Ben Adhem (may his tribe increase)
Awoke one night from a deep dream of peace,
And saw within the moonlight in his room,
Making it rich and like a lily in bloom,
An angel writing in a book of gold.
Exceeding peace had made Ben Adhem bold,
And to the presence in the room he said,
'What writest thou?' The vision raised its head,
And, with a look made of all sweet accord,
Answered, 'The names of those who love the Lord.'
'And is mine one?' said Abou. 'Nay, not so,'
Replied the angel. Abou spake more low,
But cheerily still, and said: 'I pray thee, then,
Write me as one that loves his fellow-men.'
The angel wrote, and vanished. The next night
It came again with a great, wakening light,
And showed the names whom love of God had blessed,
And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest."

That is the humanity of the Gospel. Peace to the memory of Leigh Hunt for ever and ever! These are lines that shall live while there is a fibre of brotherhood in any human heart.

4. But this man was not only destitute of love for his brother; he was

A SLANDERER.

It is very easy to speak badly of those we do not love, and we love so few people that most of us are slanderers of the majority of the people with whom we are acquainted. Have you stopped to think of that? There are very few who can say, "I have never spoken ill of man or woman." This wicked elder brother said, "When this thy son that has spent thy goods with harlots was come." He knew that this was a frightful stain on one's manhood, a terrible thing for a brother to say about his brother, and to their common father. It was an audacious slander.

How did he know that his brother had ever been in such scenes as these he depicts? I will tell you how this wicked brother came by the fancy. He knew that if he could once slip the noose of his father's control, and go into a new country, he would enter such scenes as he painted, and that he would do that which he charged upon his brother. The voice of his own evil nature he mistook for the voice of humanity. Friends, whenever on suspicion you make a statement that is adverse to the reputation of your fellow-man, let me tell you that everybody who hears you has a right to think that you would do just that thing if you were in just those circumstances.

Thus the world is perpetually slandering the Church, and the Church is perpetually slandering the world. The thoughtless man of the world says, "These men are hypocrites: they serve God for gain." Now that is what the devil said of Job, and when you say it of any man, you simply quote the devil's words, and you ought at least to give the devil credit for the form of the allegation. And whenever you hear a man say that the Church is serving God for gain, you may believe that if he joined the Church he would do it for that motive.

And Christians say many naughty things of men who are just as stainless as they themselves. This is a terrible trick of human nature to paint one's own portrait and put another man's name under it. Supposing a painter should see an ugly man in the street, and call him in and take his portrait, and while the painter stepped out of the room the hideous fellow should seize the brush and put your name under it, you would think him ugly in more ways than one.

5. The elder brother was

A LIAR.

The statements he makes are absolutely false. When men become excited with passion they are very apt to do this. This elder brother committed this sin thrice. He said to their father, "This thy son has gone and wasted thy sub stance." He had wasted substance, but it was not his father's. According to the law of the land, the son was entitled to so much, and the father gave him just what belonged to him. And now the elder brother not only utters a slanderous falsehood of the younger, but he tells a falsehood in regard to himself. He says, "I have kept thy commandments all the time." He was professing allegiance to his father which was not true, for with the very breath that he was uttering that statement he was proving his disobedience. It was practical disobedience not to join in the festivities which his father had ordered and arranged.

And, in the third place, he made a false statement about his father, because he said: "I have done all these things, yet thou never gavest me a kid that I might make merry with my friends." Stop here, and ask what business that boy had with a friend that was not his father's friend. It is a very bad thing if a man's son has associates that he does not dare to bring in and introduce to his father. It is a terrible thing, allow me to say, in passing, when fathers make their home so strait and so disagreeable that the boys cannot feel that home is home. This man said he never had a kid from his father, when his father had given him the freedom of the house and the use of all that was therein.

6. Moreover, this elder brother was selfish and MERCENARY.

He admits unconsciously that he was serving his father for profit. He had done all these things: "And now," said he, "what is the net result? Not a kid. The fatted calf for the prodigal, but not a kid for me." And thus for the kids and the calves, for the fat and the marrow, for the loaves and the fishes, for the gain and the profit, the pharisaic sinner is serving God.

7. In the seventh place, the elder brother was disrespectful and to his father. There is hardly any crime I can conceive of so wicked, so demoralizing, as disrespect to parents. The man that is not respectful to his father cannot be pious toward his God. You may settle that now. A girl that is not respectful to her mother cannot have any sincere respect for God. It is out of nature.

DISOBEDIENT

Now see this case. His father came out and entreated him before the son said a word. He did not speak harshly to him, and say roughly, "Why don't you come in and welcome my son?" but he threw his arms round him, and said, "Do come in and welcome thy brother." But the wicked boy threw back this entreaty, and said, like a master talking to his servant, "Lo! these many years have I served thee, neither have I transgressed at any time thy law, yet thou never gavest me a kid that I might make merry with my friends; but as soon as this thy son was come" (as though he reflected upon him for being the father of such a wretch)—"as soon as this thy son was come who hath devoured thy living with harlots, thou hast killed for him the fatted calf."

My friends, this is a melancholy picture of the elder brother, so often passed over carelessly. He is in the house; he is in the Church; and, mark, the very sin he charges upon his prodigal brother—that of devouring his substance—is the very sin the elder brother wants to commit now. Here was a man lost in his father's house.

8. Lastly, this son was

A HYPOCRITE,

a Pharisee, a man who, under the cover of piety, condemned the sins of others with loud preaching, and endeavored to show the sincerity of his condemnation by vehement exhortations, while he committed these very sins in private. He is a Pharisee that is loud for total abstinence, but has a private closet and a secret key for his bottle. He is a Pharisee that denounces the man who keeps a faro-table, and himself, by sharp, shrewd ways, throws thousands of dollars wrongfully into his coffers. He is a Pharisee that condemns, it may be, the men that are struggling down in Wall Street and the Gold Room, while he himself, on a large fat salary, is paid for writing slanders of these his brethren. He is the Elder Brother of our modern times.

[Want of space compels us to omit here several practical applications of the text.]

But, my friends, here is, I think, of the text, so far as we are concerned—namely, that the root of all sin is in the belief that we may enjoy good out of God. Whenever you think there is any thing in music that you can enjoy outside of God, you are a sinner. Whenever you think that in statuary, in wit, in poetry, in any of the arts and sciences, there is good that you can enjoy outside of God, and say to God, "Give me my substance, that I may go and enjoy it in my own way"—whenever you do that, it is a sin. And whenever in your father's house you say, "I wish my father would leave the house: I am going to invite three or four good fellows, and we are going to have a high time, and we want the key of the cellar and the larder;" or whenever you, my friends in the Church, say, "I want to have a kid and slay it without my father," no matter what that kid is, no matter whether it be sensual pleasure or mental pleasure, if you want to enjoy it without the Father, you sin.

THE GRAND LESSON

But here is the supreme lesson as touching the Father. If any of you hate the Pharisee as Christ painted him in this parable, stop and consider that there was no hate in the father's heart. Let us go home all very humble; for see: "A certain man had two sons." They were both his sons, and he behaved toward them in the most fatherly manner. When the prodigal came back he needed consolation and cordial assurances, and the father fell on his neck and kissed him. And when the Pharisee outside refused to come in, the father went out and said, "Oh, my son—oh, my SON!"

Mark that tenderness. He has just come from inside the house, and from saying, "This my son, who was dead, is alive again; who wa lost, is found," and he goes out and says to th obstinate brother, "My son, thou art ever wit me." Is not it beautiful to see how tenderl God loves us? He says these things to th hard-hearted brother: "It is all yours by inheritance—all yours by endowment, if you be good boy; but if lost in your father's home envious and jealous, none of these treasures ca come to you. If you only rejoice with you brother, then all that I have is yours." Oh, m elder brother, God is not angry with you; m younger brother, God is not angry with you.

It is at the bottom and the root of all th other teachings of the Gospel that God is m Father, God is your Father, God is eve man's Father, and that we are all brothers an sisters of this family of sinners that are to saved by Christ. Oh, blessed be the Father th comes out to the prodigal and falls upon h neck; blessed be that Father that comes out the Pharisee and entreats and forgives even hi even him!

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

A Thrilling Story by Henry Martin, Author "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 935.)

Mr. Lemaire Carries to Percival his Release Percival Teaches Jemmy Mehaffy to Read— Beguiles Jemmy into an Interest in the Bibl Jemmy Likens Percival's Case to Joseph's.

Mr. Lemaire's remembrance of his daughte faithful conduct brought painfully home to mind the memory of his own unworthy sus cions of Percival. He was therefore considera agitated, and felt humbled in the presence Alick at the complete vindication of his frie openly expressed by the police chief. He st a glance at Alick, to read, if possible, from countenance whether his own self-condemn thoughts were echoed in his mind, and he fe ed, from Alick's grave looks, that they we Yet he would fain hope that estrangement not gone too far for a return to the cordiality previous relationships. He held out his ha but slowly and sadly, to Alick, and Alick, see his evident repentance, in token of reconciliat pressed it.

"I have been in the wrong, Mr. Goghart he said, "greatly in the wrong. From wha had known of him, I ought to have had your changing confidence in Percival; but, carr away by the present political crisis, and by assurance given me in this office"—and as spoke he looked at the police chief—" Haley's testimony was confirmed by other have done Mr. Montaigne a cruel wrong. terly I regret it, and I trust he will forgive shameful doubts concerning him. I mean try it, Alick"—and he used the old fami word as encouraged by Alick's reconciliatio "for I cannot endure my present false posit in regard to him. When the requisite docum is filled up, I will take it to Richmond jail, will myself bear to Percival the message of freedom. And would to God my thoughts never consented to his arrest!"

"Will you let me go with you?" Alick eag asked.

"And me too?" urged Rowley Quinn.

"Yes," said Mr. Lemaire, "and gladly. deed, as the instruments of clearing Perciva is you both who, by right, should bear to the tidings of his release. But as I wish to treat his forgiveness for the unfortunate pa have taken, I earnestly ask, Will you let m the one to tell him he is free? What is nee will be done in my office in a few minutes, then we all three can set out for the prison.'

Jemmy Mehaffy's admission to Percival was a w and joyous phase in his prison life. It gave n what he wanted—congenial and satisfying mpanionship—and thus delivered him from his stressing condition of ennui. Percival, on the cond day of his incarceration, having obtained om his lodgings at Mrs. Spencer's several arti-es of furniture and other things needful for his mfort, Jemmy had considerable occupation in tting things to rights and arranging "the sther's" cell. Two or three times, absorbed pleasing bustle, he caught himself in the act breaking out into song, and, in great alarm, d barely power to check himself. But as, in s present happy frame of mind, to keep silence s quite impracticable, to compromise matters indulged himself every now and then in a low istle. On several occasions, indeed, fully oc-pied and lost to a wise restraint, the whistle se to a rather dangerous shrillness, so that the rder in the corridor more than once detected mmy's furtive breach of the rules, but he ndly condoned it and pretended not to hear. Bless me!" he soliloquized, "but that is an d fish; one o' the curiousest creatures ever I m across. I'm glad he's not going to bother long. Of course the discipline of the prison uld have to be kep' up, that's sartin, but it uld be as aisy, I do believe, to get a wild cat to harness as bring that chap under prison le. I don't wonder, however, that his master so fond of him, for he seems to me to love, as were, the very ground on which he treads."

Percival, having had brought to him some of s books, spent a good deal of his time in read-g to Jemmy, and to make his prison retirement, twithstanding its seeming hardships, a lifelong on and turn an evil into good, he even under-ok to teach him his letters, and Jemmy, quick intelligence with all his oddity, in a very short ne, under patient and careful instruction, mas-red the alphabet. Percival then, taking all the g words, made Jemmy read the small ones, and was surprising how many pages in an hour ere in this way got over.

It was no uncommon thing, however, for Jem-y, exhausted by his strained attention to beg "the masther" to read a page or two without s help, for, to encourage him, so Percival called mmy's slow and halting style of reading. Indeed, masther dear," Jemmy would say, I'd like to lind you a hand, that I wud, but troth, I'm dead beat, and that's a fact, and u know, masther dear, it isn't to be wondered , for, begorrah, for wan big word you have to y masther, it's me opinion, and I don't think m far out, that I have to say two, if not three, tle wans. The big wans, it strikes me, mas-er jewel, is mighty like the fathers and others o' the book, and the little wans is the ilder, you onderstand, and big families they e too. Consiquintly there's more o' thim at's little nor o' thim that's grown up."

"All right, Jemmy," Percival would reply. I'll take the troublesome children off your nds, dear fellow, at all events for a little, and anage the fathers and mothers, and all. Just t down there, my good chap, quiet, and listen hile I read you this."

Percival would then read for the absorbed and raptured Jemmy some remarkable passage in istory, or some touching anecdote, or some vely description of character, or some fairy le. Very often, without telling him the name the book, for fear of hurting his conscience or ousing his prejudice, he would read aloud a apter of the Bible. And the old book always serted its power, for nothing so arrested Jem-y as the stories contained in the Divine Word. he account of David and Goliath, of Samson nd Gideon, of Samuel and Daniel, and such ke, as explained and paraphrased by Percival, ver riveted the attention of the admiring and ondering Jemmy, while, again, the sacrifice of aac, the bereavements of Jacob, the sorrows in gypt, the captivity in Babylon; or, in the New estament, the tale of the prodigal son, the par-ble of the lost sheep, and the history of the cru-ifixion, as touchingly expounded by the reader, never failed to arouse his sympathies, and often brought a tear to Jemmy's eye.

"Bedad," he would say, "but that's beyant the commin, and all out beautiful ontirely; nothin' cud bate it. I'm blest, masther, if I cudn't listen to ye from dawn o' day till past midnight—aye, and niver feel the hunger all the time."

"Yes," Percival once replied, "I scarcely doubt it, friend Jemmy; for what I have just read for you are no common words, as you say. 'More to be desired are they than gold, yea, than much fine gold, sweeter also than honey and the honeycomb.'"

On the day—Saturday—and about the hour when Mr. Lemaire, accompanied by Alick and Rowley Quinn, arrived at Richmond Jail bringing with him the order for Percival's release, Percival in his cell, with Jemmy sitting on a low seat, was reading to him the history of Joseph. When the part of the story was reached where Joseph, on a false accusation, is put in prison, Jemmy burst out,

"Be all that's lovely, masther, but that's you! Shure, it fits you to a T; you can't deny it. For, don't you see, they towld a big lie, and no mistake, upon the dacent young man that's minshuned in the book—Joseph I mane, a name I'll niver forgit from this day out—but purshuin' to me if it was a bigger lie they towld on him, nor that Mickey Haley—bad luck to him!—as the governor lets out, has towld on you. But go on, masther dear; let us hear, and God bless ye, how it turned out. I'll go bail—not badly."

Percival, much amused, and also struck by Jemmy's remark, proceeded, and he had just completed the account of Joseph's release from prison when Mr. Lemaire and Alick and Rowley Quinn and the governor of the jail and a warder, the latter having unlocked the door, all crowded into Percival's cell. Mr. Lemaire was about to deliver his joyful message, when the governor of the jail said, "Pardon me, Mr. Lemaire, but I think we had all better adjourn to the corridor."

Thus authorized, into the corridor all, including Jemmy, passed. As may be supposed, Percival was in a tumult of emotion. At the first appearance of Mr. Lemaire and the throng behind him he did not know what to think; such extraordinary and trying complications had occurred in his history that for a moment he feared some additional trouble was about to assail him, and this the more as he could see there was a shade of sadness over Mr. Lemaire's countenance, but a look at Alick's dancing eye, and at the broad grin of satisfaction playing on Rowley Quinn's face, speedily disabused his mind. With a beating heart and light step, therefore, he left his cell at the governor's invitation.

(To be continued.)

ROMANISM AND THE COMMON SCHOOLS.

In a lecture on this subject, at Boston, November 17th, Rev. Joseph Cook said: "It is a stern historical truth that Romish priests, when they have had their own way, never yet gave, in their parochial primary schools, instruction enough to fit a population for the duties and responsibilities of free government.

"Romish parochial schools, as tested by five centuries of their history, make no adequate provision for that public intelligence which is necessary to the permanence of republican institutions. Here is the fundamental indictment which history brings against exclusively Romish parochial schools for any people, whether under republican, monarchical, or mixed institutions. The result has been to plunge the masses of the population into prolonged childhood, when the Romish ecclesiastical power has been set up over the civil. I might cite here documents to show what the theory of the Romish hierarchy is as to education. I might quote the Syllabus of the Pope, of which all the clamor of ecclesiastics in every part of the world is only an echo. But I prefer higher evidence than official documents. I open the pages of the continents. I point to the spots where Romanism has had undisturbed power for centuries, and in the darkness which gathers upon them I find the proper warning for any republic which, like ours, has in it 6,000,000 or 8,000,000 of Romanists, over whom a foreign hierarchy asserts power.

"'What have you done?' I say to this hierarchy. I am not assailing the laity of the Romish Church, for I have great sympathy with their efforts to escape from the clutches of that historic power which has eclipsed the sun itself in the human soul, and the sun of modern civilization in so many fair portions of the globe. But I say to this hierarchy that they must stand before the bar of public opinion, and be judged by the outcome of their prolonged endeavors, in Canada, in Mexico, in Ireland, in the States of the Church. A most careful statistician told me at Rome that when Victor Emmanuel took possession of the Seven Hills the darkness of the population of the States of the Church, in the matter of illiteracy, was greater than the darkness of the population of Spain.

"I pause here to emphasize the terrific power of the confessional in the Romish Church over women, and over men of little education, brought up from their youth to believe that the Romish is the only infallible Church, and that out of it there is no salvation for the soul. There is a custom among the robbers of Italy requiring that when a new confederate is brought into a gang of thieves he shall load a pistol, hold it before a crucifix, and fire it at the figure of our Lord. It is supposed that whoever has the audacity to do that will not hesitate to take the life of child, or spouse, or parent.

"Now when education and a deep religious temperament, and much intercourse with ecclesiastics, and none at all with their critics, fill a woman's soul with that beautiful flame of Catholic devotion which we revere so much in many Catholic works—'The Imitation of Christ' is a Catholic book read by all Protestants—when a woman, with a heart like that of the author of that famous volume, is asked to send her child to the parochial school, or else incur the anathemas of the priest whom she regards as the representative of a power at Rome really standing in God's place on earth, we find the woman's soul tested as that of the Italian thief is tested by the requisition to fire at the crucifix.

"Rather than do that, woman's heart will often flame up here in the United States, and defend even a narrow Vatican hierarchy; and I shall not think less of the Romish laity if vast masses of them, with their past education, stand by the extreme doctrines of their priests. Those who have just been imported to our shores are under the control of the hierarchy. You are asking that all women shall have a vote on matters of education, and for one I indorse your earnestness in that particular, and am glad that Massachusetts has given to all women the right to vote on questions concerning education.

"But here are the multitudes of Sisters in the Romish Church. They are under the control of the hierarchy, and the question is, whether we can safely widen female suffrage as long as the broadening of it in Roman Catholic female circles means little more than the enlargement of the power of the foreign priesthood? I think I am not altogether wild in standing on Edmund Burke's doctrine, that wisdom can be attained only by experience in these large, novel matters, and that we cannot very accurately theorize in advance concerning the results of so radical a change as female suffrage.

"I am ready to try the experiment of woman's suffrage as to education and temperance. Godspeed all enterprises that seek for freedom to any woman to express herself as to the education of her children, and the protection of her home; but I expect some difficulties that we do not now foresee, and one of them may burst out of the confessional. One of them may come up from the very depths of woman's soul, and show us how, under what she thinks a divine sanction, she can vote unflinchingly for the divine rights of the hierarchy."

THE DISPOSITION OF CHRIST

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, Dec. 7, 1879.

AN IMPORTANT ANNOUNCEMENT.

Before commencing his sermon Dr. Talmage said :

"I have an announcement to make of much importance. I hope it may be received in silence." Dr. Talmage then read from manuscript the following statement :

"At the beginning of last week the trustees of this church passed a resolution asking me, in consequence of what they style 'the wanton and persistent pursuit and persecution' of their pastor, that I initiate a movement for the taking of this church out of the Presbyterian denomination. This resolution, coming from my warm and long-tried personal friends, whose sacrifices and services for this church have brought me under strongest obligation—a resolution expressing, as I believe, the feeling of the whole church—absorbs my serious attention, especially when these brethren assure me that they will cheerfully join me either in going or staying.

"I now reply to their letter by saying that no persons so well as the trustees of this church can understand the outrages committed by those clergymen who have the idea that there is not room enough in Brooklyn for this church and theirs. I defy any gentleman in the profession of law or medicine to find any such strange intensity of pursuit as has been demonstrated in my case.

"The chief agents in starting this trial declared in the outset that they wished my acquittal, yet within fifteen minutes after my acquittal they appeal to the Synod for reversal of that decision.

The opinion currently expressed in that community may be true—that our enemies, left in a sinking condition by the decision of the Presbytery, are now struggling to get ashore. It is not De Witt Talmage on trial, but his defeated pursuers. These enemies have not been content with assaulting me, but have tried to damage the financial credit of our church by sending to religious newspapers letters packed with financial falsehood.

"Self-appointed detectives have tried to microscopize every imperfection. Our reception of members has been belied ; spies have been sent out, one of whom was found on the window ledge at night listening to a conference between myself and church officers. The sanctity of the domestic relation has been invaded by an emissary sent to a branch of my family to see if seventeen years ago there was not a misunderstanding out of which something could be manufactured for Presbyterial effect, who, finding nothing, apologized for the act on the ground that I had given the Presbytery permission to investigate my entire life. This I have in affidavit taken before a notary public.

"A misunderstanding between me and a gentleman was exhumed from the place where it was buried three years previously, and made a specification against me, though all the misunderstanding arose from a false and impertinent letter written by one of my assailants in a religious paper damnatory of my church. This pursuer made the trouble first, and then, affronted at the fact that it had been settled three years before, put in the spade of the midnight resurrectionist. I do not wonder at the outburst of righteous indignation of my board of trustees against these ecclesiastics who have taken so much of our precious time and expended thousands of dollars, which they assess upon the churches, incensed because my own church will not help pay for the stilettos with which they have been stabbing us. When Booth shot Mr. Lincoln he did not send to Mr. Lincoln's administrators a bill for pistol and shot.

"But what shall we do? The question is whether, with the vast majority of the ministers of the Presbyterian Church on our side, we shall, to get rid of this group of troublesome men, leave our beloved denomination?

To leave the Presbyterian Church would be a difficult step for me. I was born in the Presbyterial family, the Reformed Church being a part of that family. My father and grandfather and great-grandfather served as elders at her altars. I was born in the Presbyterian Church, and there I was born again. She is my mother. I have preached the Gospel twenty-three years in her pulpits. I have taught my children to revere her. I love her ministry, and a more cultivated and consecrated body of men are not to be found in any denomination. She has shown her determination to vindicate my rights.

The majority of the members of the Brooklyn Presbytery are noble-hearted men, and when my case was before them they gave me triumph over my enemies. My Presbyterial friends stood firmly, though every conceivable influence was brought to bear on them to make them antagonistic to myself, one of my friends being offered by one of my assailants an elaborate speech against me, saying in effect, 'You take this speech against Dr. Talmage and deliver it, and you shall have the credit of its being yours.' The plagiaristic bribe was rejected, because that brother had an abler speech of his own on my side. We must not as a church do any thing that would imply want of confidence in those clergymen who have so manfully battled on my behalf, or do any thing that would look like ingratitude for their magnificent service.

A DECLARATION OF FAITH.

"I believe in the Brooklyn Presbytery and in the Long Island Synod, and in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church, and in God the Father Almighty, and the Holy Catholic Church.

It is now only a question how much annoyance and nagging the great Presbyterian denomination will allow my enemies to carry on toward me without official condemnation. Sometimes I have thought I would expose the moral rottenness of some of my pursuers and show by return of assault how very thin-walled is the glass house of some who are pelting me.

"Gentlemen thinking I ought to fight fire with fire have put in my hands material enough to make a bouquet for scandal-mongers for the next year. But I have no spirit for such work. I never pursued anybody and I don't mean to begin now. All I ask is that the Synod of Long Island or the General Assembly of the United States call off these pursuers and let me go on in the glorious work of proclaiming a sympathetic Christ to a suffering world.

"Brethren, our wisdom is to stand still and see the salvation of God. If the Presbyterian Church want us they can have us. If they do not, let them say so, and we will all go together. This church is made up of personal friends. With such men as this Board of Trustees and those whom they represent I could be happy anywhere. If the bad treatment goes on I will say to the Board of Trustees and Session, 'Where thou goest I will go, where thou dwellest I will dwell, thy people shall be my people, and thy God my God.' This church was built for me to preach in, and here I shall preach till God in whose hand our breath is shall tell me to stop.

"From letters received from various parts of the land since the passage of the resolution by the Board of Trustees, I judge that we will stay where we are, and that when my poor work is done you will find engraved on the plate of the casket at the foot of this pulpit the name of a minister of the Presbyterian Church, who with ten thousand imperfections tried to do his best.

"My loving salutation to the official Board of the church and for my enemies the prayer of Christ, 'Father, forgive them, they know not what they do.' My sermon will be somewhat in the direction indicated by these utterances."

THE SERMON.

"Let this mind be in you which was also in Christ Jesus."—PHILIPPIANS 2 : 5.

Evil Grows and Propagates—Our Disposition may be made over again—What was the Disposition of Christ—I. One of Great Gentleness—Children and Invalids were Attracted to Him—An Arm out of Joint—Christian Gentleness the Power for Good—II. One of Self-Sacrifice—The Worldly Position Christ might have Won—What is Self-denial?—A Coat that would not Stretch—The Marseilles Physician's Self-sacrifice—III. One of Great Humility—IV. A Prayerful Disposition—More Prayer Needed Everywhere—Luther's Prayer—V. An Industrious Disposition—Not a Lazy Moment in Christ's Life—Tender Footed Christians—Who can Stand the Test?

THERE is nothing more desirable than a pleasant disposition. Without it we cannot be happy ourselves nor can we make others happy When under some sudden provocation in life we lose our temper, we soon after come to new appreciation of proper equipoise of nature. We envy those people who are never thrown into perturbation. We have the feeling that as life goes on, we will be ripened and mellowed and come to more self-control, not recognizing the fact that an evil left in our nature grows to larger proportions, and that an iniquity not cast out may become the grandfather to a whole generation of iniquities. We may have our disposition all made over again. Because we do not believe this, we make no improvement.

A man says, "I am irascible by nature, and can't help it ; I am revengeful, and I can't help it ; I am impulsive, and I can't help it." You can help it. There is a way, as my text indicates, of having the disposition of the Lord Jesus Christ implanted in our nature. "Let this mind which was in Christ Jesus be also in you."

So far as God may help me this morning, want to show you what was

THE DISPOSITION OF JESUS CHRIST.

And, first, I remark, it was a disposition of great gentleness.

Sometimes He made wrathful utterance against Pharisee and hypocrite, as I showed you in the opening chapter this morning, and He cried "Woe, ye Pharisees and hypocrites, ye whited sepulchres, ye generation of vipers, how can ye escape the damnation of hell?" A man who ha no such thing as righteous indignation is no man at all. But while Christ sometimes made these expressions of holy indignation, for the most part His words were gentle and kind and placid This was the more remarkable from the fact that He had all power to tear to pieces His assailants, and did not use that power.

Little children, who always shy off from rough man, clambered on His knees and put their arms around His neck until the people had to tell them to stand back. Invalids so sore with disease that they shuddered to have any one come anywhere near them, implored Christ to put His hands on their wounds. A blind man making a great ado about his lack of vision, the people try to hush him up, saying, "He is bothering the Lord," and Christ comes to where the man is, and says, "What wilt thou that I do unto thee?" A bad woman is hustled into Christ's presence, and her pursuers say, "Blas her, denounce her, kill her ;" but Christ looks at her and looks at her assailants, and says with an intonation of sarcasm which I warrant you they never forgot : "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone at her."

Gentle of hand, gentle of foot, gentle of voice gentle of heart. Whether we have this disposition or not, we all admire it. Just as the mountain bluff or the scarred crag looks down on the calm lake at its feet, and just as the stormie winter loves to merge into the sunshiny spring so whether we have the spirit of gentleness or not, we love to see it in others. For the lack of it, we are not—many of us—we are not fit for the Christian duties of life, we are not fit to ta to the sick, or to administer to the troubled, or to care for the poor.

The effect of outdoor life is to rub our disp in the wrong way. The thunder of the rl s scorn sours the milk of human kindness. reachery, extortion, the behavior of mean men, ake us suspicious and hypercritical, and stuck or with nettles, and how few of us have the irit of Jesus Christ! We go out in the world y to make it better; for the lack of this ness, perhaps, we make it worse.

sister got her arm put out of joint. The ors of the country place came in and they o put that arm in its place, and they ld and they pulled mightily; they pulled he was in anguish, but the bone did not k to its place. After a while the surgeon and with one touch every thing was ad- So we go out for Christian work, and lack of a sympathetic nature, or the lack gentleness of Christ, we make the wounds world worse, when some kind and gentle comes along after us, and by one touch the torn ligaments, and the disturbing are rejoined. Oh! there is more power d in a spirit of Christian gentleness than this high pretension of Christian work. w of one summer's night will accomplish for the grain field than fifty Caribbean inds. Oh for the gentleness of Jesus !

II. But, I remark again, the disposition of was oung man of that day had such brilliant unities opening before him as were opening ore Christ if he had chosen to follow ambition. With power to popularize , he could have attained any official po- No orator ever won such plaudits as might have won from synagogue and rim and sea-side assembly, if He had de- No physician ever gained such a repu- for marvellous cures as Christ might have if He had performed His cures in the e of the Roman aristocracy. I tell you things that you may know what Paul when he says of Christ, "He pleases not lf to show you the splendors of His self- e."

ONE OF SELF-SACRIFICE.

uman or satanic power could have put on the cross, or sent Him into the grave, t Christ decreed Himself to the torture e humiliation. To save our race from nd destruction, Christ faced the sorrows earth and the woes of hell. All motherly herly and brotherly and filial self-sacrifice to insignificance before this extreme of generosity.

ose you had a choice between two roads— road would lead you through a comfort- e in this world and end at a palace, and er road would lead you through all kinds ecution and annoyance and maltreatment, at assassination—which road would you Christ chose the latter.

t is self-denial? It is taking from my t to add to yours, it is my taking a long y to save you fatigue, it is my putting my er under your burden so that you may ss strain, it is a subtraction from my ease osperity that you may have an addition ease and prosperity. How much of that have we? I might better put it in the hape, and say how little of it we have.

destitute little children were passing down eet—brother and sister. The lad had any garments at all, the little sister a coat e had nearly outgrown, and some one ard her saying, "Johnny, come under my ." "Oh," he said, "it's too short!" she replied, "it will stretch!" But it t stretch, and so she took it off and her brother with it. That was Christ on l scale. Taking off His robe that our might be clothed. Self-sacrifice—how e understand of it!

e was a great plague in Marseilles, and ds of people had died of it, and the Col- Surgeons met, and they decided that must be a post-mortem examination in hat this disease might be understood and vanquished. The College of Surgeons sat in silence, when Doctor Guion arose and said, "Gentlemen, he who makes this examination dies; some one must make it; for the sake of suffering humanity, I will make it." He went home, made his will, bade good-by to his family, entered the dissecting room, accomplished his work, wrote out the results of it for the benefit of others, and died in twelve hours.

"Magnificent!" you say. "Wonderful self-sacrifice!" But it is a tame illustration of what Christ endured for us. Dying that we might live. Walking the road toward Emmaus. Walking from Capernaum to Bethany. Walking from Jerusalem to Calvary. How much have we ever walked for Him? His head ached, His back ached, His heart ached. How much have we ever ached for Him? Let us this morning look back over the paltry list of our self-sacrifices.

III. Again, I remark that the disposition of Jesus Christ was

A DISPOSITION OF GREAT HUMILITY.

The Lord of earth and heaven in the garb of a rustic! He who pours all the waters of the earth out of his hand—the St. Lawrence, the Amazon, the Ohio, the Mississippi—begging a Samaritan woman for a drink. He whose chariots the clouds are, walking with sore feet. Spreading the heavens for a canopy, and setting the earth for His footstool, and yet lodging with one Simon, a tanner. Jostled about as though He were nobody. Nicknamed, struck at, spit on. Silencing the tempest on Genessaret, and then sitting down in the boat's cabin with the disciples, as though He had only wiped the sweat from His forehead in His father's carpenter shop. Taking the foot of Death off the heart of Lazarus, and breaking the shackles against the grave mouth, and then walking with Mary and Martha as though He were a plain citizen of Jerusalem going out to spend the evening in the suburban village of Bethany.

Was there ever such an illustration of humility? How little we have of that, my brother! We get a few more dollars than some one else, or we get a little higher social position, and oh, how we strut! We want people to know their place now. We go around and say, "Is not this great Babylon that I have built for the might of my majesty and for the honor of my kingdom?" Like a man going through the streets of Toronto, Canada, with such pomposity and pretension that a countryman passing through the street wondered who that could be with such an imperial gait, and, his curiosity too much for him, he pursued this great-looking man, and said to him, "Are you anybody in particular?"

Oh, how few men there are who can endure success! There are a thousand men who can endure misfortune where there is not more than one man who can endure victory. Oh, for the humility of Jesus Christ!

IV. I remark again that the disposition of Christ was a

A PRAYERFUL DISPOSITION.

Prayer on the mountains. Prayer in Gethsemane. Prayer on the lake. Prayer among the sick. Prayer on the cross. You cannot mention the name of Christ without thinking of prayer. His prayer for little children: "I thank thee, O Father, Lord of heaven and earth, that Thou hast hid these things from the wise and prudent, and hast revealed them unto babes." Prayer for His friends: "Father, I will that they be with Me where I am." Prayer for his enemies: "Father, forgive them: they know not what they do." Prayer for all nations: "Let Thy kingdom come." Oh! we want more prayer, more prayer in the household, more prayer in the legislative halls, more prayer among the young, more prayer among the old.

While the Diet of Nuremberg were signing the decree by which Protestants should get their liberty, Martin Luther, in another place, was praying for the accomplishment of that object, and he suddenly arose from his knees, and shouted, "The victory is ours! The Protestants are free!" There was no communication between the room where the Diet of Nuremberg met and the room where Martin Luther prayed. His came directly from the throne of God. Oh, have more of this spirit of prayer!

We want to pray like Daniel, with our face toward the Holy City. We want to pray like Paul: "Oh! wretched man that I am, who shall deliver me from the body of this death?" We want to pray like the publican, smiting on the heart. We want to pray like Christ, who emptied His heart of the last drop of blood and then filled it with the sorrows, the wants, the woes, the agonies of all generations.

> "Cold mountains, and the midnight air, > Witnessed the fervor of his prayer."

V. Again I remark that the disposition of Christ was

AN INDUSTRIOUS SPIRIT.

There was not a lazy moment in all his lifetime. Hewing in his father's carpenter shop, helping the lame man to walk without a crutch, curing the child's epilepsy, giving rations to a hungry host in the wilderness—always busy. Whether talking to fishermen on the bank, or sailors on the deck, or spending the evening in the village —always busy. The hardy men hauling the net ashore full of floundering treasure, the shepherds hunting pasture for the flocks to nibble at, the shipwrights pounding in the dry-dock, the winemakers of Engedi dipping the juices out of the vat and pouring them into the goat-skins—not half so busy as Christ, whose head and hands and heart were all full of work for the world.

How little of that spirit of work we have! The burden must be light if we lift it. The church pew must be soft if we sit in it. The sphere must be brilliant if we move in it. The religious service must be brief if we survive it. Fan us, rock us to sleep, sing to us on our way to heaven. Dandle us on the tips of your fingers. Lift us up out of this dusty world on kid gloves, under silken sunshade. Let the martyrs who breasted the fire and flood stand back, and give room for the column of tender-footed Brooklyn Christians as they come up to glory!

Oh, for the spirit of hard work! Resolved to go to heaven myself and take everybody with me. Busy in the Sabbath-school, busy in the prayer circle, busy at home, busy abroad, busy everywhere for Christ. Oh! what has the Lord done to you and against you that you betray him? At this moment, when all the armies of earth and heaven and hell are plunging into the fight, will you desert the standard?

My brothers, I have shown you that the disposition of Christ was a disposition of gentleness, of self-sacrifice, of humility, of prayer, of hard work—just five points. Will you remember them? and shall we by the grace of God imitate the glorious example? And are we ready now for the conclusion of the apostle when he said, "If any man have not the spirit of Christ, he is none of His?" Oh, that is overwhelming! You cannot stand that test, perhaps I can't stand it.

And yet there should be no melancholy in this subject, for I verily believe that the seed has been planted in your soul, and that it is going to bear a glorious harvest. I think that the symptoms are favorable for our recovery from sin into the pure life and health of the Gospel. Aim high. Watch. Study. Compare. Do your best. Sheathe not your sword until you have conquered the last enemy. Onward, higher and higher, until you gain the eternal hills. An unfading crown for the victor, but death to every deserter. Let the same mind that was in Christ Jesus be in us.

A Brooklyn Infidel Impressed.—A Young man was offered a little book containing a copy of the Gospel by St. John, one day last week in a prayer-meeting in Brooklyn. He said he was an infidel, but would take the book. He took it and read it, and is now asking the prayers of God's people that he may see Jesus as his Saviour. His Christian mother and others are pleading for his salvation.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, December 3d, at 3.30 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress Assembled for the Despatch of Business December 1st. The President's Message was read, and although it had previously been published was listened to with attention, especially the parts relating to finance. On December 3d, Senator Bayard introduced a resolution proposing to take from the greenback its legal-tender capacity except in payment of import duties. Senator Ingalls immediately introduced a resolution expressing the opinion that the present volume of United States notes should not be reduced, and that said notes ought to continue to be a legal tender in the payment of debts.

Secretary Sherman Deprecates any Financial legislation this session, and believes that the legal-tender property does not increase the value of the greenback or make it any more acceptable to the people. But if Congress accepts Senator Bayard's resolution, and would give the Secretary authority to reduce the value of outstanding legal tenders to $300,000,000, the shock to business would probably be much less than if the Supreme Court should suddenly decide, a year or two from now, that such notes reissued after the war are not a legal tender. The present season of business prosperity, when large quantities of the precious metals daily arrive here from foreign countries, undoubtedly renders this a favorable opportunity for returning to a hard money currency.

A Fourth Attempt to Assassinate the Emperor of Russia was made December 2d. He was proceeding to Moscow, and the train by which he travelled started soon after another carrying heavy baggage. The assassins had undermined the rails intending to blow up the Emperor's train as it passed over the excavation. They, however, providentially mistook the train, and blew up the baggage train instead of the one by which the Emperor travelled. No lives were lost. The Emperor's train had overtaken the baggage train, and the latter was switched aside to allow the other to pass. The Emperor probably owes his life to this transposition of the trains on the journey; but the attempt shows how desperate are the men who lead the disaffected classes in Russia, and how ill-suited are the severe measures recently adopted by the authorities to allay popular discontent.

The Irish Agitation has resulted in another arrest for sedition. The cable announces that Thomas Brennan was arrested December 5th and taken to Castlebar. He is Secretary of the National Land League, and prominent in the Amnesty Association and other political organizations. The expressions which caused the arrest of Brennan were to the effect that he adopted the words of Davitt, and that the time for resolve and action had arrived. He will be charged with using seditious language at Balla, and with endeavoring to seduce the police from their allegiance.

The N. Y. Herald, in an editorial written in view of the agitators coming to this country to obtain assistance for their agitation, warns Irish Americans against aiding an opposition to English law and order. It suggests that if money can be spared to aid the Irish people it should take the form of a fund to aid those who may wish to emigrate or to send to those in absolute need, a shipload of provisions.

The N. Y. Herald asserts that from inquiries made, it is convinced that, "no matter what demagogues say, the ascertained truth is that the Irish as a people are far better off now than thirty years ago. There is less poverty; there are fewer small holdings of lands. If Parnell could carry out his crazy programme the mud cabins would be as numerous ten years hence as they were in 1841."

Brooklyn Lay College.—At a Regular Called meeting of the Board of Trustees, held at the house of the President of the Board, John F. Henry, Esq., Monday evening, December 1st, the Rev. T. De Witt Talmage, D.D., was invited, by a unanimous vote of the trustees present, to be the President of the Faculty of the Brooklyn Lay College and Biblical Institute, upon the recommendation of the six professors, Revs. Edward P. Ingersoll, Charles E. Lord, Wellesley W. Bowdich, Frank Rogers Morse, Melville B. Chapman, and George Lansing Taylor. It was decided for the present to continue the place for college lectures in the Nassau Street Church (Baptist), instead of the Amity Street Church, (Presbyterian), which has been sold to the English Lutheran society.

The Death of Dr. W. Ives Budington, of Brooklyn, occurred November 29th, at the age of sixty-four. For twenty-three years he was pastor of the Clinton Avenue Congregational Church, and won the love and respect of all who knew him. A little more than two years ago a cancer made its appearance on his lip, and it was three times operated on, but it reappeared after each operation in a more troublesome form, and ultimately caused his death.

Three Children were Burned to Death in a Fire which broke out late on the night of December 6th in one of the small pavilions attached to Bellevue Hospital, containing twenty-three persons. One woman died from fright after being rescued. All the others were saved. The first alarm was given by a nurse, who noticed smoke issuing from the ceiling of the ward where she sat. She says, "The flames spread with lightning-like rapidity, and the whole interior of the children's ward seemed to blaze up at once. The smoke was so stifling that for a time I was stunned and overcome with fear, but at length we managed to save some of the little ones. It seemed a long time before any help came, but it did come at length, and every one worked bravely to rescue the sick women." The excitement in that portion of the main building which faces the pavilion was terrible. Women who had been in their beds for weeks rushed from them frantic with fear, and it required the utmost exertions of the attendants to restrain them from committing acts which would have been fatal to themselves. All the patients in that wing of the building were removed after much difficulty. It is feared that the effects of the temporary panic will be serious in many instances.

Death of a Centenarian.—The Rev. Samuel West, a local elder of the M. E. Church (an able and useful itinerant minister from 1809 to 1824), died at the family residence near Olive Branch, O. He celebrated his hundredth anniversary February 14th, 1879. Had he devoted himself to the ministry as a life-work he would doubtless have been equal to any position the Church has to bestow. His great mistake—and which in his last years he bitterly lamented—was that he had turned aside from the regular work of the ministry. Until within a short period of his death Father West's intellect continued remarkably clear and vigorous. His faith in God simple and tenacious, and the remembrance the Lord's goodness and mercy to him o whelmed him at times with emotion. Hav outlived his contemporaries, there were few were to him companions. He chose to be m alone with God in prayer. The night of death he rose and knelt at his bedside, and fervent prayer commended himself to G knowing that the time of his departure was hand.

A Wise Step has been taken by the New Y Board of Education. Among the lesson bo furnished to the schools is one on Tempera by Dr. Richardson, published by the Nati Temperance Society. It is impossible to o estimate the importance of impressing on c dren the evils of even the moderate use of a holic beverages.

A Large Gift to the Manhattan Eye and Hospital has been received from the Hon. E Morgan, formerly Governor of this State, a member of the Brick Presbyterian Church in city. By a donation of $25,000 he has enti freed the Hospital of debt. During the year the hospital has treated 4000 cases and formed 566 operations, and so great is the sure for want of room that the building mu greatly enlarged. Gov. Morgan has, it is removed a debt from the Brick Church by a d tion of $11,000, and these gifts are a part of $100,000 which he has recently given to be olent objects.

A Desirable Madness.—An English min related the following incident at the F Street Prayer Meeting last week: "A lady her heart to the Lord Jesus, and so beca Christian. Her husband, however, wa avowed atheist. The lady fell sick and The day of her death he sent for her p He could not reach the house in time to see but asked the husband how his wife 'Raving mad,' was the reply. 'What pro madness did she give?' asked the min Whereupon the infidel informed him tha died shouting 'Victory! Victory, throug blood of the Lamb!'" The minister expr the wish that he himself, as well as the wid man, might so die. The atheist's misco tion is not a modern one. St. Paul's inspir was also mistaken for madness (Acts 26 : 2

The Corruption of the Turkish Govern was the subject of the following scathin nunciation by Dr. Jessup at a meeting in land, where he has gone on his way to "I utterly detest and loathe the Turkish G ment. I look upon it as a most corrupt G ment. I have a positive love for the T people, but the Government from first to detestable beyond description. If I wante quate words to express my loathing fo should have to go to Holy Writ to find for it is only in the Epistle to the Roman I could find language for the purpose." Jessup speaks from personal experience, a words are entitled to the attention of thos ticians in England who are seeking to pr the Turkish Government.

A League against Austria has been f between three provinces north of the Ba namely, Servia, Montenegro, and Bulga which they covenant to raise conjointly a of 236,000 men for their mutual defence. object of this coalition is to resist by for attempt which may be made by Austria tend her territory beyond Novi-Bazar. In the brigand Despotovitch, about whom s was heard during the Russo-Turkish war, bing travellers and putting his captives ture.

A Request for Prayer, Received at th of the CHRISTIAN HERALD from a lady kansas, has been, as desired, forwarded Fulton Street Prayer Meeting. Another r from another part of the country, was Dr. Talmage last week.

The Portrait of the King and Queen o with a view of the royal palace at Madr appear in the next number of this journa

The Death of a Whole Ship's Crew is Reported by Captain Packham, of the brig Westmoreland, which arrived at New York, November 29th. As the Westmoreland was leaving Jacmel, a vessel was towed into that port, which had been found drifting about helplessly. All her crew were dead. In the cabin lay the dead bodies of the master and his officers, while the forecastle berths contained the decaying remains of the sailors. They had all been taken sick, and had apparently been unable to render one another any assistance. The disease which had desolated the vessel was Black Fever. That vessel, with its ghastly burden, is a miniature of what this sin-stricken world would have been had not God so loved it as to have given "His only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on Him should not perish" (John 3 : 16).

A Lady's Hair Given for Charity.—The Montgomery Advertiser says: "A lady in Atlanta, who was made poor by the war and had nothing else to give, has just cut off her magnificent blonde hair and presented it to the fund for the orphan children of General Hood, left destitute by their father's death. This case, and that of Mrs. Bryant, of Lowndes County, who gave her hair to the yellow-fever fund, are rare examples, in these days, of woman's sacrifice in the noble cause of charity."

Time Saved by Keeping the Lord's Day.—Hon. William E. Dodge told a story at the Sabbath Convention which indicates that the observance of the Lord's Day on at least one occasion proved in his experience a help, and not a hindrance to business. Forty years ago, after riding for three days and nights in a stage-coach in Georgia, he determined to rest on the Sabbath, though business was pressing, while his acquaintances in the coach went on. The hotel where he stayed was small and unattractive. He asked one of the children if he might go to Sunday-school with them. He went, was asked to teach a large class of young men from the academy in town. He spoke in the afternoon at their request to a full house, and addressed a large gathering in the evening. He took the boat on Monday morning, passed the boat on which his friends had taken passage, after travelling all day Sunday, and got into Mobile one day ahead of the others.

A Good Way to Celebrate a Birthday was adopted by Mr. Edmund Lyon, a member of the Rev. Dr. Shaw's church, Rochester, N. Y., who has made a birthday gift of $25,000 to the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions. The example deserves following, and those who have not the privilege of giving sums of so large an amount will remember our Saviour's commendation of the widow who cast her two mites into the treasury.

The Opinion of an English Physician on alcoholic drinks has been published. Dr. B. W. Richardson, in reply to some strictures in the London Telegraph, says: "In the dispensary of the apothecary and in the laboratory of the chemist alcohol is a good agent when it is used with scientific discretion by skilled men; beyond this I hold it to be a mischievous chemical, which destroys its tens of thousands a year, diffuses misery and vice in all directions, engenders a constitutional condition of body altogether unnatural, and does no mortal service in return for all the evils it originates, sustains, and transmits from one generation to another."

The Agricultural Skeleton in Britain.—Reliable statistics show that the late harvest has been the most disastrous since 1816. In that year agriculture was the staple industry of the United Kingdom, being then third in the rank of importance among industries, whereas it now stands tenth. The whole of the home production this year is six million quarters of wheat, while the required quantity wherewith to feed the population of Great Britain is twenty-four million quarters, thus requiring a large amount of money to go out of the country to purchase the eighteen million quarters which are deficient.

The dependence of Great Britain on other nations for food from the foregoing causes is a source of great national danger, for in case of her going to war with any nation, privateers scouring the seas would seriously check the needed importation of the staff of life, and high prices, scarcity of food, popular discontent, and agitation would soon prevail. It is not difficult to see how possible it is for Daniel's predicted "time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time" to arrive at no distant period.

Kossuth, whose visit to this Country and enthusiastic reception are well remembered, has just lost his rights as a Hungarian citizen. The Austro-Hungarian Chamber of Deputies has adopted a bill declaring that any native of the country who voluntarily resides abroad for an uninterrupted period of ten years shall lose his civil status. The Hungarian patriots violently opposed this measure, accusing the Government of levelling it directly at Kossuth, but it was finally carried by 141 votes to 52. Though Kossuth has lost his rights as a citizen of Hungary, the wrongs he has endured for the sake of his country will make his name more famous in history than any name among his persecutors.

The Publications Exhibited on the Newsstands of our cities, whose indecent illustrations are an offence to the eyes of all who desire the well-being of the community, are being refused admission to Canada. They are prohibited circulation in the Canadian mails, and at the request of the Canadian authorities, American postmasters have been instructed not to forward such matter. It is a pity the law is not enforced to stop their circulation in this country.

Tobacco in School.—It was Reported lately that the boys in one of the principal schools in Pittsfield, Mass., had taken to using tobacco, and an investigation showed that 35 boys out of 60 in the school, between the ages of 11 and 16, were users of the weed, some of them chewers as well as smokers. The Principal reports that a number of the lads are plainly showing the ill effects of tobacco in a lessened capacity for study; and he desires the co-operation of parents in his efforts to stop its further use.

Diphtheria was Carried into a Town in Vermont recently through careless disregard of proper precautions. A few weeks ago a family of three children, in St. Albans, Vt., had the diphtheria, but made good recovery. After they had been well and about the streets for two weeks, they went to Fairfield and visited in four families. At that time there was no diphtheria in Fairfield, but since then it has broken out in each of those four families.

Boy Pirates.—Ten Young Boys of London, Ont., have been discovered in a plot to buy a schooner and turn pirates on the lakes. They had each purchased revolvers, and were concerting as to weapons of warfare. The money for this outfit, $180, one of the boys stole from a relative. The oldest boy is twelve years of age. The boys said they got their idea of the plot from reading "Jack Harkaway" and other kindred stories.

Another Cable has been Successfully laid, connecting the New World with the Old. It gives direct communication with France. The steamer Faraday, which has been laying it in the bed of the Atlantic, arrived off North Eastham, Mass., on Saturday, Nov. 15th, and after communicating with the shore through the cable on board by way of the French coast, the old Atlantic cable, and the American shore line, made a successful landing of the new cable.

A Regal Robber, by self-confession, is the Emperor of Germany, according to Dr. Busch. That gentleman relates that the Emperor William's recent interview with his nephew the Czar of Russia left a certain bitterness in his mind, and he remarked subsequently to General Skobeleff, that unfortunately sometimes exigencies of State, force monarchs to break up the tenderest relationships—that he himself had by the will of God been obliged to rob dear cousins of their crowns and lands.

A Lady a Hundred Years Old was Baptized a few weeks ago in England by the vicar of Cottingham.

THE DROMEDARIES.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

Text—1 Kings 4 : 20–28.

Solomon's Reign a Type of the Reign of Christ—Kingdom Managed by Officers—I. Each Officer had a Charge—1. The Glory of the Position—2. They Served under a Strict King—3. They Felt their Responsibility—4. The Spirit of the King in his Officers—5. Mischief brought on the Kingdom by the Officers—II. Each Officer Bound to Act according to his Charge—1. As to Matter—2. As to Measure—3. As to Place—4. As to Time—III. Each Officer Received the Supplies Necessary—1. A Great Charge a Guarantee of a Great Supply—2. A Great Supply Indicates a Great Charge—A Desire to Escape Responsibility.

THE last words are the text for this occasion.

From the whole passage you will see that the kingdom of Israel under the sway of Solomon was a fair type of the reign of our Lord Jesus Christ. Perhaps it most exactly describes His future dominion, in the long-expected glory of the latter days. The present state of the church may be compared to the reign of David, splendid with victories, but disturbed with battles; but there are better days to come, days in which the kingdom shall be extended and become more manifest; and then the Lord Jesus Christ shall be even more conspicuously seen as the Solomon of the kingdom, "who shall have dominion from sea to sea."

Yet even now, as "we that have believed do enter into rest," so do we also enter into the richest provision which is made in the covenant of grace, even at this present; and I may say of all who have come under the sway of Christ, that we dwell in a region of peace, seated every man under his vine and fig tree, and none making us afraid. "There is, therefore, now no condemnation to them which are in Christ Jesus," and, "therefore, being justified by faith, we have peace with God through our Lord Jesus Christ." "The peace of God which passeth all understanding" doth keep our heart and mind by Jesus Christ

Israel under Solomon had abundance as well as peace. What says the historian? They were "as the sand which is by the sea in multitude, eating and drinking, and making merry." It is said that there was such plenty in the land in Solomon's time that gold was of no more value than silver, and silver became of little more value than iron; and as for the other metals, they were little accounted of. So common had precious metals become that they were scarcely precious any longer, they were so plentiful. The whole land flowed with milk and honey, and the people rejoiced and were glad.

Certainly the Lord Jesus Christ has brought His people into a state of the greatest plenty, for "all things are yours; whether things present, or things to come; or life, or death; all are yours; and ye are Christ's; and Christ is God's." What plenty must that man have to whom the Lord has said, "No good thing will I withhold from them that walk uprightly"! "Whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive." He has given us carte blanche in prayer. He has put into our hands the keys of His treasury, and has bidden us take what we will. He has said, "Delight thyself also in the Lord, and He shall give thee the desires of thine heart;" and He has added, "Open thy mouth wide and I will fill it." If we have not, it is "because we ask not, or because we ask amiss."

So, too, we dwell in a kingdom which is ruled with wisdom. It is said of Solomon in this chapter that he had wisdom and understanding exceeding much, and largeness of heart, even as the sand on the sea-shore; and Solomon's wisdom excelled the wisdom of all the children of the east country, and all the wisdom of the Egyptians. Is not this also our honor and privilege? Behold, this day the Lord Jesus Christ is "made unto us wisdom." "We have an unction from the Holy One, and know all things" while we dwell in Him; for "the secret of the Lord is with them that fear Him, and He will show them His covenant."

Israel had a king who was full of power. Solomon had squadrons of horse and chariots of war, and he was so strong that the kings of the earth dared not come into conflict with him, but paid him tribute. As for our King, He has better forces than horses and chariots of war, for He has but to speak to His Father, and He will presently send Him twenty legions of angels. All power is delivered unto Him in heaven and in earth. The fulness of the Godhead dwells in Him for the defence and help of His people, and if you will but open your eyes you shall see horses of fire and chariots of fire round about your Lord.

The great kingdom of Solomon was managed by a well-appointed body of officers, and certain persons were set over each province, who, amongst other duties, had to provide for King Solomon's table and stable. The table was very sumptuously furnished, as you saw in the reading; and in the stable stood horses of war, and also swift dromedaries, which were used in the same manner as our modern post-horses, to carry messages rapidly from one station to another.

These swift horses and dromedaries were made to run from town to town with the royal mandates, and thus the whole country was kept in speedy communication with the capital. Appointed officers were bound to provide for these horses and dromedaries, and all else that concerned the king's business; and my subject at this time will illustrate the likeness between this arrangement and the methods of our Lord's kingdom.

EACH OFFICER HAD A CHARGE.

I. First we shall note that each of Solomon's officers had a charge. The text says, "Every man according to his charge." We have officers about modern courts who may be highly ornamental, but when you have said that, there is very little else to add. On high days and holidays they wear many decorations, and glitter in their stars and garters, and sumptuous garments, but what particular charge they fulfil it is beyond my power to say.

In Solomon's court all his officers had a service to carry out, "every man according to his charge." It is exactly so in the kingdom of our Lord Jesus Christ. If we are truly His, He has called us to some work and office, and He wills us to discharge that office diligently. We are not to be gentlemen-at-ease, but men-at-arms; not loiterers, but laborers; not glittering spangles, but burning and shining lights.

1. It is an exceeding glory to be the lowest servant of King Jesus. It is more honor to be a scullion in Christ's kitchen than to be a peer of the realm. The meanest position that can be occupied in the kingdom of Jesus Christ, if any can be mean in such a service, has a touch of divine glory about it; and if we rightfully discharge it, though it be only to wash the saints' feet, we partake in the honor of our Master, who Himself did not disdain to do the like. But no man is put in any office in the church that he may be merely ornamental. We are set in our places with an end and design, every man according to his charge—every woman according to her charge.

My dear brother, you do not occupy the post of a minister or a pastor that you may be respected, but that you may "adorn the doctrine of God your Saviour in all things." You are not, my dear brother, ordained to be an elder or a deacon in a church that our Lord may put honor upon you, though He does put honor upon you in it, but that you may bring glory to God—that the people may see the grace of God in you, and may magnify God in you. Churches were not made for ministers, but ministers for churches. We who are officers in the church are not ordained for our own sakes, but for the people's sake, and we should always recollect that fact, and live with it in our eye.

2. Those who served Solomon were officers under a strict king, for such was his wisdom that he would not tolerate unfaithfulness in any office. He chose the best men, and so long as he retained them he meant business and expected prompt attention. If they did not do their duty, he did his, and sent them packing. It is very much so in the church of Jesus Christ. I am not speaking as if the children of God could perish; but I do say this, that in the service of Christ if you are not a faithful servant you will soon have to make room for another.

You may be laid aside by sickness, and then you will have suffering instead of serving, or you may be made to drop into the rear rank and go behind and weep in sorrow because you did not faithfully do your duty in the front. Recollect that text, "The Lord thy God is a jealous God," and rest assured that our Lord Jesus Christ is like His Father, He will have the diligent obedience of His servants, and their faithful zeal, or else He will cashier them, and take away their commissions.

The love of our Lord Jesus is of so fervent a character that He cannot bear a divided heart, or a negligent walk in any one of us. There is a text which some Christian people do not like, and so they cut the heart out of it: "Our God is a consuming fire." They say, "God, out of Christ, is a consuming fire" The text does not say so; it speaks of "Our God," and that means our covenant God, our God in Christ, and it is God in Christ Jesus who is a consuming fire.

3. The officers of Solomon were also obliged to recollect that the of the whole system depended upon each one of them. Solomon had so arranged it that there was a certain troop of horses in a certain town, and the appointed officer must see to their fodder: barley and straw were to be on the spot in full quantity for the horses at that particular depot. It would not have done to send it anywhere else; and if an officer had failed to supply his department, the horses must have starved and the system been thrown out of gear.

ORDERLY WORKING

Now, in any well arranged Christian church a Christian who is not faithful to his charge little knows what mischief he does; but, as far as he can, he puts the whole machine out of gear, and, apart from the interposing mercy and supreme wisdom of Christ, he would throw the whole economy of the Lord's house into disorder.

The little church cannot prosper because an influential member is where he ought not to be. In a great house the servants must keep their places, and if the cook will persist in doing the chambermaid's duties, and does not prepare the meals, every thing is in a muddle; and if, on the other hand, the maid who has to clean the rooms neglects that duty, but must needs be in the kitchen, there will be no comfort either by day or by night. You can all see the bearing of this upon a Christian church.

4. In Solomon's kingdom it came to pass that the spirit of the king infused itself into all his officers, and therefore the country was well governed. Beloved, I pray that it may be so with this church, and with all the churches of Jesus Christ, that the Spirit of our great King may infuse itself into us all. Nothing makes men fight like having a hero for a leader. When Cromwell came to the front nobody was afraid. Away went the cavaliers like chaff before the wind, when once he was present.

And, surely, when our glorious Master, the Captain of our salvation, the standard-bearer among ten thousand, is seen to be in the midst of a church then every thing goes well, and we all fight with confidence and daring. One man sometimes seems to have the power of pervading thousands of other men; his spirit appears to govern, to move, to stir the hearts of his fellow-men till the man lives in them all; and so is it supremely with the Lord Christ. We live in Him, and He lives in us. If we are all moved by the spirit which dwells in Jesus—the spirit of love, of self-denial, of consuming zeal, and of ardor, then all will be done gloriously. If we copy His consecration, His prayerfulness, His boldness and His gentleness, what a troop shall we make, and how well will our Solomon's kingdom be administered!

5. Only one more thought here. When Solomon's kingdom came to mischief it was through one of his officers. You recollect that, when Solomon died, Jeroboam split the kingdom in twain, and he was a runaway servant. Whenever a church comes to ruin, we grieve to confess that it is generally through its own officers. I fear it is oftener the ministers than any other persons. The great heresies which have infested the church have not sprung from the mass of the people, but from certain famous leaders; and at this day the heart of our churches, I believe, is infinitely more sound than the ministry. I wish it were not so, but I cannot conceal my fears.

When our Lord was betrayed it was not by private followers, such as Mary Magdalene, Zaccheus, or Joseph of Arimathea, but by Judas, the treasurer of the College of Apostles. It was an apostle who sold his Master for thirty pieces of silver. Still the fault is equally grievous if it be committed by the lowest officer. As I have already said, we are all servants: we are all clothed with responsibilities, and we can, if the Holy Spirit shall leave us to it, do grievous damage—more damage than the outside world can ever accomplish.

BOUND TO OBEY.

II. Our second head is somewhat like the first. We now note that each man was bound to act according to his charge, "Every man according to his charge."

1. The officers were bound to obey their orders; first, as to matter. Certain of them had to provide fat oxen for Solomon's table, and others had to see that the roebucks were hunted and that the fowls were fatted for the same purpose; while others were commissioned to provide the barley and the straw for the horses and the dromedaries. As I have already said, if they had gone out of place—if the man who had to provide the barley for the horses had fed the chickens with it, and if the officer who was bound to hunt the roebucks had occupied himself with carting the straw, there would have been great confusion. And so, dear brother, when you will not do what you were evidently meant to do, and are quite able to do, but must needs attempt something quite out of your range, all goes amiss.

Dear friend, have you found out what you can do—what the Lord has fitted you to do, and what He has blessed you in doing? Then keep to it, and do it better and better, and by no means complain of your vocation. Do not find fault with others whose work differs from your own. You should each find out what you can do, and then seek, God the Holy Spirit helping you, to do that, to the very best of your ability, out of love to Jesus.

2. Observe that with Solomon it was "every man according to his charge" as to measure; for if a man had charge of a barrack where there were two thousand horses, he had to send in more barley and straw than the officer who superintended a smaller barrack of only five hundred horse. The purveyor who was ordered to supply Solomon's table with fat bullocks had to send more than he who fed the tables of the inferior officers.

Note this well, for certain of us are bound to do much more than others. Some of us bear heavy responsibilities, and if we were to say, "I shall do no more than anybody else, I need not overburden myself," we should be unfit to occupy the position to which God has called us. Dear friends, I am not afraid that any of you will do too much for Jesus Christ, but I would like you to try. Just see now whether you can be too ardent, too self-sacrificing, too zealous, or too consecrated. It were a pity that such a thing should not be attempted. I have never known anybody who could accuse himself of so rare a crime. Oh no; we all feel that all we can do, and more, is well deserved by our blessed Master who has given us our charge.

Do remember the rule of proportion. If you have five talents, and your brother has only one you may do twice as much as he does and yet fall short. He is faithful with his small capital but your proportion is five times as much, and therefore twice as much falls short of what is expected from you. Many a servant girl gives her fourpenny-piece to the offering, and if the same proportion were carried out among those who are wealthy, gold would not be so rare a metal in the Lord's treasury. A tithe may be too much for some, but a half might not be enough for another. Let it be, "Every man according to his charge," as to measure as well as to matter.

"Every man according to his charge," applied to place; for if the servant who had to send in barley for the dromedaries to Jerusalem had sent it off to Joppa, or if the Joppa man had sent all his fodder to Jericho, there would have been considerable trouble and outcry in the stables; and if the fatted beef and the venison for Solomon's table when he stopped in the house of the forest of Lebanon had been sent over to his other house on Mount Zion, the king would have had his table ill supplied.

Some men are not satisfied to serve God in their proper place; they must run fifty miles off or a hundred, before they can work. Is this right? I remember a little text in the Proverbs, "As a bird that wandereth from her nest, so is a man that wandereth from his place." There is a sphere for every star which decks the sky, and a blade of grass for every drop of dew which spangles the mead. Oh that every one would keep his place!

Many a man have I known who has done nothing till he has found his place, and then he has astonished his friends. I find it so with young men entering the ministry: a brother has not succeeded, in fact, he has been an utter failure in his first position; and yet, when God has opened the proper door for him, he has done marvels. Why did he not succeed before? Because he was out of his place. The best thing applied to the purpose for which it is not suited is a mere waste, and the best man in an unsuitable position may unwittingly be a hindrance to the cause he loves.

Find your place, good brother, and do not be in a hurry to move. He who keeps a shop in a dozen towns in a dozen years will at the end look in vain for a shop which will keep him. The spirit of roving tends to poverty. Those who are eager to move because they imagine that they will leave their troubles behind them are much deceived, for these are found everywhere. You may soon get into some such predicament as Jonah, who thought that all would be well if he could avoid Nineveh trials, but he had forgotten the troubles of being aboard ship in a storm. I do not suppose he ever ran away to Tarshish again. That one experiment satisfied him, and I hope you will profit by his experience.

Do not try running away on your own account, for if you do endeavor to escape your Lord's hard work, I would have you remember that the sea is quite as tempestuous now as ever, and whales are fewer now than in Jonah's day, and not at all so likely to carry a live man to shore. Keep your place: "every man according to his charge."

Once more: every man was to act according to his charge as to time, because the passage speaks of each one "in his month." If the January man had taken care to provide for Solomon's table in February, what would have happened? There was a man for February, and there would have been two supplies for one month, but none for the first weeks of the year. If the August officer had kept back till September the corn which was wanted by the horses and the dromedaries in August, what would the poor creatures have done during that month? While the barley was coming the steeds would have been starving. In serving Christ there is a great deal in being up to time, punctual in every thing. Not to-morrow, brother: not to-morrow, that is somebody else's day: to-day is the day for you. Up and do the day's work. Some soul is to be won for Christ, some truth to be vindicated, some deed of kindly charity to be wrought, some holy prevalent prayer to be offered, and it is to be done at once. Or ever to-morrow's sun has risen, see that thou hast carried out thy charge, for time in reference to these solemn matters is life. Promptness we always admire in responsible persons. If they have any public duty to do, we cannot endure to see men leaving matters in arrears, to be done by and by, or never done at all. If Jesus Christ "straightway" did this and that, as Mark always takes care to tell us He did, let us imitate His promptitude, and serve God without the sluggard's delays.

PROPORTIONATE SUPPLIES PROVIDED.

III. I close with the third point, that each man would receive supplies "according to his charge." I do not quite understand the precise and definite bearing of my text. Surely it means, not only that one set of officers was to send in the barley, but that another set of officers was to receive the barley and the straw in proportion to the number of horses and dromedaries. "Barley also and straw for the horses and dromedaries brought they unto the place where the officers were, every one according to his charge;" that is to say, according to the number of horses to be provided for, such was the amount of corn and of straw that was sent in for their food.

1. So I gather, first, that concerning the servants of our Lord Jesus Christ a great charge from Him is a guarantee of great supplies. There is something very comfortable about this as to temporals. Some declare that God sends mouths and does not send bread; or at least they say He sends the mouths to one house and the bread to another. If it be so, those who get too much bread should send it round to their neighbors. Yet I note that somehow where there are mouths bread does come.

It often amazes me, I must confess, and it brings tears to my eyes when I see it, and indeed it is perfectly wonderful, that poor widows with a swarm of little children do feed them in some fashion. The poor woman comes to the Orphanage about a little boy, and she does not like to part with him, but want compels; and when we have said, "My good woman, how many children had you when your husband died?" she has replied, "Seven, sir, and none of them able to earn a penny." "You have been fighting your way alone these three or four years, how have you done it?" "Ah, sir," she answers, "God only knows. I cannot tell you." No, no; and there are many of God's dear children who could not tell you how they lived, but they have lived, and their children too. The Lord leaves them a great charge, and in His own way He sends a supply.

Most of us have found that if our King sends us the dromedaries He sends us the barley. It has been so in my case in the matter of our two hundred and fifty orphan children at Stockwell; our gracious God has always sent us enough, and the boys have known no lack; and when we receive another two hundred and fifty children, and have girls as well as boys, I feel sure our heavenly Father will provide for them all. I hope you will all recollect that the provision must come instrumentally through the Lord's own people, and much of it through the readers and hearers of the sermons, but come it will.

If my Lord puts more dromedaries into my stable I shall look for the corresponding increase in the barley and the straw, for I am quite sure He will send it. When I think of my dear friend, Mr. George Müller, with 2050 orphan children, and nothing to depend upon, as they say, but just prayer and faith, I rejoice greatly. He never has a fear or a want, and is as restful as if he were an incarnate Sabbath. If we had twenty thousand orphans to feed, our Master is quite able to supply them all. He feeds the universe, and we may well trust Him. If we have a simple, childlike faith, we shall find that a great charge is a guarantee of a great supply: "Every man according to his charge."

As it is in temporals, so is it in grace. When God gives a man a few people to look after, He gives him grace enough; and when He gives him ten times that number, He gives him more of His Holy Spirit; and when He gives him a hundred times that number, He increases the divine anointing. If the Lord sends you a little trial, dear brother, you shall have grace enough, and if He sends you a huge trial you shall still have grace enough. If He gives you some little work to do in the back settlements, your strength shall be as your day, and if He allots you a great charge in the front of the enemy's fire you shall not come short.

"Every man according to his charge." You will not have a farthing's worth of grace over. You shall never have so much that you can boast about it, and talk of having lived for months without sinning, and the like kind of nonsense. You shall be forced to feel that, when you have done all, you are an unprofitable servant. Never in my life have I had in the morning, left from yesterday's manna, as much as would cover a threepenny-piece. I have always been so hungry that I have had to devour all I could get there and then. I have lived from hand to mouth; the hand has been that of my Lord, which is ever full, and the mouth has been mine and it has been always gaping for more. When in my ministry I have had a double quantity of food, I have had a double number to feed upon it. The Lord's grace has been sufficient for my necessities, but it has never left me room for glorying in self. Still, take it as a sure fact that a great charge is a guarantee of a great supply.

2. Now we will turn the truth over, and say that a great supply indicates a great charge. Oh that some would think of this! A man has grown richer than he used to be. Brother, with more barley and more straw you ought to keep more dromedaries; I mean, that God did not send that corn for the mice to destroy, but he means it to be eaten.

The man who much receives but nothing gives is dead while he lives. He who has great receipts should reckon that he has a great charge, and act accordingly. When a brother has great talents, great possessions, great influence—when he is great at any thing—by God's grace let him say, "God requireth great things of me; for to whom much is given, of him shall much be required." It is a law of the kingdom of Christ—a law which he will take care is always carried out.

NO ESCAPE FROM RESPONSIBILITY.

So I finish up with this: somebody will say, "I could almost wish that I could escape from the responsibility of being a servant of Christ." Dear brother, take note of these two or three facts.

You cannot better your circumstances as a servant of Christ by diminishing your charge. If you say, "I shall not attempt quite so much," you will not improve your circumstances by that course; for if you diminish work, the Lord will diminish the strength. Our great Solomon will stop some of the supplies if you have fewer dromedaries to feed, and so you will be no better off. If you have to keep six He will give you provision for six; if you take to keeping three He will only give you supplies for three, and you will be poorer rather than richer.

Neither can you improve your circumstances by entirely and only increasing the supply; for, if you receive more straw and barley, certainly our Solomon will send you more dromedaries. When you have more strength you will have more trials. When God's children do not discharge their service with the means which He intrusts to them, He frequently lets them take shares in a "limited liability company," which is the same thing as throwing your money into the river; or He leaves them to become shareholders in a breaking bank, with unlimited catastrophe as its capital, and this is more terrible still.

It often happens to a man who has scraped and saved, and stinted the cause of Christ, that in his later years he is in straits, and he cries to himself, "It is all gone, and I wish I had used it better before it went. It would have been far better to give it to the Lord than to see the lawyers devour it." Ah! your sin has found you out. Your Master could not trust you, and so He has taken away His goods from you, and now you wish that you had behaved yourself. Let us take warning from such bad managers; and let us see that, as our charge is so we cry for supplies, and that as the supplies come we use them wisely.

Every thing for Jesus, the glorious Solomon of our hearts, the Beloved of our souls! Life for Jesus! Death for Jesus! Time for Jesus! Eternity for Jesus! Hand and heart for Jesus! Brain and tongue for Jesus! Night and day for Jesus! Sickness or health for Jesus! Honor or dishonor for Jesus! Shame or glory for Jesus! Every thing for Jesus, "every man according to his charge." So may it be! Amen.

[The prayers of the readers of this Journal are requested for the blessing of God upon its Editors in America and England, and those whose sermons, articles, or labors for Christ are printed in it and for its weekly circulation of more than 165,000 copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to the conversion of many sinners and the quickening of God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage especially request prayer every Sunday morning on behalf of their labors.]

MARVELLOUS ANSWER TO PRAYER.

Mr. James B. Silkman, of 54 Wall Street, New York, writes to the N. Y. Daily Witness: I have taken special pains to investigate the published account of the most remarkable case of Miss Carrie F. Judd, who was healed of a chronic spinal affection in answer to the prayer of a colored woman who has the "gift of healing," and not only find that the statements are genuine and authentic, but I have procured Miss Judd's signature to the following narrative, which was first written by the young lady to a friend. Her father, Mr. O. K. Judd, of 260 Commercial Street, Buffalo, has for more than a quarter of a century been connected with the American Express Office; the lady herself is a member in good standing of St. Mary's Episcopal Church, Buffalo, Rev. C. F. A. Beilby, rector, and is well known by Professor Buckham of the Normal School, etc. I have a letter from Mrs. Mix's husband which corroborates what Mrs. Mix has written.

"On January 6, 1877, after a gradual decline of health, I was prostrated with an attack of nervous fever, proceeding from my spine, the result, probably, of a severe fall on a stone sidewalk several months before. My disease grew into settled spinal difficulty, accompanied with hyperæsthesia of my spine, hips, knees, and ankles. So great was the sensitiveness of these portions of my body that it was impossible for myself even to touch them, however lightly, and we often had to take means to prevent my clothes touching them. The nerves in my spine and large joints were so unnaturally alive, that they felt as if they were bare, and the slightest noise or jar in the room would cause them to vibrate, giving me great agony.

"I suffered such intense pain in my head that I could scarcely live, and sometimes I could not even stir my eyelids. I could not endure a ray of light, and my sense of hearing was unnaturally acute. We were obliged to exclude everybody from the room excepting those who had the care of me. I became more and more helpless, until I could not turn over alone or move myself a particle in bed, though I helped myself as long as it was in any way possible. Every move had to be made for me with the greatest care. For eleven months I could not sit up at all, but at the end of that time I began to improve slowly, and commenced sitting up a few moments each day.

"I continued to improve very slowly until the following summer, when I was able to sit up part of the day, though I could not by my greatest exertions get able to help myself any. The only way in which I could be lifted from the bed to the chair was by being lifted under my arms, as I could endure no pressure on my spine. Owing to the very warm weather at that time, and to the fact of my over-exerting myself when so weak, I was taken very violently worse, and continued to fail in spite of every thing that was done for me, until last February (though I rallied a little the previous Fall).

"Last February I was so weak that it was only by the greatest effort that I could speak even in a whisper, and sometimes I could only move my lips. Often the exertion of speaking only one word in a whisper would cause the perspiration to start out all over me. I would lie for hours needing something rather than ask for it. They brought me an alphabet, torn from a primer, but I was too weak to move my finger from one letter to another. I could take no solid food whatever, and my weakness was so extreme that I could scarcely swallow liquid fluid. Often my nurse, after giving me a spoonful of nourishment, would have to wait several moments before giving me another, as it exhausted me to take it. For several months I had been obliged to take 'pepsin' to aid digestion.

"My disease had grown into blood-consumption, and my largest veins looked like mere threads. I was so cold that nothing could keep me warm, and I was emaciated to a mere shadow. Most of the time I could only lie gasping for breath, and I suffered so excruciatingly, even in my sleep, that when I awoke I would be perfectly exhausted; I was so weak that even the weight of my arms and limbs seemed to be dragging me to pieces, and this terrible strain was always constant. My pulse could scarcely be found, and I was not expected to live from one day to the next.

"About this time we heard of a colored lady, Mrs. Edward Mix, of Wolcottville, Ct., who performed wonderful cures by the power of prayer. At my request, sister Eva wrote her a few lines, telling her that I believed her great faith might avail for me if she would pray for my recovery. On Tuesday, February 25th, her answer came as follows:

"'Wolcottville, Conn., Feb. 24, 1879.

"'Miss Carrie Judd: I received a line from your sister Eva, stating your case, your disease, and your faith. I can encourage you by the Word of God, that according to your faith so be it unto you; and besides you have this promise, "The prayer of faith shall save the sick, and the Lord shall raise him up." Whether the person is present or absent, if it is a prayer of faith it is all the same, and God has promised to raise up the sick ones, and if they have committed sins to forgive them. Now this promise is to you as if you were the only person living. Now if you can claim that promise, I have not the least doubt but what you will be healed.

"'You will first have to lay aside all the medicine of every description. Use no remedies of any kind for any thing. Lay aside trusting in the arm of flesh, and lean wholly upon God and His promises. When you receive this letter I want you to begin to pray for faith, and Wednesday afternoon the female prayer-meeting is at our house. We will make you a subject of prayer between the hours of three and four. I want you to pray for yourself, and pray believing, and then act faith. It makes no difference how you feel, but get right out of bed and begin to walk by faith. Strength will come, disease will depart, and you will be made whole. We read in the Gospel, "Thy faith hath made thee whole." Write soon. Yours in faith,

"'Mrs. Edward Mix.'

"Mrs. Mix, you will perceive, quoted several Bible promises, told me to pray for faith, and directed me to leave off all medicine, which I did. She said that on Wednesday, February 26th, the female prayer-meeting would be held at her house, when they would make me a subject of prayer, between the hours of three and four.

"At the time appointed, members of our family also offered up prayer, though not in my room. I felt a sudden and remarkable increase of faith, different from any thing which I had ever experienced. There was no excitement, but a feeling of faith and confidence. Without the least fear or hesitation I turned over and raised up alone for the first time in over two years. Directly after, with a little support from Mrs. H., I walked to m chair. I had not borne any weight on my feet (except as I made unsuccessful attempts to do so when so much better the summer before) fo two years and two months. During the same hour that prayer was being offered in my behalf a great change was perceptible in my color, circulation, and pulse.

"Referring to my diary, which Mrs. H. wrote, find under Feb. 28th: 'This afternoon, after sitting up, she walked from her chair to the bed, distance of about eight feet, by taking hold o my arms. The Lord strengthens her every hour. Then under Feb. 29th, 'I gave her a sponge-bath and could not help but notice the change in th color of her flesh; instead of the yellow, dea look, it is pink and full of life.' Under Marc 2d: 'Her chest and lungs have been strong; sh has talked aloud a great deal, appetite good, colo fresh and clear.'

"In about three weeks from the time I firs commenced getting better I could walk all aroun the room without even having any one near me in four weeks I walked downstairs with a litt assistance. I walked very steadily from the firs We could almost see my muscles fill out; still, suffered nothing from aching or lameness, would be naturally the case. The first pleasa day in April I went out of doors and into a neig bor's. One can fully appreciate the fact of m walking, when I tell him that my spine and lar joints had become so weakened by the hyperæ thesia, that they were like cartilage, and if by a human power I could have been placed upon m feet I should have immediately been all out shape. They however became strong and fir at once. I have continued to improve in streng and flesh. I can walk several blocks witho resting, and since June have taught my class Sunday-school. I have not taken a drop of me cine since February 25th. My friends say tha look much better than I did before I was pr trated.

"I wish to add that Dr. Chas. Cullis, of B ton, whose faith-works and faith-cures are widely known, kindly added his prayers for complete recovery.

"All praise be to Him who, in answer to t prayer of faith, fulfilled His own Word (Jan 5:14, 15), and raised me up from a dying b Yours sincerely, Carrie F. Judd.'

MAN'S FIRST AND LAST HOME.

By William Maude.

(Continued from p. 941.)

II. Secondly, regarded in its typical asp the city presents humanity as in contrast to individual isolation. There w but two individuals in the garden in close simple relationship, of social equality, of un veloped powers, and placed in circumstance absolute independence. Even had Adam and remained long enough in their condition Edenic innocence to have fulfilled the Di injunction, "Be fruitful, and multiply, and plenish the earth" (Gen. 1:28), man c hardly, while he continued to inhabit the gar of Eden and to find his sole occupation in "dressing and keeping," have advanced in litical organization beyond the family.

PERFECTED IN SOCIAL UNION

It was not till the expulsion from Eden been necessitated by the occurrence of the that men began the building of cities and formation of states (Gen. 4:17). But in act antithesis with what is thus written of garden, the city embodies the threefold id complex relationship, of diversity of rank office, and more especially of a mystical un

1. The city embodies the idea of comple lationship. We have not in this case prese to us only the primary domestic relationshi husband and wife, parent and child, bu wider and more complex relations of citiz citizen, of the citizens in general to those p in positions of special influence and auth and of these again, the higher as well a lower, to the supreme ruler, whether govern

g. In the New Jerusalem the Edenic germ-of the family is indeed retained, but it is ated and expanded till it embraces the whole eemed family in heaven and earth, the more plex relationships involved in which con-tion can only be adequately represented under figure of a city, the inhabitants of which, des their common bond of loyalty and love he Father-king, hold various subsidiary re-ons to each other in the way of mutual ser-
, sympathy, and subordination.

Again, the city embodies the idea of diver- of rank and office for the common good.
king, the royal family, the court, the great cers of state, and the various professions and ings—all these are found in the capital of an hly empire, and doubtless will have their nterparts in the New Jerusalem. For though heavenly city is indeed described as "the le, the Lamb's wife," and John has shown "coming down from God out of heaven as ide adorned for her husband," yet this most ious and expressive figure is not intended to slavishly adhered to as to exclude all others.
he writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, for nple, speaks of the heavenly Jerusalem as prehending not only "the general assem-
," and "the Church of the first-born ones," also "the spirits of just men made perfect" brews 2 : 22, 23). St. Paul tells us that as ere is one glory of the sun, and another y of the moon, and another glory of the s, and as one star differeth from another star lory, so also is the resurrection from the l" (1 Cor. 15 : 41, 42). And in the last ter of the Revelation, in direct reference to New Jerusalem, it is said : "And there shall o more curse ; but the throne of God and of Lamb shall be in it ; and His servants shall e Him" (Rev. 22 : 3).

hile, in beautiful harmony with these repre-ations, we find that the promises made in Epistles to the Seven Churches to the "overers"—and it is the "overcomers" as such have the right to enter into the city—ext a sublime gradation of reward, from the g of the tree of life and exemption from the nd death to the being made a pillar in the ple of God, and sitting with Christ in His ne even as Christ overcame and sat down
His Father in His throne.

Once more, the city embodies the idea of t we may call a mystical unity. The city is
; it has a corporate and ideal existence apart the mere arithmetical aggregation of its in-tants, or the number and appearance of its icular streets. All great cities have a parlar character as a whole which distinguish from all other cities. London is not as s, nor New York as Constantinople. The bitants of certain cities have a special name ied to them, and they boast the possession, irtue of their citizenship, of special rights, unities, and privileges. They have common s for defence, common temples for worship, mon marts for business, common traditions e past, and common anticipations for the re.

ow the ideal unity thus indicated and sought in the earthly city, is perfectly realized in New Jerusalem. The heavenly city "lieth square—the length, and the breadth, and the ht of it are equal." In other words, it is xact cube, indicative of perfection, to which ing could be added, and from which nothing d be taken away, without destroying its y and completeness. And the truth which representation is intended to teach us is ly the oneness of redeemed humanity, a h which St. Paul expresses under another e when he says, "We being many are one one body" (1 Cor. 10 : 17).

ad Adam remained unfallen, we may reason-conclude that his descendants, as they hed the limits of their probation, would in-dually, by translation, have been transferred higher state, and thus the city of God would remained at least beyond the range of hly vision. But when Christ came to work out man's redemption, the city, as it were, at once began to descend from heaven, for Christ redeemed His people not individually, but rather as one body ; and though it is the privilege of the believer to be able to say, Christ "loved me, and gave Himself for me,' it is only as this is included in the deeper and wider truth—"Christ loved the Church, and gave Himself for her" (Gal. 2 : 20 ; Eph. 5 : 25).

III. Emblematically regarded, again, the city, as contrasted with the garden, suggests to us the ideas of ETERNITY AND UNCHANGEABLENESS.

Summer after summer our gardens delight us with their blooming beauty, but alas ! how soon they wither with the shortening days ! Autumn after autumn the harvest is gathered in, and the denuded fields left bare and bleak to the storms and snows of winter ; year after year the trees are stripped of their beautiful foliage, and stretch forth imploringly their bare gaunt arms, crying aloud in every blast for the coming of eternal spring.

But yon city's walls have stood the storms of centuries, and its gray old towers have looked down, all but unchanged, as the generations of men have come and passed away. Enter this ancient church, and you realize with a strange, vague awe that here the voice of prayer ascended long ages ago, and the organ pealed forth its grand music to men who to you are though they had lived before the flood. The grass withers, the seasons roll on, the generations perish, but the city abides.

Now these ideas of eternity and unchangeableness are presented to us in the New Jerusalem with wondrous force and beauty. In the garden of Eden every object that surrounded Adam was in its nature perishable. Its flowers, however lovely, were doomed to fade ; its fruit, however pleasant to the taste, formed and ripened and decayed ; the seasons, as they succeeded each other, brought with them change and decay as well as renewed beauty and verdure.

But in the heavenly city all is

PERMANENT AND UNFADING.

Time cannot breathe on its incorruptible beauty, or change dim the splendor of its divine light. Perhaps in some moment of thoughtful meditation the question may have suggested itself to us, But how will it really add to my happiness to walk on streets of gold, and be surrounded by walls of jasper, and pass in and out through gates of pearl, and behold the mingled colors of the rarest jewels ?

Will not this cold, hard splendor repel rather than attract ? shall I not feel that I can never be at home beneath this weight of glory, within these dazzling walls ? But this is altogether to miss the teaching of the symbolism. The flower perishes at the very touch of fire, but the gold and jewels of the New Jerusalem have passed through the fires fierce enough to melt the very elements of this world, in order that by destruction they might be rendered indestructible ; and hence they are the most beautiful and appropriate materials for the city which is to be "an eternal excellency—a joy of everlasting ages." In the house of immortality there must exist no elements of decay.

IV. Still—and this is the last point that we can notice—the home-hunger of the soul seems to be unsatisfied till by looking more carefully into the divine mystery we come to see that in our idea of the garden are preserved in the wider conception of the city. That, in other words, the heart of Paradise is inclosed in the casket of the New Jerusalem. We should, in thinking of a city as the last home of the redeemed, bear in mind the fact that the ancient cities of the East differed widely from our modern Western ones. They were not merely a number of buildings crowded together as closely as possible, but covered a vast extent of ground, and inclosed within their walls gardens, parks, and even cornfields, and pasture lands with their flocks and herds.

THE DIVINEST ELEMENTS

It is very interesting and very suggestive to notice how some of the features in the description of the garden as man's first home reappear in the description given of the city as his last. "A river went out of Eden to water the garden ;" and in the New Jerusalem John saw "a pure river of the water of life." In the midst of the garden there was the tree of life ; and in the Epistle to the church of Ephesus it is promised, 'To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the paradise of God" (Rev. 2 : 7). There is, then, a paradise in the future as well as in the past. And where is it located ? Plainly within the New Jerusalem, for it is written, "In the midst of the street of it, and on either side of the river, was there the tree of life" (Rev. 22 : 2).

But observe at the same time how every thing is elevated, transformed, glorified. The river of the old paradise was filled only with that water of which "whosoever drinketh of it shall thirst again ;" but the river of the New Jerusalem is "a pure river of the water of life, clear as crystal, proceeding out of the throne of God and of the Lamb." The tree of life as it grew in Eden was one, yielding only one manner of fruit, and that only in its season. But the trees of life in the celestial city are many in number, bearing twelve kinds of fruit, and yielding that fruit every month.

Oh, let us not fear that aught that is sweet and beautiful and good on earth shall be found lacking in heaven. It is an eternal truth which the poet expresses when he says,

"All that is beautiful shall abide,
Only the base shall die."

One thing indeed there is, and it constitutes the crowning glory of the city, which had no foreshadow in the garden, where God, if not a stranger, was but a guest ; it is said : "There shall be no more curse, but the throne of God and of the Lamb shall be in it ; and His servants shall serve Him, and they shall see His face, and His name shall be in their foreheads" (Rev. 22 : 8, 4). In the light of this divine assurance the vision of the olden paradise finally fades and dies, and in the holy city, New Jerusalem, we recognize the Father's house, the eternal home and rest of our immortal spirit.

Reader, art thou, like Abraham, looking for this city which hath foundations whose builder and maker is God ? Does the far-off vision of its glory even now cheer and irradiate the oftentimes dark and toilsome pathway of thy earthly pilgrimage ? Canst thou say, with assurance of faith, "Our feet shall stand within thy walls, O Jerusalem !" Happy are the people that are in such a case ; for of a truth, "Glorious things are spoken of thee, O city of God !"

Scenes of Inhuman Barbarity in Russia show that whatever the power of that country may be, it cannot claim to have emerged from barbarism, or to be governed by the principles of the Christian religion. A case recently described by the correspondent of the London Times is an instance of the barbarity of the people and the courts. "The wife of a peasant in the district of Kremenetz appealed to the courts against her husband, charging him with beating and torturing her and with keeping her in the cold without food until she had nearly died of starvation. He had bound her stark naked to a post in the street and requested the passers-by to strike her, which he did himself each time they refused to do so. The inhuman brute had even fastened her down to the ground, and in such a position had heaped stones and heavy weights upon her body until one of her arms had been broken. When the wife's accusation was brought before the local tribunal, the wife-beater was found 'not guilty,' on the plea that a husband has the perfect right to beat his wife if he so chooses. On the following day the husband, emboldened by the decision, brought a counter-complaint against his wife before the same court, and it actually declared against the unfortunate woman, and by its judgment she was actually flogged publicly there and then on the spot in the most shameful manner."

A WEIGHT OF WEALTH.

(Continued from page 943.)

Clifford's Heir.

ERNEST looked up expectantly to the small window of the closet adjoining his own study, where his motherless child slept, and which he could enter with quiet footfall any moment of the long evenings he often spent alone and mark every change on the sweet, rosy face asleep on the little bed. He was not disappointed, for Rose was already up and dressed, and was watching for him, with her face pressed close against the window. She ran down swiftly, and he heard her fingers busy at the fastenings of the door, which were but slight ones, for no one feared housebreakers in Clifford. There was no lack of warmth in Rose's welcome. She pulled down his sad face to hers and covered it with kisses.

" How I've missed you, father !" she said. " Why did you stay away from me all night ? I got up so early to see if you wouldn't come. I was going to run up to grandpapa's after you, if you hadn't come soon."

" Rose," he said solemnly, " I was watching with your grandfather till he went away from us all."

" Where is he gone?" she asked in an earnest, emphatic tone.

Ernest was silent as he drew his little daughter into the homely room where his breakfast was being laid. What could he say in reply to the important question we ask of each one that passes away from our sight and ken ? He had hitherto been so much occupied with his own position that the thought of the old man's destiny had barely touched his mind. No one knew him as well as he did, no man was better fitted to pronounce upon his doom ; but Ernest's heart sank within him as he vainly tried, for an instant, to follow the journey his step-father had taken since he had left his questioning little daughter.

" He is gone to his own place," he murmured half aloud.

" Is it a pleasant place ?" asked Rose. " Is it where you'd like us two to go, father ?"

" No, no !" he answered hastily, pressing the child closer to him ; " my darling, your grandfather is dead."

" Like my poor mamma !" said Rose in a pitiful tone. " Never mind, father. I'll make up to you for him, as well as for poor mamma. Don't I make up for her to you ?"

" Yes, my little girl," he answered tenderly.

" Are you very, very sorry he is dead ?" she inquired again, after a little pause. She did not find that she felt very sorry. He was a yellow, toothless, rough-faced old man, with a mumbling voice, of whom she had been secretly afraid ; though she had too much native sweetness and grace to show it in any way. " Are you very sorry ?"

" I am grieved," answered Ernest, stroking his child's sunny curls with as loving a touch as a mother's. For the first time he felt an emotion of grief for the old man ; for his wasted life, so long in passing, and so solitary in its close. Could it be possible that he had possessed the same absorbing love for Charles which Rose received from him ? What poignant anguish must the forsaken father have undergone ! What a sore spirit must he have carried about with him under his proud mien for many a past month ! The only love that had ever reached the man's hard and selfish heart had pierced it through with many sorrows.

" You'll never be very grieved for long while I'm with you !" said Rose wistfully.

" Why no ! How could I ?" he replied, rousing himself from his mournful reverie. " If my little girl is very good, and very happy, I couldn't be sorry for long. Now give me my breakfast, little woman." It was an unfailing pleasure to him to see the flush of mingled anxiety and happiness that mounted to Rose's face when she was employed in pouring out his coffee, the only part she could yet take in the management of the breakfast table. She was not tall enough to sit down to her task, and she stood at the tray, with a grave face puckered up into supernatural seriousness, as she carefully portioned out the cream and sugar, and poured out the hot coffee, breaking out into a triumphant little laugh as she placed the full cup in safety before him.

" There ! You'll never pour out my coffee for me again," she said, " as you used to do when I was a little girl. Not if I never break any of the cups and saucers ? Don't make believe I'm little again, please. I'm going to learn how to mend your stockings ; and some day, when I am quite tall, I shall wash your surplices and iron them. I'm almost a woman now I think. Was it very cold and dark all night, father ?"

" It was neither cold nor dark in your grandfather's room," he answered.

" Poor grandpapa !" said Rose, in a voice of awe and pity ; " did he know he was going away all alone ? Did he want to stay here a little longer ? Would grandmamma have gone with him if she could ? He would have liked somebody to go with him."

" She would rather stay with us as long as she can," replied Ernest.

" Father !" cried Rose, running to him, and throwing herself in his arms, " if you were obliged to go away, I should want to come too. I should never, never like you to leave me behind. Didn't you want to go with poor mamma when God called her ?"

" My little daughter," he answered, with soothing caresses, " we have no choice offered to us. Thank God, we are not called upon to choose whether we will go with those we love, or stay behind ! God calls each of us when He sees it best ; and none can refuse to obey, neither can we go till He calls."

" It is so strange and dreadful," sobbed Rose, hiding her face on his breast, and clasping him more tightly in her arms.

" Why ! how's this ?" he said. " My little woman was quite merry a minute ago, and now she is crying her poor little heart away. Did you love your grandfather so much ?"

" I didn't love him enough," she faltered between her sobs ; " if I'd only known I'd have tried to love him better. And now he'll never speak to me again ; and he's gone alone by himself ; and I'm afraid it's not a pleasant place, for you said you would not like you and me to go there. If I was there I'd ask God to let him go to a quiet room, where he could rest himself a little while, because he is so old ; and he should have some very quiet angels to take care of him. Might I ask God for it ? Perhaps it would not be too late yet."

" You may ask God for every thing you wish," answered Ernest soothingly. There could, he thought, be no harm in teaching his child that : but he was reluctant to burden her young mind with any theory of the great mystery and tragedy which he had just witnessed. It came home to himself more closely than any death had done since his wife's, and had awakened a whole host of questions that slumber easily enough in the recesses of the brain as long as death passes by our own circle.

He exerted himself to chase away the gloom on Rose's face ; and presently she was sitting again at the head of the table, chattering almost gayly, though a suppressed sob now and then forced itself from her lips. Her father had soon to leave her to go again to Clifford Grange, and Rose ran upstairs to her little room to ask God to grant a very quiet place to her old grandfather.

Ernest then set out for the Grange, and his way led through the whole length of the village street. The place was in an unusual stir and excitement, with groups of men and women standing here and there talking busily. Only the very oldest among them could remember the death of the last Clifford of Clifford, more than sixty years before ; and the news that their old master had at last laid down the burden of his extreme age had shaken the village as with the shock of an earthquake. There was no other death that could come so closely home to all of them.

They had neither loved nor respected him ; but he had been their chief, with power in hi hands which he could use for their welfare or ir jury. But it was not so much his loss, as th question who would succeed him, that was ag tating them, every one. There was scarcely child among them who had not heard their dea master say that his runaway son should be cu off from his estates, and that his step-son shoul succeed to them. Now would come the confi mation of these oaths, if they had been genuin and true.

But there was the doubt. Old Charles Cli ford had worshipped his son so openly that seemed incredible he could really leave him pe niless and landless. The villagers were veh mently discussing this doubt when Master E nest, as they still called him, became visible i the street. He felt inclined to hurry past witho speaking to these weather-beaten, hard-feature men and women ; but they came thronging abo him with the familiarity of long acquaintance.

" So th' old squire's dead and gone," said th parish clerk, a hale old man of eighty himsel " and we're all a-wondering who's to come aft him up yonder. Please God, I say, as our Mast Ernest's made squire in his stead. That's wh I'm looking for, please His holy will !"

" Nay, nay !" cried a loud shrill woman voice, " Clifford's been Clifford time out o' min Master Ernest 'll never be offended with su as we if we wishes a Clifford to come into it ; a there's none save Master Charlie, as has been lo these four years."

" Well ! we shall all see what we shall see," sa the mistress of the dame-school, the only pers in the village of whom Rose stood in aw " there's a providence in all things ; and Mast Ernest's next to own son to the old squire ; a he's almost a Clifford. He'd get the Quee leave to change his name, so it would be all one

" But it wouldn't be the old breed," object the shrill voice.

" Th' old breed's a bad breed," interrupte sturdy fisherman ; " we don't want Mas Charlie to lord it over us. I'm for Master Erne Hurrah !"

" My good folks," shouted Ernest, to get hi self heard amid the din of contending voic " as a matter of course my brother Charles w come into the estates ; and no doubt he w quickly reappear now he is Clifford of Cliffo Some among you know his whereabouts, o am very much mistaken."

" Not me," " nor me," cried a chorus of voic " We want you to have it ; you'd make a v sight better squire than parson," cried out a stro voice after him, as he walked hurriedly " though we've nought to say agen you parson, Master Ernest. It's only my way speaking."

Ernest kept steadily on his way, the wo ringing in his ears. He knew only too well t he did not and could not make a good pars and that the rough honest fellows about h knew it quite as well as he did. What wa that was so necessary to make him a true, e cient minister to the spiritual wants of this lit community, so shut in and hedged round fr the great world ? They loved him heartily af their fashion, and looked up to him as the m learned and scholarly man in the place.

They also looked up to him as one who co give them good counsel about their fields a their boats. There was not a fisherman am them who would not rather have him in his bo on a stormy and dangerous sea, than any ot man in the village. He was a leader am them in all things save one ; but that one the very soul of the profession he had ente into. The moment he put on the garb o clergyman he ceased to be their guide ; and k himself to be the blind leading the blind. A they knew by instinct also (Luke 6 : 39).

As Ernest drew nearer to the Grange, and its quaint old-fashioned gray pile of building ing sheltered within its own curving brow of cliff, these vexing thoughts died away, to place to others as vexing. How would he be to bear to see his brother leading a riotous, reputable life within its walls; and probably in the course of a few years bring the old place to the hammer? It had perhaps grown dearer to him since he had looked at it with the eye of a possible owner than it had been before; but it had always been an object of admiration to him. Charles was not fit to be master of it; yet he was left in absolute, unrestricted, immediate possession.

The house seemed dark and dreary when he ntered it. With a step that echoed noisily hrough the silent, stone-paved hall, Ernest rossed it to the door of the room where he knew e should find his mother. She was seated in a ow easy-chair on the hearth in the darkened oom, her face hidden behind the handkerchief he was holding up to her eyes.

Though she was nearly fifty years of age she vas still slim and almost girlish in figure; and er face, though there were a few lines on the orehead, and crow's-feet about the corners of he eyes, was nearly as round, and fair, and full, s when she had married a second time, twenty-ive years ago. Ernest stooped down to kiss her, ith an unusual emotion of tenderness and comassion for his mother, once again a widow.

It was not probable that she could feel any rofound grief at the loss that had just befallen er. Her husband, like any other man utterly rapped up in self, had made her life a weariness nd burden to her. The little love she might nce have cherished for one who had taken her om poverty, and who was the father of her vorite son, had long ago been worn out. But e had not failed in the fulfilment of her duty wards him; partly, perhaps, because he had ever released his claim upon it. She did not ft up her head when Ernest kissed her; but e moaned a little, and rocked herself to and o, as if bound to prove in this manner the epth of her affliction.

There was another occupant of the room, hower, who hailed Ernest's appearance with eageress; an elderly man, short-sighted, and slightly eaf, who had been sitting sideways by the table, d strumming upon it with his fingers, in a perexed and uncomfortable silence. He sprang up e instant the door opened, and shook hands rriedly and warmly.

"I'm here, Ernest," he said. "I came over is morning to see if I couldn't persuade the d man to do right at last. So he's gone, and m too late! I was at him only a week ago, en I saw him last. Make another will, I said; d he swore he never would. Ah! well! we ust all knock under, sooner or later, as I've en telling your mother. What is it in the urch service? There's 'but a step' between and old Clifford (1 Sam. 20:3). Susan is ore overcome than I expected; but time, Erst, time will work wonders."

"Time has not worked many wonders for me t, uncle," answered Ernest. "Come, mother, must attend to business now my uncle is here. ere are a good many matters to arrange."

"I have no heart for business so soon," murred the widow from behind her handkerchief.

'Come, come, Susan!" said her brother arply, "I cannot leave my business every day, an tell you, to dance upon you. But I know ite well the provisions of your husband's will, d the directions he has left for his funeral; so need not look to that. A handsome funeral will be, I promise you, and will cost a mint of ney. But there! he had a perfect right to do at he chose with his own."

(To be continued.)

THE LAST WORDS.

S. Lesson for Dec. 21st. Rev. 22 : 6-21. Golden Text, ver. 21. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

IT appears that in this last chapter of the velation two voices were speaking to the Apos John—that of the angel (see 21 : 9), who is same as in verses 6, 8–11 of our subject, and o seems to speak again in verses 11 and 15. en the Lord Himself seems to break in (vers. 7 12, 13, 16–21), God gave the Revelation to Son (Rev. 1 : 1), and Jesus to the angel (21 : 16), the angel to John (22 : 6), and John to the churches (1 : 4).

"And I John saw these things, and heard them. And when I had heard and seen, I fell down to worship before the feet of the angel which shewed me these things. Then saith He unto me, See thou do it not: for I am thy fellow-servant, and of thy brethren the prophets, and of them which keep the sayings of this book: worship God." It would seem as though the angel were a glorified man, a redeemed soul like John himself, whom the Lord made use of to bear His messages, and make known his counsels in the future to the Apostle. He himself kept "the sayings of this book," and says to John, "Seal not the sayings of the prophecy of this book; for the time is at hand."

Is not this injunction, in common with Rev. 1 : 3, and the reiterated declaration of the Lord's speedy coming (chaps. 3 : 3, 11; 16 : 15; 22 : 7, 12, 20), a testimony sufficiently strong against the indifference and neglect of this book among a large number of Christians? What would we say to a wife to whom an absent husband wrote details concerning his return journey, and who laid the latter aside, saying, "It is too complicated and difficult, besides it is not important?" The heart of love would learn every line, search out carefully all the details, make all the needful arrangements, and then read and reread, lest any thing should have been forgotten. When we love our Lord, then all our life is lived in reference to His return, and has a provisionary character until He comes.

It is distinctly asserted that the time is at hand. Therefore, "He that is unjust, let him be unjust still; and he which is filthy, let him be filthy still; and he that is righteous, let him be righteous still; and he that is holy, let him be holy still." It would seem as though two classes were here mentioned among the saved and two among the unsaved, just or "righteous"—i.e., justified or forgiven, but of the justified some are also "holy." Then of the unjust or unjustified, some are also "filthy," deeper dyed in sin than others, as in the awful descending scale (James 3 : 15): first, earthly; second, sensual; third, devilish."

Now what is our position in the light of Christ's return? justified? thank God! "but as He which hath called you is holy, so be ye holy in all manner of conversation; because it is written, Be ye holy, for I am holy" (1 Pet. 1 : 15, 16). For in whatsoever state we are found when He returns, in that state shall we be still—i.e., so shall we remain. Every opportunity of self-conquest in the name and for the sake of Christ comes only once in our lives; the same may seem to come again, but as it bears another date, it is not really the same, and the victory which is not gained is lost; another may be gained, but that one is lost forever. "Behold, I come quickly," says our Lord; "and My reward is with Me, to give every man according as his work shall be."

"I am Alpha and Omega" (i.e., A and O being the first and last letters of the Greek Alphabet), "the beginning and the end, the first and the last." This Christ is in Himself; is He this to us? Is He the first and the last in our business, so that He is considered before ourselves as our business partner, and His interests watched over before those of the business itself? In our pursuits, studies, occupation, work for God, etc., is Christ first, is His word law, has He always liberty of entrance, is He permitted to alter all He will? In our family arrangements, the dress and schooling of the children, the furniture, guests, food, does Jesus rule and reign? is He the first and last considered in every arrangement, or not?

Now follows a blessing. This book is full of blessings. The first words which follow the title are a blessing, and the very closing words are a blessing too. And although the book is full of God's judgments upon sin, the golden thread of blessing runs throughout. Here it is: "Blessed are they that do His commandments" (some MSS. read, "Blessed are they which have washed their robes") "that they may have right to the tree of life, and may enter in through the gates into the city." The tree of life, forbidden to fallen man into whose being the principle of death had entered, is now set before redeemed man, who practises the obedience in which our first parents failed, and in whom the principle of eternal life has entered. For without are dogs, etc.—and whosoever loveth and maketh a lie (see also 21 : 27).

"I Jesus have sent Mine angel to testify unto you these things in the churches. I am the root and the offspring of David, and the bright and morning star." The root of David as well as the offspring. David came of Him who created him, and He came of David through His incarnation. And the bright and morning star. This is the star of which Balaam prophesied (Num. 24 : 17): "They that turn many to righteousness shall shine as the stars forever and ever" (Dan. 12 : 3). But there is only one Morning Star, one who has come to shine in the night and to herald the daybreak of His kingdom.

"And the Spirit and the bride say, Come." She is no bride who does not enter into the bridegroom's heart and do this work; and because He is come to seek and to save that which was lost, so must His bride, in His name and in His strength, seek for the lost and perishing to bring them unto Him. All the bearing of His bride should say to lost sinners, Come to Jesus; her words and deeds should all proclaim His invitation. There can be no heart to heart intercourse with Jesus if lost souls are no burden upon us. How can we leave those to perish for whom He died if we have any real love to Him?

But again: "Let him that heareth say, Come." The very fact that we have found Him ourselves is our warrant and our obligation to proclaim His salvation to others. Souls are perishing, and we are guilty of their blood (Eze. 3 : 18) if we are not winning them to Christ. It is not for us to put the responsibility on others. Love will find opportunities of speaking to them. But if no message by the hand of a brother reaches some longing soul, yet the Master has one for him. "Let him that is athirst come: and whosoever will, let him take the water of life freely." Thus the responsibility is thrown upon the sinner, and the only possible reason why any sinner is unsaved is that he has not chosen to accept the water of life which is offered to him freely, and now.

A solemn warning follows. In Deut. 4 : 2, and 12 : 32, God commanded, "Ye shall not add unto the Word which I command you, neither shall ye diminish aught from it." Here in our subject the Lord says, "I testify unto every man that heareth the words of the prophecy of this book. If any man shall add unto these things, God shall add unto him the plagues that are written in this book." Thus we see that there are literal plagues, like the plagues of Egypt. "And if any man shall take away from the words of the book of this prophecy, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, and out of the holy city, and from the things which are written in this book." Now, while we know that no man can pluck Christ's sheep out of His hand, who know His voice and follow Him (John (10 : 28), yet such a warning as this is not to be passed over lightly, for the Lord Himself declares that whoever takes from the words which are written in this book, God shall take away his part out of the book of life, etc.

"He which testifieth these things saith, Surely I come quickly. Amen." What shall we say to Him? Are we ready? Are our bodies, souls, houses, families, businesses, just ready for Him? Can we let out our hearts with John, and cry with tears, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." Oh! can we consent to live another hour in a state which does not warrant us in this call to Him to come? Can we be justified in living as though His coming were not imminent? You say, But He has tarried 1800 years. If your eyes are open you will see clear signs of His approach. Readers, "The grace of our Lord Jesus Christ be with you all. Amen."

1880.

As the year 1879 draws to a close, we thank the public of the United States and of Canada for the hearty appreciation with which it has received the CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES. The history of religious journalism in America can show no parallel to the success of this paper. In thirteen months it has found subscribers in every State of the Union, in five Provinces of Canada, in South America, in the West Indies, and in Polynesia. Besides, it is sold on the stands of the American News Company, from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The extracts given below represent only a small part of all the letters received by us within the brief space of about six weeks. They were taken as they came, yet they represent thirty-one States, besides several Canadian Provinces. We receive scores of such commendations every month. This rapid and wide-spread popularity is to be ascribed to:

1st. THE BLESSING OF ALMIGHTY GOD,

whose blessing has been implored by the proprietor and the conductors at every step of the enterprise, and who has been graciously pleased to prosper this attempt to publish the Gospel for the million—the pure Gospel and the simple Gospel, without a word of controversy or of denominational doctrines.

2d. THE CHARACTER OF THE PAPER.

The utmost pains are taken to illuminate the columns of every number. There is nothing dull or heavy in any part of the CHRISTIAN HERALD. The biographies are freshly written and are always extremely interesting. The serial stories are full of the Gospel of Jesus Christ; we choose this mode to present the Way of Salvation to persons who will not read any other part of the paper. Finally, the latest current sermons of Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage, of which we are the authorized publishers, are surpassed by no productions of uninspired man. The gospel has not been preached since the Reformation with greater clearness and power than it is by these two servants of God. Sermons by eminent preachers of other denominations are given occasionally.

3d. THE LOW PRICE.

A single copy, containing both the above-mentioned sermons, costs only three cents. The annual subscription is only $1.50, postage free. There has probably never been a religious paper of any description so cheap in this country; and the CHRISTIAN HERALD is a first-class and an illustrated paper. This makes it easy to collect subscriptions for it.

The public cannot be too positively informed that the sermons by Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon, published in this journal without fail every week, are the preachers' latest Sunday morning sermons, and are authenticated by them. Not one is hashed up. We get a manuscript copy of Dr. Talmage's sermon from the Doctor's own hand at No. 1, South Oxford Street, Brooklyn, every Monday morning; while in the case of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons, we have specially arranged with that minister's London publishers to receive advance sheets of them, so that we can publish the sermons before any one else can do so.

We offer exceptionally liberal terms to ministers, clubs, agents, and all benevolent and charitable institutions; and we invite any person, lady or gentleman, to act as agent, beginning, if he please, with only a single subscription. Very many persons of independent means have accepted this offer, and have relinquished their commission in order to give the paper to poor people or to unconverted acquaintances. Let any one send to us for a sample copy of our "Agent's Edition," and it will be mailed free.

NOTICE.

Subscriptions may begin at any time of the year, and they are taken for long or short periods; but no commission is allowed on a subscription of less than six months. Any person sending two names with $1.50 each may get the paper to himself, post free, for a year. The only restriction we insist upon is, that subscribers must send remittances with their orders. Our "Due Book" has been a plague of our existence during this year; so we have resolved to abolish it entirely. Therefore, let all who wish to renew for 1880, and all new subscribers, write and remit in response to this invitation.

THE following unsolicited expressions of appreciation and of gratitude, received during a few weeks, are a specimen of the hearty kindness with which our readers continually encourage us and our contributors in the common service of the Lord:

— —, Miss.: "I can truly say that I will be glad to know that the C. H. has a great circulation in this part of the country. . . . It is one of the best papers published, and should be taken and read by all Christians." (Sept. 2.)

— — —, Pa.: "I am taking a great interest in your paper, the C. H., and would like to make its circulation a still larger one."

— — —, Tex.: "I enjoy the reading of your paper. . . . The sermons cannot be excelled."

— — —, N. C.: "God bless your paper! I look upon it as a weekly treat. I am glad you publish those precious sermons by Talmage and Spurgeon." (Sept. 3.)

— — —, N. Y.: "I confess to surprise at the excellence of the HERALD. It is so good I want it for myself and my family."

— — —, N. J.: "Your valuable paper I esteem as one of the best published."

— — —, Ind.: "We will send the price of the paper for another year as soon as possible. We like the paper well." (Sept. 4.)

— — —, Wis.: "I like the paper very much."

— — —, N. Y.: "I like it very much, and thank you for it."

C. N. H., Iowa: "Your paper is well liked here." (Sept. 5.)

H. N. B., Me.: "I have received the sample copy of the C. H., and am delighted with it. I must have the paper."

H. T. M.: "Your valuable paper is borrowed,* read, and appreciated in Glasgow."

F. N. A., Conn.: "I have the HERALD every week from one of our newsdealers, and consider it the choicest of religious periodicals." (Sept. 8.)

J. W. H., Ohio: "I am a reader of your excellent paper, and appreciate it highly. I cannot help wishing you abundant success in your great and good work."

M. B., N. C.: "I am receiving the HERALD regularly, and am well pleased with it. I think it will take wherever known."

L. G. O., Conn.: "For the first time in my life I saw your choice little paper yesterday. My heart went out toward it for myself and this people."

S. J. H., N. C.: "God bless the editors of the C. H.! God bless the sermons of Talmage and Spurgeon to the awakening and conversion of many souls." (Sept. 10.)

T. M., Canada: "It is reported that the C. H., published by you, is a valuable paper. Will you please forward a specimen number."

S. E. W., N. Y.: "Your paper is excellent."

A SUNDAY SCHOOL teacher in Illinois sends ten names for the paper, with the subscription-money, and writes: "These are all small scholars in my class in Sabbath-School. I want to get the paper introduced into their families."

J. C. U., N. Y.: "I would not have my file broken for a good deal."

J. M., Ohio: "—— says he must have the paper."

L. B. B., Va.: "I have read your paper with much pleasure and profit."

W. K., Ill.: "I am well pleased with the HERALD, and like the tone of the paper." (Sept. 11.)

L. M. P., Conn.: "I was very much interested."

B. P. W., S. C.: "Having seen a few copies of the paper, I am much pleased and hope to see it extensively circulated in this section." (Sept. 12.)

S. P. F., N. Y.: "I must say I am very much pleased with it."

E. W., Ky.: "The HERALD comes to my address regularly; I am well pleased with it." (Sept. [illegible])

F. N. D., Tex.: "I have been taking your paper a few weeks, and am much pleased with it; a Christian paper."

S. J. B., Ohio: "I like the C. H. very much better than any paper I have ever taken. Praying that the Gospel which it preaches may reach many, very many precious souls, etc."

[illegible], D. D., Mass.: "Please send a package of your most excellent paper for distribution in my congregation." (Sept. 15.)

J. W. C., Ill.: "I cannot afford to do without the C. H. It makes a volume of the most valuable and practical knowledge. I consider the sermons, expositions of prophecy, and comments on the Sunday-school lessons worth five times the money. May the Lord bless it to the good of the Church and the salvation of many souls."

J. A., Cal.: "The last number was worth its weight in gold to me. No mine of this State is as rich as this, your paper."

A. T. S., Ohio: "All the present subscribers think very much of the paper." (Sept. 16.)

E. H. W., S. C.: "I cannot do without it. I thank God for the noble work that it is accomplishing." (Sept. 17.)

W. B. G., Iowa: "The more I read the more I like it and profit by it. Words cannot express how much I value it. I pity all who cannot drink in the doctrines taught by the C. H." (Sept. 19.)

C. B. E., Ill., calls the C. H. "a valuable paper," and adds, "I am very desirous of doing all the good that lies in my power, and one way is by interesting others in your paper." The writer pays for four subscriptions for acquaintances. (Sept. 20.)

J. J., Canada: "I do not think there is a better paper for the price in circulation."

J. C. C., Canada: "It is looked for each week with increasing interest."

W. H. R., Mass.: "I like the paper very much, and others that I have given it to like it well." (Sept. 22.)

W. E. L., Ill.: "Your paper is obtaining a fine popularity in this vicinity."

S. E. W., Tex.: "I like it exceedingly."

A. E., Vt.: "I cannot do without it." (Sept. 25.)

E. C. S., R. I.: "I like the paper very much, and wish to introduce it into this section. Wishing you a grand success, etc." (Sept. 26.)

W. H. E., N. Y.: "I could hardly do without your paper. I think it is the best paper published."

L. M. B., Mich.: We would be glad to devote our whole time to the interests of this much-loved little paper if we could live by it." (Sept. 27.)

F. A. T., Conn.: "I am trying to introduce the C. H. in this community, as I think it is the best religious paper in existence."

J. M. F., Ala.: "We have become very much interested in the paper. We desire the paper to be more extensively circulated in our own immediate country."

J. W., Miss.: "I am so pleased with the C. H. that I would be glad if it had a more extensive circulation in our churches."

A. N. M., Ga.: "I love to read the sermons and prophetic sketches." (Sept. 29.)

W. N. X., Tenn.: (asks for a package of copies for distribution) "I think they would be the means of doing a great deal of good."

J. S. H., Ky.: "I cannot do without the paper."

J. C. N., Ohio; "Please continue sending the paper to me. I am a good deal interested in your paper."

E. R. W., Mich.: "Your excellent paper, I have wanted it from week to week."

J. W. R., Pa.: "I value it more and more for its evangelical influence and character." (Sept. 30.)

A LADY in Connecticut, at a place where there is no pastor, and no religious service except a weekly meeting in her house, writes: "I read one of those good sermons this afternoon in our prayer-meeting. I have given the papers sent to eager hearts and hands."

A. M. C., N. Y.: "I wish you every success, and will do all I can to increase its circulation."

W. H. M., Colo., sends a subscription and says: "Oblige an admirer of your very excellent paper."

H. A. B., N. C., sends three subscriptions and says: "I was much pleased with the specimen copy you sent me."

R. W., Ill.: "It gives me so much spiritual food that I prize it above all my other papers."

J. M. O., Pa.: "Please inform me what time my subscription expires. I do not want to lose a number."

J. McD., N. J.: "I wish to introduce it if possible. I like it. I take it every week from a newsdealer. I think everybody should read it." (Oct. 1.)

P. L. H., Ga.: "Of the many religious papers which I see, I know of none that I admire so well as the C. H."

J. M. F., Ala.: "I ever remain a friend to your paper."

J. H. A., Iowa: "I cannot do without it. I would not think of having it discontinued."

R. G. G., Pa.: "The C. H. is an excellent paper, and I want my children to become enchanted with it, and fancy that the sermons and other good things in it may lead them to Jesus." (Oct. 3.)

R. L., Pa.: "We like the paper very much."

H. R. O., Ga.: "I do not want to lose a paper. I cannot do without it."

M. G., Ark.: "I think more of the HERALD than of any other paper."

H. R. H., Ill.: "I read your paper with unabated interest. To me it is a model religious paper."

E. C. J., S. C.: "I receive your paper regularly, and prize the articles on prophecy very highly." (Oct. 4.)

G. M., Md.: "I deem your paper to be well suited to instruct and stir up the colored preachers." (Subscriptions to the amount of five dollars enclosed.)

E. M. A., Ill.: "It supplies a long-felt want, and has our very best wishes."

J. N., Tex.: "I read the C. H. and S. of our T. with delight, and am especially pleased with your articles on prophecy. I heartily recommend it to all my friends."

A. G. S., Tex.: "The matter is very excellent. I love the C. H. much. With kind regards and prayers for your success and usefulness, etc."

G. W. C., Canada: "I prize it highly."

M. A. N., Ga.: "The best religious paper, I believe, in this country. I gave —— a copy for a year, and also —— a copy for twelve months. Every one I have ever conversed with on the subject is pleased with the paper. My son, a Baptist minister, takes the HERALD, and is greatly pleased with it."

R. H. H., Kans. "I am perfectly delighted with it. We read it ourselves and loan it to our neighbors." (Oct. 6.)

J. T., Canada: "We love the HERALD."

J. P. M., Ohio: "Am highly pleased with it."

W. A. G., Ky.: "I would not do without the Sunday-schoo Lesson for twice the money."

G. H. A., Conn.: "I am well pleased with the publication. (Oct. 7.)

T. M., Me.: "The C. H. is just the paper I needed, and w like it very much. It brings light and comfort to our home."

E. H., Pa.: "I have read the C. H. with much interest an profit for the last six or eight months."

M. D., Ill.: "We think it is the best paper we have taken."

E. K., Mo.: "I have no words to express how highly I estee your soul-inspiring paper." (Oct. 8.)

J. G. A., Pa.: "I do not like to miss one copy of your valuat HERALD."

S. W. B., Ind.: "I would that each member of my church w a subscriber. God bless the noble men who are making it an i strument capable of doing so much good." (Oct. 10.)

N. G., La.: "I thank you kindly for sending your C. H. They are so full of truth. It is Gospel truth."

W. M., Ky.: "I enjoy the sermons very much."

L. B. R., N. Y., encloses two dollars to send the paper t friend, and writes: "I know of no better way of doing good w the printed page. I am already a subscriber and like it much. is strictly a religious newspaper."

R. L. G., N. J.: "I think there is no religious paper like it. recommend it on all occasions." (Oct. 11.)

W. L. S., N. C.: "I am trying to put the C. H. in ev family."

T. B., Minn., encloses a subscription and writes: "Please ward your paper to —— ——, and forward the work of spread the good news. I think your papers are just what we wa (Oct. 14.)

V. N., Ala.: "Our family enjoy your paper very much, an wish —— and —— to have it."

W. N., N. Y.: "I like the paper so much I am trying to in duce it to my friends."

W. B., Canada: "I highly appreciate your paper."

J. H. W., Pa.: "I think the C. H. is an excellent Chris paper and should be in every Christian family." (Oct. 15.)

J. A. G., Ill.: "I have enjoyed your paper so much th take upon myself to do this;" (i.e., to send five annual subs tions for acquaintances).

W. D. B., N. J.: "The C. H. is a necessity in our family, to friends to whom we furnish it."

C. W. G., N. Y.: "I will do all in my power to further circulation of your valuable paper."

W. J. C., Md.: "It will be the means of doing much good.

J. M. S., Ga.: "Thanking you for the rich feast contain every number, and praying for the continued health of that Christian worker, the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, I am, etc."

J. H. S., Md.: "I cannot refrain from saying that every se in these papers by Dr. Talmage is worth (to every lover of (and truth) ten times the price of a year's subscription. The as a whole, must prove a blessing to all who read it. May the abundantly reward your labors, is my prayer."

⁂ We have omitted a few cases in which the writers favors while they bestowed praise.

---

* We hope it will be bought soon!—Ed. C. H.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

ıblished at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken. This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. LMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, or some other ıinent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc. The Circulation is 165,000 Copies.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, DECEMBER 18, 1879. 13th Year. No. 61—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

RTRAITS AND LIVES OF THE KING AND QUEEN OF SPAIN, with View and Description of he Royal Palace at Madrid.
LIGION IN COMMON THINGS. A New Sermon y Dr. Talmage.
ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE. (Continued.)
WILL IRELAND EVER BE SEPARATED FROM GREAT BRITAIN? By Rev. M. Baxter.
CURRENT EVENTS: Congress—Jerry McAuley in Water Street—A Remarkable Case of Healing, etc.
MR. GOUGH'S ORATION AT STEINWAY HALL.
PRAYER TO GOD AN ACCEPTABLE SACRIFICE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
A WEIGHT OF WEALTH. A New Serial Story. (Continued.)—My Second Desire Fulfilled.
REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS. S. S. Lesson, by Mrs. M. Baxter.

BAY OF BISCAY FRANCE GALICIA
ASTURIA
ARAGON CATALONIA
MADURA
SPAIN
MADRID
TOLEDO
LISBON
PORTUGAL
ALENTELO
ATLANTIC OCEAN
VALENCIA
VALENCIA CARTAGENA
ALCALA
CADIZ
ST. OF GIBRALTAR
MEDITERRANEAN SEA
ALGIERS AFRICA

THE KING AND QUEEN OF SPAIN, with View of Their PALACE AT MADRID.

ALFONSO XII., KING OF SPAIN.

His Birth, Education, and Exile—Troubles in Spain—"What is Exile?"—He ascends the Throne in 1874—He takes Command of an Army against Don Carlos—Incidents and Character—His First Marriage.

THIS young king boasts of the following medley of names: Alfonso, Francesco de Assisi, Ferdinando, Pio Juan, Maria de la Conception, Gregorio, etc. He is the only son of the ex-queen of Spain Isabella II., and was born on November 28th, 1857; he is therefore 22 years of age at present.

When his mother was driven from the throne of Spain in 1868 by the revolutionary party, he fled with her to Paris. They received a cordial welcome from the Emperor Napoleon III., who on their arrival, accompanied by the Empress, hastened to pay them a visit. An incident occurred on the return of the Imperial party which subsequent events have invested with sad significance. Napoleon in conversation with the Empress made some allusion to the sad interview in the presence of the little Prince Imperial, who suddenly exclaimed:

"Where are they going, papa?"

"Who?" inquired the Emperor.

"Why, the king you have been seeing."

"Louis, they are going into exile."

"Where is exile?" inquired the child.

The Emperor smiled sadly, and putting his hand on his son's head, made an evasive reply to satisfy the curiosity of the child. He said:

"You shall know when you are bigger."

As our readers are aware, after a few years had passed away the boy had no need to ask for a definition of the melancholy word.

In Paris Alfonso went as a day-scholar to the celebrated Jesuit College of Stanislas. At that time he did not know a word of French, so that language was made his first study. He occupied a little study to himself very simply and plainly furnished, and was treated in all respects on an equality with his school-fellows.

While Alfonso was quickly learning French under his Jesuit tutor, were in inextricable confusion. The revolution which had driven the Royal Family into exile was the work exclusively of the army and navy, but the nation, disgusted with the personal character of the queen, had acquiesced in the change. But the conspirators discovered after they had succeeded so far, that dislike to the reigning family was almost the only sentiment on which they were agreed. While some advocated the proclamation of a Republic of a communistic character and a redistribution of property, others urged the restoration of the monarchy with their respective protegés for the crown. A provisional government was ultimately appointed to maintain order until the future form of government should be settled by a Cortes elected by universal suffrage.

AFFAIRS IN SPAIN

When the Cortes assembled it was decided by a large majority that Spain should adhere to the monarchical form of government, but when the question arose as to the person on whose head the crown should be placed, innumerable disputes were excited, and the Cortes adjourned, leaving the matter still in abeyance. After a short vacation the Cortes reassembled in November, 1869, and the discussion was resumed.

Early in the year 1870 a project was started to place on the throne of Spain Prince Leopold of Hohenzollern, a Prussian subject, distantly related to the Royal Family of that kingdom. The relations between the Courts of Berlin and Paris had for a long time been in a strained condition, and this proposal fanned the smouldering embers of jealousy and dislike into a blaze. The Emperor Napoleon declared war against Prussia, and in the struggle which followed lost his own throne.

Prince Leopold's name was withdrawn as a candidate for the Spanish throne, and negotiations were opened with Prince Amadeus, second son of Victor Emanuel, King of Italy, who was ultimately elected king by the Cortes, despite the earnest protest of many sincere Republicans. At the time of the election of this prince to fill the throne Alfonso was also a candidate, but while Amadeus received 191 votes only two were recorded for Alfonso.

On the outbreak of the Franco-German War, Alfonso, then known as the Prince of Asturias, removed to Geneva, and thence to Vienna, where he continued his military studies in the Theresianum, or Nobleman's Academy. He remained three months in Vienna, and it was probably during that period that he first saw the lady who has now become his bride. Leaving Vienna Alfonso went to England and entered as a student at the Military College at Sandhurst, where he had as fellow-students the young Prince Imperial of France and the Duke of Connaught, third son of Queen Victoria.

The Italian prince, who as King of Spain sought to restore order and harmony in the distracted country, soon found the task impracticable. He failed to win the allegiance of the Spanish grandees, and the masses of the people were inspired with that aversion to his rule which the people usually entertain for that of a foreigner. He several times narrowly escaped assassination, and weary of his hopeless effort he abdicated in the year 1873.

The abdication of King Amadeus was followed by the proclamation of a Republic, of which Castelar made himself Dictator. The Cortes, however, refused to recognize his authority, and the government passed into the hands of Marshal Serrano, who held office for about a year. The distracted state of the country and the general lack of adhesion among the leaders and the officers of the army and navy brought about a state of anarchy. At this juncture of affairs, on December 29th, 1874, General Martinez Campos and Captain-General Primo de Riviera, supported by the army, suddenly proclaimed the young under the title of Alfonso XII.

ALFONSO, KING OF SPAIN,

When the news of his proclamation as King reached him, Alfonso was on a visit to his mother in Paris, whither he had gone in order to spend New Year's Day with her.

The following anecdote, which is told by the Whitehall Review, relates to this period of his life, and will serve to illustrate the phlegmatic temperament which is one of the distinctive characteristics of Alfonso XII. The telegram announcing the proclamation of the young man as King did not reach the hotel where he was staying, in Paris, till late at night. Every one was asleep except the fond and anxious mother, who, immediately on reading the despatch containing the glad tidings, hurried to her son's bedroom. "See! read!" she cried, waking Don Alfonso from a sound sleep. "You are King of Spain. Permit me, sire," she continued, changing her tone of voice, "to kiss your hand as the first of Your Majesty's subjects." Don Alfonso looked at his mother sleepily for a moment, languidly drew his hand from under the coverlet, presented it to Queen Isabella's lips, and then, turning over, fell asleep again without having uttered a word. Many other stories are told of the young king which illustrate this temperament, and which also show him to be possessed of great courage and determination.

Hastening to Madrid he was most enthusiastically received on January 14th, 1875, and on February 15th, 1876, left that capital to take the command of the army which it had been found necessary to place in the field to operate against Don Carlos, his cousin, who had ever since 1873 been fighting, at the head of a large army of Ultramontane adherents, for the throne of Spain. Within a month the young king returned to Madrid in triumph. Don Carlos had been discomfited and had fled; some of his adherents, who were called Carlists, were banished, and others made submission to Alfonso.

In the same year (1876) his mother was allowed to return to Spain. Two years afterwards, June 29th, 1878, he married his cousin,

THE PRINCESS MARIA DE LAS MERCEDES,

Infanta of Spain, and daughter of the Duc d Montpensier. She was then in her eighteentl year. The marriage was violently opposed b the mother of the young king, and she lef Madrid in fury. The Spanish Ministers wer also opposed to the match, but Alfonso ha loved his cousin from his boyhood, and with th determination which distinguishes men of h temperament he insisted on having his own wa The devotion of Alfonso to his young wife ma be gathered from the following expressions h made use of after her early death:

"From my earliest youth she was my on thought. Her image was ever present in m mind, when I passed my examinations at th Vienna Theresianum, amid my comrades at th military school in England, in my study, and the battle lines of Lacar. I loved her as kin rarely do, and I lived with her like the mo affectionate bourgeois. We were never apa We shared alike work, pleasure, and dang Whenever I went out shooting by myself brought her home my bag. I told her befo hand whatever I meant to say in public speech She took deep interest in every thing I did, eve thing I said, and every thing I attempted."

The happiness of the royal pair was very bri for the young queen was stricken with typh fever, and died only five months after her m riage. Alfonso was overcome with grief, shut himself up in his palace to weep over t coffin of his dead wife, and for two months fused to see any one except his secretary, a would not attend to public business. But gr ually his grief was assuaged, and he has now entered the bonds of matrimony.

An account which has been published of

THE KING'S DAILY LIFE,

does not present a very exalted idea of his ch acter or a hopeful one of the good results of reign on the nation over which he is plac A correspondent of a prominent journal sa

"His Majesty rises late, and his first car to bathe his face carefully in Barége water counteract the effects of a cutaneous affec which he inherits from his mother. Then, a swallowing innumerable sweet biscuits and large cups of chocolate, he pays a visit to stables; then presides at a Cabinet Cour signs some decrees, and spends the aftern and evening riding or driving about the cap When court mourning does not prevent from doing so, the King, accompanied by sister, goes regularly almost every evening the theatre or opera, and every Saturday sunset he repairs, with his sister and all court, to the Church of Atocha to hear the vice."

A life so empty and frivolous must essarily be a useless one, but as the offic king has of late years become chiefly of an c mental character, they being satisfied reigning while their ministers govern, it is p ble Spain may not suffer by the inefficienc her chosen king.

MARIE CHRISTINE, QUEEN OF SPAIN.

Her Family and Personal Characteristics—er Charity—Her Marriage—The Wedding T seau—How the Bride said Yes.

THIS distinguished lady is a scion o he ancient and historically great reigning fami of Hapsburg, of which the Emperor of Aust is the head, and in which this handsome bride eld the position of Archduchess. It is a sin lar coincidence that she should have becom he consort of the King of Spain, as her family ve been so intimately associated with Spain i he height of its ancient grandeur, at the tin o Ferdinand and Isabella.

It was very soon after the death of the rst queen of Alfonso XII. that Spanish politi ans recognized the necessity, owing to State re ns, that their king should seek another mat ne nial alliance. Some reports, as far back the month of February, mentioned the Au ian Archduchess Marie Christine Henrietta esirée, daughter of an uncle to the presen Em-his marriage with a princess palatine ary.

he young Archduchess was born in 1858. lost her father six years ago. Her mother, Archduchess Elizabeth Françoise Marie, a widow of the Archduke Ferdinand Vic- of ste, when she married the Archduke les Ferdinand of Hapsburg. Christine had red one of the orders of Chanoinesses which in Prague for ladies of noble birth, and abbess of her chapter, though not bound to the Order for life, no vows being re- these lay establishments. It is by no uncommon for ladies of the court to thus some years into seclusion.

was in this quiet retreat, apart from the capital of Austria and away from the bril- court of the Hapsburgs, that the Princess one day startled with the intelligence that Ministers of King Alfonso had cast their on her as the successor to Queen Mercedes. The first advances in made through diplomatists, but these pre- having been arranged, Alfonso ap- in person to the Princess for her private nt. He travelled to Arcachon, where she and immediately on his arrival paid a her home. It was dusk. The King pro- turn in the garden. The Archduchess and her stepmother and all the Aus- Spanish courtiers, as had been no aged beforehand among them, remained drawing-room. When the happy pair re- the villa, Christine, who had an engaged her finger, led the monarch to her step- whom she thus addressed in French: the honor, madame, to present to you your husband." Alfonso gallantly kissed of the Archduchess Charles, who, he would accept from him the duty of a Archduchess Christine has a charm ulness which have won all hearts. tall and slender figure and a lovable blue eyes, dimpled cheeks, and some- air. Her small hands, almost like a and a silvery voice complete a graceful She has been educated under the care of her mother, to whom she is attached. She is as well acquainted with languages as with her own. She paints mostly flowers, and is an ex- pianist. In Gmünden, where the family Archduchess regularly passed the sum- Archduchess occupied herself with ing under the tuition of a clever claims to the interest and regard of do not depend wholly on her per- appearance, for she is said to have a dis- markable for

THE ROYAL COURTSHIP

KINDNESS AND CONSIDERATION

of those around her. It is related since her childhood she has regularly year a number of warm garments, self, to the poor children of Gmün- that she is much attached to her for- s and governesses, and is full of at- regard for her attendants. In Vienna beloved; and her charities have conspicuous as her beauty. Though only to the flattery of courtiers, she the poor, and was always on the er help to those who were afflicted in mind, body, or estate. These ing memorial of her when the hon- antry with which she has been re- nded will be forgotten.

record of honor the Archduchess Madrid on November 24th, and was great demonstrations of welcome sh people. The king and his sis- ministers of state, and the principal military authorities were present at the station, and joined in the public wel- After the public reception the Arch- Madrid, and took up her residence Palace, which is about five miles from the capital, whither she was accompanied by her mother, the Archduchess Elizabeth, and several members of her family.

On the wedding-day, November 29, the bridal procession returned to Madrid, and at the church of "Our Lady of Atocha" the marriage was celebrated in the presence of all the dignitaries of Spain. The nobles assembled in their official robes, which for grandeur have no equals in the world. A much larger company of these representatives of the ancient families of Spain were present than on the occasion of the former marriage of the king, showing plainly that the country is more settled, and that the revolted grandees of "proud Castile" who had rallied round Don Carlos are now disposed to return to their allegiance to King Alfonso.

Our fair readers may be interested in knowing that the trousseau of the Queen of Spain was exhibited in the palace of her uncle, the Archduke Albrecht, in Vienna, for a few days. It was, of course, an object of great attraction. Many of the articles of dress and ornament are copied from ancient patterns in the royal wardrobes of Europe, and on every article the Spanish crown surmounts the Archduchess's monogram. There is enough house linen to furnish a whole palace, and lace is lavished in profusion on every thing. Some of the handkerchiefs are embroidered in pure gold, and the various costumes are most magnificent, several being trimmed with real silver lace.

The wedding toilet was not exhibited, neither were the twelve dresses which the king, according to an old Spanish custom, presented to his bride. The Queen of the Belgians gave the wedding veil, which was made of Brussels lace, with the Spanish royal arms forming the chief design. The bridal dress was of silver brocade.

THE ROYAL PALACE OF MADRID.

THIS handsome pile, called the Escurial, is the most striking architectural feature in the city of Madrid. It is of comparatively recent date, and stands upon a commanding height on the site of a former famous palace, which was destroyed by fire in 1734. Not only the building perished in the conflagration, but with it were destroyed its contents, including many priceless treasures — the great picture, the "Torre Horada," by Titian, diamonds worth fabulous sums, and a pearl called "The Orphan," because it had no equal in the world.

Its architect was Giovanna Battista Saccheti, and the great edifice is built of white stone not unlike marble, the whole forming a very fine specimen of Tuscan architecture. Its internal fittings are on very majestic proportions, the ceilings are in fresco, the grand staircase is of black and white marble. Upon this staircase are two lions in black marble, upon one of which Napoleon I. placed his hand when he entered the palace in 1805, with the remark, "At last I hold thee, thou much-longed-for Spain."

Its gardens are not worthy of such a palace. "A Spaniard," one has said, "does not know a garden-bed from its paths." In its stables and coach-houses there are the elements necessary for a Court famed for pageantry and display. There are 500 Catalanian mules in them, and horses from every country. The cream-colored horses from Aranjuez, by which the state coach was drawn at the wedding, are among the finest in the world.

Beneath all this grandeur, trickles the humble river Manzonares, which at its best is but a turbid gutter, whose scanty stream scarcely keeps the city washerwomen in water, and which has been the subject of many a joke. A wit told Philip IV., King of Spain, he had better sell his bridge of Toledo, of which he was very proud, and buy a river. It has also been compared to the universities of Spain, having holidays all the summer, and curso, a course or current, only in the winter months. This palace is not used during the summer months because of the excessive heat; but the winter is no less a time of danger, for while in the "dog days" every thing seems red-hot to the touch, yet in the winter the sentries are not unfrequently frozen to death at their posts.

The site for Madrid as the capital of Spain was selected by Charles V., King of Spain, first, because the air assisted to ease his gout, and, secondly, because it was the centre of the peninsula of which Spain and Portugal form the whole. But the monarch did not notice that the air of the district is so subtle that while it will not extinguish a light, at the same time it will slay a host.

TRUSTING JESUS.

By the Rev. W. M. Hay Aitken.

SOME little time ago I was conducting a mission in the North of England. There I met with a young person in great distress of soul. She had been several months in that state. I saw she was of a melancholy temperament, and I was apprehensive lest the long pressure should in any way affect her mind and ultimately undermine her reason. I tried to set before her what I have been setting before you to-night. She only answered with a shake of the head and said, "I can't trust Jesus; I don't know how." "Will you trust me?" "Oh, yes, I will trust you." "Are you quite sure you trust me?" "Yes, I do."

"But suppose it were a matter of paying into my hands every farthing you possess in the world, so that I should have the means of ruining you and stripping you of all your worldly possession? Suppose there were some reason that led you to feel that that would be expedient, would you do it?" She smiled, and thought a moment: "Well, I do not think I should." "I should be very much surprised if you did; it would be very rash of you to trust an utter stranger with every farthing you had in the world. But supposing it was a great object to be able to tust me, how would you set about it? Would you try to work yourself up into an enthusiasm of trust, so that you should at last say, 'I will trust him?'"

"No, sir, I should not set about it in that way." "Well, you would be a great fool if you did; that would not make me trustworthy. But how would you set about it?" "Oh, well, I should make inquiry." "Exactly. You would probably write to the vicar of the parish, the bishop of the diocese, and two or three well-known clergymen, and say, 'Do you know anything about Mr. Aitken?' And if they all bore the same witness and said, 'We have known him from a child, and he is thoroughly trustworthy,' then you would come to the conclusion that you could safely trust your property to me.

"Now, apply that to your soul's relation to Jesus. You find it difficult to believe in Him: make a few inquiries. Go and ask that poor penitent woman who bathed his feet with her tears. "Poor sorrowful-hearted sinner, surely thou hast trusted Jesus. Didst thou find Him trustworthy?' I think you will get the answer: 'I came to Him with a heart heavy with woe and wearied with guilt, and I heard Him say, "Thy sins, which are many, are all forgiven thee."' Go to that robber who is hanging over eternity, the darkness of death and hell ready to swallow him up. Ask him, 'What do you think or know about Jesus?' He would reply, 'I was a poor sinner trembling on the brink of doom—but another stepped between me and hell. Jesus Christ stretched out his own hands, and put them between me and hell, and said, "This day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise."'

"Yes, Jesus is trustworthy; you may safely trust Him. So you might go through the New Testament, and find out, if you can, whether there is one single instance of a person who trusted Jesus and found Him fail. Then let us go to Him whose witness must be true. 'If we receive the witness of men, the witness of God is greater.' What is the witness of God concerning His Son? As I make my appeal to 'the King Eternal, Immortal, Invisible,' I seem to get from the throne the answer I have suggested, 'Sinner, I trusted my Son Jesus to save the world; you may trust him safely to save your soul.'"

RELIGION IN COMMON THINGS.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, Dec. 14, 1879.

"In all thy ways acknowledge Him."—PROVERBS 3 : 6.

Genuine Religion not Spasmodic—Religion should be brought into Ordinary Life—I. Into Ordinary Conversation — Religion often an Unwelcome Theme—The Difference between Cant and Christian Converse—II. Into Ordinary Employment —Nothing too Insignificant for God's Notice—A Swindling Deacon—A Sabbath all the Week—The Romance Gone Out of Life—Alps Still to Scale—III. Into our Trials—Little Annoyances —In the Sculptor's Studio—How God fashions Character—IV. Into our Ordinary Blessings— —No Gratitude after Uneventful Journeys—Thanksgiving all the Year—The Hiss of Everlasting Scorn.

THERE has been a tendency in all lands and ages to set apart certain days, places, and occasions for especial religious service, and to think that they formed the realm in which religion was chiefly to act. Now, while holy days and holy places have their use, they can never be a substitute for continuous exercise of faith and prayer. In other words, a man cannot be so good a Christian on Sabbath that he can afford to be a worldling all the week.

If a steamer start for Southampton, and sail one day in that direction, and the other six days sail in other directions, how long before the steamer will get to Southampton? Just as soon as a man will get to heaven who sails on the Sabbath day toward that which is good, and the other six days of the week sails toward the world, the flesh, and the devil. You cannot eat so much at the Sabbath banquet that you can afford religious abstinence all the rest of the week.

Genuine religion is not spasmodic, does not go by fits and starts, is not an attack of chills and fever—now cold until your teeth chatter, now hot until your bones ache. Genuine religion marches on steadily, up steep hills, and along dangerous declivities, its eye ever on the everlasting hills crowned with the castles of the blessed.

I propose this morning, so far as God may help me, to show you how we may bring our religion into ordinary life, and practise it in common things—yesterday, to-day, to-morrow.

RELIGION IN CONVERSATION.

I. And in the first place, I remark: We ought to bring religion into our ordinary conversation. A dam breaks in New England and two or three villages are submerged, or a South American earthquake swallows a city, and people begin to talk about the uncertainty of human life, and in that conversation think they are engaging in religious service, when there may be no religion at all. I have noticed that in proportion as Christian experience is shallow, men talk about funerals and deathbeds, and hearses, and tombstones, and epitaphs. If a man have the religion of the Gospel in its full power in his soul, he will talk chiefly about this world and the eternal world, and very little comparatively about the insignificant pass between this and that.

Yet how seldom it is that the religion of Christ is a welcome theme! If a man full of the Gospel of Christ goes into a religious circle, and begins to talk about sacred things, all the conversation is hushed, and things become exceedingly awkward. As on a summer day, the forests full of chirp and song and carol, mighty chorus of bird harmonies, every branch an orchestra—if a hawk appears in the sky all the voices are hushed. So I have sometimes seen a social circle that professed to be Christian silenced by the appearance of the great theme of God and religion.

Now, my friends, if we have the religion of Christ in our soul, we will talk about it in an exhilerant mood. It is more refreshing than the waters, it is brighter than the sunshine, it gives a man joy here, and prepares him for everlasting happiness before the throne of God. And yet, if the theme of religion be introduced into a circle, every thing is silenced—silenced unless, perhaps, an aged Christian man in the corner of the room, feeling that something ought to be said, puts one foot over the other, and sighs heavily, and says, "Oh yes; that's so!"

O my friends! the religion of Jesus Christ is not something to be groaned about, but something to talk about and sing about, your face irradiated. The trouble is that men professing the faith of the Gospel are often so inconsistent that they are afraid their conversation will not harmonize with their life. We cannot talk the Gospel unless we live the Gospel. You will often find a man whose entire life is full of inconsistencies filling his conversation with such expressions as, "we are miserable sinners," "the Lord help us," "the Lord bless you," interlarding their conversation with such phrases, which are mere canting, and canting is the worst kind of hypocrisy.

If a man have the grace of God in his heart dominant, he can talk religion, and it will seem natural, and men, instead of being repulsed by it, will be attracted by it. Do you not know that when two Christian people talk as they ought about the things of Christ and heaven, God gives especial attention, and He writes it all down. Malachi 3 : 16: "Then they that feared the Lord talked one to the other, and the Lord hearkened and heard, and a book of remembrance was written."

IN ORDINARY EMPLOYMENT.

II. But I remark again: We ought to bring the religion of Jesus Christ into our ordinary employments. "Oh!" you say, "that's a very good theory for a man who manages a large business, who has great traffic, who holds a great estate; it is a grand thing for bankers and for shippers, for the Rothschilds and the Barings; but in my thread and needle store, in my trimming establishment, in my insignificant work of life, you cannot apply these grand Gospel principles."

Who told you that? Do you not know that a faded leaf on a brook's surface attracts God's attention as certainly as the path of a blazing sun, and that the moss that creeps up the side of the rock attracts God's attention as certainly as the wavy tops of Oregon pine and Lebanon cedar, and that the crackling of an alder under a cow's hoof sounds as loudly in God's ear as the snap of a world's conflagration, and that the most insignificant thing in your life is of enough importance to attract the attention of the Lord God Almighty?

My brother, you cannot be called to do any thing so insignificant but God will help you in it. If you are a fisherman, Christ will stand by you as He did by Simon when he dragged Gennesaret. Are you a drawer of water?—He will be with you as at the well curb, when talking with the Samaritan woman. Are you a custom-house officer?—Christ will call you as He did Matthew at the receipt of custom.

The man who has only a day's wages in his pocket as certainly needs religion as he who rattles the keys of a bank and could abscond with a hundred thousand hard dollars. And yet there are men who profess the religion of Jesus Christ who do not bring the religion of the Gospel into their ordinary occupations and employments. There are in the churches at this day men who seem very devout on the Sabbath who are far from that during the week.

A country merchant arrives in the city, and he goes into the store to buy goods of a man who professes religion, but has no grace in his heart. The country merchant is swindled. He is too exhausted to go home that week; he tarries in town. On Sabbath he goes to some church for consolation, and what is his amazement to find that the man who carries around the poor box is the very one who swindled him. But never mind—the deacon has his black coat on now, and looks solemn, and goes home talking about that blessed sermon! Christians on Sunday. Worldlings during the week.

That man does not realize that God knows every dishonest dollar he has in his pocket, that God is looking right through the iron wall of his money safe, and that the day of jud is coming, and that "as the partridge sitt eggs and hatcheth them not; so he that g riches, and not by right, shall leave them midst of his days, and at his end shall fool." But how many there are who bring the religion of Christ into their ev occupation! They think religion is for Su Well now, my friends, I do not think that

Suppose you were to go and to fight fo country in some great contest, would you do the battling at Troy or at Springfield you would go there to get your swords an kets. Then you would go out in the face enemy and contend for your country. take the Sabbath day and the church to the armory where we are to get equipped great battle of life, and that battlefield is day, Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Saturday.

"Antioch," and "St. Martin's," and Hundred" are not worth much if we do n all the week. A sermon is of little acc we cannot carry it behind the counter hind the plough. The Sabbath day is of n if it last only twenty-four hours. O my f we must take the religion of Jesus Chr our ordinary occupations.

"Oh!" says some one, "if I had sphere I would do that; if I could have the time of Martin Luther, if I could ha Paul's travelling companion, if I had son and resounding work to do—then I sho into application all that you say."

I must admit that the romance and errantry have gone out of life. There very little of it left in the world. The of Rouen have been changed into smithi classic mansion at Ashland has been cut walking-sticks; the muses have retre fore the emigrant's axe and the trappe and a Vermonter might go over the Al and the Rocky Mountains and see nei Oread nor a Sylph. The groves where used to dwell have been cut up for firew the man who is looking for great sphe great scenes for action will not find ther

And yet there are Alps to scale and t Hellesponts to swim, and they are in life. It is absurd for you to say that yo serve God if you had a great sphere. I not serve Him on a small scale, you w on a large scale. If you cannot stand of a midge, how could you endure the a basilisk?

Suppose a soldier should say, "This skirmish, and there are only a few en won't load my gun: wait until I can some great and general engagement. man is a coward, and would be a cowa sphere. If a man does not serve his c a skirmish, he will not in a Waterloo. you are not faithful going out against t handed misfortunes of this life, you w be faithful when great disasters with th dering artillery came rolling down over

IN TRIALS.

III. This brings me to another po ought to bring the religion of Jesus C all our trials. If we have a bereavement, our fortune, if some great trouble blas tempest, then we go to God for com yesterday in the little annoyances of y or office, or shop, or factory, or banki did you go to God for comfort? You

My friends, you need to take the r the Lord Jesus Christ into the most trials of your life. You have your mis you have your anxieties, you have y tions. "Oh!" you say, "they don't character. Since I lost my child, sin lost my property, I have been a very man from what I was." My brother, little annoyances of your life that ar your disposition, clipping your moral and making you less and less of a man

You go into an artist's studio. Yo making a piece of sculpture. You sa don't you strike harder?" With his sel he goes click, click, click! and you rdly see from stroke to stroke that there mpression made upon the stone, and yet rk is going on. You say, "Why don't ike harder." "Oh!" he replies, "that shatter the statue; I must make it in y stroke by stroke." And he continues week and month until after a while every at enters the studio is fascinated.

I find God dealing with some man. He ing him for time, and shaping him for . I say, "O Lord! why not with one dous blow of calamity shape that man for t world?" God says, "That's not the deal with this man; it is stroke after annoyance after annoyance, irritation ritation; and after a while he will be nd a glad spectacle for angels and men." by one great stroke, but by ten thousand rokes of misfortune are men fitted for You know that large fortunes can scattered by being paid out in small money, and the largest estate of Christaracter is sometimes entirely lost by these pletions.

friends! we must bring the religion of hrist to help us in these little annoy- Do not say that any thing is too insigni- o affect your character. Rats may sink hip One lucifer match may destroy a tem- queen got her death by smelling of a rose. The scratch of a sixpenny nail e you the lockjaw. Columbus by asking iece of bread and a drink of water at a can convent came to the discovery of a ld.

here is a great connection between trifles mensities, between nothings and every Do you not suppose that God cares for significant sorrows? Why, my friends, nothing insignificant in your life. How u take the responsibility of saying that ? Do you not know that the whole uni- not ashamed to take care of

ONE DAISY?

"What are you doing down there in the oor little daisy? Nobody knows you . Are you not afraid nights? You will thirst; nobody cares for you; you will you will perish." "No," says a star, atch over it to-night." "No," says the 'I'll give it drink." "No," says the 'll warm it in my bosom." And then d rises, and comes bending down the nd sounding its psalm through the for- I say, "Whither away, O wind! on ift wing?" and it answers, "I am going the cheek of that daisy." And then I eys at work in the sky, and the clouds wing water, and I say, "What are you here, O clouds?" They say, "We are water for that daisy." And then I look to the grass, and I say, "Can it be that es care of a poor thing like you?" and wer comes up, "Yes, yes; God clothes s of the field, and He has never forgot- a poor daisy."

friends! if the heavens bend down to significant ministry as that, I tell you willing to bend down to your case, since st as careful about the construction of a eye as He is in the conformation of galaxies.

IN ORDINARY BLESSINGS.

ut I remark again: We ought to bring gion of Jesus Christ into our ordinary s. Every autumn the President of the States and the governors make procla- and we are called together in our s to give thanks to God for His good- ut every day ought to be a thanksgiv- We take most of the blessings of life ter of course. We have had ten thou- ssings this morning, for which we have ked God. Before the night comes, we e a thousand more blessings you will ink of mentioning before God. ust see a blind man led along by his dog e learn what a grand thing it is to have one's eyesight. We must see a man with St. Vitus' Dance before we learn what a grand thing it is to have the use of our physical energies. We must see some soldier cripple, limping along on his crutch, or his empty coat-sleeve pinned up, before we learn what a grand thing it is to have the use of all our physical faculties. In other words, we are so stupid that nothing but the misfortunes of others can wake us up to an appreciation of our common blessings.

We get on board a train and start for Boston, and come to Norwalk bridge, and the "draw" is off, and crash! goes the train. Fifty lives dashed out. We escape. We come home in great excitement, and call our friends around about us, and they congratulate us; and we all kneel down and thank God for our escape while so many perished. But to-morrow morning you get on a train of cars for Boston. You cross that bridge at Norwalk. You cross all the other bridges. You get to Boston in safety. Then you return home. Not an accident, not an alarm. No thanks. In other words, you seem to be more grateful when fifty people lose their lives and you get off, than you are grateful to God when you all get off, and you have no alarm at all. Now you ought to be thankful when you escape from accident, but more thankful when they all escape. In the one case your gratitude is somewhat selfish; in the other, it is more like what it ought to be.

Oh! these common mercies, these common blessings, how little we appreciate them and how soon we forget them! Like the ox grazing, with the clover up to its eyes, like the bird picking the worm out of the furrow—never thinking to thank God who makes the grass grow, and who gives life to every living thing, from the animalculæ in the sod to the seraph on the throne. Thanksgiving on the 27th of November, in the autumn of the year; but blessings, hour by hour and day by day, and no thanks at all.

If you were thirsty and asked me for a drink, and I gave you this glass of water, your common instinct would reply, "Thank you." And yet, how many chalices of mercy we get hour by hour from the hand of the Lord, our Father and our King, and we do not even think to say "Thank you." More just to men than we are just to God.

Who thinks of thanking God for the water gushing up in the well, foaming in the cascade, laughing over the rocks, pattering in the shower, clapping its hands in the sea? Who thinks to thank God for that? Who thinks to thank God for the air, the fountain of life, the bridge of sunbeams, the path of sound, the great fan on a hot summer day? Who thinks to thank God for this wonderful physical organism, this sweep of vision, this chime of harmony struck into the ear, this crimson tide rolling through arteries and veins, this drumming of the heart on the march of immortality?

I convict myself, and I convict every one of you while I say these things, that we are unappreciative of the common mercies of life. And yet if they were withdrawn, the heavens would withhold their rain, and the earth would crack open under our feet, and famine and desolation and sickness, and woe would stalk across the earth, and the whole earth would become a place of skulls.

O my friends! let us wake up to an appreciation of the common mercies of life. Let every day be a Sabbath, every meal a sacrament, every room a holy of holies. We all have burdens to bear; let us cheerfully bear them. We all have battles to fight; let us courageously fight them.

If we want to die right, we must live right. You go home and attend to your little sphere of duties. I will go home and attend to my little sphere of duties. You cannot do my work: I cannot do your work. Negligence and indolence will win the hiss of everlasting scorn, while faithfulness will gather its garlands, and wave its sceptre, and sit upon its throne long after the world has put on ashes and eternal ages have begun their march.

A GIRL IN A SHOWER OF RAIN.

A Real Occurrence.

On one summer afternoon a little girl about nine years of age was walking along one of the beautiful terraces in the western part of London. The day had been intensely hot and sultry, and, in accordance with the weather, she was clad in simple white.

She tripped lightly and joyously along, for as yet she knew nothing of "the world's vain joys, its temptations, toils, and tears;" every sunset gave her a promise and every sunrise brought a blessing. She was just at that happy period of her life's journey when the future seems most bright and inviting, and her heart was full of hope and pleasurable anticipations. Such a time is fresh in the memory of many; but its duration is generally all too brief. A few years, and the deceit and treachery of the world have wrung the heart, contact with sin and the struggle with the evil in our natures and the snares of Satan and the world have marred the bright picture, and the "not far from the kingdom of God" is made "of the earth earthy."

Even now the sky, meet type of the changeful scene of life, became overcast, the thunder-clouds, which had for some time been gathering, presently burst and discharged, as it were, a continuous sheet of water, while the flashing lightning and roaring thunder added terror to the scene. The little girl's thin attire could but ill resist all this. What was she to do? She bethought herself, there was no shelter near—nothing on the one side but a large garden, on the other, fine houses.

"Well," thought she, "I must not stay hesitating; I must go up to one of these large houses, although I dare say very rich people live here, and I must ask them to let me come in till the storm is past." So she summoned up all her courage, and, mounting a flight of steps, rapped at one of the doors. It was opened by a gentleman who looked like a clergyman.

He had seen her from the windows, and asked her very kindly to come in and sit down. She did so, and he began to talk. She stayed till the heavy shower had quite abated, and was thanking him as well as she could for the shelter he had afforded her with such politeness, when he said he was very much pleased to see that she was not afraid to come up and ask admittance, and his prayer for her should be that she might be led to take refuge from the storms of eternity in the merits of Jesus Christ.

Much else that he said passed afterward from her memory, but those words remained indelibly fixed upon it, and through many years of mingled joy and sorrow, had their influence for good, and when the storms of life beat upon her and the thought of the mysteries of eternity filled her soul, the words she had heard that showery afternoon came to her memory and told her where and how to secure an eternal refuge.

She heard afterwards that the gentleman was a clergyman who officiated in the same district. Time has passed. This circumstance, trivial apparently, perhaps passed from his recollection, but it did not pass from the book of God's remembrance. "A word spoken in due season, how good is it!" the "seed" cast into "good ground may ofttimes bring forth an

HUNDRED-FOLD."

Many such a little passing admonition as those words of the good clergyman were, may be remembered during a whole life, and the benefit derived from them eternity alone can disclose. Let none despise such kind admonitions. Rather let them not "depart from them, but keep them in the midst of their heart, for they are life to those that find them" (Prov. 4:20–22).

A Christian Conference was held in Toronto, Canada, this week. Vice-Chancellor Blake presided, and the Rev. George Müller, of Bristol, England, was present. The principal subjects of discussion were: "What the Bible Teaches as to the Second Coming of the Lord," "The Inspiration of the Scriptures," and "Bible Study."

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

A Thrilling Story by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 949.)

Mr. Lemaire's Confession—Passionate Greeting of Alick Gogharty by Percival—Rowley Quinn Surprised to find Jemmy in Jail—Jemmy begs Percival will not do as the Butler did—Joyful Release—Mrs. Spencer Hesitates to receive Percival into her House.

MR. LEMAIRE then announced the nature of the document he held in his hand, and informed Percival he was rejoiced to tell him that he was free to leave the prison when he pleased. Percival had known nothing of Mr. Lemaire's dark suspicions and suspense of judgment about him, nor of Alick's efforts on his behalf. He took it for granted, therefore, that Mr. Lemaire was the agent of his liberation. With a heart full of gratitude he sprang forward, to seize his supposed vindicator's hand, but to his surprise Mr. Lemaire drew back.

"No, Percival, no," he said. "I am not worthy of your thanks. It pains me to the heart to tell you that I deserve the opposite. There is your liberator," and he pointed to Alick. "Your whole justification, Percival, is due to him. When I shamefully hung back from your cause, he took it up, and spared no toil and shrank from no difficulty to deliver you. I have only brought to you the result of his well-managed and self-sacrificing task, and I have done it that I may ask, for Lucie's sake, your forgiveness."

Percival was dumbfounded. He found it hard to summarize in his mind what Mr. Lemaire's words meant. While touched at his request for forgiveness his heart swelled with pain to think that his Lucie's father had acted in any way to need it. He was in no mood, however, to cherish resentment; Mr. Lemaire was dear to her whom he so tenderly loved, and for her sake, if for nothing else, he must be forbearing. But beside this the remorse of her father for the wrong he had done him was evident. Mr. Lemaire's sad face, and sadder tones, proved the reality of his self-condemnation and regret. Percival therefore advanced once more, took Mr. Lemaire's hand in his, and, in token of his good will, warmly grasped it. This done, his greeting was turned to Alick. Flinging himself upon his neck, he cried,

"You are my good angel, Alick—my loving and true friend! Oh, Alick, how shall I ever repay you!"

"Don't pay all your thanks to me," said Alick, cheerfully. "There, old fellow, keep off; don't be so demonstrative;" and then he added, with a mischievous twinkle in his eye, "I assure you I'm not—well, we'll not say who; but if you would turn a little of your attention there," and he pointed to Rowley Quinn, "it would be no harm. If it were not for him, Percival, I could have done precious little in this business, I can tell you. It was his brave and honest words that exposed the lying story of the scoundrel Haley."

Rowley Quinn did not hear the reference made to him by Alick, for he was in the most engaging and wondering conversation with Jemmy Mehaffy. After coming from his cell into the corridor it was not long before the eyes of this latter individual fell upon the father of his Janie. Had he suddenly dropped, in full sight, from the clouds Jemmy could not have been more astonished.'

"What, Rowley Quinn, you in Dublin?" he said to himself, "and in the company of Mr. Alick and Mr. Lemaire, and, above all, in the prison here, and near to me. Shure it's past all believin'."

Jemmy rubbed his eyes, and looked again, saying, "Well, I'm blest! You here, Mr. Quinn, to see me. Shure it's nothin' but enchantmint; an' the fairies thimselves must have had a hand in it, for nothin' less wud explain it."

If Jemmy was surprised to see Rowley Quinn in the jail, his surprise was matched in the astonished mind of the honest farmer. To find in this prison the "intended" of his daughter was a discovery that was simply incredible. He opened his eyes with a wide stare, darted forward his hand, when he found he was not deceived, and energetically returned Jemmy's salutation, saying,

"Well, I never! You here, Jemmy, me boy? Who, in the name of all that's wonderful, could have thought it! Why, it bates all that iver wuz hard. Begorrah, nothin' but dhramin' cud aqual it. Arrah, but will ye tell us, me brave gossoon, how it happened?"

"Niver mind about that now," replied Jemmy. "I'll tell it all to ye agin; but it war nothin' that I'm ashamed of," he added, to keep himself right in the thoughts of his interrogator. "I tell you that much, to aise yer mind, Mr. Quinn. But will you tell us—and God bless you—what on airth has brought ye to Dublin, and how is Janie?"

"Oh," said Rowley, "Janie is well, thank God! To use yer own words, me fine fellow, I tell you so much 'to aise yer mind;' but as to me comin' to Dublin, why it's a long story, Jemmy, and again to use yer own words, me man, 'I'll tell it all agin.' Ha, ha! me boy, I have ye. Only let us now, as in dhuty bound, attind to the consarns of 'the masther.'"

It was just at this stage of the interview between these two that Percival, as influenced by Alick's words, approached Quinn. "Rowley," he said, taking him by the hand, "Mr. Gogharty tells me how much I owe to your kind interference on my behalf. Indeed, he says my happy release from prison this hour is more due to what you have done than to his own endeavors."

"Don't believe him, Mr. Montaigne," interposed Rowley. "Shure it was him, say what he likes, that cum fur me, and fetched me, and got the thruth I tould in the police-office from me. And—"

"And, in fact, did every thing," interrupted Alick. "No, Rowley, it won't do. Percival, give him a right shake. I tell you it is he that has wrought out your freedom, and brought it gloriously to pass that this moment, in spite of every foe, you can leave the prison.

"Hooray!" cried Jemmy at this news of "the masther's" liberty. "Didn't I tell you, masther dear," said he, "that it 'id be all like Joseph, the young gintleman that ye read me about? The big lies, as I sed to ye thin was, towld on him and towld alike on you; and so, ye see, is the gettin' out o' prison. Hooray! I say agin;" and quite oblivious, in his joy, of all prison discipline, Jemmy, to the visible annoyance of the governor and warder, shouted so that the corridor echoed it again. But the next moment the thought struck him that liberty to "the masther" in all probability would not be connected with liberty to himself, and that he would, consequently, be taken back to his former lonely and wretched prison experience; and his exultation sank at once to a feeling of sadness. Approaching Percival, he said, in a beseeching and melancholy tone, "Oh, masther dear, whin you git out o' this don't—and God bless you!—go and do the part of that butler chap in the story I have just talked of, who, whin he himself got free—as you read it out, you know—didn't remimber the poor fellow-captive he left in jail behind him, but in his own good luck teetotally forgot him."

"God forbid that I should!" said Percival. "No, Jemmy, my faithful servant and dear friend, I'll not leave the jail without you."

On appealing to the governor, it was found, however, that it would not be needful for Jemmy to remain behind; his term of confinement for four full days was now completed, and he, too, could leave the jail immediately. When this was announced, Percival returned to his cell, and took from it what articles he had introduced which Jemmy could easily carry. The whole group of friends then departed in high glee.

And soon the whole group of friends them in freedom and joy, and all estran scattered to the winds, with their backs t mond Bridewell, was on the way to Mr. Le residence. They had not gone far, h before a cab for hire presented itself. P taking into account Jemmy's and Rowley laden condition, put them into it; wishi as a natter of course, to make his toilet Spencer's before seeing Lucie, he hims lowed, telling the friends left on the p that if they did not hurry he would be them in Rathgar.

"We'll take care, old fellow, you sha cried Alick, as the cab moved off; "for as we get opportunity, we'll seek to sho time of our journey in the same way as doing."

When Percival, with Jemmy and Quinn, arrived at his old quarters, Mrs. received him in a rather dubious state o
She did not like to lose from her house excellent and profitable lodger as Perci proved, and yet the statement of Sergea der that he was a leader among the Conf made her question the expediency of r him under her roof as an inmate. Ne would doubtless criticise what they wo such disloyal conduct—harboring rebel besides, to be subject, in all probability, her premises searched again in the un way they had been of late was, to say t undesirable. Percival held out his han for a cordial welcome, but his salutation o ship he felt was returned with exceedi ness. He, however, made no remark, b ing asked for the key of his rooms, wer them, to see with his own eyes the havo had been wrought upon all his lock-up p described to him when in jail by Jemmy.

A certain amount of repair had been d a measure of order restored by the care Spencer; but a rapid survey gave tim that a very annoying degree of confu mained, especially among his books and and the way in which his private corresp had been exposed was dreadfully vex when he thought of it he found it har anger, to repress some not very flatte thets concerning the authorities. He h ever, at present no time for a close exa of the injury done to his property or fo dulgence of wrath, since he had to prep self for seeing Lucie. And as he was Mr. Lemaire to include in his invitatio and Rowley Quinn, he told them to s the same toilet-task in which he was exercise himself.

It is an old saying that where there there is a way, to which we will add, th one which is also rapidly travelled over it proved, for it was not long before friends, though not social equals, present selves at Mr. Lemaire's residence. But had been their movements, they did no race, for Mr. Lemaire and Alick had ar fore them. Percival, therefore, did no knock at Mr. Lemaire's door. He reached the top of the steps leading to it was opened, and with one boun warned of his coming, hastened to rec
Then there was a moment of happines it is worth enduring a season of som and trouble to experience—a gleam of j brighter and blissful from breaking thro had been a dark and stormy heaven.

After satisfying the first impulse of Lucie, who had been rapidly told by their services towards Percival, trans attentions to Rowley Quinn and Jemn ing honest Rowley's hand in hers
"How shall I ever thank you eno
Quinn, for your kind and good servi falsely accused and oppressed? And my," she afterwards said, giving his h cordial shake, "may God bless you I'll never forget your fidelity and lovin to your master."

(To be continued.)

WILL IRELAND EVER BE SEPARATED FROM GREAT BRITAIN?

By Rev. M. Baxter.

Ireland never belonged to the Roman Empire like England—Newton's Prediction—Fenianism—One third of British Soldiers Catholics—The Home Rule Movement—Approaching Conflicts.

PROPHETIC expositors have long maintained that in the latter-day revival of Cæsar's Roman Empire in the form of a ten-kingdomed confederacy, all the countries inside the Roman Empire must become separated from the countries outside the Roman Empire, and it will thus become exactly reconstituted within its ancient boundaries of the Rhine and Danube and Euphrates. Britain was undoubtedly part of Cæsar's Roman Empire for 400 years, from A.D. 45 until A.D. 436, when the Romans finally withdrew from it, as stated by Gibbon (Ch. 1), and other historians. But Ireland was never part of the Roman Empire, and for this reason many prophetic students expect that it must be at least legislatively separated from Britain before the ten-kingdomed confederacy can be completely formed.

For instance, an eminent expositor, B. W. Newton, wrote in his "Prospects of the Ten Kingdoms" some years ago, in 1849, these words:

In cases where a country external to the Roman Empire is subjected to a country within the Roman Empire—the countries thus circumstanced being Ireland in its relation to England, and also the colonies of England, etc.—there can be little doubt but that the union between such countries will be dissolved; if not fully, yet to the extent of distinct and independent legislatures being granted, as indeed is already done in the leading colonies of England."

Here was a plain prediction twenty-five years ago founded upon intelligible reasons, and it is wonderful how the march of events during the past twenty-five years points to the probability of its fulfilment. If, on taking a survey of Ireland, we found it, like Scotland, consisting of a Protestant population without any thought of separation from England, then we might regard such a prophecy as a long distance from fulfilment.

But what is the real state of the case? It is a startling fact that of about six million inhabitants of Ireland fully five million are Roman Catholics, who, as a rule, secretly hate British Protestantism, and would be glad to see any Roman Catholic power, like France, subjugate Protestant England. In addition to this religious antipathy, there is the political hatred borne by the Hibernian Celtic race toward the Anglo-Saxon race as their conquerors.

This chronic Irish disaffection has assumed a dangerous organized form in Fenianism ever since 1864. The Fenians are only waiting for England to be engaged in some foreign war to show their power to create trouble and mischief. The old maxims are not forgotten by them, "England's difficulty is Ireland's opportunity," and "He who would against England win must first with Ireland begin." There is real and serious ground of alarm in the fact that nearly one third of the British regular army consists of Irish Roman Catholics; and there are 100,000 Irish Romanists in each of the cities of Liverpool, Manchester, and Glasgow, and great numbers of them in Leeds, Edinburgh, and other towns, and two or three hundred thousand of them in London. They are chiefly the lowest class, who have nothing to lose, and who may, therefore, think they are likely to gain by a democratic revolution.

The incendiary conflagrations, by which the desperate Communist Republicans reduced part of Paris to ashes in 1871, showed the reckless fierceness of revolutionary Red-Republicanism. The desperado ferocity of Parisian Communism and of Irish Fenianism is precisely identical. Indeed, the same man has been a leader in each movement. The Communist General Cluseret, who is said to have set fire to the Tuileries with his own hands, resided in London in 1867 as the military Fenian head-centre, and is supposed to have planned the Clerkenwell nitro-glycerine explosion, and the attempted attack on Chester Castle.

In that year large buildings in London, Liverpool, and Manchester were vigilantly watched all night by special constables, in consequence of secret information that the Fenians intended to fire them, as a revenge for the hanging of Burke and others at Manchester. We now see the solid ground that existed for those apprehensions, and it gives some idea of future dangers, when terrible scenes will be witnessed in English cities in riots and uprisings.

Still further, in 1871 the revived Irish agitation assumed an additional form in the Home Rule movement, which has well been called Rome Rule. Who would have believed twenty-five years ago that there would have been in 1876 about fifty Home Rulers, Irish members of Parliament, in the British House of Commons, pledged to try and obtain an independent Legislature for Ireland—clamoring for an Irish Parliament to sit in Dublin, the same as England's colonies, Australia, Canada, and New Zealand, have Parliaments of their own? Surely all this is a considerable preparation for the fulfilment of the prophetic expectation of Mr. Newton and other expositors, that Ireland will be separated from England—at least to the extent of having a separate Legislature.

Great Britain must soon be involved in terrible European wars, although she would earnestly desire to stand free from entangling and hazardous alliances. And then the Home Rulers and Fenians will press their advantage to the utmost, and it remains to be seen whether they will not, unfortunately for England, succeed in practically effecting a repeal of the union between Ireland and England.

Britain's submission to such a measure is scarcely likely to be voluntary, and before such a concession could be extracted from her, she must be reduced to considerable straits, such as being involved in a foreign war, or harassed by another Indian mutiny, or by serious disturbances in England or Ireland. Every prophetic indication presents a dark and gloomy outlook, and suggests grievous disasters.

Another alarming fact should not be lost sight of, that Republican ideas are notoriously gaining ground among many of the working classes in England. Widely circulated Radical newspapers imbue the minds of workingmen with revolutionary notions. The frequent strikes of workmen at the dictation of Trades Unions, with the consequent struggle of labor against capital, create an antagonistic feeling betwen the employed and employers, and fan the flame of democratic fervor, and prepare the masses for the schemes of Communism, Socialism, and Internationalism. Everything is ripening for the "time of trouble such as never was since there was a nation even to that same time"—introductory to the period of the resurrection and the second coming of Christ (Dan. 12 : 1).

LONGING FOR CHRIST'S SECOND ADVENT.

By Cheyne Brady.

THE resurrection body is essential to our perfect enjoyment of the Emmanuel, the personal God in our nature.

The interval between death and the resurrection is necessarily an imperfect state, imperfect to the departed Christian individually, imperfect to the spirits of the ransomed as a body. So long as death reigns over their mortal bodies, they cannot fully enjoy Christ the personal Redeemer in His glorified state in heaven. The reason is plain. The body is an essential part of the human constitution, and during the time that corruption preys on the Christian's physical nature he is not completely conformed to Him who is perfect God and perfect man in one person.

Again, while He, the Head, is now perfect in His own person, in the absolute sense of the term, His body, the Church, is incomplete so long as the grave is not spoiled of its prey. It is incomplete in a twofold sense: (1) in the numbers constituting His body—the bride, the Lamb's wife; and (2) in the personal constitution of each member of the body. What a blessed hope, then—the hope of the Lord's advent and of the triumphs of the righteous dead in the resurrection!

There is, therefore, an earnest longing throughout the Church of God in all its constituent parts, and in all ages, for the great consummation.

Christ Himself looks forward with earnest desire to His own glorious appearing, when the church now in heaven and the church on earth shall no longer be separate parts of one great body, but shall in all respects be perfect.

The souls of the redeemed now in glory eagerly anticipate the time when their present condition of happiness shall receive an extraordinary enhancement. Their eye is doubtless fixed on the event which shall bring judgment on the wicked and resurrection glory on the righteous. The evidence of this we have in the prayer of the souls beneath the altar, "How long, O Lord! holy and true, dost Thou not judge and avenge our blood on them that dwell on the earth?"

The ehurch on earth also waits with long continued watching the marvellous change which shall be effected in her experience at the appearing of Jesus in the clouds. Her sovereign Lord proclaims from the throne, "Behold, I come quickly," and she gives at once the hearty response, "Even so come, Lord Jesus." "To them that look for Him, shall He appear the second time, without sin, unto salvation" (Hebrews 9 : 28).

Not only so, but "the whole creation groaneth and travaileth in pain together until now," as if uniting with us "who have the first-fruits of the Spirit, who groan within ourselves, waiting for the adoption, even the redemption of our body; for we are saved by hope" (Romans 8 : 22–23).

It appears then that there is a universal straining of the eye, in heaven and in earth, in the spiritual and even in the irrational and material departments of the universe, looking for one grand all-important and all-absorbing event—the second advent of Jesus Christ, emphatically designated "that blessed hope."

The Old Testament is full of intimations of the coming Messiah. From the fall of man the expectations of God's people have been constantly directed to the manifestations of the great Redeemer. The prophets in all ages have sounded the key-note of preparation for the advent of man's glorious Deliverer. The predictions of inspired men of old were not by any means confined to the first coming in humiliation and suffering, but for the most part rather referred to the second coming in great glory.

Even Enoch, before the flood, "prophesied of the Lord coming with ten thousands of His holy ones." The unbelieving Jews rejected Christ's claim, partly because He did not display Himself as an all-conquering King, subduing the world to Himself, and raising them to pre-eminent earthly grandeur.

In the New Testament, the writers already having beheld Christ in the flesh, fulfilling the prophecies respecting sacrifices, humiliation, suffering, and death—having seen Him ascend, after His rising from the dead, to the right hand of God, in order to fulfil the work of intercession—in all their epistles are full of the idea of our Lord's speedy coming a second time in His robes of judicial power and royal majesty.

The all-engrossing nature of the topic may be seen in the fact that in one out of every thirteen verses, as has been calculated, throughout the New Testament, there is reference made, more or less direct, to the second coming of the Saviour. Thus frequently and solemnly do Christ and His apostles refer to this momentous occurrence, that it might be next to impossible for men to be indifferent to its approach, and especially that the disciples of the Lord might never cease feeling alive to its importance.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, December 10th, at 3.30 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress Appears to have Settled Down to work with unusual tranquillity. Both parties have abstained so far from the taunts and irritating speeches, which by arousing angry replies obstruct business. Senator Conkling has introduced a bill designed to prevent the spoliation of the bay and harbor of New York by the casting into it the garbage of the city. The bill is generally acceptable, and there is good reason for hoping it will become law.

Notwithstanding Rumors to the Contrary, the President adheres to the opinions on the financial question expressed in his Message. In a letter to a friend, dated December 4th, he says: "The only constitutional legal-tender is gold and silver. Depart from that and confidence is gone. A sound financial policy will bring us money from all the commercial nations of the earth. In good times prepare for hard times; in good times pay debts. The legal-tender notes are debts. Let them be paid by the coin in the Treasury and the coin that is coming in from abroad, and it will not contract the circulation. Let our ship be headed in the right direction. It is a sound policy which has brought good times; the same policy will continue good times." A memorial will shortly be presented to Congress extensively signed by influential persons, praying for the adoption of Senator Bayard's resolution abolishing the legal-tender of the greenback.

In the Midst of Scenes of Squalor and Vice almost without equal in any city in the world, stands Jerry McAuley's mission in Water Street, New York. At its seventh anniversary, December 7th, an account of the work and its financial position was rendered, which showed that as an agency for good it had been abundantly blessed by God. The room was crowded in every part, and hundreds of disappointed roughs thronged around the door. When Jerry asked if any one wished to testify what God had done for them there, many reformed men and women sprang to their feet. Besides the spiritual blessings acknowledged, it was shown that godliness has "a promise of the life that now is" as well as "of that which is to come" (1 Tim. 4:8.) One speaker thus feelingly described the visible influence of the work accomplished:

"It meant no more fear of the police or the prison, no more carousals, broken heads, smashed furniture, children fleeing in fear. It meant clean clothes and no more rags—decency and respectability, home, bread and butter, happy wives, in fact every thing."

The mission is free from debt, and it owns the building, lot, and adjoining lot. Jerry expressed a wish to enlarge the building if he could procure the necessary funds, and at once $3730 were contributed, several gentlemen present giving $250 each.

'Thirty-five Years of My Life have been spent in prison," was the confession made by a man apparently under three-score years of age, at the above anniversary. He said, "I have been in prison in every part of the world. I had the desire of stealing in my heart from childhood, and it was never taken out till March, 1878, when I came into this mission." A woman said, "For seven years the Lord has saved me from drunkenness. When I came to Him I was a beggar, ragged, and filthy. I had signed pledges, but they never did me any good. It was the pledge I made to Jesus that saved me." A young man said, "I came from that low den on Chatham Street that 'Jerry' stamped out. There were nine of us who started out to follow Christ together, and none of us have yet given up. I earned $21 a week while there, but it all went for drink. It was harder for me to acknowledge Christ here than it was to stop drinking." An old man said, "It is a great privilege to stand up here and speak for Christ. Scarcely ten months have passed since I was plucked out of the mire. Christ has given me the privilege of going about among the slums of this city and speaking for Him. What rapture I had the first time I led a soul to Jesus!"

Mr. Gladstone, the English Ex-premier, has been making an electioneering tour in Scotland. He expects Parliament will be dissolved soon, and desires to represent a Scotch constituency. The platform he advocates is an advanced one, as will be seen by the following items: He declared himself favorable to the abolition of the law of hypothec and of the law of entail, and of an increased number of Scottish representatives in Parliament. While not favoring Home Rule, he thought that if Ireland or Scotland desired and were able to arrange the local portion of its affairs, it would relieve an overweighted Parliament and accomplish a great national good. Upon the question of Church disestablishment, he held that to be a subject for the decision of the people themselves. He is also in favor of "local option" being given to townships in the matter of restricting public-houses.

Mr. Gladstone formally resigned the leadership of the Liberal party six years ago, but the reception accorded to him in Scotland indicates that if his party should return to power, he will be expected by the people to be at the head of affairs.

Sedition in Ireland.—Mr. Parnell and Other agitators are announced to sail for this country in the Cunard steamer Scythia, which leaves Liverpool December 20th. They are coming to ask for funds to continue their agitation in Ireland. It is right that the American people should know for what they are asked to contribute their hard-earned money. The following is a specimen of the letters now being sent to the owners of property in Ireland, and indicates the character of the agitation:

"Republican Garrison.—Sir,—Take notice that if you do not abate your rents fifty per cent you will be shot, murdered, or otherwise maltreated, D.V., and may God have mercy on your soul."

By the blasphemous use of the above two capitals the writer endeavors to constitute the Almighty a co-conspirator. The influence of Mr. Parnell and his friends over the men who write such letters is almost as firmly established as is the power of the Roman Catholic priests, and in the minds of thinking men, the leaders, clerical and lay, will be held responsible for the outrages which they might repress if they chose to exert their power.

The Anglo-Afghan Difficulty has not been solved by the occupation of Cabul. A combined movement, preparatory to clearing the country toward the Northwest, was recently begun by General Macpherson and General Massy. General Massy with a force of cavalry arrived at the agreed point of junction too soon. By so doing he encountered a heavy force led by the Afghan general Mahmoud Jan. In the battle that ensued, the English forces lost their guns, but o receiving reinforcements renewed the attack an recovered them. The official report says th Afghans "are admirably led, and two or thre thousand of them are armed with Snider rifle They lost heavily by the cavalry charge an artillery fire, and never wavered. Our loss believed to be eighteen killed, including tw lieutenants and twenty-five wounded, includin one colonel. General Macpherson is now a tacking the enemy. The guides have arriv from Luttabund, and General Baker is comin from Maidan."

A Great Heat Wave is Predicted by Mete rologists to sweep over the continent of Euro in 1880. The Astronomer-Royal of Scotland 1872 published in Nature his deductions fro observations of thirty-two years, which he l lieved clearly showed that a recurrence of a gre heat wave might be anticipated every elev years and a fraction. The arrival of this wave predicted would be in 1880. Prior to that thought there would be a period of unusual co which might be expected to set in in the fall 1878. The meteorological records of Gr Britain show that during the past twe months the mean temperature has been lov than at any period since 1813, strikingly fulf ing the expectation of the astronomer. T forecast was based on the eleven-year peri nearly coincident with the sun-spot cycles of same duration. A leading meteorological thority says, "Whether the observed weat cycles of eleven years are due to the equally observed sun-spot cycles, or to some other ph ical agency, it would seem clear that we hav this forecast one practical corroboration of theory which ascribes the earth's great ' waves' and their associate 'cold waves' varying solar or cosmical influences."

The Fourth Commandment.—The New Y Herald makes this open declaration in its ed rial columns:

"It is an effete delusion that the clergy in or country disapprove of Sunday newspap The experience of the Sunday Herald always been that clergymen and their families are most eager and appreciative readers." We l this is incorrect, but in godly contrast to i find the following statement by Postma James in excuse for declining to make a Sun delivery of the mails: "We tried the ex ment once before, and found such energetic widespread opposition to it that we had to a don it. Clergymen as well as laymen c upon me, in perfect delegations, to pro against the 'desecration' of the Sabbath, many people either refused to receive thei ters at their houses or wrote to me that they not wish any Sunday delivery at all." The never such a thing as a Sunday issue of the papers in London.

John Wesley's Chapel in Flames.— chapel which John Wesley founded in the Road, London, was found to be on fir Sunday, December 7th. A brief cable me says that notwithstanding the exertions o fire brigade, the building was completely gu The beautiful frescoed ceiling is irreparab jured, and it is feared the roof of the stru cannot be restored. Among the treasured saved from the ravages of the fire were the pit from which John Wesley preached, an Bible and gown used by the eminent divine.

Mrs. M. Baxter, whose Valuable Exp tion of the Sunday-school lessons publ each week in this journal has been grat acknowledged by many readers, has been ing meetings at Ittlingen, a village lyin tween Heilbronn and Heidelberg. Altho was snowing hard each day, the meetings always full—even crowded—the people s on the forms and desks of the school; a believe there will be results made known that day." Much opposition is being ma all lay work; Mrs. Baxter desires the pray the readers of the CHRISTIAN HERALD half of her work.

A Joyful Thanksgiving was Enjoyed by an ged couple in Medway, Mass., on Nov. 27th. At e outbreak of the war their only son ran away sea, and served under Cushing in the well-nown Albemarle exploit. There all trace of e sailor was lost, and it was supposed that he ad been drowned in the river when the torpedo ploded under the vessel. His sister died a w years ago, and his parents have since been ing in retirement and poverty. But late on ednesday night, Nov. 26th, a man with a scar on s face knocked at the door and requested a lodg- g. He was admitted by the old lady, who, hile making a cup of tea, looked closely him, and recognized her lost son. He had en severely wounded by the explosion of the rpedo, but had been taken out of the river by e of the boats which came to the relief of the ew of the Albemarle. He had lost his senses by e concussion and wound, and could no more member any thing of himself, not even his me. Finally he fell into the employ of a for- er surgeon of the army, and with him went to plantation outside of Raleigh, N. C. One day e surgeon examined the old wound in his ad, and found the skull fractured and pressing the brain. With the aid of another surgeon e skull was lifted, and the wound again closed adually. The man's condition at once began improve, and he recovered his memory and ental faculties and returned to his parents, as have just related.

The Week of Prayer.—The following pro- amme has been adopted by the United States angelical Alliance, for the week of prayer, nuary 4–10, 1880: Sunday—Sermons on the Fulness of Christ's Salvation." Monday— hanksgiving for the blessings of the past year, d prayer for their continuance. Tuesday—Con- sion of sin, and humiliation before God. ednesday—Prayer for the Church of Christ, ministers, its growth in grace, and its en- gement; and for revivals of religion through- t our country. Thursday—Prayer for Chris- n education; for the family, and institutions learning; for Sunday-schools, and Christian sociations. Friday — Prayer for nations, ers, and people; for peace and religious lib- y. Saturday—Prayer for Home and Foreign ssions; for the outpouring of the Spirit upon flesh, and the conversion of the world.

A Remarkable Case of Healing in Answer to ayer is related by the New York Tribune. at journal relates that Mrs. Churchill, of enn's Falls, N. Y., who has been bedridden for umber of years with nervous prostration, and s been unsuccessfully treated by several physi- ns, was recently cured through the instrumen- ity of prayer. She had a pious Quaker lady for urse. When her patient had one of her accus- ned hysterical fits of crying and physical de- ession, the nurse would immediately kneel vn and pray with and for the sick one, and she overed in answer to their petitions (Matt. 21 :)

William C. Gilman, the Christian Professor d Sabbath-School teacher, whose forgeries, ounting to a quarter of a million dollars, used so much excitement two years ago, re- ved a pardon from Governor Robinson on cember 3d. His original sentence was five rs' imprisonment with hard labor. His un- stakable penitence, and the frank confession he de to his Sunday-School and to the Christian ends whose confidence he had abused, enlisted ch commiseration for him. He said that be- e the panic of 1873 he had misappropriated ds intrusted to his care by speculating reck- ly. These irregularities had created a tre- ndous deficiency, to meet which the forgeries been committed. He entreated all who had own him to take warning from his case and avoid the first step from the path of rectitude, ich he assured them inevitably led to others, would end in irretrievable if not eternal n. General sympathy was expressed for the ily of the criminal, and his creditors not only e their own heavy loss, but nobly made up a rse of $60,000, which they presented to his sisters to replace trust money of which their brother had defrauded them. Many efforts were made at the time to obtain Mr. Gilman's pardon, which Governor Robinson, in the interest of justice, declined to grant. During his imprisonment Mr. Gilman's daughter, whom he loved most tenderly, died, and his wife lost her reason through grief at the failure of her efforts to secure her husband's release. She also died a few days ago, and Governor Robinson then felt he could no longer refuse a pardon. It arrived in time to enable Mr. Gilman to attend the lady's funeral. New York has not often seen a more striking illustration of the words, "God is not mocked: for whatever a man soweth that shall he also reap" (Gal. 6: 7.) We confidently hope that Gilman is a child of God's, and God has terribly chastised him. He will next be shown the loving kindness of the Lord. See Isa. 54: 8, and 2. Cor. 4: 17.

Thanksgiving Offerings in Chicago have been made in accordance with a suggestion by Mr. Moody. They were brought to the Chicago Avenue Church on Thanksgiving Day. Some six wagon loads of offerings of good things of all sorts meant as thanksgiving gifts to the Lord for the poor in that part of the city, arrived at the church on Thanksgiving morning and were placed in front of the pulpit. These offerings consisted of flour, bread, crackers, cakes, pies, apples, pears, grapes, oranges, lemons, canned fruits, canned meats, fish, hams, dried beef, mutton, chickens, turkeys, ducks, matches, brushes, soap, etc. (Prov. 19: 17.)

The Largest Sale of Stocks on Record in this or any other country occurred November 26th, when Mr. William H. Vanderbilt, the President of the New York Central and Hudson River Railroad Company, sold to a syndicate in Jay Gould's interest 250,000 shares of the New York Central Railroad stock. The purchasers paid for the stock in United States 4 per cent bonds at cost, thus making the cost to them about $18,475,500.

The British Government appear to have rea-sons for believing that Yakoob Khan, the ex-Ameer of Afghanistan, was implicated either directly or indirectly in the massacre of Major Cavagnari and his party at Cabul. It is now announced that under instructions from the Viceroy of India the ex-Ameer Yakoob Khan left Cabul December 1st for Peshawur, under the charge of Captain Turner and an escort, and will reach his destination in eight marches.

Curious Bible Facts.—The Learned Prince of Granada, heir to the Spanish throne, imprisoned by order of the Crown for fear he should aspire to the throne, was kept in solitary confinement in the old prison at the Place of Skulls, Madrid. After thirty-three years in this living tomb, death came to his release, and the following researches in the Bible, marked with an old nail on the rough walls of his cell, told how his brain had sought employment through the weary years: In the Bible the word Lord is found 1853 times; the word Jehovah 6855 times; and the word reverend but once, and that in the 9th verse of the 111th Psalm. The 8th verse of the 117th Psalm is the middle verse of the Bible. The 9th verse of the 8th chapter of Esther is the longest verse; the 35th verse, 11th chapter of John, is the shortest. The 37th chapter of Isaiah and the 19th chapter of 2d Kings are alike. The word girl occurs but once in the Bible, and that in the 3d verse and 3d chapter of Joel. There are in the Bible 3,586,483 letters, 773,693 words, 31,373 verses, 1189 chapters, and 66 books.

Sir William Muir, late Governor of the Northwest Provinces in India, said at a missionary meeting in London recently, it was the Koran that held back the empire of India from progress, and it was the Koran which held back Mohammedans from embracing Christianity. They owed to the American missionaries a debt of gratitude for what they were doing in Turkey. He knew well himself the American missionaries in India and their admirable work.

PRAYER TO GOD IN TROUBLE AN ACCEPTABLE SACRIFICE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify me."—PSALM 50: 15

Thankfulness and Confidence Missed—Prayer in Trouble brings Glory to God—I. In the very Act—1. It Indicates a Truthful Recognition of God—2. It is a Sign of Fellowship—3. It Implies Hope in God—4. Exhibits Clinging Affection—Alexander and His Physician—5. It Proves Steadfast Confidence—II. Through the Answer—The Answer is—1. Practical—2. Positive—3. Personal—4. Permanent—III. Our After-Conduct—That should be Marked by the Gratitude of the Heart—Growth in Faith—Increased Patience and Confidence—Trouble an Opportunity.

THE Lord God in this psalm is described as having a controversy with His people. He summons heaven and earth to hear Him while He utters His reproof. This indictment will show us what it is that the Lord sets the greatest store by, for His complaint will evidently touch upon that point. We are informed most plainly that the Lord had no controversy with His people concerning the externals of His worship; He does not reprove them for their sacrifices and burnt offerings; He even speaks depreciatingly of these symbolical sacrifices, and says, "I will take no bullock out of thy house, nor he-goats out of thy folds." His complaint was not concerning visible ceremony and outward ritual; and this shows that He does not attach so much importance to outward things as most men suppose Him to do.

His complaint was concerning inner worship, soul-worship, spiritual worship; His reproof was that His people did not offer thanksgiving and prayer, and that their conduct was so inconsistent with their professions that clearly their hearts went not with their outward formalities. This was the essence of the charge against them. They were faulty, not in visible religiousness, but in the internal and vital part of godliness; they had no true intercourse with God, though they kept up the appearance of it. We see then that heart-worship is the most precious thing in the sight of the Lord. We learn what is that priceless jewel, which must be set in the gold ring of religion if the Lord is to accept it.

Nor is it hard to see why it is so; for it is plain that if a man had kept the ritual of the old law to the very full, yet he might not be in sincerity a worshipper of God at all. He might drive whole flocks of his sheep to the temple door for sacrifice, and yet he might feel no spiritual reverence for the Most High; for it has been proved times without number that the most careful and zealous attention to external ceremonies is quite consistent with the absolute absence of any true apprehension of God and hearty love for Him.

What the Lord missed in His people was not temple rites and offerings, for in these they abounded; but He missed the fruit of the lips giving glory to His name. He missed first their thankfulness, for He says unto them, "Offer unto God thanksgiving; and pay thy vows unto the Most High;" and next He missed in them that holy, which would lead them to resort to Him in the hour of their need: hence He says, "Call upon me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee, and thou shalt glorify Me."

TRUSTFUL CONFIDENCE

Brethren and sisters, have you failed in these two precious things? Do you fail in thankfulness? May I also venture to ask whether you pay your vows to Him? In times of sickness and sorrow you say, 'Gracious Lord, if I am recovered, or if I am brought out of this condition, I will be more believing, I will be more consecrated. I will devote myself alone to thee, O my Saviour, if thou wilt now restore me." Are you mindful of these vows? It is a delicate question, but I put it pointedly, because a vow unredeemed is a wound in the heart.

It is not to thankfulness, however, that I am going to ask attention this morning, so much as to the other sacrifice—namely, prayer in the day of trouble. Let me say at the outset that I am struck with wonder that God should regard it as being one of the most acceptable forms of worship, that we should call upon Him in the day of trouble. Such prayers seem to be all for ourselves, and to be forced from us by our necessities; and yet such is His condescending love that He puts them down as being choice sacrifices, and places them side by side with the thankful paying of our vows.

He tells us that our call for His help in the hour of distress will be more acceptable to Him than the oblations which His own law ordained—more pleasing than all the bullocks and rams which liberal princes could present at His altars. Be not backward then, beloved, to cry to Him in your hour of need. If it pleases Him and profits you, you ought not to want a single word from me to excite you to do what seems so natural, so comforting, so beneficial.

Are our cry of anguish and our appeal of hope acceptable to God? Then let us cry mightily unto Him. Are any of you in the black waters? Call upon Him. Are you in the hunrgy desert? Call upon Him. Are you in the lions' dens, and among the mountains of the leopards? Call upon Him. Whether you are in peril as to your souls or your bodies, do not hesitate to pray at once, but say to yourself, "Why should I linger? Let me tell the Lord my grief right speedily; for if he counts my call a worthy sacrifice, assuredly I will present it with my whole heart."

I. May the Holy Spirit, the Comforter, enable us to see that calling upon God in the day of trouble brings GLORY TO HIM IN ITSELF.

I beg you to notice the time that is specially mentioned. Calling upon God at any time honors Him, but calling upon Him in the day of trouble has a special mark set against it as peculiarly pleasing to the Lord, because it yields peculiar glory to His name.

1. Note then, first, that when a man calls upon God sincerely in the day of trouble it is a truthful recognition of God. Outward devotions suppose a God, but prayer in the day of trouble proves that God is a fact to the suppliant. The tried pleader has no doubt that there is a God, for He is calling upon Him when mere form can yield no comfort. He wants practical, matter-of-fact help, and he so realizes God that he treats Him as real, and appeals to Him to be his Helper. God is not a mere name or a superstition to him; he is sure that there is a God, for he is calling upon him in an hour when a farce would be a tragedy, and an imposture would be a bitter mockery.

Many of your beliefs in God are a sort of religious parade, and not the actual walk of faith. Many have a holiday faith, which enables them to repeat the creed, and say with the congregation, "I believe in God the Father Almighty;" but in very deed they have no such belief. Do you, my hearer, believe in God the Father Almighty when you are in trouble? Do you go to the great Father at such times and expect help from Him? This is real work, and not hypocritical play. There is solid metal about the faith which follows the Lord in the dark, cries to Him when the rod is in His hand, and looks to Him not for sentimental comforts in prosperity, but for substantial help in bitter adversities. What we want is facts, and trial is the test of fact. Sharp furnace-work does away with mere pretence, and this is one of its great uses; for that grace which, like the salamander, lives in the fire, is grace indeed.

2. There is more here, however, than this first good thing. When a man calleth upon God in the day of trouble it is because he seeks and in some measure enjoys a spiritual intercourse with God. "Call upon Me in the day of trouble." That call is heart-language addressed to God: it is the soul really speaking to the great Father beyond all question.

How easy it is to say a prayer without coming into any contact with God! Year after year the tongue repeats pious language, just as a barrel-organ grinds out the old tunes, and there may be no more converse with the Lord than if the man had muttered to the ghosts of the slain. Many prayers might as well be said backwards as forwards, for there would be as much in them one way as the other. The abracadabra of the magician has quite as much virtue in it as any other set of mere words. The Lord's Prayer, if it be merely rehearsed as a form, may be a solemn mockery. But prayer in the day of trouble is honest speech with God, or at least a sincere desire in that direction.

Now, as I have already said, in the sacrifice of bullocks there was no intercourse with God in the case of a great many, and in external devotion, whether it is performed in a cathedral or in a humble barn, there is frequently no coming near to God; but when we believingly call upon God in the day of trouble, then there is no mistake in the matter, we are holding converse with God—"the righteous cry, and the Lord heareth." Intercourse with the unseen, spiritual Father is genuine indeed when it is carried on against wind and tide, under pressure of sorrow and weight of distress: the Lord give us to carry it on, whatever may happen to us.

3. Yet is there more than this; for the soul not only comes into God's presence, but in calling upon God in the day of trouble it is filled with a manifest hope in God. It hopes in God for His goodness, for it is a belief in that goodness which is the reason why it feels able to pray at all. The soul hopes in His mercy, or it would dwell in silence and never lift up another cry to heaven. Amid a sense of deserved wrath the heart has a trust in infinite grace, and hence its call.

There is a hope in such a prayer which honors God's goodness and condescension, and equally pays tribute to His faithfulness and His all-sufficiency. He has promised to help those that call upon Him, therefore do we call upon Him; and He has all power to keep His promise, therefore do we come to Him, and spread our case before Him. Little as the act of calling upon God in the day of trouble seems to be, it puts crowns upon all the attributes of God in proportion to the spiritual knowledge of the suppliant.

There may be more honoring of the Lord in a ploughboy's tear than in a princely endowment; more homage to the Lord in the humble hope of a dying pauper than in the pealing anthems of the cathedral, or the great shout of our own mighty congregation. The publican's confession, and His hope in the mercy of God, had more worship in it than the blast of the silver trumpets, and the ringing out of the golden harps, and the songs of the white-robed choristers, who stood in the courts of the Lord's house, and led the far-sounding hallelujahs of Israel.

4. This calling upon God in the day of trouble, again, pleases the Lord because it exhibits a clinging affection to Him. When an ungodly man professes religion, as such men often do, he is all very well with God as long as God pleases him. Sunshiny weather makes such a man bless the sun: if God smiles upon him he says that God is good.

Aye, but a true child of God loves a chastening God. He does not turn his back when the Lord seems angry with him; but then it is he falls prostrate in humble supplication, and cries, "Show me wherefore Thou contendest with me: I will not believe Thee to have any real spite against me; if Thou smite me there must be some wise and good cause for it: therefore show me, I beseech Thee." It is very sweet, brethren, when God sends you a great deal of trouble to love Him all the more for it. This is a sure way of proving that ours is which abides while it gets its price, and goes when wages fail.

NOT A HIRELING LOVE,

God forbid that we should have Balaam's love of reward, and Juda's treacherous greed. A dog will follow a man as long as he throws him a bone, but that is a man's own dog which will follow him when he strikes him with the whip and will even fawn upon him when he speaks roughly to him. Such Christians ought we to be, who will keep close to God when He is robed in thunder. It is ours to will that God shall do what He wills, and ours to call upon Him in the day of trouble, and not to call out against Him when times are hard.

I would trust my God as unreservedly as Alexander trusted His friend, who was also His physician. The physician had mixed a medicine for Alexander, who was sick, and the potion stood by Alexander's bed for him to drink Just before he drank, a letter was delivered t him in which he was warned that his physicia had been bribed to poison him, and had mingle poison with the medicine. Alexander read th letter, and summoned the physician into his presence, and when he came in Alexander at onc drank up the cup of medicine and then hande his friend the letter. What grand confidenc was this! To risk his life upon his friend' fidelity. Such a man might well have friends He would not let the accused know of the libe till he had proved beyond all dispute that h did not believe a word of it.

Is not our heavenly Father in Christ Jesu worthy of even a grander faith? Shall I eve mistrust Him? The devil tells me, my Lord that this affliction which I am suffering wi work me ill. I do not believe it—not for moment do I believe it, and to prove that I hav no suspicion, I accept it joyfully at Thy hand I joy and rejoice in it because Thou hast o dained it, and I call upon Thee to make it wor my lasting good. I will take bitter at Th hands as well as sweet, and the gall shall honey to me.

5. There is in connection with this clingi affection a most steadfast confidence. They wh call upon God in the day of trouble becon quiet and unshaken, and abide in full assuran as to the Lord on whom they rely. O troubl one, do not be agitated, do not run away others, but call upon God in calm faith. I not sit down in silent despair and fretfulnes but call upon God; do not be soured into morose state of mind, nor go into the sulks, b call upon the Lord as one who cannot be driv to curse or to be in a passion, but gives hims to prayer. It is a blessed thing when we c say, "Though He slay me, yet will I trust Him," and can feel that whatever happens us we never will start aside from our firm c viction that the Lord is good, and His mer endureth for ever.

In fine, this it is which God accepts as hon ing him, that in the day of trouble we shou take all our troubles to Him, pour out hearts before Him, and then leave the wh case in His hands. The child-like uncovering the heart to God alone is very precious to Hi There are times when it is wise to advise a tr bled heart to be quiet before men.

"Bear and forbear and silent be,
Tell no man thy misery."

But it is always wise to bare the bosom to Lord's eye.

Is the slander too vile to be communica even to a single friend? Then follow the exa ple of Hezekiah and spread Rabshakeh's let before the Lord. Is the trial too severe, in much as others are obliged to suffer with y and are therefore turned to speak bitt against you? Then imitate David at Zikl and encourage yourself in the Lord your G Hide nothing. Reserve nothing. Tell it all, then trust about it all. When you have once the burden before the Lord leave it with H Do all that lieth in you, that prudence can tate, or common sense suggest, or indu effect, but still make the Lord your mains your buckler, your shield, your fortress and h tower. Say to yourself, "My soul, wait t only upon God, for my expectation is f Him."

A critic may sneeringly say, "It is a very natural thing for a man to cry out to God in the day of trouble, and certainly a selfish thing to run to the Lord because you need His help." "Besides," says another, "it must be a very distracted prayer that such a person offers, and faith under troublous circumstances is a very elementary virtue." But, my good sirs, hearken. Surely the Lord knows best what pleases Him, and if He declares His delight in our calling upon Him in the day of trouble, why should we dispute with Him? It is so, for He has said it. As for us, who dare not raise such quibbles, let us not be moved by them, but continue to call upon Him in the day of trouble, and we shall certainly glorify His name.

II. When we call upon God in the day of trouble it brings which the prayer obtains. "I will deliver thee." I ask you, troubled saints, to follow me while I repeat the text with variations, for that is about all I shall attempt. "Call upon Me in the day of trouble"—there is the prayer commanded. "I will deliver thee"—there is the answer promised.

HONOR TO GOD THROUGH THE ANSWER

1. In these words we have a practical answer. It is not merely "I will think about thee, I will hear thee, I will propose plans for thee, and somewhat aid thee in working them out," but, "I will deliver thee."

Thou shalt have solid, substantial aid. Either I will keep thee out of the trouble of which thou art afraid; thou shalt be delivered by never having to endure it; the Egyptians that thou seest to-day thou shalt see no more for ever; thou dreadest the stone at the mouth of the sepulchre, but thou shalt find it rolled away. Or else if thou must come into the trouble, I will deliver thee whilst thou art in it; like Noah, thou shalt be surrounded by the deluge, but the floods shall not overflow thee; like the three holy children, thou shalt be in the furnace, but the fire shall not kindle upon thee. Thou shalt go through the trouble triumphantly, as Israel went through the Red Sea on foot. Thou shalt have such sustaining grace that thou shalt glory in tribulation and rejoice in affliction.

2. Notice, next, that it is a positive answer. It is not, "I may, perhaps, deliver thee;" but, "I will." It is not, "I will endeavor to do it," but, "I will deliver thee." Did unbelief say, "But how?" Friend, leave the "how" with God. Ways and means are with Him. He says, "I will deliver thee." To turn round and ask "How?" is to forget that he is God all-sufficient.

"Remember that Omnipotence Has servants everywhere."

Unbelief is very ready with its questions, and too often it inquires, "When?" Friend, leave the "when" with God. He does not tell us when; but the deliverance must come at the right time, because if He were not to deliver us till after we had perished it would be no deliverance at all. If deliverance came too late it would be a mere mockery. The promise comprehends within itself the implied condition that it shall be a timely deliverance, for otherwise how should the delivered one live to glorify the name of the Lord?

3. Notice next that the promise is personal. "I will deliver thee." It is not said, "My angels shall do it," but "I will deliver thee." The Lord God Himself undertakes to rescue His people. "I will be a wall of fire round about them." "I the Lord do keep it; I will water it every moment: lest any hurt it, I will keep it night and day."

Then, too, it is personal to its object; it is the same man who calls upon God in trouble who shall be a partaker of the blessing. "Call upon Me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee." It is personal, personal to you; therefore, dear friend, personally believe in this personal promise of thy God.

4. Recollect, also, that it is permanent. You pleaded this promise, some of you, fifty years ago; it is as sure to-day as it was then. If you have a bank-note, and take it to the bank and get the cash, it is done with; but my Master's bank-notes are self-renewing. You can plead His promise a hundred times over, for His word abides for ever; it is fulfilled only to be fulfilled again.

Where are you at this moment, you troubled, downcast one? You said just now, "I shall never be happy any more." Recall those words. Eat them with bitter herbs of repentance: "Trust in the Lord for ever, for in the Lord Jehovah is everlasting strength." You said, "That blow has crushed me; I could have borne anything else, but this trial I cannot bear." Tush! Do you know what you can bear? What said the apostle? "I can do all things through Christ which strengtheneth me." Only have faith in God, and obey and believe the text: "Call upon Me in the day of trouble; I will deliver thee."

III. Lastly, if you trust your God in your distress, and are, therefore, delivered, the Lord will be

GLORIFIED IN YOUR CONDUCT AFTERWARD.

When a man prays to God in the hour of trouble, and gets deliverance, as He is sure to get it, then he honors his great Helper by admiring the way in which the promise has been kept, and by adoring and blessing the loving Lord for such a gracious interposition. I know some of you have seen enough of the hand of the Lord in your own cases to make you wonder and admire forever and ever.

Next, you will honor Him by the gratitude of your heart, in which the memory of His goodness will for ever be recorded. This devout gratitude of yours will lead you in due season to bear testimony to His faithfulness. You will be indignant at unbelief and will war against it by personal witnessing. You will be very tender toward those who are now in trouble, as you once were, and you will long to tell them of the blessed rescue which God is prepared to perform for them as He did for you.

At the same time, you will personally grow in faith by the experience of your Heavenly Father's love and power, and in days to come you will glorify Him by increased patience and confidence. You will say, "He has been with me in six troubles, and He will be with me in the seventh. I have tried and proved my God, and I dare not doubt Him."

I know also that you will try to live more to His praise. As you see Him bring you out of one difficulty and then another you will feel bound to His service by fresh bonds. You will become a more consecrated man than you ever have been. You will jealously protect your remaining days from being wasted by sloth or desecrated by sin. And let me tell you that even when you die, and come up the banks of Jordan on the other side, you will long to glorify your God. When the angels meet you I should not wonder but what one of the first things you will do will be to say, "Bright spirits, I long to tell you what the Lord has done for me."

We each one owe most to God's grace, and hope to praise Him best. Some of you may think that you are love's deepest debtors, but I know better. I am not going to quarrel with you, but I know one who is so undeserving and yet receives such mercy, that he claims to take the lowest place, and most humbly to reverence boundless grace. Yea, I myself, less than the least of all saints, claim to have received most at His hands. I would fain love Him most, for towards me He has shown the utmost love in treating me as He has done. Am I not saying for myself that which you each would say for yourself? I know it is so, and hence it is that God is glorified by the reverence and love of those whom He delivers in answer to prayer.

I want you to notice with care the persons mentioned in the first clause of the text. You do not see yourself; you only hear of yourself. It is, "Call upon me." God is there. There is no direct mention of you; you are hidden; you are such a poor, broken-down, dispirited creature, that all you can do is to utter a cry and lie in the dust. There stands the mighty God, and you call upon Him.

Now, look at the next clause, "I will deliver thee." Here are two persons: the Lord stands first, the Ever-glorious and Blessed "I," and far down there are you. "I will deliver thee," poor, humble, but grateful "thee." Thus we see the Lord unites with His poor servant, and the link is deliverance.

When you come to the third clause, do you see where you are? You are placed first, for the Lord now calls you into action—"Thou shalt glorify Me." What a wonderful thing it is! For God to put glory upon us is easy enough, but for us to put glory upon Him, this is a miracle of condescension on the part of our God. "Thou shalt glorify Me."

"But," said one in this place, "I do love the Lord, but I cannot glorify Him. I wish I could preach, I wish I could write sweet hymns, I wish I had a clear voice with which to sing out the Redeemer's praises, but I have no gifts or talents, and therefore I shall never be able to glorify Him." Listen: you will be cast into trouble one of these days, and when you are in trouble you will find out how to glorify Him. Your extremity will be your opportunity. Like a lamp which shines not by day you will blaze up in the dark.

When the day of trouble is come you will cry, "Lord, I could not do anything for Thee, but Thou canst do everything for me. I am nothing, but, Lord, in my nothingness I, poor I, do trust Thee, and fling myself upon Thee." Then you shall find that you have glorified Him by your faith. I think you might almost be content to have the trouble, might you not? It seems as if you could not glorify Him anyhow else, and to glorify Him is the main object of your existence. Some Christians would scarcely have brought any glory to God if they had not been led by paths of sorrow, and made to wade through seas of grief.

I leave the blessed subject of the text with you, as a souvenir, till we meet again. The Lord be with you till the day break and the shadows flee away. Pray, also, that He may abide with me, and with all my brethren in the ministry; and may we all in yonder world of rest glorify Him, who will then have delivered us completely from all evil, to whom be glory for ever. Amen.

LETTER FROM MR. SPURGEON.

Dear Friends: I have prepared this sermon for the press in a warm and sunny clime, where the leaves have not yet left the trees, and one may sit under his vine and fig-tree from sun-rise to sunset and feel no chill. I am most happy to have escaped my annual season of pain and affliction, and I am gratefully consecrating every day to such mingled rest and study as may, under the divine blessing, enable me to return physically, mentally, and spiritually fitted for my work.

My heart is at home with my people, with the College, with the Orphanage, and all the other works. Specially do I miss the Monday evening prayer-meetings—dear seasons of holy intercourse and sacred joy. Do not forget me when it is well with you. If I have ever been made the means of blessing to your souls, implore the smile of the great Father for me. If there be any love between us for the truth's sake, and because of the union of the saints in Christ Jesus, pray for me. How much I need the aid of your prayers for the discharge of my ministry over so great a flock God alone knows. I am persuaded that the Lord will be with you, and cause you to abound in all spiritual blessings, for he is faithful to his promise, and evermore preserves and sanctifies those who abide in the truth. The Holy Ghost will teach, comfort, and perfect you, for it is his delight to bless his people.

May if come to pass that our churches may be more and more the saviours of the age, the salt amid surrounding corruption, the lights of a dark time. Watch for the good of our beloved country in changes which may soon transpire, and be in earnest for the cause of truth and righteousness, and the cause and kingdom of our Lord Jesus.

My hearty Christian love is with all the brethren in Christ Jesus. C. H. SPURGEON.

Mentone, Nov. 20, 1879.

MY SECOND DESIRE AND HOW IT WAS FULFILLED.

A Recollection by Major Malan.

Discharging the Duties of Chaplain to the Soldiers at Singapore for more than Two Years—Help from a Corporal in a Sunday-School—A Soldier's Converted Boy—My usual Sunday's Work—Week-Day Meetings—The Regimental School—Soldiers on Hong-Kong Rocks.

For myself, one thing
Do I desire of God, and it is this :
. . . .
That I may never be ashamed to own
Christ as my Saviour, God, and all :
But by my life and conversation lead
Some of my fellow-men to trust in Him.
If this He grant, welcome the sultry heat
Of tropic climes—the weakened, fevered pulse !
Welcome reproach, misunderstanding, shame !
Written during the voyage to China.

FROM the time that, by God's grace, I began to work for Him among my fellow-soldiers, I had a very earnest hope that some day I might find myself in command of British soldiers where I might have the great privilege of preaching the glad tidings of salvation to them.

When I arrived at Singapore, I found that there was no chaplain for the soldiers of the Church of England in my regiment. The colonial chaplain was in feeble health, and only able to perform the services in the town, three miles distant from our barracks. There was no regular military chaplain for the station. Thus the inestimable privilege of reading God's Word to my men, and telling them of the love and power to save of the Lord Jesus Christ, devolved upon me as commanding officer.

If it was a happiness and a source of thankfulness to be allowed to attend to my men's bodily needs, and look after their temporal comfort, how great was my joy and delight to be able to tell them of Him who loved them, and gave Himself for them ! The Lord gave me this privilege during nearly the whole of the two years and a quarter I was in command in those barracks ; thus fulfilling my second desire.

In the absence of the chaplain, it is the duty of a commanding officer to read the service. On Sunday, therefore, the men off duty paraded in the veranda of the schoolroom bungalow. I always went down the ranks on Sunday morning, to see how the men looked in health ; and many a time I have sent men off to lie down on their beds, in whose faces I saw the signs of fever or ague. After they were seated in the schoolroom, I read the service. The men sang, and very heartily too. The hymn-book we used was one I compiled in 1863.

After the service, which was shortened by avoiding all repetitions, and omitting the communion part, I spoke to my dear comrades, for about ten minutes or quarter of an hour, as simply as I possibly could. Then followed a short extempore prayer, in which I always prayed that all who had then heard of the love of God, and of the forgiveness of sins through the precious blood of the Lord Jesus, might be led by God's Spirit to believe, that we might hereafter share together God's everlasting glory. The hearty "Amen" which always followed this prayer made me believe that many did earnestly desire that blessing. I do indeed hope to meet very many in that glory.

As the colonel of my regiment did not wish me to use my own words to the men, and his wish was my command, I used a book, "Truth in Christ," by the Rev. F. Whitefield. This book had been given me by a dear Christian friend, a general officer, and I had kept it always on my table, hoping that the title would attract some of my brother officers. I took a page or two out of this book for my sermon, prefacing it, altering it, and concluding it as was necessary. This restriction, far from being a hindrance, was a blessing, for I should not have had the strength to do this work while the cricket-ground was going on, if I had had to prepare all that I wished to say.

The Lord had provided a helper for me in His work. The corporal of my regiment, who acted as schoolmaster, was very fond of children. With his help I opened a Sunday-school. All the married soldiers sent their children ; and it was a bright, happy sight on a Sunday afternoon to see the dear little ones gathered together, and to hear them sing their hymns. What a blessing those children were to me ! Often and often, when weary and worn out with work on the cricket-ground, followed by perhaps two hours' painful inquiry into some troubles, and other work, I have gone into the schoolroom. "Now, darlings, give me my text."

The dear little things would at once begin, "Blessed is the man that trusteth in the Lord, and whose hope the Lord is." How much I could write about them ! It was my pleasure, and that of my good schoolmaster, to try and teach them about the Lord Jesus. After the regiment had moved to Africa, gathered his playmates round him and said, "I should like to go to heaven ; the sun won't burn me there as it does here." Dear little fellow, he went there four days afterwards. He delighted in the Lord, and He gave him the desire of his heart.

ONE OF THE LITTLE BOYS, WHEN AT PLAY ONE DAY

My Sunday morning's work was the service : my afternoons commenced with a reading to the sick in hospital at 2 P.M. Then the Sunday-school, and a class for married women, which was continued for more than a year ; then the Presbyterian service, which I attended with several of my men. A dear friend of mine, a missionary, conducted this during the best part of the time : he would not take any pay from the Government, but he will get his reward by and by. I believe his preaching has been blessed to not a few of those who heard him.

Following this, for the last year, I had the great pleasure of spending my evenings at the Chinese girls' school. Here a dear Christian friend always made me welcome, and in this bright and blessed home I used to refresh myself after the work of the day, and gain strength for the coming week. The Christian girls in this school, well taught in God's Word, enjoyed studying it, and we went through the book of Revelation and other portions together on those happy Sunday evenings.

During the week I had a reading in barracks of God's Word. To this any men who would come were welcome. I thank God that some did come, and these have since blessed Him that they went to Singapore. "The entrance of Thy Word giveth light." This meeting was held on Wednesday. On Friday there was a meeting of Christians in the town of Singapore. My dear friend the missionary expounded the Scriptures ; and so much was his teaching valued, that I have seen my men come in wet through, having walked three miles in pouring rain to hear the Word.

There was a monthly missionary meeting at the Malay chapel, and other meetings, which were means of refreshment to me and and my fellow-soldiers.

I had cause for happiness in my regimental school here. Thanks to the schoolmaster, a good many men were much helped in their education. When I took command, there were nearly one hundred men who could not read and write. When I sent the wing on to Hong-Kong there were not twenty. There were no school materials supplied by Government, but some of the men paid for their copy-books, and I found the rest of the things. Here again the blessing of being able to read God's Word was my chief motive. If a man cannot read, he cannot read God's Word. The desire to give my fellow-soldiers an opportunity of enjoying that which I had found to be the greatest privilege of my existence made me so earnest in seeking their education.

It is the Lord's wont abundantly to fulfil His children's desires ; certainly He did so to me. Not only did He give me this service for Him with one wing of my regiment, but the wings were subsequently changed, so that I had the privilege of proclaiming the Gospel to the men of the other wing. There went up to Hong-Kong from Singapore a small band of faithful Christians. Earnestly were they commended to the grace of God : He has kept them. At first they were able to meet in a little room they hired in Hong-Kong ; but this was taken from them, and they then met on the rocks above the barracks, and there praised the Lord.

MR. J. B. GOUGH AT STEINWAY HALL.

A Great Change in London—The People Shamed into Temperance—The Costermonger's Donkey—Increased Use of Beer in America—Brutalizing Effect of Beer—A Brutal Father—"Her Jim"—The Officer's Wife—A Compromise—The Moderation Society.

MR. J. B. GOUGH delivered an oration at Steinway Hall, New York, on December 8th. The Hon. W. E. Dodge, who presided, in introducing the lecturer expressed his regret that he was suffering from a cold.

THE ORATION.

My friend Mr. Dodge is not quite right : I have no cold, but I come to you very weary after the hardest year's work I ever did in my life. I remember very well the 22d of last September standing in the pulpit of my friend Rev. Charles Haddon Spurgeon before an audience of 6500 persons. I felt embarrassed at speaking to so large a company on the same old theme. I was very much relieved when the chairman, Sir Charles Reed, occupied half an hour in introducing me. I feel still more embarrassment to-night in coming before you with the same subject—you who have known me so many years and who have heard me so many times.

My whole range of argument is so limited. I am not able to grasp the scientific side of the question, nor the political side, nor the theological side. Those of you who have known me thirty-seven years know I am not capable of giving you an intellectual feast of argument and logic. My way is to draw my arguments from facts and to illustrate them by facts.

When I returned to England after an absence of twenty years I found a great change. Many things were the same. London with her great population of four millions was there ; but in the great city I saw many improvements, such as the Thames Embankment and the noble Holborn Viaduct. There were the street boys, just as impudent as ever. One of them remarked my personal appearance as I met him, and stroking an imaginary mustache said, "It looks werry nice, sir."

With regard to the work in which I have been engaged so many years, I found an immense improvement. It has been lifted into all spheres of society. It has become a live question. Who would have believed that total abstinence would ever occupy its present place, when twenty years ago it was laughed at as a ridiculous absurdity. Why think of it—Canon Farrar has lectured on the subject in the Shelburne Theatre at Oxford, and he said, "Who would have believed it possible that a pledged total abstainer would have ever stood here to speak to Oxford men on the subject of total abstinence ?" Now we have five lord-bishops total abstainers ; I have had four of them to preside at my meetings. Think of a poor American lecturer having to address his chairman as My Lord. Think of a total abstinence lecturer being invited to be the guest of the Lord Bishop of Rochester ! Or of an invitation to the Max Muller celebration at Oxford.

Twenty years ago, at a temperance meeting there, they could not get any one to take the chair. They had to send to London for a chairman. The audience made all sorts of interruptions, some of them crowed like roosters. They made me stand still for nearly half an hour, but they did not quite put me down. Now we have bishops and archbishops, canons and dignitaries of all sorts, in the law and in Parliament and in the medical profession, all advocating total abstinence. Now how has this change been brough about ? I will tell you. Englishmen have been alarmed, terrified, horrified, by the ravages of liquor. Their present attitude has been forced on them. They have been

SHAMED INTO IT.

A costermonger's donkey came to the foot of a hill and there he stopped. He obstinately refused to pull up the hill. The costermonger tried coaxing, but it was of no use. Then he tried other measures, but no use. At last he took the donkey out of the shafts and got in himself and pulled the barrow up the hill. "Why are you doing that?" said a bystander. "Well," the man said, "I thought I'd shame him into it."

Well, the English people have been shamed into total abstinence. The London Times said: "You may go all over the world and see the lowest degradation of every nation—the Chinese with their opium, the Japanese with the same drug—but nowhere can there be gathered together such filth, such rottenness, such a mass of putrefying sores, as in the purlieus of a well-to-do London Gin Palace." A judge lately said a man often goes into a beer-house a respectable man and comes out a felon. Now drinking in such proportion and producing such debasement and wide-spread misery has driven the upper classes of England into the temperance ranks.

It has forced the attention of medical men to the question—even those who stand at the head of the profession. There is Sir William Gull, the physician to the Royal Family, and Sir Henry Thompson, whose income from his profession alone is £70,000 a year—the King of the Belgians paid him £3000 for one operation—and there is Dr. Richardson; all these eminent men have stated it as their opinion that alcohol is not food. The Bishop of Durham, Dr. Lightfoot, is one of our most earnest advocates. He is one of the greatest biblical critics—theologians is the proper word—in the world, and he goes up and down his great diocese preaching total abstinence. The Dean of York presided at one of my meetings.

I was sorry to see in one of your American papers—for I always contrived to see those while I was away, although Dean Stanley said in a speech at the opening of a coffee-house which his sister had built and endowed out of her own means, that what he liked best in America was the libraries, and what he liked least was the newspapers; but I used to find that I could learn more of what was going on in the whole world from an American newspaper than I could from the London Times. Well, I was sorry to see from this newspaper that the use of beer was increasing in this country. Now it is said that the effect of beer is soporific, and soporific only, a good liquor to sleep on. But what is the fact? Why most of the brutality which exists in England is produced by beer. Beer is the poor man's drink. He cannot afford to drink spirits, for the duty on them is ten shillings a gallon; he drinks beer, and this soporific liquor transforms him into a brute.

Remember, he is not a brute by nature. The Anglo-Saxon has never been a brutal race naturally. Look at the charities of England. Guizot said, "English charities are deep, comprehensive, sincere, and searching." While I was there the Princess Alice disaster occurred. An appeal was made for those made widows and orphans by that catastrophe. Why, there were subscriptions sent in from all parts of England for them. In six weeks there were £98,000 collected. There were not merely gifts of the rich, but the boxes at the Lord Mayor's residence contained hundreds of pounds in bronze, the gifts of shoeblacks, and working-men who put in their pennies to help the fund. Then there was an explosion in a mine, then a flood in Hungary, the famine in India and China, and there were appeals for help, and the working classes were found ready to respond.

ANGLO-SAXON BRUTALITY.

No, it is unnatural for the Anglo-Saxon race to be brutal. Yet I have heard Canon Farrar relate that he knew of an English father who went into his house and heard his child crying. "Stop crying," growled the father. But the child continued, and that English father took up his own child and set it on the fire. He was under the influence of beer, that soporific drink.

On a miserable evening a woman stood outside a gin palace in the drizzling rain with two children clinging to her skirts. She was looking wistfully at the door, and presently a man came out. "Is my Jim in there?" the woman said. "Yes," said the man. "Ask him to come out." By and by her Jim came out. "Well, what do you want?" he growled. "O Jim! I am so miserable at home, there is no fire and no candle and no bread, and I thought you would be coming home." How did he reply to her? By a blow on the mouth that sent her reeling into the gutter. As she rose and wiped the blood and dirt from her face and turned sorrowfully homeward the man jingled the coin in his pocket with a chuckle, and returned to his cup. Is that soporific?

You say, "Those people belong to the lower orders." But drink is an awful leveller. I was in Jerry McAuley's mission last night, and the people there you would say belonged to the lower orders; but I assure you some of the upper classes of society may be seen there, brought down to the very lowest. I have seen a poor miserable man peddling matches, who was a direct descendant of Sir Philip De Carteret. A man was pointed out to me who had sunk to the lowest depths of degradation, who was once a popular preacher, but now could be induced for twopence to preach one of his old sermons in an ale-house.

I received a letter one day in London from a lady of position and education, formerly moving in the best classes of society. Her family resided in the West End of London. She had married an officer in the army, who had ruined her and himself by drink. He had sold his commission, and had spent every farthing of the proceeds. She was then living in a single room, and I asked one of the partners in the firm of Partridge & Co. to go and see her.

There was no furniture in the room, nothing but a few orange boxes turned upside down to serve as chairs and tables. There were six children in the room, one a babe only fourteen days old. On one of the boxes was a crust of dry bread and some weak tea, and that was all the provision for the woman and her children. That morning her husband had stolen their last blanket, and had got a shilling for it, and there he was, drunk with the money. Yet this man did not belong to the lower orders. His wife wrote to her family describing her want, and asked for help, and they sent her fourteen pounds, but the husband intercepted it and spent it all.

The wife said he would reform if he could obtain employment. We got him a situation as conductor on a tram car. But he would not take it. He was a gentleman, and he would not stoop to the work. Yet some one gave his son a pair of shoes, and this gentleman crawled to his son's heap of clothes and stole the shoes, and was drunk all day Sunday with the money.

Such facts as these startled the people of England into temperance agitation; and, ladies and gentlemen, I tell you that if something is not done here, and done immediately, you in the United States will be startled too. I give you this solemn warning, for I feel the coldness of age creeping over me. I cannot expect to maintain my work here much longer. When I went to England I went for rest, but when I saw their organizations and their work and their danger, I should have been ashamed not to join in the labor. They are far beyond us in their organization, though we have many things here superior to those in England. Thank God for that! But there are which we have, that would not be tolerated in England. The first is the Sunday concert. Over and over again, recollecting what we see in this country, have I told them, beware of the first introduction of the wedge. Do not permit a Sunday concert. A second thing which would not be allowed there, though we endure it here, is that an alderman should continue to hold office after he had been convicted of intoxication. The third practice they will not permit in England is peddling liquor on the cars. Our cars are regular dramshops; you can get on them any kind of liquor you can name. As I came here there was a man on the train so stupidly asleep from the effects of the liquor he had taken, that they had to shake him to wake him up.

THREE SCANDALS

We have in our country, as they have over there, a

MODERATION SOCIETY.

In England it is attached to the Church of England Society. This society is not an entirely total abstinence society. They have two pledges, and when I first went there I thought to myself, "I sha'n't like that: I may be compelled to oppose it;" but when I saw how it worked I got rid of that sort of feeling that if people do not go in my channel they are all wrong; or if they do not run in my groove they are all out of the way. I was very glad even to see this moderate drinking pledge in that society, because it is bringing men into the circle of the grand total abstinence movement, where they see and hear of the evils of drunkenness; and they cannot associate long with men who are right if they are conscientious men, without becoming right in the course of time. And so they are being brought into the ranks of temperance workers.

But after all, it is only a compromise, and I don't like compromise. It reminds me of a negro who was always tempted to steal when he went into any place where there was property. He said: "I went into a boot and shoe store, and I seed the han'somest boots that ever was. I wanted de boots. The debil says, 'Take de boots;' and de Lord says, 'Let de boots alone.' I laid my hands on de boots and my cheek upon de leather, and it was so smooth, and I want de boots. The debil said, 'You may have them; there is two of us.' So I compromise with de Lord, and took a cheap pair of shoes off another shelf."

But still I have no objection to a man walking with me as far as he can go, and then saying "God speed you," when I go on farther. But what would moderation do for me and for thousands of others in New York? The great danger that is connected with this moderation plan is that many will be led to drink a little, and from that become drunkards. There are men who cannot drink moderately. Dr. Johnson could not. "Surely," said a friend to him once, "you can carry off one glass." "No," said he, "the one glass would carry me off." "But," it is said by many, "it is weak-minded not to be able to drink and to stop at any point." No, it is not weak-minded; it is a physical infirmity, and if I am liable to be brought by moderate drinking into inebriety, then it is no more right that I should be encouraged to do that than it is to place a log in a blind man's way.

When I meet so many wrecks of men, men saying, "I am a lost laddie," I am almost thankful I have no son. But

IF I HAD A SON

I would rather show him drinking as it is in the lowest den in Water Street than where his mother sips it and his minister indorses it. "You would not surely take your son into those Water Street dens?" says one. Yes, I would. Those are the finishing places, and there he would see the end, and might be saved from ending there himself. There would not be so much danger for my boy. He would say, "What a strange place to bring me to! the very smell of it makes me sick. Take me away! take me away!" He puts his hand to his ears in horror as the first blasphemous word is spoken, and he sees at once the fearful abyss which lies at the end of the path. But take him into a respectable place, where there is refinement and nothing to shock his sensibilities, and he takes the glass and sips it without scruple. There lies the danger.

(To be continued.)

A WEIGHT OF WEALTH.

(Continued from page 959.)

The Subtlety of Temptation.

"WHAT is the date of the will?" inquired Ernest, with a slight spasm of regret as he asked the needless question.

"We drew it up four years ago," answered his uncle, "and it was executed at once by the old squire. There! I'll say no more till after the funeral, unless you wish it opened and read at once."

"I do wish it," said Ernest; "my mother and I know where it is to be found. Shall I fetch it here, or will you come with me to my father's room, and give a glance at it? It would be as well to see that he has made no change."

"Oh! bring it here," exclaimed his mother, in an impatient tone; "though I must say it seems an extraordinary thing to meddle with a man's will almost before the breath is out of his body. If my poor dear Charles was only here there would be no such haste; indecent haste it seems to me."

"If Charles were here he would be master," said Ernest, speaking from a sore heart. He went away without another word, to the chamber where the corpse was lying. There were the peculiar hush, the blank stillness, and emptiness about it which always attend the dreary presence of death. It was a very familiar room to him, for old Charles Clifford had not kept his wife's boy at a distance from him; yet to-day it seemed strange in the white dulled light entering through the shrouded windows.

Not even the ashes of the fire were left upon the hearth, where last night he had watched the will consumed before his eyes, which would have made him master in the place of his prodigal brother. The stiff and straightened form of the dead man lay slightly outlined under the sheet that covered it. Ernest paused for a minute at the foot of the bed, looking down upon it, his brain busy in retracing the past. This lapsed existence, which had had no link of blood-relationship with his own, had yet been bound up with it in the most intimate connection. This man, with his dominant, overmastering will, had filled the position of a father to him; so far as authority constitutes a part of fatherhood.

It was he who had placed him where he was, and chosen in a great degree his life for him; a bad choice, as Ernest felt to the very core of his heart. There was not much grief in his absorbed contemplation of the lifeless form; this death was a release, though it could not undo the mischief he had done.

It could not give him back his youth, and a fresh entry upon manhood, with all its bright possibilities. "I forgive you!" he breathed softly; and a momentary moisture dimmed his eyes. With hushed and slow steps, as if fearful of disturbing the sleeper, he crossed the floor to the cabinet, and took from it the will he had deposited there the night before.

The cover bore the date of it on the front. It was twenty-two years back, a few months after the birth of old Charles Clifford's son and heir. Ernest read it half aloud. How well he could recall the earlier years of his little brother's life, whilst he was still a young child like his Rose! There had been no jealousy and contempt between them then. He almost felt a return of the old affection, and the sense of protectorship towards Charles. But he did not linger longer in the room. He carried the packet downstairs, and placed it in his uncle's hands, who cut the ribbon that tied it, and broke the seal with a composure Ernest could not share. He glanced at the date and signatures of the will.

"Ah! I see," he said, glancing up for a moment over his spectacles, "we drew it up, you know, from the old squire's instructions; and I was present when it was signed. Well, well! I wish I'd come yesterday. I did expostulate with him strongly at the time; but a wilful man must have his way. He turned a deaf ear to all I urged on him. He would cut off Charlie and make Ernest his heir."

Ernest involuntarily uttered an exclamation of surprise. His brain whirled, and his senses seemed to be playing him false. He leaned over his uncle's shoulder and devoured the will with his eyes. The date was that of four years back; the time when his father's anger raged most fiercely against Charles. Yielding to a sudden and almost unconscious impulse, Ernest crushed up the cover which was lying on the table and thrust it into his pocket. He had not time to deliberate now; he must wait, and reflect, and decide. The lawyer, whose deaf ear was turned towards him, went on with his tranquil comments.

"Ah! no codicil," he said, "three hundred a year to Susan, and right of residence in Clifford Grange for her life; with a few legacies of no consequence. 'The whole of the residue, estate and personality, to my beloved step-son, Ernest Wren, who shall take the name of Clifford.' We valued it, two years ago, Ernest, and reckoned it at over £1200 a year, after Susan's £300 is deducted. And there are splendid openings for improvement, which old Clifford talked of but never set about. By the way, the squire has entailed the estate now; he will not let you be free to play such a high prank as he has. You and your heirs; eldest son, or daughter if you have no son. He was fond of little Rose. But poor Charlie is merely mentioned in the will to be cut off from the inheritance."

"Oh! my poor Charles! my dear boy!" cried Mrs. Clifford. "It's a wicked will, John; it must be set aside. Oh! my darling! my poor boy! Perhaps he made another will and hid it somewhere. Let us go and look this minute."

"Ay! ay! he made another will," said Mr. Wright dryly; "we drew up a will for him when Charles was six months old, and I remonstrated strongly with him about that. We all but quarrelled and parted over it. It was a very unfair will in my opinion; almost as bad, if not quite as bad, as this. He left absolutely every thing to his son, without reserve and without condition. There was no provision whatever for you, Susan; you were left altogether dependent upon Charlie. 'It will make her a good mother to him,' said the old squire; 'she'll keep a civil tongue in her head if she's to look to him for her living.' You know what sort of a living you would get from Charlie."

"That was a more wicked will than this one," exclaimed Mrs. Clifford. "Why! Charles would soon make duck and drakes of his money; and then where should I be! Ernest will do what is right; everybody knows what Ernest is. But my poor boy has always gone wrong, and no wonder, with such a wilful, headstrong man for his father."

Now she knew the contents of her husband's first will, which she had burned with her own hands the night before, she felt quite reconciled to this later one. There would have been no hope for her if Charles had succeeded as uncontrolled master; but Ernest had always been good, and steady, and dutiful to her and her husband. Besides, she was independent of him and mistress of Clifford Grange. She turned to him and lifted up her face to kiss him.

"God bless you, Ernest!" she said; "you'll make a better master than poor Charles. But I am sorry for him. Perhaps he'd have tried to be a good man, if he'd had a chance; but he'll never have a chance now." She sank down again in her chair and began weeping in more real earnest than before; partly with hysterical emotion, but partly with real genuine disappointment for her disinherited son. Ernest had listened and looked on apart from them as if it was all a dream.

"Mother," he stammered, "the estate is not mine. I ought not to take it from Charles."

"But what will you do?" asked his uncle sharply. "Old Clifford had a right to leave it as he chose; and he left it to you. His last will was wiser than the first. Of course Charlie is his own son; but he knew, and everybody knew, the lad would squander it away. What would £1500 a year be to a youngster who would like to spend £15,000? As it is, if he should turn up again—and that's doubtful—you could do something handsome for him; or if he continues a reprobate, you could but keep him out of the gutter at least. Your father knew very well what he was about, you may be sure.

"When I expostulated with him at leaving Charlie without a penny, 'Ernest's a good man,' he said; 'he'll never see him starve. I wish he would!' he said, for he was awfully bitter against Charlie. Then there's your mother. She has her three hundred a year to do what she likes with. It's a younger son's share, and as much as Charlie deserves. Take your good luck, and thank Heaven for it. You'll make a better Clifford than if you'd been born one."

"Of course he will," added his mother pettishly. "Oh! don't begin to harry us all with scruples and doubts. He always promised me my boy should be the same as his own, and he'd act by you as if you were; or else I never would have married him. You are the eldest son, and you're the heir."

"Not old Charles Clifford's heir," said Ernest.

"Yes you are," she persisted; "he's made you heir, and nobody can alter that. Dear me! what would have become of me if he had told me to burn this will and keep the other?—with my own hands too! No provision for me! To think that he'd left me without a penny! I know I should have been compelled to live with you in that poky little vicarage, with nothing to live upon! But now I'm safe, and you are safe; and if Charles comes back we can do something for him. What a comfort that first will was not to be!"

It seemed to her as if she had just had a narrow escape from some dire calamity. The sword that had been hanging over her head was taken away; but she could see both the sword and the frail thread by which it had been suspended. She shivered and quailed at the mere thought of it. But with Ernest she was safe. At last she would be mistress of Clifford Grange; the position she had married for, but had not gained.

After the long wearisome season of bondage were coming those gay, good times she had promised herself when she became old Charles Clifford's wife. She had chafed under a yoke more burdensome than Ernest's. But at length the oppression had ceased, and the oppressor was gone. Already, though he had not been one day dead, she was experiencing the relief of freedom; and this was gathering strength now she knew she was provided for, and left dependent upon no one. She was thankful according to her nature; and when she left her brother Wright and Ernest, she retired to her own room, and half superstitiously knelt down to return thanks for the provision made for her, before sending for her draper and dressmaker, and entering upon the elaborate task of putting on weeds for old Charles Clifford. She honored God with her lips, but her heart was far from Him (Matt. 15:7, 8).

Ernest gave what orders were absolutely necessary, and then left the Grange, having agreed with his uncle that the will should not be discussed again till after the funeral. He had kept his own counsel in the first moments of amazement and perplexity, and now he desired solitude and silence, to turn over the whole of the matter in his mind. He was like a man in a trance, unable to catch the end of any clear thread of thought, and unravel it from the vague confusion of his brain.

After a while he found himself wandering aimlessly along the narrow, grass-grown path which followed the crooked bends of the cliffs. The light was dying away behind its thick gray veil of clouds, and the night was coming on swiftly and steadily. But Ernest had neither eye nor ear for any thing outside of himself. His brain was too busy to take note either of the weather or the hour.

There could be no doubt whatever that the will which had been destroyed was the very one old Charles Clifford had intended to preserve. That was as clear as day. The old man's faculties, his sight especially, had been failing him for some months past ; and he must, at some time, after reading his two wills, have inclosed them in the wrong covers.

e had been too precise and clear in speaking of the one he wished to leave behind him for any mistake to be possible. On his death-bed he had forgiven his prodigal son, and revoked the will he had made in an hour of bitter anger against him. He had passed away in the belief that his only child would succeed to the possessions of his forefathers. It was a mere accident that had caused the former will to be destroyed and the later one to be preserved.

ut was it right to call it an accident? Ernest could not deny that it would be a grievous calamity to every other person involved in the matter, if not to Charles himself, for him to come into uncontrolled possession of the estate. There was barely a chance against his squandering it recklessly. To squander it meant that it would soon pass into the hands of strangers ; while the very name of Clifford of Clifford would die away altogether from their ancient dwelling-place.

d Charles Clifford, with his strong family pride, could never have meant that. He had made his first will when his heir was an infant in the cradle. To revert to that would be as much opposed to his real mind as that his stepson should succeed to the lands and take the name. He was keen-sighted enough to know the folly of aving his son absolute master of the place. He had had two wills at variance within himself ; and it was only in the hour of mortal weakness that his passion for his son had triumphed over his conviction that his old house and name would be sacrificed to his prodigality.

rely it was no accident, this slight mistake dim-eyed old man, which had been allowed by rovidence. Ernest did not use the name of "Providence" had permitted the half-ish father to inclose the papers in the wrong rs. Thus he had died more happily ; like an over-indulged child who falls asleep with some dangerous tool in his hands, which is gently drawn away as the nerveless fingers lose their hold. There was no harm done. Power would be dangerous weapon in Charles' hands ; in his would be a blessing to all about him.

at was the right light to see it in, Ernest continued to argue to himself. Providence had allotted the inheritance to the one who could make the use of it. He had not had a finger in it himself. He had even urged his father to forgive Charles. It was his mother, the mother of both of them, who had burned the will ; so that even the mechanism of the error had not been his. He was perfectly free, in will and act, of any plot to seize his brother's birthright. It had come to him.

hat ought he then to do? He had no idea what the law of the land would demand of him and he hardly wished to know it. There had been no third person present during his conversation with his stepfather, and all must rest upon his word and testimony alone. If the law his word, and gave up all to Charles, what would become of his poor mother? Her life had a monotonous bondage for many years, and r old age she would be cast upon the mercy profligate son for the very bread she ate.

, he finally concluded. It would be madness to throw away the responsibility laid upon him for the welfare of others and for the maintaining the name and dignity of an old family. stood alone in the matter it would be quite another question. But was it not his bounden duty to keep silence and enter into possession of the estate?

tore up into small pieces the cover, which no other writing than the words, Charles ord's Will, Sept. 14, 1835," and he watched fragments floating slowly away on the light e. Then he felt some regret at having destroyed it ; but why? There was nothing in the s, written though they were in the bold, hand-writing of his stepfather. It was y a slight corroboration of a fact he had ed to keep to himself.

(To be continued.)

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 28th. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

OUR first two lessons for the last quarter were taken from the Epistle to the Hebrews, in which the contrast between the shadow and the substance, the types and the antitype, the old covenant and the new, is so vividly brought out. All the teaching of this epistle leads up to the tenth and eleventh chapters, in which our position in Christ, and the mighty, irresistible power of a life enduring "as seeing Him who is invisible," are unfolded to us.

In the ninth chapter we see Christ as the perfect offering once for all, sanctifying not only to the purifying of the flesh, but purging our "conscience from dead works to serve the living God," because by His own blood He "obtained eternal redemption for us" (verses 12, 14) and He is entered "into heaven itself, now to appear in the presence of God for us" (verse 24). Thus our privilege is to have a spotless conscience because Christ is our guarantee that the past is purged, and He is our living witness that we are accepted before God in Him the Beloved. In the tenth chapter we see how in His renounced will we are sanctified ; "a body hast Thou prepared Me," He said, and "Lo, I come to do Thy will, O God." A prepared body is one in which every member answers the purpose of its creation and responds to the will of God.

"By the which will we are sanctified." By His death we are crucified with Christ ; because He lives we shall live also ; by His sanctification of Himself we also are sanctified (John 17 : 19)—i.e., by entering into His renounced will, and letting Him live out His will in us. In such a position, purified from sinning, living no life but Christ's, and having no will but His, all can become supernatural, and we may learn to live the life of faith taught us in chapter 11.

This is the normal condition of a child of God ; all the precepts of God's Word presuppose this position ; here all things are possible because all things are seen and judged in the light of God and not after human reason. God is owned as Master of His own laws, making and controlling them. Here experience bows to revelation, and the Word of God takes its right place. A man who lives a life of faith gives up looking at persons and things in relation to himself ; he learns to see all in relation to God. This, then, is our lesson. All other things are shadows. Faith, which seems so shadowy to those who do not believe, is the only thing which Scripture calls substance, because it brings and keeps us in contact with God Himself.

Our lesson from the Epistle of James taught us that real faith brings forth fruit in works ; that there is such a thing as dead faith—i.e., an assent to doctrines without the vital power which brings us, and others through us, into contact with the living God. From Peter we learned of Christ as the perfect pattern of His people. By nature we are the exact opposite of Christ, self-idolaters, while He "pleased not Himself." It is but by faith that we can become Christ-like, living in His will as He lived in His Father's will, loving not our lives unto the death (Rev. 12 : 11).

From the apostle John we learned of Christ as the perfect Saviour, who not only reconciles the ungodly but purifies also His own people, and makes them holy that they may be the dwelling-place of God.

It is perfectly true that the same apostle says, "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves," &c. (1 : 8). But to have sin and to commit sin are two very different things. Paul had sin, but he could say nevertheless, "Ye are witnesses, and God also, how holily and justly and unblamably we behaved ourselves among you that believe" (1 Thess. 2 : 10), and again, "Be ye followers of me, even as I am also of Christ" (1 Cor. 11 : 1). All sin comes from the maintenance of relations with our own selves. In the measure that we enter into the experience of Paul, "Not I live, but Christ liveth in me" (Gal. 2 : 20), in such measure the enemy has no hold upon us, and sin cannot take form. The temptation may be there, as in the case of our Lord, but instead of driving us further from our Lord, it may absolutely bring us nearer by the victory which we gain over it.

The last five of our lessons were from the book of Revelation. First, the glorified Saviour who has the keys of death and of hell, death's conqueror, and then His message to the Churches. It is worthy of notice that in these messages He speaks of Himself in every case in some character which is revealed to us in chapter 1. Comp. 2 : 1 with 1 : 13, 16 ; 2 : 8 with 1 : 18 ; 2 : 12 with 1 : 16 ; 2 : 18 with 1 : 14, 15 ; 3 : 1 with 1 : 4, 16 ; 3 : 7 with 1 : 18 ; 3 : 14 with 1 : 5. Then the promises are only to him that overcometh, and they differ, perhaps deepen in character. First, "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the tree of life which is in the midst of the Paradise of God" (2 : 7), and the second (2 : 11), "He that overcometh shall not be hurt of the second death." These promises seem to be more the simple assurance of eternal life than any thing else.

Then (2 : 17), "To him that overcometh will I give to eat of the hidden manna and will give him a white stone, and in the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it." Here seems to be something special, not before promised, a secret between the soul and the Saviour. The next promise (2 : 27) is one of power over the nations (i.e., in the millennium). This surely is reigning with Christ : "And I will give him the morning star." I am "the bright and morning star," said our Lord (22 : 16) ; thus it is a special promise of Himself. The promise to Sardis is of white raiment, and "I will not blot out his name out of the book of life, but I will confess his name before My Father and before His angels." This would seem to be more general again, like the first two.

The promise to Philadelphia is especially blessed : "Him that overcometh will I make a pillar in the temple of My God, and he shall go no more out ; and I will write upon him the name of My God, and the name of the city of My God, new Jerusalem, which cometh down out of heaven from My God, and My new name." This promise seems to be specially connected with the bride, the Lamb's wife. To be a pillar which bears the weight of the Church of Christ, to bear the name of the bride, instead of our own name, and more, His new name. This is the promise held out to us probably as the special reward to the overcomers now in our own days. The last of all is a distinct prospect of reigning with Christ : "To him that overcometh will I grant to sit with Me in My throne, even as I also overcame, and am set down with My Father in His throne."

Now have we a right to expect the fulfilment of these promises? Are we overcomers, or are we overcome? Only they who enter into Christ's victory, and who regard the world as really overcome, with all its various trials and temptations, can really sing the new song and have their part in the new Jerusalem of which we have heard so lately. Oh, let us think deeply and solemnly, Am I overcome by the dispositions of those about me, by the various vexations and contradictions of my life? Am I overcome by the spirit of worldliness in those around me? Or am I unmoved by all, only brought nearer to God by them, and nearer to those by whom the trial comes? Does every attempt of Satan to cast me down have a contrary effect, because I put it into His hands who makes me more than conqueror through Him?

It is such alone who can expect the fulfilment of the promises, who can have part in the bride, the Lamb's wife ; who, partaking with Him here in suffering and endurance, will have part with Him there in the glory. To such the new song is not unknown, and their citizenship is already in the heavenly city—pilgrims and strangers here, they are only at home there. And these are they who with longing hearts echo the last words of our beloved Lord, and say by their lives as much as by their lips, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus."

1880.

As the year 1879 draws to a close, we thank the public of the United States and of Canada for the hearty appreciation with which it has received the CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES. The history of religious journalism in America can show no parallel to the success of this paper. In thirteen months it has found subscribers in every State of the Union, in five Provinces of Canada, in South America, in the West Indies, and in Polynesia. Besides, it is sold on the stands of the American News Company, from the St. Lawrence to the Gulf of Mexico, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

The extracts given below represent only a small part of all the letters received by us within the brief space of about six weeks. They were taken as they came, yet they represent thirty-one States, besides several Canadian Provinces. We receive scores of such commendations every month. This rapid and wide-spread popularity is to be ascribed to:

1st. THE BLESSING OF ALMIGHTY GOD,

whose blessing has been implored by the proprietor and the conductors at every step of the enterprise, and who has been graciously pleased to prosper this attempt to publish the Gospel for the million—the pure Gospel and the simple Gospel, without a word of controversy or of denominational doctrines.

2d. THE CHARACTER OF THE PAPER,

The utmost pains are taken to illuminate the columns of every number. There is nothing dull or heavy in any part of the CHRISTIAN HERALD. The biographies are freshly written and are always extremely interesting. The serial stories are full of the Gospel of Jesus Christ; we choose this mode to present the Way of Salvation to persons who will not read any other part of the paper. Finally, the latest current sermons of Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. Talmage, of which we are the authorized publishers, are surpassed by no productions of uninspired man. The gospel has not been preached since the Reformation with greater clearness and power than it is by these two servants of God. Sermons by eminent preachers of other denominations are given occasionally.

3d. THE LOW PRICE.

A single copy, containing both the above-mentioned sermons, costs only three cents. The annual subscription is only $1.50, postage free. There has probably never been a religious paper of any description so cheap in this country; and the CHRISTIAN HERALD is a first-class and an illustrated paper. This makes it easy to collect subscriptions for it.

The public cannot be too positively informed that the sermons by Dr. Talmage and Mr. Spurgeon, published in this journal without fail every week, are the preachers' lates Sunday morning sermons, and are authenticated by them. Not one is hashed up. We ge a manuscript copy of Dr. Talmage's sermon from the Doctor's own hand at No. 1, South Oxford Street, Brooklyn, every Monday morning; while in the case of Mr. Spurgeon's sermons, we have specially arranged with that minister's London publishers to receiv advance sheets of them, so that we can publish the sermons before any one else can do so.

We offer exceptionally liberal terms to ministers, clubs, agents, and all benevolen and charitable institutions; and we invite any person, lady or gentleman, to act as agent beginning, if he please, with only a single subscription. Very many persons of independ ent means have accepted this offer, and have relinquished their commission in order t give the paper to poor people or to unconverted acquaintances. Let any one send to u for a sample copy of our "Agent's Edition," and it will be mailed free.

NOTICE.

Subscriptions may begin at any time of the year, and they are taken for long or sho periods; but no commission is allowed on a subscription of less than six months. An person sending two names with $1.50 each may get the paper to himself, post free, for year. The only restriction we insist upon is, that subscribers must send remittances wi their orders. Our "Due Book" has been a plague of our existence during this yea so we have resolved to abolish it entirely. Therefore, let all who wish to renew f 1880, and all new subscribers, write and remit in response to this invitation.

THE following unsolicited expressions of appreciation and of gratitude, received during a few weeks, are a specimen of the hearty kindness with which our readers continually encourage us and our contributors in the common service of the Lord:

——, Miss.: "I can truly say that I will be glad to know that the C. H. has a great circulation in this part of the country. . . . It is one of the best papers published, and should be taken and read by all Christians." (Sept. 2.)

———, Pa.: "I am taking a great interest in your paper, the C. H., and would like to make its circulation a still larger one."

———, Tex.: "I enjoy the reading of your paper. . . . The sermons cannot be excelled."

———, N. C.: "God bless your paper! I look upon it as a weekly treat. I am glad you publish those precious sermons by Talmage and Spurgeon." (Sept. 3.)

———, N. Y.: "I confess to surprise at the excellence of the HERALD. It is so good I want it for myself and my family."

———, N. J.: "Your valuable paper I esteem as one of the best published."

———, Ind.: "We will send the price of the paper for another year as soon as possible. We like the paper well." (Sept. 4.)

———, Wis.: "I like the paper very much."

———, N. Y.: "I like it very much, and thank you for it."

C. N. H., Iowa: "Your paper is well liked here." (Sept. 5.)

H. N. B., Me.: "I have received the sample copy of the C. H., and am delighted with it. I must have the paper."

H. T. M.: "Your valuable paper is borrowed,* read, and appreciated in Glasgow."

F. N. A., Conn.: "I have the HERALD every week from one of our newsdealers, and consider it the choicest of religious periodicals." (Sept. 8.)

J. W. H., Ohio: "I am a reader of your excellent paper, and appreciate it highly. I cannot help wishing you abundant success in your great and good work."

M. B., N. C.: "I am receiving the HERALD regularly, and am well pleased with it. I think it will take wherever known."

L. G. O., Conn.: "For the first time in my life I saw your choice little paper yesterday. My heart went out toward it for myself and this people."

S. J. H., N. C.: "God bless the editors of the C. H.! God bless the sermons of Talmage and Spurgeon to the awakening and conversion of many souls." (Sept. 10.)

T. M., Canada: "It is reported that the C. H., published by you, is a valuable paper. Will you please forward a specimen number."

S. E. W., N. Y.: "Your paper is excellent."

A SUNDAY-SCHOOL teacher in Illinois sends ten names for the paper, with the subscription-money, and writes: "These are all small scholars in my class in Sabbath-School. I want to get the paper introduced into their families."

J. C. U., N. Y.: "I would not have my file broken for a good deal."

J. M., Ohio: "—— says he must have the paper."

L. E. B., Va.: "I have read your paper with much pleasure and profit."

W. K., Ill.: "I am well pleased with the HERALD, and like the tone of the paper." (Sept. 11.)

L. M. P., Conn.: "I was very much interested."

B. P. W., S. C.: "Having seen a few copies of the paper, I am much pleased and hope to see it extensively circulated in this section." (Sept. 12.)

S. P. F., N. Y.: "I must say I am very much pleased with it."

E. W., Ky.: "The HERALD comes to my address regularly; I am well pleased with it." (Sept. [illegible])

F. N. D., Tex.: "I have been taking your paper a few weeks, and am much pleased with it, a Christian paper."

S. J. B., Ohio: "I like the C. H. very much better than any paper I have ever taken. Praying that the Gospel which it preaches may reach many, very many precious souls, etc."

[illegible] D. D., Miss.: "Please send a package of your most excellent paper for distribution in my congregation." (Sept. 15.)

J. W. C., Ill.: "I cannot afford to do without the C. H. It [illegible] of the most valuable and practical knowledge I [illegible] sermons, expositions of prophecy, and comments on the Sunday-School lessons, worth five times the money. May the Lord bless it to the good of the Church and the salvation of many souls."

J. A., Cal.: "The last number was worth its weight in gold to me. No mine of this State is as rich as this, your paper."

A. T. S., Ohio: "All the present subscribers think very much of the paper." (Sept. 16.)

E. H. W., S. C.: "I cannot do without it. I thank God for the noble work that it is accomplishing." (Sept. 17.)

W. B. G., Iowa: "The more I read the more I like it and profit by it. Words cannot express how much I value it. I pity all who cannot drink in the doctrines taught by the C. H." (Sept. 19.)

C. B. E., Ill., calls the C. H. "a valuable paper," and adds, "I am very desirous of doing all the good that lies in my power, and one way is by interesting others in your paper." The writer pays for four subscriptions for acquaintances. (Sept. 20.)

J. J., Canada: "I do not think there is a better paper for the price in circulation."

J. C. C., Canada: "It is looked for each week with increasing interest."

W. H. R., Mass.: "I like the paper very much, and others that I have given it to like it well." (Sept. 22.)

W. E. L., Ill.: "Your paper is obtaining a fine popularity in this vicinity."

S. E. W., Tex.: "I like it exceedingly."

A. E., Vt.: "I cannot do without it." (Sept. 25.)

E. C. S., R. I.: "I like the paper very much, and wish to introduce it into this section. Wishing you a grand success, etc." (Sept. 26.)

W. H. E., N. Y.: "I could hardly do without your paper. I think it is the best paper published."

L. M. B., Mich.: We would be glad to devote our whole time to the interests of this much-loved little paper if we could live by it." (Sept. 27.)

F. A. T., Conn.: 'I am trying to introduce the C. H. in this community, as I think it is the best religious paper in existence."

J. M. F., Ala.: "We have become very much interested in the paper. We desire the paper to be more extensively circulated in our own immediate country."

J. W., Miss.: "I am so pleased with the C. H. that I would be glad if it had a more extensive circulation in our churches."

A. N. M. Ga.: "I love to read the sermons and prophetic sketches." (Sept. 29.)

W. N. X., Tenn.: (asks for a package of copies for distribution) "I think they would be the means of doing a great deal of good."

J. S. H., Ky.: "I cannot do without the paper."

J. C. N., Ohio: "Please continue sending the paper to me. I am a good deal interested in your paper."

E. R. W., Mich.: "Your excellent paper, I have wanted it from week to week."

J. W. R., Pa.: "I value it more and more for its evangelical influence and character." (Sept. 30.)

A LADY in Connecticut, at a place where there is no pastor, and no religious service except a weekly meeting in her house, writes: "I read one of those good sermons this afternoon in our prayer-meeting. I have given the papers sent to eager hearts and hands."

A. M. C., N. Y.: "I wish you every success, and will do all I can to increase its circulation."

W. H. M., Colo., sends a subscription and says: "Oblige an admirer of your very excellent paper."

H. A. B., N. C., sends three subscriptions and says: "I was much pleased with the specimen copy you sent me."

R. W., Ill.: "It gives me so much spiritual food that I prize it above all my other papers."

J. M. O., Pa.: "Please inform me what time my subscription expires. I do not want to lose a number."

J. McD., N. J.: "I wish to introduce it if possible. I like it. I take it every week from a newsdealer. I think everybody should read it." (Oct. 1.)

P. L. H., Ga.: "Of the many religious papers which I see, I know of none that I admire so well as the C. H."

J. M. F., Ala.: "I ever remain a friend to your paper."

J. H. A., Iowa: "I cannot do without it. I would not think of having it discontinued."

R. G. G., Pa.: "The C. H. is an excellent paper, and I want my children to become enchanted with it, and fancy that the sermons and other good things in it may lead them to Jesus." (Oct. 3.)

R. L., Pa.: "We like the paper very much."

H. R. O., Ga.: "I do not want to lose a paper. I cannot do without it."

M. G., Ark.: "I think more of the HERALD than of any other paper."

H. R. H., Ill.: "I read your paper with unabated interest. T me it is a model religious paper."

E. C. J., S. C.: "I receive your paper regularly, and prize t articles on prophecy very highly." (Oct. 4.)

G. M., Md.: "I deem your paper to be well suited to instr and stir up the colored preachers." (Subscriptions to the amou of five dollars enclosed.)

E. M. A., Ill.: "It supplies a long-felt want, and has our ve best wishes."

J. N., Tex.: "I read the C. H. and S. of our T. with delig and am especially pleased with your articles on prophecy. heartily recommend it to all my friends."

A. G. S., Tex.: "The matter is very excellent. I love C. H. much. With kind regards and prayers for your success usefulness, etc."

G. W. C., Canada: "I prize it highly."

M. A. N., Ga.: "The best religious paper, I believe, in t country. I gave —— a copy for a year, and also —— a copy twelve months. Every one I have ever conversed with on the s ject is pleased with the paper. My son, a Baptist minister, ta the HERALD, and is greatly pleased with it."

R. H. H., Kans. "I am perfectly delighted with it. We it ourselves and loan it to our neighbors." (Oct. 6.)

J. T., Canada: "We love the HERALD."

J. P. M., Ohio: "Am highly pleased with it."

W. A. G., Ky.: "I would not do without the Sunday-sc Lesson for twice the money."

G. H. A., Conn.: "I am well pleased with the publicati (Oct. 7.)

T. M., Me.: "The C. H. is just the paper I needed, and like it very much. It brings light and comfort to our home."

E. H., Pa.: "I have read the C. H. with much interest profit for the last six or eight months."

M. D., Ill.: "We think it is the best paper we have taken.

E. K., Mo.: "I have no words to express how highly I es your soul-inspiring paper." (Oct. 8.)

J. G. A., Pa.: "I do not like to miss one copy of your valu HERALD."

S. W. B., Ind.: "I would that each member of my church a subscriber. God bless the noble men who are making it a strument capable of doing so much good." (Oct. 10.)

N. G., La.: "I thank you kindly for sending your C. They are so full of truth. It is Gospel truth."

W. M., Ky.: "I enjoy the sermons very much."

L. B. R., N. Y., encloses two dollars to send the paper friend, and writes: "I know of no better way of doing good the printed page. I am already a subscriber and like it much is strictly a religious newspaper."

R. L. G., N. J.: "I think there is no religious paper like recommend it on all occasions." (Oct. 11.)

W. L. S., N. C.: "I am trying to put the C. H. in family."

T. B., Minn., encloses a subscription and writes: "Pleas ward your paper to —— ——, and forward the work of spre the good news. I think your papers are just what we w (Oct. 14.)

V. N., Ala.: "Our family enjoy your paper very much, wish —— and —— to have it."

W. N., N. Y.: "I like the paper so much I am trying to duce it to my friends."

W. B., Canada: "I highly appreciate your paper."

J. H. W., Pa.: "I think the C. H. is an excellent Ch paper and should be in every Christian family." (Oct. 15.)

J. A. G., Ill.: "I have enjoyed your paper so much take upon myself to do this;" (i.e., to send five annual su tions for acquaintances).

W. D. B., N. J.: "The C. H. is a necessity in our famil to friends to whom we furnish it."

C. W. G., N. Y.: "I will do all in my power to furth circulation of your valuable paper."

W. J. C., Md.: "It will be the means of doing much goo

J. M. S., Ga.: "Thanking you for the rich feast contai every number, and praying for the continued health of tha Christian worker, the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon, I am, etc."

J. H. S., Md.: "I cannot refrain from saying that every in these papers by Dr. Talmage is worth (to every lover of and truth) ten times the price of a year's subscription. The as a whole, must prove a blessing to all who read it. May th abundantly reward your labors, is my prayer."

⁂ We have omitted a few cases in which the writers favors while they bestowed praise.

---

* We hope it will be bought soon!—Ed. C. H.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

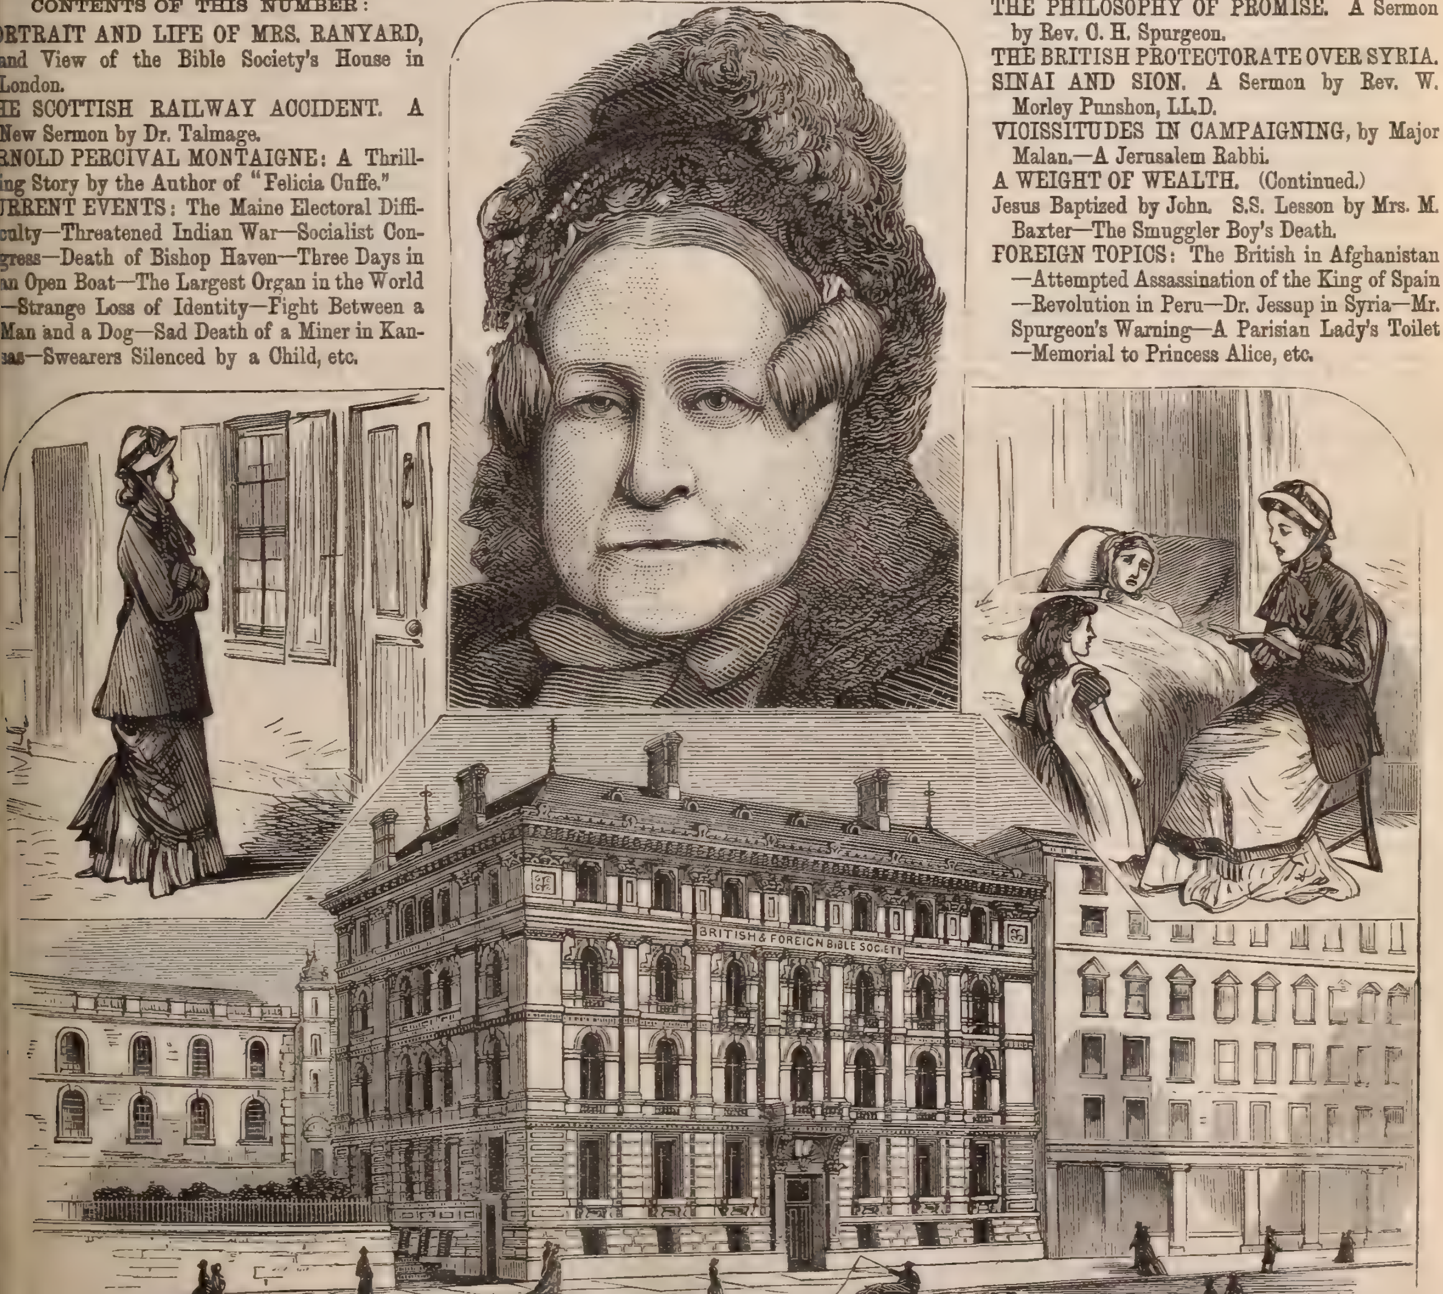
ublished at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

This Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. ALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. AY AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, JANUARY 8, 1880. 14th Year. No 2—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

RTRAIT AND LIFE OF MRS. RANYARD, and View of the Bible Society's House in London.
IE SCOTTISH RAILWAY ACCIDENT. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
RNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE: A Thrilling Story by the Author of "Felicia Cuffe."
RRENT EVENTS: The Maine Electoral Difficulty—Threatened Indian War—Socialist Congress—Death of Bishop Haven—Three Days in an Open Boat—The Largest Organ in the World—Strange Loss of Identity—Fight Between a Man and a Dog—Sad Death of a Miner in Kansas—Swearers Silenced by a Child, etc.
THE PHILOSOPHY OF PROMISE. A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
THE BRITISH PROTECTORATE OVER SYRIA.
SINAI AND SION. A Sermon by Rev. W. Morley Punshon, LL.D.
VICISSITUDES IN CAMPAIGNING, by Major Malan.—A Jerusalem Rabbi.
A WEIGHT OF WEALTH. (Continued.)
Jesus Baptized by John. S.S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter—The Smuggler Boy's Death.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The British in Afghanistan—Attempted Assassination of the King of Spain—Revolution in Peru—Dr. Jessup in Syria—Mr. Spurgeon's Warning—A Parisian Lady's Toilet—Memorial to Princess Alice, etc.



Mrs. RANYARD, Founder of the Bible Mission, and View of the Bible Society's House in London.

MRS. RANYARD.

The Pioneer of Bible Mission Work.

Her Birth in 1810—Wanstead—Her Conversion—She Starts with Elizabeth Saunders on a Bible Mission in Barnet—Both were Stricken with Fever—Elizabeth Dies—Ellen joins her Grandmother's Bible Work in Kensington—She commences Work in St. Giles's, London—Her Mission is Greatly Extended—The Bible Society Helps It—Her Death and Funeral.

WE present to our readers in this issue a portrait and brief account of the salient points of the work of the devoted Christian laborer, Ellen Ranyard, better known as L. N. R., who first wrought in and then organized the work of Bible distribution in England.

The age in which we live is one upon which there is happily written a brilliant record of woman's work for God. Yet in the midst of this grand galaxy of bright Christian stars we would assign Ellen Ranyard a place among those of the first magnitude.

The mission Mrs. Ranyard undertook in London was one involving sacrifice and danger, needing for its successful performance all those qualities of mind and body which go to make up the character of the Christian heroine. To that mission she devoted her life, and its results seen in this life only in part, but known in its fulness in the eternal world, constitute a monument to her memory which will tell of her energy and fearless effort to the end of time.

It appears from notes of her life in her own handwriting, that Mrs. Ranyard was born near Barnet in 1810. Her mother appears to have been an earnest Christian lady, and her grandmother was also engaged in active Christian work. The latter lady at one time held the office of president of the ladies' committee of the Bible Society at Kensington, in the environs of London.

AN EVENTFUL VISIT.

The circumstances which led to her entering on the work which was eventually to fill all her thoughts and to be the one all-absorbing object of her life, are deeply interesting.

In the year 1826, Mrs. Ranyard (then Miss Ellen White) was taken by her mother on a visit to Wanstead, in Surrey, to attend a Bible meeting which was being held at that place. The speakers at the meeting were entertained by a family named Saunders, and there Ellen and her mother stayed during their visit. There were in the Saunders family several daughters, and one of them named Elizabeth was at this time in deep distress. A dear friend and next-door neighbor of hers, to whom under God she owed her conversion, was about to remove to Manchester, and Elizabeth feared that after her friend's departure her own Christian life would be subject to many trials. She was the only one in her family who had experienced converting grace, and in her peculiarly trying position she had suffered much and had found her friend's counsel and sympathy exceedingly helpful. Her friend had pointed out to her that the separation was doubtless permitted by God with the view of drawing Elizabeth nearer to Himself, and teaching her by removing the human prop on which she leaned, to trust solely in Him. But Elizabeth, like many young Christians, found the lesson hard to learn, and at the time of this visit was in a very depressed and apprehensive state of mind.

Mrs. White and her daughter sympathized with the young Christian girl, and on their return to Barnet proposed to take her with them for a short visit. Elizabeth's parents accepted the proposal, for the young lady was in delicate health, having overtasked her physical strength by Christian work in visiting the sick and the poor in company with the friend from whom she was to be soon separated. She needed rest, and her parents thought that removal from the scene of her labors would give her the opportunity she would not take at home to recuperate her exhausted frame. But the Lord's poor are everywhere, and in all places there are souls to whom Jesus is a stranger. Elizabeth could not rest anywhere while she knew that near her lay a field where she might work for her Saviour, and she longed to carry the blessed message of the cross to perishing souls at Barnet as she had done at Wanstead.

A FATAL EXPLORATION.

"One morning during that visit," says Mrs. Ranyard, "I sat at a table drawing. We were alone, and she said to me, 'Ellen, dear, have you ever thought what you will do with your life? You must live to do something in God's service.'

"'Perhaps you mean in a Sunday school? My mother will not let me teach there. She says such work is only for converted people, and I am not converted. I like worldly reading, and I wish to see more of the world before I leave it, especially of its books.'

"'Then you mean to leave it some time? I wonder what, my dear, you know about the best of books? Do you love your Bible at all?'

"'I have read it through three times,' said Ellen. 'I seem to know all about it. Yes, certainly I love it; but one cannot always be reading one's Bible.'

"'I suppose you never have thought how many of the poor people who live in the streets not far from you have no Bibles to read?' was the next suggestion.

"'No, I never thought of that, but I liked your Bible meeting very much the other day at Wanstead.'

"'Would you like to leave your painting this morning and go with me to find out how many want a Bible?' said Elizabeth.

"'Yes, I should like to go anywhere with you.'

"Dear Elizabeth had set her heart on the exploring walk, and she obtained my mother's consent under protest. So we set forth, she with a Bible in her hand and a prayer in her heart, and in her pocket a pencil and a little book, a page or two of which she had been ruling in squares, while I was painting by her side. Oh, that last walk in her lovely, holy, gentle life! It led her to her death, but to me at that unknown cost to life eternal. She certainly gave prudence to the winds. We must have been out three hours, and we found the people in thirty-five houses on that day without a Bible.

"I came home, having seen for the first time how the poor live; their ignorance, their dirt, their smells—for we went upstairs to more than one sick room; and I heard my friend in a way that I had never heard before (though religiously brought up) tell the good news of the love of Jesus to the consumptive and the dying: she spoke to them, but the Spirit of God carried the message home to me. We finished our work by a talk with an old woman in a filthy shop, who sold coals and greens, and there I never shall forget the odor; and the old woman was deaf and rude; but we actually turned homewards with thirty-five pence in our bag, and as many names in our collecting book.

"She was too tired to talk any more that day, and I remember nothing more that afternoon except that when I went to bed at night I took up my Bible to read my usual chapter with a new feeling for it and a new light upon it from all I had seen and heard that day, and I thought I would begin the Book over again for Elizabeth's sake; and as I read 'Let there be light,' there was shed a light upon its pages such as I had never seen before, for my hard young heart was now softened, and a quiet new affection was drawn out toward this new and gentle friend."

In this missionary tour both the friends contracted fever; Elizabeth's was typhus, and proved fatal after a short illness. Miss White's was bilious fever. When the watching of the sick one had ceased by her death, the future organizer of Bible mission work came forth from that death chamber with fixed resolves and definite purposes as to her future work.

THE BORDER LAND.

How that illness affected the survivor, and how it concentrated all her energies on the work which was in the future to make the name of Mrs. Ranyard illustrious in Christian annal may be learned from the following extract fro a letter she wrote in reply to a friend who ha written to inquire where she had been so long

"I have been to a Border Land where the was but a strange, dim light, where shadows an dreams seemed real, where I scarce knew ho there I came, or if thence I should ever pas where small seemed great as compared with th standards of earth, where the loss of all wou scarce have cost a tear, where days wasted worldly haste were recalled, and where the po were brought to mind, with their scant fire, ar bread so hard to find, where I met with a wo drous friend, whose words had power; and nc
I have come back from that Border Land earth, and should its trifles ever again engro me as in the past they have done, I will thi of how empty and vain they seemed from t heights of the Border Land."

After such a solemn and memorable inaug ration,

THE BIBLE MISSION

in the district of Barnet was to her sacr ground; the sweet memories of her depart friend, which were fragrant in every part of seemed to be an abundant answer for all di culties which presented themselves. Mrs. R yard attached her mission to the branch of Bible Society of which her grandmother was that time president of the ladies' committee, a became afterwards minute and cash secretary it.

She chose the uncongenial district of St. Gile to commence practical organized work. T district is the worst in London, having its cen in Seven Dials, the most degraded spot in city. It is notorious as the haunt of crimir and vicious persons of both sexes. There p erty and vice may be seen in their worst for and sights which shock even those whose ner are accustomed to scenes of squalid misery n the observer at every step.

In this district the energetic young Chris laborer commenced her mission. What character of the early work of herself and Bible-women was, she informs us in her pre to the last volume of the Missing Link m zine, which she edited. She there rem some of her elder fellow-laborers, ladies wh different neighborhoods superintended the Bi women, how in their earliest mothers' meet they used to see "gatherings of wild wo slip-shod, careless, and in borrowed shaw who consented to meet, and work, and liste a Bible story, and "earn twopence."

Not only did she write of the Missing L and with untiring energy conduct the Mi Link magazine, but beginning we know how, in that silent way, however, in w works that are to grow take their origin trained Bible-women, planted them here there, solicited and gained the co-operati ladies to superintend them, gave and got n of support till there had grown up unde hand a vast and energetic agency, spread London, and beginning to branch away int tant countries, even into Syria and Madag into India, Italy, and France.

Her Bible looked not at man as a mere s but as soul and body, and had its healing f body as well as the soul; so, beside her I woman and the mission-room gradually s up a nurse, and here again the links we only between the direct laborer and the suff but reached from both of these higher u her nurses have nurse lady superintende encourage, counsel, and co-operate with t just as her Bible-women have Bible lady intendents. Each of these, learning and ing lessons of sympathy for the lowest st domestic life in London, serves as a link t the fallen, and to convey downward the those who stand higher.

THE FUNDS.

The British and Foreign Bible Societ twenty-five cents a week toward the sup each of her Bible-women, of whom she fo years engaged upon an average annua

h saw the coastguard approach he was ordered t give the alarm.

ometimes he had to watch for hours in the d k, cold, and rain. Before he had learned a ut God he had been afraid to stay upon the l ely rocks, but now he felt that his Heavenly F her would watch over Him. Still there was o thing which troubled the poor boy very m ch—he knew that he was helping others to d what was wrong, and he felt that God would b angry with him; but then if he refused to w ch he would be beaten, and the poor child w afraid, because he dreaded his father's anger a curses.

nd then, too, while he watched he was often in ain, because the cold and damp had seized h d of him and made him very ill, and a fearful c gh would sometimes rack his little body m t cruelly.

he winter passed along, and during the w ry night-watches the boy would often cheer hi self by saying over a prayer, or the psalm, "he Lord is my Shepherd;" or as he thought ab ut his future home above, where no cold, no da ness existed—that home which his own dear Je s had prepared for him—then he would sing o gently to himself his favorite hymn, which th good minister had taught him, "Jesus, lover of my soul"—it seemed so sweet a thought to th poor, neglected, ill-used child, that the great G should care for and love him, body and so ; and then, as he thought thus, he would lo to fly right away to Jesus and be sheltered fr all the storms of life.

t last the boy grew worse and worse; but hi parents did not notice his danger—they only be him for being, as they thought, lazy. One ni t, when the cold wind blew and the heavy ra, was pouring down, the captain told his son to o and watch, as they wanted to land a cargo. " ather," said the boy, "let me not go to-ni t; God will be angry with me, and I fear to of d Him; let me not go to-night!" But wi an oath the father drove his son to his w c. Sad, ill, and weary, the boy crawled up th rocks right away from the house, and, oh, ho he longed for rest, for peace, for heaven, an for a fond mother and father to love and ou e him! Cold and wet, he knelt down to pr , and then looked up to the sky, and th ugh the dark clouds there shone forth one br t star, and it reminded him of that star wh h he had read of in his Bible, by which th Lord had led the wise men of the East to he feet of Jesus, and the boy wondered, in is child-like, simple way, whether that star wh h he saw was sent to tell him that he must go Jesus; then, as he thought of this, a terri-ble aroxysm of coughing seized hold of him, the was a kind of choking feeling, and the ch sank down on the hard ground, while a la red stream flowed from his little mouth. " sus, dear Jesus!" he gasped, "have pity up Thy little child; fetch me away from this co weary world, and take me up to the glad ho e above." Then he fainted right away.

on after this a coastguard came along, but the was no one able to give an alarm to the sm glers; and as he drew near to the spot he he d a low, weak voice singing very softly and sw ly like an angel—

"Hide me, O my Saviour hide,
Till the storm of life be past;
Safe into the haven guide,
O receive my soul at last."

en the voice stopped, there was another r cough, a faint struggle, a gasp, a sob, and le soul was caught in an angel's arms and a away to heaven.

ether the coastguard discovered the smug- le through their sentinel having thus died, or wh her his death produced any religious effect p his parents, we do not know, but it must a been a source of joy to the minister that his te hy instructions to the youth were fruitful l ding him to a saving knowledge of Christ, at at last he was safely folded as a lamb the Good Shepherd in heaven.

THE BRITISH PROTECTORATE OVER SYRIA.

THE hopes of the Jews as to the enfranchisement of Syria and Palestine from Turkish oppression and misgovernment have been reawakened by the unexpectedly firm and decisive demand of the British ambassador that the Turkish Government shall effect promised needed reforms in the government of Asia Minor. The Jewish Chronicle says:

"If subjected to rigid tests, it may appear unreasoning that scattered millions of the Jews, inhabiting all climes, speaking all languages, and subject to all forms of government, should yet turn toward the East with the utmost solicitude, and feel for the Holy Land a reverence and affection which centuries of exile are incapable of eradicating. In this, as in some other respects, the Jewish mind is peculiarly constituted. Other races have been expatriated, and have forgotten the land from which they sprung; other races have colonized lands and have founded distinct nationalities, or have only hung on to the parent stem by the slender ligatures of language and custom. It is not so with the Jews. Citizens of all countries they are Jews, and through each and all there runs a sympathetic chord which vibrates to the touch of the skilled player. For us, then, the question of reforms in Asia Minor is one of the deepest interest. Individually we may be content with our surroundings, but neither reason nor the philosophies of the schools can induce us to forget that Asia Minor is the cradle of our race, the home of our religion, and that at some future period it will witness the culminating grandeur of our spiritual mission."

It is not then surprising that the official announcement in 1878 that England had assumed the Protectorate of the Turkish provinces in Asia should have produced a thrilling sensation amongst the numerous Asiatic Jews who "have," as we are told, "long groaned under Ottoman misrule." The Levant Herald recently published a letter from a well-informed correspondent, in which it is said, "Official corruption in Turkey has proceeded to such an extent that the whole body-politic appears to be tainted, and there are depths of iniquity here which are unfathomable." This forcible description of Turkish misrule in Asia Minor is not new. It is language with which the English Government has long been familiar; whilst successive Consuls and Commissioners have reported that nothing human could exceed the abnormal greed and rapacity of the pashas and official classes. "It is not the Sultan who reaps the full benefit of the oppression of his subjects, for only a small proportion of the taxes gathered come into his hands; the sums raised filter through several grades of officials, each reserving for himself what his superior will permit, and a small residue alone reaches the Imperial Treasury at Constantinople."

After waiting more than a year for the execution of promised reforms, the English Government lately commissioned Sir Henry Layard to proceed to Syria and make investigations. What Sir Henry Layard has reported we do not know. On this point Lord Beaconsfield in his Guildhall speech was silent. The energetic action of the British Cabinet on the Porte is, however, sufficient to guide us to the conclusion that Sir Henry Layard found the Asiatic provinces of Turkey much in their old condition, and that there was the danger that the promised reforms would become dead letters unless some extreme pressure was brought to bear on the authorities at Constantinople.

"Every year," says the Jewish Chronicle, "increasing numbers of Jews emigrate to the Holy Land, to live or to die there. Wise reforms properly carried out would, without doubt, change the conditions under which the great mass of our brethren live in the East, and greatly lighten the anxiety and labors and pecuniary responsibilities of the Western Jews. If education were encouraged, stability secured, tenures settled and permanent, it would be less difficult for the Anglo-Jewish Association, the Alliance Israélite, and for other kindred institutions to deal effectually with the complex questions of Jewish education and interests in the East than at present. Apart, then, from general principles of humanity, we, as Jews, are directly interested in the carrying out of the reforms in Asia Minor."

The generous eloquence of Lord Sandon in the English House of Commons in 1878, in defending the British Protectorate, was made the subject of what, in connection with such a subject, must be called the ribald jesting of Sir William Harcourt. But the noble lord's sympathy is not ignored or contemned by the Jews. We refer to their own organ, which describes Lord Sandon during his visit to Asia Minor as having "stood over the tombs of ancient civilizations, and realized the unutterable ruin which overlays them. Investing the vanished civilizations of the East, there are mysterious but imperishable glories. For generous minds they possess a fascination which the presence of seething corruption itself cannot entirely dispel. In Asia Minor he saw populations squalid and debased, he saw desolation where fruitful plains once yielded abundance, he saw ruins where stood the emporiums of the world, he saw crass ignorance in the homes of the ancient philosophies; but he saw more: he saw populations inviting Western civilization to repay some of the debt which it owed to antecedent greatness.

"'When are you coming?' was the question which greeted him. Such a question, asked in such a land, was as though the 'dry bones' of the valley, which for centuries had been bleaching under the eyes of a pitying sun, were impatient to be clothed anew. And his lordship replied, 'We are coming!' We are coming with the steam-plough, with railways, with scientific irrigation, with all the resources of applied science, to restore to the East some of its fruitfulness and develop some of its unexhausted resources. We are coming with education to quicken the dormant faculties of races perishing for want of knowledge. We are coming with just principles of finance to take from off the shoulders of the poor the grinding burdens which the oppressor had placed on them, and to do battle with the pestilence which official corruption has bred.

"The assurance which his lordship gave to the native races that England was coming has been in part fulfilled. As we have shown, this step is not without its deep interest to the Jewish race. We may have to wait a long time before all that has been promised will be achieved. There will be obstacles to overcome, and direct opposition to remove before Eastern civilization will live again, strengthened and expanded by the resources of the West. But we may rest satisfied that a British Protectorate in Asia Minor will be the point of a fresh departure which will lead to important results.'

We regard the regeneration of God's ancient people as dependent upon higher and more mysterious agencies than the steam-plough, with railways and the resources of applied science. But it will be a noble achievement to lay even a foundation for the renovation which Lord Sandon foreshadowed, and we shall rejoice if Great Britain shall be endowed with the will and the ability to enforce those measures of reform in Asia Minor the absence of which is fatal to the existence and the growth of nations.

We have a sure word of prophecy to encourage our interest in the future of the children of Abraham, the friend of God, and to inspire hope that the time is drawing near when God Himself "shall arise and have mercy upon Zion; for the time to favor her, yea, the set time is come." The growing interest with which the explorations of the Holy Land have been of late years carried on by Christian missionaries, travellers, and archæologists cannot fail to recall the words in which the Psalmist pleads for the restoration of Zion, for "Thy servants take pleasure in her stones, and favor the dust thereof" (Psa. 102 : 14).

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, December 31st, at 3.30 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Electoral Difficulty in Maine has been submitted to the judgment of the Supreme Court in the form of questions framed by Governor Garcelon, and the court has promptly rendered an unanimous decision. It is to the effect that the legal technicalities on which the Governor rejected the returns of several cities do not invalidate the returns, and that "a Representative is not to be deprived of his rights because municipal officers have neglected their duty." The judges consider that the formalities prescribed by law are to be understood as "directory" merely, and that they are designed to give unmistakable effect to the decision of the people as recorded at the polls, but that the formalities are not mandatory, and therefore if a return be made in which the manifest result of the election is clear the return must be accepted, even if the directions of the law have not been minutely obeyed. As Governor Garcelon has displayed his wisdom in submitting the questions to the court, we may hope that he will give practical effect to the decision, and thus end the uneasiness and apprehension which have prevailed in the State since the election.

Another Indian War is Threatened, owing to Chief Ouray having failed to deliver up the Utes who were engaged in the White River massacre. The time granted for the surrender was extended to December 29th, but Ouray was then still unable to fulfil his promise. As the Indians are convinced that the trial of the men given up would issue in their execution, it is not surprising that reluctance is shown in the matter; but it seems improbable that the suspicions entertained of Ouray's complicity in their concealment have any foundation in fact. But for his efforts the war would have gone on, and the women and children captured would not have been given up. A dispatch from Los Pinos agency dated December 31st says: "Ouray fully realizes the situation, and knows that if the ultimatum of the Commission is not complied with the Utes must go. Chief Guero, second in power to Ouray, being a medicine man, has a large following, and has done more than all others to hinder the Commission from accomplishing its work. He is in favor of war, and at the time of the White River troubles wanted to massacre the people living in the garrison, and was only restrained by Ouray." And alliance with the Sioux is feared.

An Energetic and Timely Protest has been entered by Bishop Whittle, of Minnesota, against the wrongs contemplated against the Indian tribes. He says: "A bill has been introduced in Congress to create a Territorial Government over the Indian Territory. The Cherokees, Choctaws, Creeks, Séminoles, Osages, Wyandottes, Senecas, Delawares, Shawnees, and other tribes declare that they will not submit to this wrong. They have hoped against hope that the United States would keep its plighted faith. They say that if all pleas of justice, honor, love of man and fear of God, will not keep us from this robbery, they will raise that battle-cry of the oppressed, 'Liberty or death.' It may be that it is madness for fifteen thousand warriors to fight forty millions of people. We may be sure that if this war does come a cry of agony will go up from a desolated border such as we have never heard. If we take no thought of the millions of treasure which will be wasted, the precious lives which must be sacrificed, can we afford to stand before the whole civilized world as a perjured nation? Dare we trample every principle of honor under our feet, and bring down upon ourselves and children the anger of a righteous God?"

The Death of Bishop Gilbert Haven occurred January 3d at Malden, Mass. He was in his sixtieth year, and had held the office of Bishop in the Methodist Episcopal Church since May, 1872. He was descended from a noted Puritan family of which Chancellor E. O. Haven and Professor Joseph Haven were conspicuous members. He graduated in 1846 at the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn., of which institution he afterwards became principal. He was an abolitionist of a very pronounced type, and the Philadelphia Conference refused him admission as a preacher on that ground. He then went on a European tour, and on his return settled in Boston, where he occupied the pulpit of an important church, and also edited a religious journal. At his election to the episcopal office he was assigned the diocese of the Gulf States, and took up his residence at Atlanta, Ga. He conducted a party of colored freedmen to Liberia in 1877, and it was during his travels in that country that he contracted the disease which has now resulted in his death. His genial, hearty manner, and thorough earnestness in any cause he espoused, won him a prominent place in the esteem of the Methodist Episcopal Church.

A Congress of Socialists has been Holding its sessions at Pittsburg during the past week. Its main business was to select socialistic candidates for the Presidency, and to protest against the injunction of the National Executive Committee prohibiting Socialists joining any military organization. The meetings are described as being very disorderly and characterized by acrimonious discussions. The existence of the order in our midst, reinforced as it is continually by emigrants from all European nations, constitutes a serious menace to our national well-being.

The Rev. W. McAlister, the Faithful and beloved pastor of Seventy-sixth Street Cornell Memorial Church, New York City, died at six o'clock on Saturday evening, January 3d. The event was awfully sudden. He preached as usual on the previous Sunday, and also conducted a funeral. Next day he was seized with internal inflammation, and fearing he would die, sent for a lawyer and made his will. His suffering was intense. On Wednesday the physician pronounced his case hopeless, and on Saturday he was unconscious till his death. His son and daughter were summoned from a distance, and both arrived by different routes on Saturday. The son arrived first, but his father did not recognize him; the daughter did not arrive till all was over.

The Story of a Reunited Family was Told at Mr. Sawyer's Gospel Temperance Meeting, at the Y. M. C. A., New York, on New Year's Day. A gentleman said that some years ago he had fallen under the power of intoxicating liquor, and had become so debased and violent that his wife and children were under the necessity of leaving him. After the separation he sank lower, and was almost continually in a state of intoxication. He was led to the Gospel Temperance Meeting, and by the grace of God was saved from the power of his besetting sin. At a subsequent meeting he was relating his experience, and to his great joy, at the conclusion of his remarks, his wif rushed into his arms and embraced him. Sh had happened to attend the meeting, and wa overjoyed to hear her husband's account of hi rescue. He had lost sight of her since she lef him, and had almost despaired of ever finding her again. "Now," he said, "I have a happ home and a happy family."

The Pilgrim of the Mayflower is to th American what the man "who came over wit the Conqueror" is to the Englishman—an ancestor whose name is mentioned with hones pride. It is therefore pleasant to find that monument is proposed to Samuel Storrs, one the pilgrims of the Mayflower. His descendant include President Hayes and also many distinguished ministers, lawyers, and judges wh have worthily borne the honored name Storrs.

The Fireman's Gold Medal was Presented De 26th to Captain Meagher, of the No. 3 Hook an Ladder Company, New York. The brave a which won him the medal occurred at a fire i East Fourteenth Street. On arriving at th scene of the fire Captain Meagher found a won an hanging by her hands out of a four-sto window which was beyond the reach of th longest ladder in his possession. That ladd was placed almost upright against the hous and Meagher ascending it, stood erect on th second round, 52 feet above the sidewal Standing thus below the woman whose life was intent upon saving, Meagher spoke to h encouragingly. When he had made her cal enough to understand him, he told her to s her limbs and body as rigidly as possible, a then to let go of the window-lintel. She obey him implicitly. As she dropped from the wi dow, he caught her with his right arm, a steadying himself by the power of his lim and his disengaged hand on the top round the ladder, passed her to a fireman below hi who carried the woman down the ladder safety. We admire a man who will thus imp his own life to save the life of another, but h many of us forget Him who actually sacrifi His life that through Him we might have eternal!

"Drawing from Principal on Principle" w the description given by the late Mr. Alexan Stuart, a wealthy merchant of New York, of practice in money matters during the later ye of his life. It frequently happened that at close of the year Mr. Stuart found that his g to religious and philanthropic objects equalled the income he derived from busin and his private expenses were met by a ded tion from his capital. He was born in 18 and from his twentieth year was an earnest zealous Christian. The Lord abundantly bles his commercial enterprises, and the more gained the more he gave away. He died cember 23, universally regretted.

A Fight between a Man and a Dog t place by arrangement at St. Louis, Mo., Dec ber 22d. The man was a professional pug and fought with his fists, and the dog w Siberian bloodhound. At the end of the counter the dog died, and the man's flesh lacerated and torn from head to foot. A l number of spectators witnessed the disgus spectacle, and apparently felt the same enjoyn of the scene as Spaniards are said to experi at witnessing a bull-fight. The lowest dept degradation to which human nature unreg ated can sink has yet to be fathomed, but is a specimen of one of its gradations.

The Open Channel is the Safest Course t in every-day life as in maritime affairs. pilot of a United States revenue-cutter was if he knew all the rocks along the coast he sailed. "No," he replied; "it is only sary to know where there are no rocks." well known that there are many rocks may wreck a young man's life in the neig hood of the theatre, the dancing saloon the drinking bar. It is not necessary to ine them. The safe course is to avoid the altogether.

The Largest Organ in the World is now under process of construction in the Stewart Cathedral, Garden City, L. I. The strange peculiarity about the instrument is that its several parts are placed in different places in the building. One portion is in a tower at the west end, another over the ceiling in the centre of the nave, another underneath the chancel, and lastly the large chimes which hang in the tower are also connected with the instrument, and can be played by the organist with the keys of the organ. The whole is fitted with electrical and hydraulic machinery, which render the labor of playing as easy as that of a small church organ.

This magnificent instrument will be used in the worship of God, and will be listened to with great pleasure by musical connoisseurs.

A Young Scotch Miner, at Cherokee, Kansas, died last week under melancholy circumstances. The young man came to America about eight years ago, and for several years he has been at the Cherokee coal-mines. He was a good young fellow, sober, industrious, affable, and a general favorite. By hard work and the strictest economy he had accumulated enough to buy a little one, and sent back to Scotland for his father and mother to come and live with him. They were to arrive last Thursday, and the young man was overjoyed at the prospect of meeting his aged parents, whom he had not seen since he left Midlothian. The very day they were to arrive the young Scotchman was working in one of the mines, when a car of coal fell on him at the bottom of the shaft and killed him almost instantly. The aged father and mother arrived a few hours later, all impatient to see their noble boy. It was a sad and terrible disappointment, and even the rough miners wept like children at the grief of the old people and the loss of their loved comrade. One more journey will be necessary to reunite the aged parents with their devoted son. That will be the passage from earth to heaven. But there, there will be no disappointment, for in that place there is no more death.

Three Days in an Open Boat followed by sharks was the terrible experience of eleven men brought into Baltimore on January 3d by an Italian bark. They belonged to the British steamer Borussia, which is supposed to have foundered at sea, as mentioned in our last number. When it was decided to abandon the Borussia on December 2d, the eleven men took possession of a metallic boat, in which they placed some provisions. They lost sight of the other boats during the first night, and in the morning found to their horror they were followed by sharks, one of which actually attacked the boat, and was beaten off with a boathook. A sail was sighted on the evening of December 5. It proved to be the Giacomino, bound for Baltimore, and to their intense joy the men were taken on board and brought to port. This makes twenty-six saved out of a total of 234 persons on board the missing vessel.

The Real Mission of Light Wines.—The report recently issued by one of our Temperance Societies draws attention to the effect produced by the use of light wines, which, when introduced, we were told would have a beneficial influence in checking drunkenness. The report states that the result of experience has been to show that these light wines produce and increase an appetite for intoxicating liquors which has issued in the ruin of many young people.

A Modern Magdalene.—The Brooklyn City Mission Journal recounts the reformation of one of the worst specimens of the vicious class of women who infest our streets. She was about thirty years of age, had wandered away from her home, and had led for three or four years a dissolute, sinful life. Arrested, convicted, and sentenced to five years' imprisonment, she was regarded as the worst woman that had entered the prison, violent and ungovernable in her temper, unchaste in her speech and behavior. But the agents of the Mission, by the power of Christian kindness, subdued her violent nature, and led her to seek the knowledge and favor of her offended God. On the profession of her faith she received baptism, and showed by the meekness and gentleness of her conduct the power of Divine grace to renovate and sanctify. After her conversion she was a power for good in the prison; the change in her deportment was so apparent and the contrast so strong that the grace of God was magnified. As the period of her imprisonment approached its termination, her friends were communicated with, and they consented to receive her. On her arriving home her first work was for her Saviour, in sweeping out and putting to order for worship the unfinished country church, next to gather for herself a class to teach in Sabbath-school, and to organize a "Cottage prayer-meeting," which meets the same evening and hour of the women's prayer-meeting in the Penitentiary.

An Unexpected Visitor Arrived at a House in Plymouth, Mass., on Christmas Day. The local journal says: "A man, representing himself to be a tramp, knocked at Sylvanus Churchill's door on Christmas Day and demanded entrance. This was refused on account of the illness of some member of the family. He then went to the next house, and after some hesitation, was admitted; when it was discovered that he was a near relative of the family in the house at which he first applied. He had been absent from Plymouth for twenty-one years, during which time he had not been heard from."

Doubtless the want of hospitality was speedily rectified when the returned wanderer's identity was established, but the incident at this season of the year reminds us of One "who came to His own and His own received Him not."

A Strange Loss of Identity has occurred in the case of a prominent jeweller of Cleveland, who suddenly vanished from his home on New Year's day, 1879, and was supposed to have committed suicide. He has been found at East Richland, in the county infirmary. When identified by his friends he could not recall anything, and the narration of familiar incidents and every other device to restore his memory failed to produce any effect upon the mind of the wanderer. He had confidence in what was told him by those around him, and readily consented to return to Cleveland. Pictures of all his friends were shown to him with no effect, and even a very fine jeweller's lathe, which he had spent years in constructing, failed to arouse his dormant memory. With every part of a watch, however, he was perfectly familiar. He converses on all subjects of literature and politics with as much intelligence as any one, quoting from the writings of noted authors, and narrating many important events in the history of public men. His friends, while glad to have discovered him alive, are in deep distress at the oblivion under which he labors, but they may take a consolation from the thought that if his name is written in the Book of Life, he will answer to it in the day when the quick and the dead are summoned to receive their reward.

Swearers Silenced by a Child.—A Crowded Boston train was leaving the depot when a number of well-dressed men entered. They soon engaged in conversation, and oaths were uttered freely. Presently a little girl rose bashfully from her seat, and with many blushes went over to the man whose oaths were the loudest, and, not saying a word, presented him with her little pocket-Bible. The effect was marvellous. The man looked at it for a moment, colored deeply, and showed it to his friends. Not another profane expression was used after that, and the coarse conversation dwindled down to mere casual remarks. At the next station the man to whom the Bible had been given, left the car and presently returned with a packet of candies, which he gave to the child, and stooping down kissed the little thing, and whispered in her ear, "I will keep your book and read it as long as I live." How often when older people have been restrained from doing some disagreeable duty by social etiquette, has the work been done by their juniors, and they have been constrained to say as Eli did, we "perceive that the Lord has called the child"!

THE PHILOSOPHY OF PROMISE.

A Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"New things do I declare: before they spring forth I tell you of them."—Isaiah xlii. 9.

God's Special Prerogative—Why God usually gives a Promise of what He means to Bestow—I. In Order to Display His Grace—1. In its Freeness—2. In its Fulness—3. In its Power—II. In Order to Arouse our Hopes—A Great Big Sinner unusually Black—Mistake of Chopping a Text in Halves—Columbus' Three Days' Sail from America—III. To Exercise our Faith—A Gospel Plain as an Axiom leaves no Room for Faith—Two Matters to Believe—IV. To Excite our Prayer—The Blind Man—The Prisoner—Pardon for "Longcomings"—The Minister who Lost his Prayer-Book—V. To Foster Gratitude and Assurance—I Will because I Have.

God has often foretold things to come by the lips of his prophets. I need not give you even a single specimen of the multitudes of instances in which events which could not have been guessed at, which indeed were highly improbable and unlikely, were nevertheless foretold by the Spirit of God through the prophets, and actually came to pass. The Lord claims this as a proof of his Godhead; it is his special prerogative to possess omniscience, the knowledge of every thing, and therefore prescience,, or the knowledge of that which will happen in years to come.

I think it most admirable, and it seems another instance of the foresight of the Holy Ghost that the words of my text should stand where they do; for it may not be unknown to some of you that the modern critics, who always try if they can to tear the bowels out of every text, and are never satisfied until, like swine, they trample beneath their feet every cluster of Eshcol, have dared to ascribe one part of the Book of Isaiah to a second Isaiah, as they call him, who wrote after the times of Christ; because you see the prophecy so plainly describes our Lord Jesus Christ, that men who will not believe in God or in the inspiration of his holy book are driven to invent the notion that the prophecy was written after the event.

Truly, it might as well have been written afterwards as before, for it is so accurate; but here, as if the Lord foresaw that there would come in the last days scoffers, He bids his servant, in these express words, claim that he speaks things before they come to pass—"Behold, the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare: before they spring forth I tell you of them." It remains therefore for these sham Christian critics either to accept the fact that Isaiah's book contains actual prophecies, or else to reject it altogether. Their specious pretence of believing the book to be authentic while they deny its prophetic character is exposed by the words before us.

GOD ANTEDATES HIS MERCIES.

It is not, however, about prophecy that I am going to speak at this time. I wish to bring forth a general principle—the principle that our gracious Lord usually gives a promise of that which He means to bestow. Before His favors come into our hands the sound of them falls upon our ears.

He not only means to bestow the favor, but he tells us He means to bestow it, and He has a practical purpose in this information. The philosophy of promise is my topic at this time. Why are covenant blessings the subject of promises? Why does not the Lord give us the blessing without previous intimation? It would be as effectual. Why does He, before it comes, promise it again and again? I shall give five answers to a question which might admit of fifty.

I. And the first is this. God speaks these things before the blessing comes, in order

TO DISPLAY HIS GRACE.

1. First, to display the freeness of His grace.

When He makes a promise of pure grace He does not come to us and say, "If this," and "if that," and "if the other;" but He comes with, "I will," and "I will," and "I will," and "I will," before we seek Him, before we have any desire towards Him, aye, and before we have any sense of need of Him. There are many conditional promises for which we ought to be very thankful, but the foundation of them all is an absolute, unconditioned covenant of grace. A redemption was provided for me before I lived, and consequently before I could have known that I was a slave. The Spirit of God was given that I might live, before I knew that I was dead, and consequently before I could have made an appeal for spiritual life.

"No sinner can be beforehand with thee:
Thy grace is most sovereign, most rich, and most free."

2. I think the Lord also tells us what He is going to do before he does it that we may see the fulness of his grace. The Lord says that He will come, not to men who are looking for Him, but to those who have blind eyes and therefore cannot look; that He will come, not to those who are coming to Him, though He will do that, but to those who cannot come to Him, because they are straitly shut up as in a prison-house.

Notice the passage: they are blind prisoners, and cannot come forth, and yet the Lord comes to take the film from the eye, and to tear the iron bar from the window and set the captive free, not because there is any goodness in the poor blind prisoner at the present moment, nor because there ever will be any, but simply because the Lord is full of mercy and delights to display His grace. Christ died for the ungodly. Jesus came to seek and to save that which was lost. He is a physician, and therefore comes not to seek the whole, but the sick. To make us know this glorious fulness of His grace He informs us beforehand of what He is about to do.

3. Moreover, I think it is not only to show the freeness and the fulness of His grace, but the power of it; for He speaks very positively: He says that He will open the blind eyes, and He will bring out the prisoners from the prison-house. Can He do this? Ay, that He can. There can be no question about His ability. When the Lord resolves to save, save He can. Some people believe in a great God in nature, but in a very little God in grace. The God of nature can do every thing, and they believe in physical miracles, but according to their notions the God of grace has to consult the will of man, and He has to halt and hesitate, unless dead man will arise and give himself life, and unwilling man will change his own will.

I believe in the omnipotence of God in the kingdom of grace, and that He can change a heart of stone to flesh, and break the iron sinew of the stubborn will, and bow men before him. To me the Almighty is as supreme in the realm of mind as in the world of matter. I do not doubt the free agency of man; on the contrary, I see daily evidence of it. I believe man to be a free agent, and yet he is not and cannot be more powerful in any respect than the Lord of all. The Lord knows how to be master in the kingdom of the human will, and, without violating that will in any degree, He can achieve the eternal purpose of his love.

The Lord's grace is irresistible: His purpose shall stand, and He will do all His pleasure. "This is taking high ground," says one. It is ground blessedly high for sinking sinners; it is such ground as we want who are utterly lost and ruined and undone. You that can help yourselves may go and do it, but we who cannot do so are glad to find that God knows what He is going to do, and speaks with the tone of a sovereign, and with the voice of one who has not to ask help from others, but who can work all things according to the counsel of His own will. "Before they spring forth, I tell you of them," saith He: because His grace is mighty He thus speaks of what is going to be done.

That is our first head, then. The Lord announces His purpose, of love to display His grace.

II. Secondly, brethren, I think the Lord announces the covenant blessings He is about to bestow in order

TO AROUSE OUR HOPES.

Many poor souls would actually die before they were saved if they did not get some little hope every now and then while they are in a seeking state. I am not speaking at haphazard now, I am speaking of cases that I do know—poor tempted, troubled ones, to whom the promises are as a brook by the way of which they drink and lift up their heads.

Some of you come to Christ apparently very easily. Thank God for it; but I know others who cannot get at the Lord Jesus for the press. They try even to look to Him, but they are blinded by their tears. I cannot excuse their unbelief, but I do pity their poor trembling spirits. They are coming to Christ, but they are like the child of whom we read that, "when he was a coming the devil threw him down and tare him." They are sadly torn and cannot get to Christ.

Now, when the Lord tells his people what He will do they are cheered with expectation. When they read such texts as these, "A new heart also will I give you, and a right spirit will I put within you," and "I will put my law in your hearts, and ye shall not depart from me," and "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more forever;" "Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow; though they be red like crimson, they shall be as wool,"—these poor souls catch at such words of promise, and learn how to hope. "Oh!" say they, "if that promise might be true to me, then I should not perish. Perhaps the Lord will look in mercy upon me."

Every now and then the Lord saves

A GREAT BIG SINNER

—an unusually black sinner; and what does He do with him? He makes him a walking advertisment of his mercy, so that others see the infinite grace of God. Men cry out in wonder, "What! has So-and-so found Christ? Then why should not we?" Perhaps the man may have been guilty of great iniquities. He may have been a ringleader in wickedness; but the Lord takes him and washes him from his sin, and opens his mouth to praise His name. When such an one begins to speak of divine love poor tormented spirits catch at the word, and they say, "Why should not I find mercy? Why should not I be saved?" When such a man becomes a living proof of what God can do, the promise stands out to the life before the poor sinner's eye, and he says, "Ah! perhaps, perhaps, perhaps there is salvation for me."

John Bunyan, who had been a drunken tinker, went about preaching the everlasting Gospel like a man who had been in the condemned cell, and had received a pardon; and I tell you the villagers gathered to listen to such a one as he, because they wondered at God's mighty grace. They said one to another, "Has Mr. Bad-man become a pilgrim? Then why should we not start on pilgrimage also? Has infinite mercy changed his heart? Then why should it not change ours?"

I would have you pluck up courage, any sinners among you who are here at this time. Supposing you to be the very worst persons that ever lived, and supposing you to have the worst temper, and the worst disposition, and the worst besetting sins, and the worst habits that ever men had, I tell you the Lord in great mercy has saved just such as you, and He has promised still to deal with great sinners in a way of great love.

Seize hold of this blessed fact, weave a hope out of it, and say, "I need not despair—not even I. I will not despair, then, or sit down and say there is no hope. I deserve to be with the devils in hell; but why should I not be among the saints in heaven? I deserve to be banished forever, but why should there not be a crown in heaven for me? Ah! will not the saints wonder when they see me come in? The angels will look down from their harps and say, 'What, is he there?' Then I will tell the story of what the Lord has done, and set them wondering over again, till even they shall say, 'It has never been so seen before. Here comes the biggest, blackest, most hell-deserving wretch that ever did enter heaven. Lift up a loftier song than ever. Louder, and louder yet, let the song ring through the heavenly arches, for love has out-loved itself, and grace has out-graced itself above all it has ever done before.'"

I pray God that some despairing soul may grasp these cheering facts and be comforted. I am trying to throw the big net to catch a whale of a sinner if he is floating anywhere near my barque. I know if the Gospel net once incloses him it will hold him, for not a single mesh of it will give way, despite his size and his struggling. I would like to put the Gospel so wide, and so broad, that the sheep which is hunted by the dog of hell farthest away from the fold may, nevertheless, come back to the great and gracious Shepherd of souls.

Why, beloved, even God's own believing people need to be told of what God will do, in order to encourage their hope at times. See how the Lord deals with his persecuted ones. When they are hunted, slandered, despoiled of their goods, what does He do? He makes them know that they have a richer inheritance in heaven. He sets before them the joys which He has prepared for them that love him. Now he might, if He liked, have kept all about heaven to Himself, and so have made it a surprise to us; and, indeed, some seem to think that He has done so, but in this they are ill advised.

We know much about heaven even now. "Why," says one, "the Scripture says, 'Eye hath not seen, neither hath ear heard.'" I know it does, but why do you stop in the middle of a text? You make it say the reverse of what it intends to say. Hear the whole of it. "Eye hath not seen, nor ear heard, neither have entered into the heart of man the things which God hath prepared for them that love Him; but he hath revealed them unto us by His Spirit." By chopping it in halves you made the passage say the very opposite of what it intended. Your eye has not seen it, and your ear has not heard it, but His Spirit has told you concerning the things which He has prepared for you, and this is no little privilege.

I need not stay to tell you how much the Lord has told us about the eternal state, as to our being with Jesus where He is, that we may behold his glory, and may be sharers in that glory forever. He has told us this, to cheer us up while on the road, to encourage us that we may never sink in despair. Going to lie down and die, brother? Do you know how near you are to heaven? Perhaps you will be there in a month. Going to give it all up now? Will you be so foolish as to leave the battle just as the victory is won? Brother, does the devil tell you to turn back? He knows how near you are to the glory land.

You are something like Columbus when h was within three days' sail of America, and th sailors bade him stay his course. He could not would not, reverse his venturous prow, bu pushed on and found the new world. Some o us may be within a few days' sail of heaven, an yet do not know it, and the devil has the impudence to persuade us to go back. Shall we listen to the impudent fiend? No, by the grace o God, never! If the journey be long, the en will repay us for it. If the voyage be rough, th brave country will make amends for all the tempests which have wreaked their vengeance upo us. Onward, onward, be our course: to help t to persevere even to the end, the Lord has mad the new things known to us, and has told us o them before they spring forth.

Two good answers to the question are no before us, and each one is an argument for ad ration.

III. But now, thirdly, why has the Lord to us about the mercies He intends to give?

TO EXERCISE OUR FAITH.

The Gospel of God is a Gospel for believer and one of God's great objects in the whole a rangement of the Gospel system is to educa our confidence in Him. I remember speaki once with a brother upon the room which G has left for faith to work in. We were speaki about the various defences which have been us to prove the veracity of the Christian religion against infidel assaults, and I was remarking upon the manifest failure of certain of them which appeared exceedingly strong at one time, but are now abandoned, because under new attacks they have manifestly failed. My friend was deploring that this book, and the other, which had once been considered as standard works, seemed to have lost power over this generation.

It came to the minds of both of us, that if God had made the Christian religion so clear that you could make an axiom of it, or prove it as easily as you show that twice two make four, there would have been no room for faith at all; and then the divine system of salvation must have taken another course, for faith would have occupied a very narrow space in it. The Lord intends that men should exercise faith in His word, for He knows that faith is necessary to us if we are to be delivered from sin.

The Lord has told us what great things He is going to do for sinners; and I want you just to answer the question: Do you believe that He can do this? Come now, thou that art ungodly and graceless, dost thou believe that God can save thee? can make thee holy? can make thee gracious. If thou canst believe it, canst thou also believe another thing, namely, that He is willing to do this deed of love? Thou canst believe His power and His willingness, thou sayest. Well, the only thing that thou hast now to do in order to be this moment saved is to act out thy belief upon these two points. He can and He is willing—throw yourself upon that power and will. Trust yourself with Jesus now. That is the one demand of the Gospel: "Believe and live." Rest in the fact that He has reconciled you to Himself in Christ, that He forgives you now, because you trust alone in His Son for your eternal salvation. Will you do this at once? Will you rest on Christ Jesus? Then, "Your sins, which are many, are all forgiven." You are a saved man.

"Oh! but how," say you, "do I know that I am saved?" Thou shalt feel and know that thou art saved if thou believest, for thou shalt find thyself from this time loving the things which thou didst aforetime hate, and hating the things which thou didst once love; and that simple act of trusting which seems so insignificant, will transform thee, and will so become the hinge on which thy life shall turn. Believing in Christ, thou shalt go out of this house saying, "I am a forgiven man, and I love the God who has forgiven me. I am washed in the blood of Christ, and henceforth will I serve Him.

"Lord, in the strength of grace,
With a glad heart and free,
Myself, my residue of days,
I consecrate to Thee."

I am Christ's man forever; I will not grieve him; by the help of His Holy Spirit I will live to His praise. I will tell others what He has done for me, and my entire life shall be a life of obedience if He will but help me and keep me, and sustain me by His gracious power." You see now why the blessings of grace are foretold—that they may become objects of faith. God give you faith to exercise upon them now.

IV. Fourthly, and very briefly, these things are told us before they come to pass,

TO EXCITE OUR PRAYER.

After hope and faith, prayer is quite sure to follow. Note the order: the Lord says that Christ shall come to open the eyes of the blind, —here is grace. I picture the blind man as saying, "Jesus is come to open the blind eyes; why should He not open mine?" Here is hope. Next the blind man goes on to say, "He says that He will do it if I trust in Him. I know He can. I believe He will. I will trust Him." Here is faith. What is the very next thing that the blind man does? Why, he begins to pray to Him. "Jesus, Thou Son of David, have mercy on me." Here is prayer.

As soon as the first little drop of faith falls into a man's soul, he begins to pray, "Lord, thou hast promised pardon to believers; give that pardon to me. Thou hast promised a new heart; give a new heart to me. Thou hast promised eternal salvation to as many as obey Christ; Lord, give me eternal salvation." Oh that blessed gift of faith! It soon brings a man to his knees.

Think of those poor people in the prison-house, too. There they sit in darkness, and they make no sound but groans: but suddenly a voice is heard. Jesus comes to set the captives free. It is repeated, "He comes, He comes to loose the bondaged ones." Inside the prison-house there shines a light in the midst of the darkness, and the prisoners say, "If He comes, why should not He come to us? Blessed be His name, we hope He will come to us." And now you can hear them cry, "Come! Come! Come, Lord! Come quickly! Break these chains! Dispel this darkness. Set us free." And it is not long, when the prisoner of hope begins to pray, before the walls totter, and the captive is free as a bird of the air.

O you that are the people of God, I want you to learn this lesson, that all God's promises which are not fulfilled are meant to stimulate you to pray. Even Christ must pray. Is it not written, "Ask of me, and I shall give Thee the heathen for thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for Thy possession"?

Christ is to come, but He has taught His church to say, "Even so, come, Lord Jesus." There is no picture of the princely reign of Christ but what should at once arouse our desires, and those desires should be set on fire with prayer. Thus saith the Lord, "For this will I be inquired of by the house of Israel to do it for them." And yet if the Lord does not do some great thing before His church prays greatly, the good time is not coming just yet.

I know some churches where the prayer-meeting is a mere form. It is such a little affair that they might put it in a dish, cover it up, and lock it up in the pantry, and say nothing about it. It is a miniature concern, a very sickly dwaaf. If God blessed some churches in London in proportion to their prayers, He would not bless them much: for the prayer-meetings are held in the vestry, and that is not full, nor one half full at the best. A prayer-meeting in the chapel itself would look like a drop in a bucket, and so they hide the nakedness of the land by holding a hole-and-corner meeting in the vestry. Such things as prayer-meetings in the chapel are not expected, a snug little room is quite large enough.

Alas! there are not many brethren to pray. Two or three prose so long and so drearily, that they fill up the evening, and then they ask the Lord to forgive their shortcomings; they would do better to ask forgiveness for their longcomings, which are the death of all fervency. There is not much prayer in these long sermonizings, and the whole business is far more formal than real. Scant will be the blessing if the Lord is going to bless them in proportion to their prayers.

Do you wonder that the minister cannot preach when the people do not pray? I see some of you up from the country; perhaps you are deacons, and yet do not attend the prayer-meetings yourselves. I have known such things, and I cry shame upon you. And then you find fault with the minister.

Have you never heard of the minister who suddenly seemed to fail, and when the people complained, he said, "Ah, I may well fail, for I have lost my prayer-book!" Some one said, "I did not know you used a prayer-book, sir." "Oh!" said he, "my prayer-book used to be written on the hearts of my people, and while they prayed for me God blessed me and I had success, but they have given up praying for me, and what can I do?" Do you want the man to make bricks without straw? Surely the least thing you can do is to find him straw for the bricks, and you can only find that by means of earnest, united prayer.

V. Last of all, the Lord tells you what He is going to do, and in this He has yet another object in view, namely, and assurance when the mercy has been received.

TO FOSTER GRATITUDE

When the blessing comes, the man who has received it declares, "I know that this came from God, because He promised to give it. I know that God was in all this because I can see He has acted according to His own declaration. His word has not returned to Him void. He has done what He said, when He said, and as He said: surely this thing is of the Lord. Then comes the inference,—If He has done all this for me in the past, He will do as much for me in the future. He told me that He would help me, and He has helped me; He assures me still that He will be my helper, and I am sure He will, for He changes not.

"Each sweet Ebenezer
I have in review,
Confirms His good pleasure
To help me quite through."

This is God's way of breeding assurance in the minds of His people. If you notice in the next chapter, the one argument which God seems to use there is, "I will because I have." I will read it to you. "Thus saith the Lord that created thee, O Jacob! and He that formed thee, O Israel! Fear not: for I have redeemed thee, I have called thee by thy name: thou art mine." What then? "'When thou passest through the waters I will be with thee, and through the rivers they shall not overflow thee.'

This is God's argument of consolation. Do you not see the force of it? Look in the third verse, "I gave Egypt for thy ransom, Ethiopia and Seba for thee. Since thou wast precious in My sight, thou hast been honorable, and I have loved thee: therefore will I give men for thee, and people for thy life." If I paid a full ransom once, I will stick at no expense to gain My precious purchase. If I gave Egypt and Ethiopia once, I will give the same again but what I will have My redeemed ones set free.

If the Lord had meant to be unfaithful He would have been unfaithful long ago. If it had been possible for Him to cast away His people He would have cast you and me away years ago. Does a man bestow much care and labor and expense on that which he intends to leave unfinished? Does a wise man begin to build a house, and then leave the structure unroofed and incomplete? Will God begin the work of grace in you and not complete it? Will He bring you so far on the road to the Golden City, and then leave you and put you to shame? Shall it be said in eternity, "This man trusted in God, and God failed him? This poor sinner rested in the blood of Christ, but Christ could not save him?' Never, oh never!

The Lord has given you many a promise, and He has fulfilled it in order that to-day in your present difficulties, and to-morrow, in your new troubles, you may stand firm as a rock, and feel, "He will help me; yea, He will uphold me; yea, He will deliver me. Therefore my heart is fixed, my heart is fixed, trusting in the Lord."

I know that safe with Him remains Protected by His power,
What I've committed to His hands
Till the decisive hour.
Then will He own His servant's name
Before His Father's face,
And in the New Jerusalem
Appoint my soul a place."

Such faith as this is God's due. He deserves nothing less than unmingled confidence. He has never lied to any one of you: never doubt Him till He gives you cause for suspicion, but rest, and quietly wait, and patiently hope, and you shall see the salvation of God. As surely as the Lord liveth, He will not forsake your believing soul, but will be ever at your side, till He hath done that which He hath spoken to you of and brought you home to dwell at His right hand with His dear Son forever and ever. Amen.

Portion of Scripture read before Sermon—Isaiah 42. 1–16; 43–17.

VICISSITUDES IN CAMPAIGNING.

A Recollection by Major Malan.

One more Trial of Faith from the Rain Storm which is Averted by Prayer—Not a Man Caught Cold—Scripture. "Shalls"—A Groundless Accusation Made by a Catholic Soldier, Aided by a Priest, about the Giving of Tracts and Reading of the Scriptures.

THE providential shelter and deliverance we experienced from the storms of rain in South Africa, as already narrated,[*] was still further vouchsafed. After the storm had subsided we prepared to march from East London, on the African sea-coast, to King William's Town, our destination, which was twenty-two miles distant.

We commenced our journey to King William's Town. I hoped that we should have fine weather; but I was yet to have one more trial of faith. I was awoke the morning after our first halt by the sound of rain on my tent. I knew well what this meant—a wet march of more than twenty miles, wet camping ground, wet tents, and my men would suffer as much as if I had kept them in camp at East London.

But I knew also in whom I believed, and that He was able. The word of the Lord came to me at once: "Elias was a man subject to like passions as we are, and he prayed that it might not rain, and it rained not." I got up, threw my cloak over my shoulders, and began my prayer, saying, "Where is the Lord God of Elijah? O Lord, hear!" And then I prayed that, as He had before delivered my men, He would yet do so again, and cause the rain to cease. I had hardly finished my prayer when an officer in the next tent shouted to his servant, "Any counter-orders for the march?" I answered him with, "No." I dressed, and, putting on my waterproof, walked to the sergeant-major's tent, to tell him to turn out the men. Before I got back to my own tent the rain had ceased; and when the men fell in for the march, there were heavy rain-clouds all round, and a low rolling cloud within a few yards of their heads, covering the whole camp, but not one drop of rain.

I prayed for strength for the men for what was a long march for men just come from China, and it was granted. The distance was twenty-two miles, the road bad; we had no music but one fife and a drum; and only one old man, who had been more than twenty years in the service, fell out. I find in my diary, "The officers noted the stopping of the rain as very remarkable."

The next day we marched into King William's Town. "Well, major," said one of my officers to me a week or two afterwards, "that was a very wonderful thing; we have just been talking about it. All that rain at East London, and not a man caught a cold!" It was wonderful indeed. I have heard since that the men themselves remarked that they had not suffered from all that exposure. And yet it was not wonderful, for it was an answer to very earnest prayer.

Thus the Lord had fulfilled my third desire. He had given me command of a body of men in a position of much danger to them all, and He had enabled me to deliver them out of it.

The foregoing are simple stories, with not much of interest in them for the man who does not believe in God as the hearer and answerer of prayer, and the rewarder of all those who diligently seek Him; but I trust that they will strengthen the faith and cheer the heart of many a Christian.

Very precious is the word shall when it occurs in the Scriptures in connection with any of God's promises to those who believe in Him. It is simply the unchangeable decree and purpose of the Almighty and Holy One who inhabiteth eternity. "Shall have rest;" "Shall have peace;" "Shall not come into condemnation;" "Shall be saved."

We who believe know the preciousness and value of this little word; but it occurs in connection with other assurances to those who serve God, and they should look upon its fulfilment in these particulars to be just as certain as in those which guarantee their blessing and salvation: "Shall have tribulation;" "Shall suffer persecution." Yes; as the promises of God cannot be broken where the happiness of His people is concerned, neither can they be broken where the trials which test the sincerity of their faith and love are demanded.

"All that will live godly in Christ Jesus shall suffer persecution" (2 Tim. 3 : 12). All those who will sincerely serve God, humbly following the Lord Jesus in His life and example, shall suffer persecution. It cannot be avoided, and we should not wish to avoid it, for it only gives our Father occasion to display to us more and more of the riches of His wisdom and love.

While the regiment was at Hong Kong there was sent to the colonel of my regiment, from the Horse Guards, a petition containing false accusations against me, purporting to have been written by a soldier of my regiment at Singapore. The colonel was requested to report upon the matter to the officer commanding at Hong Kong. As his letter is official, and an authentic document, I will make an extract from it, as the best explanation of this circumstance. The accusation was in reference to my distributing tracts and reading the Scriptures to soldiers, contrary to their wish—which was untrue.

I would, however, remark, that I should not have noticed this matter at all, but that it led to such further proofs of God's love and faithfulness toward me as ought to be told for the comfort and joy of faith of my fellow-Christians. Without recounting in this book the Lord's last acts of love to me as a soldier, I should feel that I had only half fulfilled my delightful task of praising His goodness.

This, then, is an extract from the colonel's letter in explanation of the petition above referred to: "Sir, in reply to your letter of 4th instant, I have the honor to state Major Malan takes great interest in the spiritual welfare of the men. He himself is a Protestant. Private —— is a Roman Catholic, unable to write well; in fact, he can hardly do more than sign his name. The priest admitted to Major Malan that he had 'lent his pen' for Private ——'s defence in his trial in November, 1870, and I therefore fancy the petition may also come from the same source; and I think, from Private ——'s character, and the evidence of witnesses relative to the occurrences alluded to in the petition, that it is a case of bad feeling on the part of Private ——, backed up by bad advisers."

This was all that referred to the petition. I have not the least doubt but that the colonel was correct in his supposition as to the author of it, for it was sent to me twice. I compared it carefully with letters I have now in my possession, and the handwriting is the same. I must, however, correct a mistake of the colonel's as to the occasion on which it was proposed to lend the pen. A Roman Catholic soldier had informed me at Singapore that two very bad men were trying to get the priest to make a report against me to the officer commanding the troops.

It became, of course, my duty to inform the priest that he was only employed by the Government for certain purposes, and that he had no right to interfere with discipline. I told him the character of the men. I also told him that these soldiers had had an opportunity of reporting me at the last inspection, but had not done so. I further told him, that if they had any complaint, and would bring it forward in the usual manner, I would forward it myself to the officer commanding the troops.

His reply was to the effect that he "was merely to lend his pen," but that he would now desist. It was this of which I informed the colonel, as I did of every thing which occurred in connection with the discipline of that portion of his regiment which was under my command. Such was my duty.

I have stated that the accusations were false. They were fully disproved in every particular, and the evidence sent to the Horse Guards. The officer commanding the troops at Singapore, through whose hands the correspondence passed, told me he was quite sure that the colonel of my regiment was right as to the source of the petition. Why it was written I do not seek to know; the Lord is judge.

Of one thing I am conscious: that I never did any wrong, either to the man whose name was put to it, or to the man who wrote it. As regards the soldier, I had treated him most kindly until he compelled me to do my duty. Had he listened to my repeated earnest entreaties to him to turn from his evil ways, he would never have got into prison. "The Lord reigneth." This is the answer to every perplexity in the path of a Christian. Not a sparrow falls to the ground without His knowledge. Nothing can happen to one of His children without His permission for their highest good.

---

[*] Christian Herald, p. 3.

SINAI AND SION.

A Sermon by Rev. W. Morley Punshon, LL.D.

"For ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched."—Heb. 12 : 18.

"But ye are come unto Mount Sion."—Heb. 12 : 22.

Sinai and Sion Represent the Old and New Dispensations—Points of Contrast—I. The Old Sensuous—The New Spiritual—The Sensuous Needs a Centre—The Spiritual System has a Temple—Its Purpose, Worship not Sacrifice—Catholicity of its Aim—Universal in its Application—A Contrite Heart Consecrates any Place—Sinai a System of Rudiments, and Introductory—II. Sinai Represents Rigor—Sion Represents Love—Privilege.

THE apostle here sets forth the dispensation of the Gospel—your dispensation and mine—as very much superior in certain important particulars to the dispensation of the law—mount Sinai, or the mount that might be touched, being put for the law that was given upon it; Mount Sion, literally the southern part of the city of Jerusalem, where David fixed the court and Solomon built the temple, being put for the newer revelation of God in the days of Jesus Christ. Some expositors understand that term Sion as having reference to heaven. But the apostle says, "Ye are come unto this state already." It is not a matter of promise, but of experience; not a future dimly apprehended, but a present actually and consciously realized.

There are several thoughts suggested by the passage that indicate the superiority of Sion over Sinai, and which will impress you, if you will only think of them, that your facilities are greater, and your responsibility by consequence greater, than that of any in former times to whom the messengers of God have come. The two great are that I. Sinai was the emblem of a sensuous, and Sion of a spiritual economy; and, II. that Sinai was a system of rigor, and the Gospel is a system of love.

POINTS OF CONTRAST

I. Sinai is represented as the mount that might be touched, that is, something palpable, the emblem of a material framework, or a system of gorgeous ceremonies and local shrines, and of impressiveness of external appearance.

I need not tell you that this was very largely characteristic of the system of Judaism. The giving of the law, for example, was an overwhelming address to the senses of the awed multitude. The eye was arrested by darkness that defied the gaze, by the lightning and the tempest which played about the summit of Sinai; the ear was thrilled by the trumpet blast, and was appalled by the thunder. Such was the majesty of the voice which spoke that the listeners crouched beneath its tones, and entreated almost with tears that it might not speak to them again. All the ritual services of the temple, the furniture, every ceremony and every sacrifice of the dispensation, were surrounded with accessories all intended to impress the senses either with sublimity or with terror.

Of course there was an inner life in all this—at least in the palmy days of Judaism—a vital heart pulsating beneath that drapery of symbol. But in the time of the Saviour—the incarnation—the religion of too many had become only a rubric and a creed; the shadow was still grasped tenaciously, but the substance was gone. And this very sensuousness of the Jewish economy necessitated, so to speak, the appointment of sacred places, and a central temple of worship. Hence all those journeys to Jerusalem in times of special festival which were binding upon the masses of the people.

Jerusalem was the centre of the system from which all its light was understood to radiate, and to which the best affections of its people converged as to their chiefest joy. Hence, when the swarthy chamberlain of the African queen heard in the defiles of his native wilderness of the God of the Hebrews, he must go up to Jerusalem for to worship. Hence, in after years of exile, long enough to have trampled out the last spark of nationality, the Israelite turned to this his home as the fire-worshipper to the sun, and Daniel kneeled down three times a day with his lattice open towards Jerusalem. That was, so to speak, the depository of the dispensation's power.

There might be many synagogues; there was only one temple. Hence the oracle of Divine wisdom spoke. From this fountain the streams of healing flowed, and all Judea was fertilized and blessed. Here, and here only, the atonement could be offered and the sin forgiven; and there was not a patriot in the tribes, as before his solemn fancy rose up the loved image of Sion, but would invoke upon himself the imprecation,—"If I forget thee, O Jerusalem, let my right hand forget its cunning; may my tongue cleave to the roof of my mouth if I prefer not Jerusalem above my chief joy."

But now, in contrast with this pomp of ceremonial and localization of interest, ye are come filled with the inner man, and with lively human stones building up a spiritual house. God on Sinai gave to the Hebrews a law; God on Sion hath given to His people a life, and now that the age of visible symbol has passed away, the Lord speaks no longer from the lips of seers, or from any chosen or exclusive lawgiver. We are not restrained from impiety by any palpable excitements. The Shechinah has departed from its accustomed habitation in the temple, and there is no process of wholesale and central lustration by which a congregation can be simultaneously forgiven.

TO THE SPIRITUAL SION,

We have got a temple yet, but it is for worship, not for sacrifice. We have the ministry of reconciliation yet, but it is not a priesthood by any means in the midst of us; it is just a body of the men who are the messengers in the churches, and the glory of it. We have the sacraments, the godly sacraments which the Saviour ordained in His church, but they are commemorative, not regenerating; not powers to constrain or to meeten for a covenant, but seals of a covenant that has been already made. Religion, as the Gospel sets it before you and asks you to receive it, comes, so to speak, in the bareness of the Saviour's incarnation.

No pomps attend it, no patronage commends it to our regard; its glory is not of this world; it stands alone upon the banks of our modern Jordan, unattended by any retinue of circumstance—a living, holy, independent stranger. Without form or comeliness to the beauty-seeking eye of nature, it is loved and it must be loved, for itself alone. It has no preferments in its gift, save those that are beyond the grasp of human hands. It calls men to no reluctant duty, and it offers to mortal weakness no compromise; it only offers the succor of a grace that will stoop down from heaven to help it up.

Now, my brethren, what do you think of such a religion? It goes straight into the inner man, and as it finds there not merely fancies vagrant and prodigal motives blemished and alloyed, but idols lurking in the secret places of the heart, revelry with some unclean rites, with some cherished Astaroth or Baal, it says, "I must have these things cleansed. Drive out those money-changers of spiritual usury; I want this temple to be holy, completely holy unto God."

Look at that religion as, perhaps for the first time in his life, it introduces a man to himself, strips him of the flimsy disguise with which he would veil his own deformity, compels him to introspection, turns him off from the excuses of his neighbor's complicity, or from complicity in his neighbor's error; and sets him searching, hunting, so to speak, after the discovery of his own vileness, not, as in former times, trying to hide it from his coward eye. Look at him as it opens up to him a vista of still increasing purity, all perfect with a glory that streams upon him from the hill of sacrifice—as it urges him from one spiritual mastery to another, until, brave wrestler as he is, he has thrown the world, and humbled the flesh, and spoiled all the goods of the devil!

THE ELEMENT OF COMMONNESS.

I. And then this religion, thus spiritual in its aim, must surely have that element of commonness which will adapt it to us. The Gospel river of life does not branch out into divers streams. There is not there a broad sweep of water for the rich, and for the intellectual, and for the cultivated, and here a little scant runnel, where the poor may now and then come and get healed by the side of its precarious wave. There is no costly sanatorium beneath whose shade patrician leprosy may get by itself to be fashionably sprinkled and healed. Naaman, with all his retinue watching, must come and dip and plunge like common men in Jordan.

There is no sort of salvation, except the one ransom and deliverance that is purchased for rich and poor together by the influences of the Lord Jesus Christ; and the poor beggar—his garment ragged from the havoc of a hundred storms, and his flesh bleeding from the ulcers of a hundred wounds—may dip eagerly into the same Bethesda, and emerge unscarred, and comely as a child. Oh! there is a hopefulness—a keen, loving, winsome insight, so to speak—in this religion of Jesus, which constrains it to furnish the very amplest and most bountiful provision. It comes to you, therefore, to every one of you, and it says, "God is a spirit and you are a spirit; you are therefore in God's likeness, and you are therefore capable of God's service."

And then the same spirituality necessitates that the Gospel shall be Catholic; that there shall be no shrine more sacred than another: that the old feud between the Jews and the Samaritans shall be altogether discarded as a meaningless thing. Who would think of vaunting his own small synagogue when he stands beneath the grand arches of the universal temple? So there is allied with this commonness—it is necessitated that there should be—a universality too. The Jewish economy was a noble law for a people; but if you look for the people now you cannot find them, therefore the law is obsolete. The people are scattered everywhere; there are no elements of a nation at this moment in the holy city.

True, there are those that take pleasure in the stones of Jerusalem, and that favor the dust thereof; and there is a grand future for the Hebrews yet, when they shall look on Him whom they have pierced, and hear Him proclaim for them an Easter and a jubilee; but at present for the masses of mankind there is no binding law in Judaism, nor any pulse or vigorous life. It would be a bitter day, don't you think, for the world's poor pilgrims if they had to go to Jerusalem to worship, like that Ethiopian eunuch of old? It would be a bitter day if they had to prostrate themselves before the shrine of the prophet in Mecca, or if they had to visit any other

EXCLUSIVE PLACE OF SACREDNESS.

Why, with our diversities of language, and national peculiarities, and jealousies of government, that mar the freedom of intercourse, half the world would have to live in the neglect of religious ordinances forever, and the other half might die unpardoned on the journey before they could reach any of those places of healing and of life. How glorious then the revelation, at once the rebuke of the intolerant and the charter of the needy—God is a spirit, and wherever two or three are gathered in His name there He is! How utterly does this unalterable promise silence the dogmas of all rabid ecclesiasticisms, and fill the souls of the true worshippers with a very flood of joy!

All that is seemly and decorous in external worship is preserved and left, "but the hour cometh, and now is," when the Father "seeketh" in every clime His true and spiritual worshippers. Oh, the beauty of that phrase! It is not the worshipper seeking the Father, it is the Father seeking the worshipper—looking down from heaven to find where the really contrite ones are that in sincerity and truth adore. "The Father seeketh such to worship Him."

Oh! do not think for a moment that by frequenting places that have an odor of peculiar sanctity you can alone acceptably worship God. Have you got a contrite heart? Then that can consecrate the meanest place on earth. It does not matter where the congregation may gather; only let them be a congregation of faithful men, yearning for truth, ready to make any sacrifice to obtain it, and that God, who is everywhere present, will reveal Himself in blessings wherever they may choose to assemble.

They may crowd into the solemn minster, and while the organ peals out its alternate wail and psalm to them it may be a spiritual service, and their hearts may glow in purer light than streams through painted windows. They may draw around the hearth of the farmer's homestead; and, while the frost-king reigns outside, their spirits may burn with a warmth that may defy the keenness of the sternest winter. For them there may be a spiritual harvest more plentiful than the garnered store in the barn that has been lent for worship; or a season of refreshing beneath the thatch through which the penitent soul can filter up its sighs for heaven.

On the gallant vessel's deck, with no witnesses of the service but the sky and sea, there may be the sound of many waters as the Lord of Hosts comes down. And in the Alpine solitudes, where the spirit, alone with God mid murmuring streams and bowing pines and summits of eternal snow, uplifts its adoration, there may be a whisper stiller and sweeter and more comforting than that of nature, saying, "Peace, peace be unto you." Oh! it is a beautiful thought that in this, the last of the dispensations, the contrite heart can hallow its own temple!

Wherever the emigrant wanders—wherever the exile pines—in the dreariest Sahara, rarely tracked save by the Bedouin on his camel—on the banks of rivers yet unknown to song—in the dense woodlands where no axe has yet struck against the trees—in the dark ruin—in the foul cell—in the narrow street—on the swift rail—there where business tramps and rattles—there where sickness gasps and pines—anywhere, anywhere in this wide, wide world, if there is a soul that wants to worship, there can be a hallowed altar and a present God.

"Ye are not come to Sinai, but to Sion,"

THE SPIRITUAL TEMPLE, where God is ever ready to bless His people with the fulness of His life and of His grace. Brethren, think of that. These are your privileges; how have you improved them? Oh! if those of meaner opportunities and of scantier means are punished at last because they come short, surely the many stripes and the wrath even to the uttermost must be reserved for the unfaithful ones who have inherited the privileges, and not come to Sinai, but to Sion.

I can hardly dwell upon the other thought, but if you could think of it, it will enhance the estimate of your own superior position.

(The remainder of this Sermon will appear in our next issue.)

The Gifts to Missionary Societies Last Year will make 1879 a memorable one in their records. The Presbyterian, Episcopal, Baptist, Wesleyan, and Congregational missions received from twelve persons within the year the aggregate sum of $3,000,000.

A WEIGHT OF WEALTH.

(Continued from page 14.)

The New Vicar.

ERNEST in his new position as Squire Clifford was looked up to as a man of mark. If he was absent from the magistrates' meetings all parties regretted it; and especially the accused, if they happened to be less culpable than they appeared.

His business faculties, which had not found scope as a clergyman, were developed in the successful management of his estate, and the little village belonging to him. It was a singularly prosperous life he led. He was a born master, with a quick eye to detect bad service or good, and a firm, quick will to exact from each person his or her best work.

His lands were farmed to perfection; and his tenants stirred up to vie with him in the careful cultivation of their ground. His village was clean and orderly, with savings-banks and reading-rooms for his people. The church, under his friend William Britton, was as well controlled as his estate. He had his intimate friend living within a stone's throw of his own home, and the woman whom he loved with unswerving constancy and devotion within an hour's walk of him.

His little Rose was blooming into a pretty, sweet-tempered, charming girl. Yet there were times when Ernest's sky was clouded, he hardly knew why. There was a slumbering, subtle sense of insecurity underlying all his sunny days. But even this passed away, as year after year went by, bringing no news of his disinherited brother.

William Britton, the friend to whom Ernest had given the living of Clifford, was devotedly faithful in all the duties and offices of his profession. He set them far above every other obligation, and his whole heart was bent upon their fulfilment. There was a good share of asceticism in his temperament; and worldly affairs of any kind had little interest for him. He literally took no thought for his life, what he should eat, or what he should drink, or what clothing he should put on.

He might be seen every day of the year, fine or stormy, marching with slow long strides about his parish to the most distant outlying homesteads, dressed in a shabby, white-seamed old coat, which had come very gradually down from the dignity of Sunday wear, to the last stage of brownness that it was possible for a gentleman's coat to exhibit. His tall, spare figure, and gentle, absorbed face were familiar to every one of his parishioners, down to the youngest child that could totter about the fields and lanes, or patter into the tide on the beach.

He knew nothing, and could learn nothing, about farming and fishing; and his parish felt that he was all the more a parson for that. Both farmers and fishermen felt a mutual contempt each for the other's opinion in the calling he had not been born to; and a parson who meddled with neither, but stuck close to his books and his church, was worthy of their deepest respect.

When Mr. Britton stopped to speak to them at their work, with his thin, worn features, and his absent gaze, which seemed always straining to catch a glimpse of something far beyond the poor objects of their interest, they felt themselves in the presence of a spiritual pastor and master indeed, as they had never done with Master Ernest; for so they continued to call their landlord and magistrate.

Though Mr. Britton took no thought for his life, it was essential that some one should take thought for him, and for the food and clothing of the household. The vicarage was full of children, till the small rooms which had appeared so inconvenient and comfortless to Ernest seemed always overflowing with them. There was not much order or neatness in the house, and it would have been a work of difficulty to maintain either; but Mr. Britton was too contemplative and rapt in thought to take much notice of the general discomfort and confusion. His study was in the attics, out of the noise and disturbance; and there he spent most of his time when he was not about his parish business. Mrs. Britton was a meek-looking little woman, with a soft step, and quiet muffled voice, apt to fall into a whisper. She was not a stirring, energetic, bustling person; though the female population of Clifford were in the habit of saying under their breath that she was a deep one.

It was always with a reluctant step that any farmer's or fisher's wife carried her goods to the vicarage, where she was certain to come away beaten in her efforts to make a bargain. The offertory money passed through Mrs. Britton's hands; and though there was very little real poverty or need in the parish, there were low murmurs current among the old folks, whose claims upon it had been more liberally met in Ernest's time.

She had been known to give twopence to the mother of a family, plunged into sudden distress by the illness of her husband, with the encouraging remark, "There! that will float you again!" The words had rung into a proverb among the Clifford folk. "We've a rare good parson," they said among themselves, "but parson's wife—she's no better than she should be." (See 1 John 3 : 17.)

There was one cottage in Clifford which was always an eyesore to Ernest, and a plague of heart to Mr. Britton. It was the last in the long, straggling village street, farthest away from the beach, and nearest to the coppices of dwarfed trees and tangled brushwood, where Charles Clifford, in his boyhood, had learned how to snare his father's game and poach on his preserves.

The thick stone walls of this cottage, and the thatched roof, covered with ivy and house-leek, were picturesque enough; but Ernest's eye was offended by the dirt and squalor of the unkept garden, and of the rooms within, which, however, he rarely entered. The old woman living in it, Martha Rush, and her daughter Julia, were the last of the bad lot who had helped to ruin Charles.

Clifford was too small a place to be a desirable dwelling for men decidedly set against the tide; and after old Charles Clifford's death, the little gang of poachers and petty larceny delinquents had melted away before the general improvement and prosperity which followed Ernest's succession to the estate. Old Martha Rush, who had been goose-girl at the Grange, and had her cottage almost rent free, was too old to flit away with her gang of sons and grandsons; and her youngest daughter Julia was usually at home with her.

But though Ernest rarely set his foot in the cottage, Mr. Britton visited it as regularly as any other house in his parish. He had never succeeded in winning this old woman to church, though Julia, who was ambitious, had consented to sing in the gallery with the children of the Sunday-school, if Miss Jenny Britton would sing there too. Old Martha Rush went, she said, to meeting in the light-house, where a service was held on Sunday night, at an hour when the parish church was closed.

"I like the ways on it best," said the blear-eyed, bent old woman; "it's more home-like. It does na' matter what clothes I go in; and I hanna' got no church clothes, like Christians. I dun very well at the old light-house. He's my brother-in-law; and there's a chimbley-corner as I can sit in just the same as my own fireside. Church religion's too grand for such as me."

"My good woman, religion is the same everywhere, in church or chapel," said Mr. Britton, in a firm yet mild tone. He had said the same words over hundreds of times, and would say them hundreds of times more to old Martha Rush's dull ears. "Religion is to believe in God, and to love Him. You can do that here, in your own house, in the poorest rags, as truly as the richest personage in the grandest church in the world. Going to church or chapel is not religion; it is only part of the outward form of it."

"Ay! ay! I canna' understand," muttered old Martha sullenly, "if it isna religion to go to church, folks is in a bad way. I go to th' old light-house, because I've got no church-going clothes; but I war married in church, and I'll be buried in church, and if that isna religion enough for an old creature like me, God Almighty's very hard to please, and there's more folks like me in a bad way."

"Martha," said Mr. Britton earnestly, "let me tell you once more that God is not hard to please. (Ezek. 33 : 11.) Nay. He loves you, and only seeks your love. He is looking out for you, and is ready to welcome you; like the father in the parable I read to you so often. You recollect? The younger son had gone away into a far country, and had wasted all he had in riotous living; and he was coming home again, ragged, and hungry, and penniless. 'But when he was yet a great way off, his father saw him, and had compassion on him, and ran, and fell on his neck, and kissed him.' That is only a poor image of what God feels for you and me."

"Ay! but it doesn't seem real like," answered the old woman. "I always think of Master Charlie when you talk like that. Th' old master didn't forgive him like the man in the book. Leastways he cut him off from every thing. Laws! it's easier to tell a tale like that than to love folks and forgive folks.

"God Almighty's cut me off from every thing, even church-going clothes; and I canna believe as He's willing to give me the best robe, and a ring for my finger, and new shoes for my feet. Nay! I'll be bound to be buried in your church, and if that inna enough, why, I must take my luck with the other folk."

"You leave mother alone, sir," said Julia; "she's in a bad way to-day, she is. But it's true what she said. It was a hard thing of th' old master to cut off his only son. It's ten years since he died, and nigh upon fifteen since Master Charlie ran away. He was a brave, bold young gentleman as ever trod."

"Ay! that he was," muttered her mother.

"I never saw him," answered Mr. Britton, who always felt a yearning of compassion toward the erring and disinherited son; "but there is no hope now that he will ever come back."

"How long was the younger son away in the parable?" inquired Julia with eagerness.

"There is nothing in the parable to indicate the time of his absence," he replied; "he did not come back till he had spent all, and was ready to perish with hunger."

"He came home because he'd nothing to eat," said Julia, with a hard smile on her face; "it wasn't for love of his father or of his mother that bore him. Master Charlie's sure to come back some day, when he's got no more money to spend, and is tired of earnin' any. He'll come home yet; and what will he feel when, instead of his father a lookin' out for him, and a runnin' to meet him he finds another man's son set up in his stead as master of Clifford. Do you think he'll believe in God Almighty's love, sir?"

"If Charles Clifford is still living," replied Mr. Britton, "he cannot expect to find his father alive yet. He knew how old he was, and how little chance there could be of ever seeing his face again; and he trampled on his father's love, and counted it worthless. It is what you are doing with the love of God."

"I think I've got as much religion as the quality," said Julia, with a slightly anxious expression on her face; "Miss Rose isn't more regular than me at church. I shouldn't like to have less than the quality."

But fortunately for Julia, Mr. Britton had not heard what she said, for her mother had spoken to him at the same moment, and he was listening to her querulous tones. His visit was soon brought to an end, and he left the cottage somewhat more faint-hearted than usual at his failure in making any impression on the dull and obstinate mind of the old woman, whose life was drawing so nearly to its close.

Julia Rush was regarded as a link between the old times and the new in Clifford. She had not had her full share of the excitement and variety of the former days, when poaching and smuggling and petty thefts had filled the cottage with a rude abundance of forbidden luxuries, besides bringing a succession of stirring and hair-breadth escapes from detection; old times which formed the constant theme of her mother's lamentations.

Nor had she been able to share fully in the new reign of quiet prosperity and comfort which had set in upon the little sea-side village. She was a girl of sixteen when Charles Clifford disappeared, and probably no one had mourned him more deeply, or continued to cherish the hope of his return more faithfully. She had helped her mother in the care of the poultry belonging to the Grange, and so had frequent opportunities of seeing Charles, who had never failed in giving the rosy black-eyed girl a word or smile as he passed her at her work.

he had often watched and waited for hours, and placed herself in his way to catch either the smile or the word. The young heir was three years older than herself, and was almost an object of worship to her. And after he was gone she could not bring herself to look with any favour on the rough young fishermen who tried their rude fashion of courtship with her. For Ida, Charles Clifford was still alive, and certain to come home sooner or later. Probably she was the only person in Clifford who really believed him to be alive, or wished for his return.

Immediately below the cliff on which Clifford Grange was built a tongue of rugged crags stretched out abruptly into the sea, rising at the end into a precipitous platform about a hundred feet from the water. On this platform stood the light-house which old Martha Rush preferred as a place of worship to the church in which Mr. Britton officiated.

narrow path ran along the lower edge of the ridge, which was never quite under water, though in stormy weather the surf and foam broke over it in such a manner as to make the light-house keeper's task far from pleasant. But since Ernest came into his kingdom he had made the path secure and safe by strong walls built on each side, founded so firmly on the living rock that old Elijah Dunnit had been able to set up his Sunday-evening meetings without fear of being left without a congregation.

The lantern hill, with its old chapel converted into a light-house, had always been a favorite haunt of the Clifford fishermen. But as for the women, it was only on the fairest and mildest of summer evenings that they were to be found among Elijah's hearers; Martha Rush made her appearance there not more than once or twice in the year.

When Mr. Britton left his incorrigible parishioner, Martha Rush, he turned his steps toward the light-house. It was a fair, sunny day late in February the gorse bushes were ready to burst into golden bloom, and the buds on every bush and tree were beginning to thicken and glisten in the warm sunlight. The vicar passed along with a vague mournfulness of spirit, altogether at variance with the joyousness of the coming spring.

He was not sure to find Elijah Dunnit at his post; but the lantern hill was a favorite spot of his own; for beneath the old gray building was a stone bench, where he and Ernest had spent many an hour in friendly communion. He paced along slowly with long, deliberate strides across the ridge, meditating; and it was only when he turned the point of the road, and saw old Dunnit mending nets on his favorite seat, that his mind was aroused again.

Elijah Dunnit was not as old as many of the men in Clifford, but he had been called old so long that it had become part of his proper name. He was a tall, athletic man, between sixty and seventy years of age, with a brown, honest, weather-beaten face, hair bleached white as snow and blue eyes, still keen and sharp enough to discern objects far out at sea without his telescope.

(To be continued.)

JESUS BAPTIZED BY JOHN.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 18. Matt. 3. Golden Text, ver. 17. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

It is written of the Lord Jesus (Heb. 2 : 17), "In all things it behoved Him to be made like unto His brethren." And consequently we find Him under the obligations of old and new covenants, which were entered into in the first instance by circumcision and baptism. "Jesus Christ was a minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made unto the fathers" (Rom. 15 : 8); and by being also baptized He joined together the two dispensations in Himself, in His own person. It would seem that the obligation in the covenant of circumcision, besides the mere outward rite, is included in God's words to Abraham (Gen. 17 : 1): "I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect." And again Paul says (Gal. 5 : 3): "I testify again to every man that is circumcised, that he is a debtor to do the whole law."

Christ alone, out of all who were circumcised, fully kept the law. He spoke of other men (John 7 : 19), and said, "Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you keepeth the law?" But He is "the end of the law for righteousness to every one that believeth" (Rom. 10 : 4); for He could say, when speaking of His Father, "I do always those things that please Him" (John 8 : 29); and thus His circumcision was "of the heart, in the spirit, and not in the letter, whose praise is not of men, but of God." There is such intense love and sympathy as well as power and holiness in His thus coming down personally into all the circumstances and obligations of man, bringing Himself down to our level, that in His wondrous grace He might raise us up to His, becoming human that He might make us divine.

Just as He was a "minister (or willing servant, not slave, or obligatory servant) of the circumcision for the truth of God," so in like manner was He baptized to fulfil all righteousness; all was done, endured, entered into, for God and for souls; self was as foreign to Him as love is to the enemy. Baptism both teaches us and pledges us to live a new life—a life such as we have not lived, and could not live in ourselves. We are planted by it into the likeness of Christ's death (Rom. 6 : 5). But that which is planted must first be alive, and it is living souls who are buried with Christ in baptism—i.e., their old self life is pledged to destruction, buried, that another life, the life of Christ, may supersede and reign in its place.

For thirty years the Lord Jesus remained in obscurity (Luke 3 : 23), and "then cometh Jesus from Galilee to Jordan unto John, to be baptized of him." There is something touching in this journey of the Son of God. No doubt He came on foot; He did not send for John, but came to him as one amongst the many who were seeking John's baptism. There seems to have been a close dealing with souls there by the river side: the people were baptized in Jordan, "confessing their sins" (ver. 6). It was like a large inquiry meeting; John's teaching was like the axe "laid to the root of the trees," and the people could not be silent; earnest, intense longing for their own salvation took possession of them, and they said, "What shall we do then?" As one among these penitents stood the spotless Son of God.

John was full of the Holy Ghost, and "the things of God knoweth no man, but the Spirit of God" (1 Cor. 2 : 11.) The same truth which had been told to the Virgin Mary, "that holy thing which shall be born of thee shall be called the Son of God" (Luke 1 : 35), was now revealed to John by the very presence of the Lord. "I knew Him not," he testified; "but He that sent me to baptize with water, the same said unto me, "Upon whom thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and remaining upon Him, the same is He which baptizeth with the Holy Ghost." "I knew Him not;" and yet there was a spiritual consciousness of an unusual presence in that Galilean peasant. So "John forbade Him, saying, I have need to be baptized of Thee, and comest Thou to me?" Even now John said, by his spirit, that which he afterwards put in words (John 3 : 30), He must increase, but I must decrease."

All this teaching had led up to the moment when Christ "should be manifest to Israel" (John 1 : 31), and he bore witness, "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance; but He that cometh after me is mightier than I, whose shoes I am not worthy to bear. He shall baptize you with the Holy Ghost and with fire" (ver. 11). And John, who came to prepare His way before Him, would give place instantly to his Lord. The marvellous popularity of John, and the intense religious excitement, such as has never since been paralleled, when "there went out unto him Jerusalem, and all Judea, and all the region round about Jordan," had done him no harm; a man filled with the Spirit of God has no room in him for self-exaltation, every part of his being is subdued by another victor, and serves the purpose for which it was created and redeemed.

"And Jesus, when He was baptized, went up straightway out of the water; and lo, the heavens were opened unto Him, and He saw the Spirit of God descending like a dove and lighting upon Him; and lo a voice from heaven, saying, This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." Jesus was baptized with the Holy Ghost as man, that He might baptize His church. And He was baptized for His mission in the world (Isa. 61 : 1; Luke 4 : 18). He was a buried man, out of sight, and He lived in His Father's will, His life was hidden in God, as ours is hidden with Him in God. The power by which the divine in Him ever supplanted and kept under the human, was the same Holy Ghost who makes us His temple, for He voluntarily emptied Himself (Phil. 2 : 7, Gr.,) that He might fill those of us who empty ourselves.

But He had the witness that He pleased God not only for His own sake as man, but for the sake of the faithful John: "This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased." To please God, this is life, breath, to those who live not their own life. All power, all interest ceases, and we lose heart when we are not sure that we please God. "In Him," says our heavenly Father, "I am well pleased." Our house is in Him if we lead the life of those who are "buried with Him by baptism unto death, that like as Christ was raised from the dead by the glory of the Father, even so we also should walk in newness of life" (Rom. 6 : 4).

From the moment the full light dawned upon John that this was He for whom He had so long been looking, his preaching underwent a change. Beforehand the stern man of the desert had only seen man's sin in the awful light of God's power and holiness: 'Repent ye, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand;" now a glorious light broke upon Him—he saw the old sacrifices personified in the person of God's Son, and saith, "Behold the Lamb of God, who beareth away the sin of the world" (John 1 : 29); he understood now how the Lord laid on Him the iniquity of us all; it was not now always in the tone of reproof and condemnation that he preached—he could speak of the remedy as well as of the evil.

In our teaching with servants, children, classes, etc., are we teaching the old John the Baptist truth, the baptism of repentance, or are we full of the blessed truth, the good tidings of the Lamb of God? A conscience which is aroused to a sense of sin without being led at once to Him who is the sin-bearer, becomes generally hardened or unreal. A man who is in earnest must get relief; if it does not come from the taking away of sin, he will begin to palliate his sins, and excuse them, and take comfort that others are worse than he—only in the light of Christ's death can sin find no refuge; no secret lurking-place, no escape is there. Let us be careful how we deal with souls; tremendous issues are at stake, on which an eternity depends.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Re-occupation of Cabul, the Capital of Afghanistan, by the British forces, has relieved the anxiety felt in England as to the fate of General Roberts and his small command; but the events of the past few weeks have convinced the government that if Afghanistan is to be held, even temporarily, it is absolutely necessary to send reinforcements for the purpose, the small body of troops hitherto employed being clearly insufficient to keep the treacherous and warlike Afghans in check. Accordingly, reinforcements left England for India January 1st, and 10,000 men have been sent through the defiles toward Cabul by the Viceroy of India. The Hindoos in the city report that while General Roberts was at Sharpur a reign of terror existed until the place was abandoned by the rebels. Every shop and house was gutted, except those belonging to the Mohammedans. Women were stripped publicly, and men were shot in the streets. It is believed that Russia has had a hand in stirring up the disturbances which led to General Roberts evacuating Cabul, for the brother of the late Ameer, when he fled from Cabul on the return of the British, asked for and received shelter from the Russian commander at Tashkend; and a cup was found in the city bearing the inscription: "Presented to Nek Mahomet for valuable services to the Russian Government in 1879."

Another Attemot to Assassinate the King of Spain was made December 30th. As King Alfonso and his young queen were driving through the gate of the royal palace a young man, dressed as a workman, fired two shots from a revolver at the royal carriage; but his aim was bad, and nobody was hurt. One of the balls passed close to the queen's face, and another nearly hit one of the royal footmen, but providentially no one was hurt. King Alfonso was driving at the time. The would-be assassin was immediately arrested, and he has confessed his crime. His name is Gonzales, and his age nineteen years. He is a waiter by occupation, and a native of Galicia. It is little more than a year since the last unsuccessful attempt to assassinate the young king.

A Warning to English Christians has been sent by the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon from Mentone. The London correspondent of the N. Y. Tribune sends the following cable message: "The Rev. Charles H. Spurgeon writes from Mentone that the nation should listen to Mr. Gladstone as a call to make righteousness and peace their guide instead of blustering; he declares that England is wantonly trampling Afghanistan under foot, and warns Englishmen that under such tutors as the Times they are becoming a nation of demons. The whole letter is an impassioned appeal to the Christian sentiment of the country." It is clear Mr. Spurgeon feels strongly on this question, and believes that England's present policy is an unrighteous one, for as a rule he does not interfere in political matters. On the other hand, many Christian men, who take all the circumstances into consideration, support the Government of Lord Beaconsfield, and believe that the interests of England and of the world are advanced by his policy.

A Parisian Lady's Winter Toilet is described in one of the leading journals of that city of pleasure. The directions are under sixteen heads, and they constitute the author's idea of the whole duty of woman toward her own person. "An hour before you get up," he says, "your maid will light your fire and then screen it with a silver framework, lined with rose silk, which will temper the heat and give to the whole room a sort of rosy morning light that warms while it illumines. Then she will bring you on a silver plate-warmer your cup of chocolate, hot and foaming, which you will drink. After you have taken your chocolate you will snooze again for a couple of hours. Then you will put on a déshabille of pink satin, lined with swan's-down, enveloping the whole body from head to foot. You may now pass into the bath-room, the atmosphere of which will be kept at an agreeable temperature by little gusts of rose-scented vapor, pumped through an aperture in the wall." A detailed account follows of articles of dress and adornment, and directions for the time of day at which each should be worn; and the author intimates that if his instructions are followed, the ideal of French womanhood will be attained.

It is lamentable that so many ladies obey such teachers, forgetting what is the only true and real adorning of themselves (1 Peter 3 : 3).

Dr. Henry H. Jessup has Arrived Safely at Beyrout, in Syria, after an absence of nineteen months spent in this country and in Great Britain. In a letter to the New York Observer, dated December 2d, Dr. Jessup says: "I have travelled not less than 30,000 miles, by sea and land, since leaving Beyrout, and to have accomplished it all without an accident and almost without a detention, and to return with so large a party, all in comfortable health, should certainly make us all grateful, cheerful, and willing workers in the great cause of our Lord and Master. From the day of our arrival until to-day—eight days—our house has been full of visitors, native and foreign, whose kind words of welcome have been like cold waters to the thirsty soul. On Sunday morning I found myself at home in the Beyrout pulpit again. The congregation numbered about 560, and it seemed like awaking from a dream to preach again in Arabic after so long an absence."

The Evangelical Alliance Deputation, which lately went to the Emperor of Austria at the palace, Buda Pesth, to represent to His Majesty the deprivation of religious liberty and severe persecutions which many Christians in Austria and Bohemia were suffering, has been graciously received by him. He has promised inquiry, and that justice shall be done if the facts as stated are substantiated. Notwithstanding the law in Austria guarantees full religious liberty, yet for the last nine months all public worship and meetings for religious exercises outside the State-accredited churches have been interdicted, and this has led to persecution. Earnest prayer should be offered on behalf of the persecuted.

A Revolution has Occurred in Peru, and President Prado has taken refuge in flight. General Nicolas de Pierola was proclaimed dictator on December 22d. The telegram announcing the fact states that "the army of reserve at Lima and Callao and the navy accept his government. He has promised to effect the salvation of Peru in the present crisis." A promise so made is little likely to be fulfilled. God alone "can effect the salvation" of that unhappy country, and we cannot hope that He will employ as His instrument a man who does not acknowledge his dependence on Divine aid.

The Experiment of Secularizing the Lord's Day, now being tried in so many American cities, has been in operation for some time in Zurich, Switzerland. The result has been that the shopkeepers, who, in their greed of gain, initiated the practice, find that their seven days' unremitting toil is a bondage not to be endured, and have petitioned the city council to declare all trade on Sunday illegal. This is another proof, if one had been needed, that the statutes of God are wise as well as right.

Royal Benevolence.—A Hamper of Game was forwarded before Christmas by the Prince of Wales for the patients of St. Bartholomew's Hospital, London, of which his Royal Highness is the president. Queen Victoria has presented 100 pounds of old linen to the Dreadnought Seamen's Hospital, Greenwich, for use in the wards. These acts of thoughtful kindness to the poor and sick indicate true nobility of character, and explain how it is royalty is popular in England.

Bishop Gregg, the Primate of the Reformed Episcopal Church in the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, otherwise called the Reformed Church of England, has published a charge to his clergy, in which he explains the main principle of his communion. He says: "We are one with the Church of England in all points in which the Church of England is one with the Word of God. We have the same 'orders,' obtained through Canterbury —the s ecclesiastical polity, the same sacraments, same evangelical forms. We have no 'pries save the Lord Jesus Christ, and all His spiri people; no altar, save Calvary; no atoning sa fice, save the Lamb of God; no regenerating tism, save that of the Holy Ghost; no 'real p ence,' save that of Christ in the heart."

Three Boys were Severely Whipped b
Roman Catholic priest recently, for ha acted as pall-bearers at the funeral of a P estant boy. The priest has been indicted assault and battery, and the case excited so bitter a feeling that the venue of the trial ha be changed three times to avoid disturba
The priest was found guilty, and the penalty posed will cost him about $328. We are c told that the spirit of persecution which graced the Roman Catholic Church in past t was due to the spirit of the age, and not t principles of the Church. But recent e have shown that that Church is of the same per in these days, and that its tyranny an tolerance extend into every department of s life, and that if it ever acquires its old power i use it as mercilessly as it did in the days o Spanish Inquisition. Indeed, the Church a day endorses everyhing that was ever done members in its name.

The Duchess of Marlborough, who is wife of the Viceroy of Ireland, has made a peal to the English public for contribution fund she has started for the relief of the tressed poor in Ireland. The amount sh ceived up to the end of last week was $
This fund will of course be used for the re absolute suffering, and is entirely distinct that raised for the mischievous purpose of Rule agitation by Mr. Parnell and his allie

What is the Inducement?—Mr. Bistan elder in the church at Beyrout, Syria, addr
Dr. H. H. Jessup from the pulpit on Su
November 28th, said:

"Dr. Jessup, what could have induced leave such a land as America, such churc those you have visited, such loving an lightened and refined Christian people congregations numbering thousands, whe might have preached and labored among and relatives and lived with your family in to a good old age—what could have i you to leave all these and come to s wretched, oppressed, and downtrodden c as Syria, where there is no real liberty, curity, or order, and preach to such a p
Sir, this to some of us is a mystery—a pr mystery. We can only understand it ground that you are not serving se Christ! God bless you, sir, in your labors
To the world the self-denial of the missio incomprehensible, but to the Christian t swer is quite sufficient, "The love of Chri straineth us." (2 Cor. 5 : 14.)

A Memorial to the late Princess of England, whose death, on Decembe 1878, plunged all England into mourni been decided upon. It will take the propriate form of an endowment for the tal and school for nurses in Darmstadt the princess herself founded, and in wh took a lively and practical interest.

The Presbyterians of the Whole Wo to hold their second Triennial Council i delphia, in September, 1880. Delegates the countries of Europe where Presbyte exists are to be present, prepared to m dresses, read papers prepared for the o and unite in conference how best to adva cause of religion. The first council was Edinburgh, in July, 1877, lasting ten day

Mrs. Gladstone, the wife of the ex-Pre Great Britain, is one of the most ch women in Europe, and is personally k many of the poor in London. Her k serene countenance charms at once.
spires respect in all, and more than o well-directed charity after the war made men forget that her husband's policy very favorable to them.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

P lished at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

his Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. T MAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. H AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

ingle Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, JANUARY 15, 1880. 14th Year. No. 3—New Series.

C NTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

P TRAIT AND LIFE OF MR.
ARK FIRTH, and Picture of Firth llege.
A lse Christ—A Soldier in a Cellar.
D AMS. A New Sermon by Dr.
lmage.
A OLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE: Thrilling Serial Story by the uthor of "Felicia Cuffe.'
T COMING OF ANTICHRIST, by chbishop Trench.
C RENT EVENTS: Reassembling
Congress—The Position in Maine Startling Disclosures in New rk—The Victim of a Mock Marge—Protests of Missionary Socies—A Judge Passing Sentence on mself—A Letter in a Glove—A pent in a Cider Cask—An Intrel Doctor—The Testimony of Four-ore Years—The Niblo Bequest, etc.
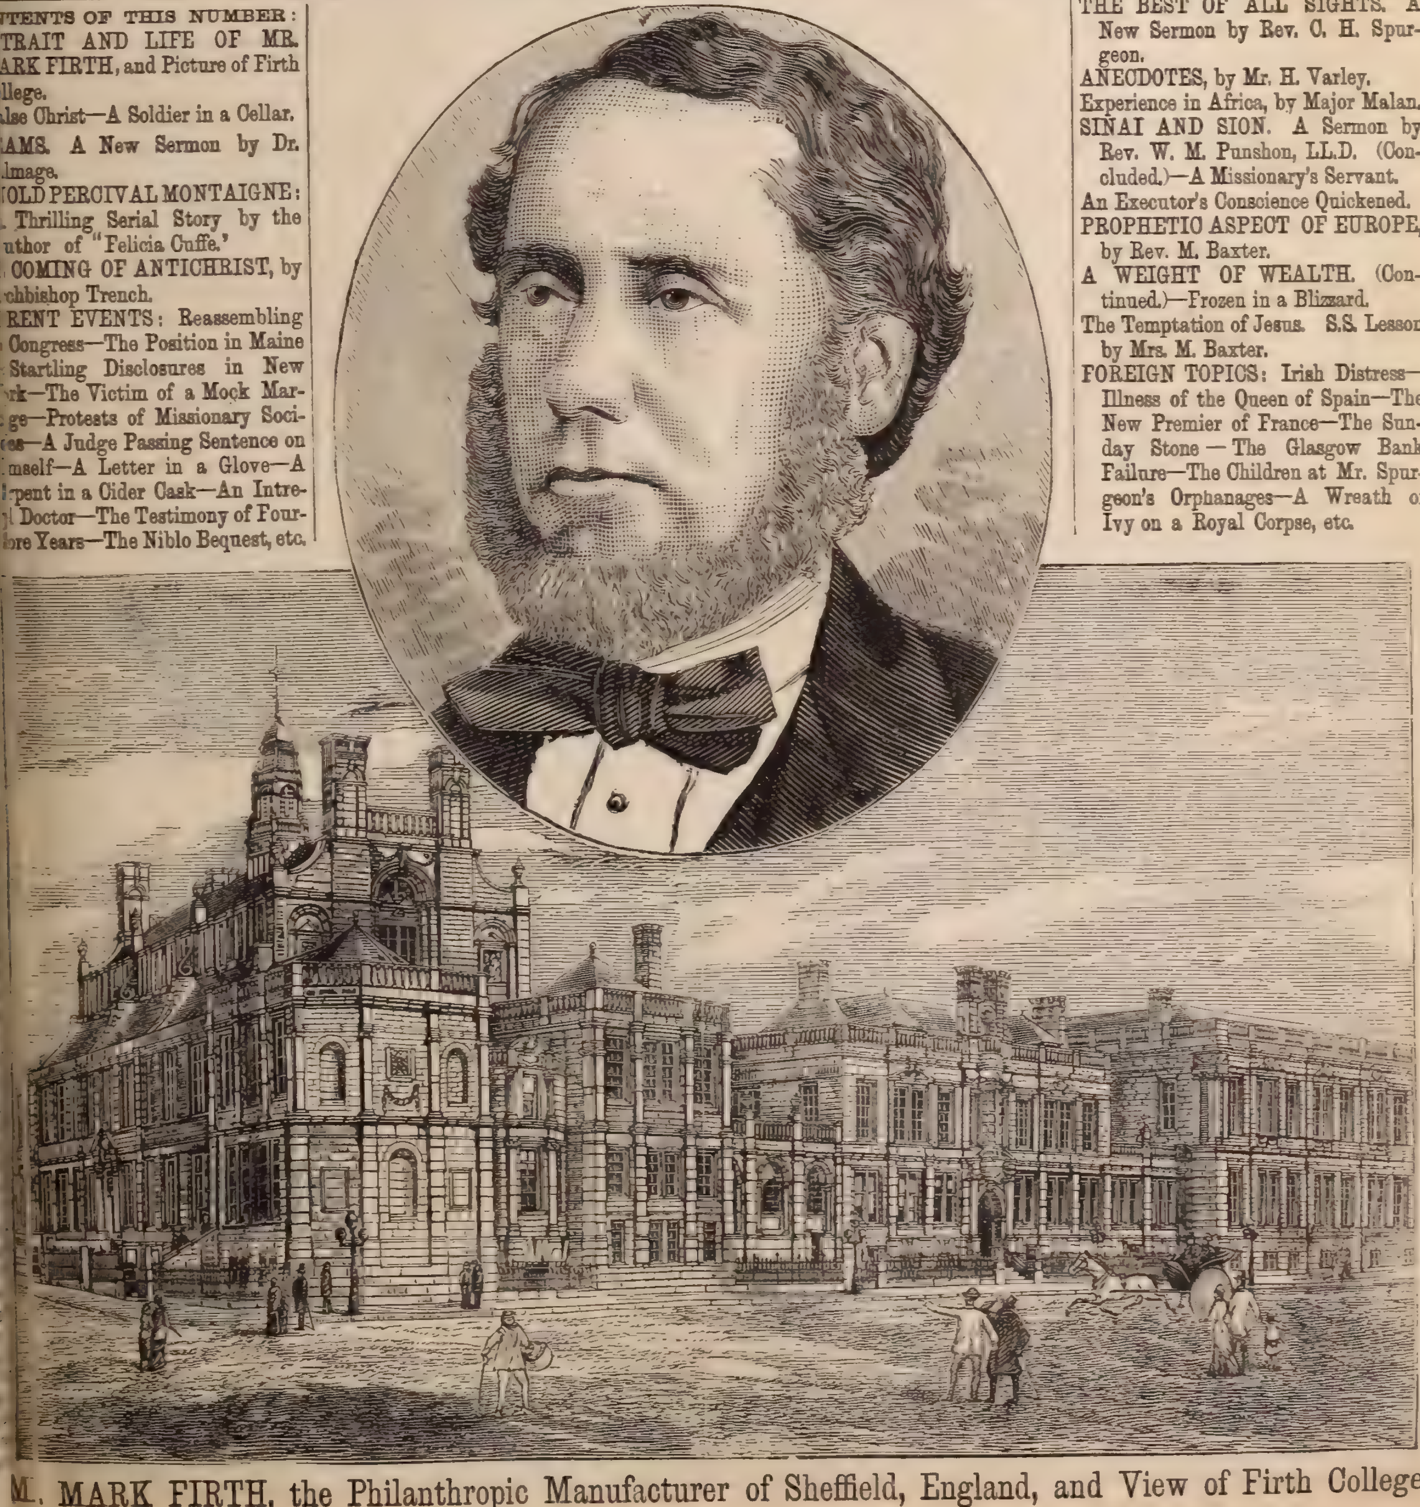
THE BEST OF ALL SIGHTS. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
ANECDOTES, by Mr. H. Varley.
Experience in Africa, by Major Malan.
SINAI AND SION. A Sermon by Rev. W. M. Punshon, LL.D. (Concluded.)—A Missionary's Servant.
An Executor's Conscience Quickened.
PROPHETIC ASPECT OF EUROPE, by Rev. M. Baxter.
A WEIGHT OF WEALTH. (Continued.)—Frozen in a Blizzard.
The Temptation of Jesus. S.S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
FOREIGN TOPICS: Irish Distress—Illness of the Queen of Spain—The New Premier of France—The Sunday Stone—The Glasgow Bank Failure—The Children at Mr. Spurgeon's Orphanages—A Wreath of Ivy on a Royal Corpse, etc.



M . MARK FIRTH, the Philanthropic Manufacturer of Sheffield, England, and View of Firth College

MR. MARK FIRTH.

His Birth and Family—Early Business Experience—Mrs. Firth—Their Home at Oakbrook—Its Six Trees—His Almshouses at Hanging Water—A Memorial Window to Miss Firth—His Gift of a Public Park—The Beginning of the Firth College—A Singular Fact in his Life—His Benevolence to the Methodist New Connexion—He Becomes Mayor of Sheffield—The Norfolk Works—Mr. Firth's Great Business Enterprise.

THE world's roll of worthies is filled with names whose owners come from every land, and whose triumphs have been won on all fields. Great generals have written their names there with the blood of their foes and their followers. Great statesmen have won a place there by the ability with which they have steered the nations they served, through the breakers of their time into havens of peace and prosperity. A few names like that of George Peabody have been placed there because they have been identified with generous gifts, devoted to the well-being of their fellows. A high place in the same category ought to be accorded to the name of Mark Firth, the English manufacturer whose munificence has done so much for his native town of Sheffield. We are not so selfish as to overlook a man's merits because the benefits accruing from his generosity are confined to another land. We can afford to admire and applaud one who has the ability and the disposition to do good to his fellows, by whatever name they may be known among men, and to rejoice that God has put it into the heart of any man to seek to elevate and to assist those who, less blessed, belong to the same great family of mankind. Our readers will, therefore, be glad to become acquainted with the work of this great man whose name is so famous in England.

Mark Firth is the son of Thomas and Mary Firth, and was born at Sheffield in 1818. His father died in 1848, but his mother is still living at the advanced age of eighty-three. At the death of his father the family consisted of five sons and two daughters.

Of the sons Mark was the eldest; the second was Thomas, who died in 1858; the third, John, who died at Malta in 1869; while the two other sons, Edward and Charles Henry, are still living, and, in partnership with their brother Mark, they constitute the world-known firm of "Thomas Firth & Sons." The whole family were educated at the school where many of the boys belonging to the middle classes of Sheffield were taught.

The father of Mr. Mark Firth was a steelmaker, employed originally at "Marshall's"—one of the oldest firms in the Sheffield steel trade. He was subsequently engaged at Messrs. Sanderson Brothers' where his remarkable skill in the manufacture of steel made his services peculiarly valuable. After some time, however, the father and the two sons, Mark and Thomas, left Messrs. Sanderson's and started business in Charlotte Street on their own account.

About that period Mark married Miss Bradley, a Nottingham lady, daughter of the late John Bradley, Esq., who was at the time Mayor of Nottingham. The family is one of the oldest and most universally esteemed in the town and district of Nottingham.

For several years Mr. Firth lived in the busy town of Sheffield, and about fifteen years ago he turned his attention to Ranmoor, an outlying suburb of Sheffield, of which he has been appropriately called

"THE PIONEER."

After Mr. Firth purchased the estate upon which he subsequently built Oakbrook—the title being suggested by the rivulet which flows through it—gas and water were extended to the locality. Other manufacturers, merchants, and professional men followed the lead of Mr. Firth, till now there is scarcely an eligible site upon which is not reared a fine residence standing in extensive grounds and enriched by the mingled works of nature and art.

Oakbrook and its grounds, where Mr. Firth entertained the Prince and Princess of Wales in 1875, and lately Prince Leopold, consist of 26½ acres beautifully laid out, and recently Mr. Firth acquired part of Endcliffe Wood, which now forms a fine fringe of fresh foliage on the south-east side of it. The grounds of this palatial residence are well laid out, and Mr. and Mrs. Firth have now six trees which have been planted by members of the royal family of England—two by the Prince of Wales, two by the Princess in 1875, and two by Prince Leopold. There is still another, which was planted by the Crown Prince of Sweden and Norway during his recent visit.

The first great work with which the name of Mr. Firth will ever be associated was the erection of the

ALMSHOUSES AT HANGING WATER,

Ranmoor, only a short distance from his own house. They cost about $150,000, and were opened in 1870, the first stone having been laid by the Earl of Shaftesbury on March 4th, 1869. The situation is exceedingly well chosen, being cosily sheltered in the valley, with the most picturesque surroundings. There are thirty-six houses, for the accommodation of forty-eight persons, less or more, as the occupants may be married or single. A house is provided for the chaplain and governor. Each house for the inmates has a living room and a bedroom, with larder and coal-cellar, and is supplied with gas and water. It was in reference to these that Prince Leopold remarked in his speech, "I saw him surrounded by the aged folk whose declining years are being soothed and made happy by his considerate forethought."

The inmates have the free occupancy of the houses, and receive, in addition, a weekly allowance amounting to $2.50 for a married couple and $2 for each single inmate. They are required to be natives of Sheffield, of good character, and to be members of some Protestant church or congregation. The Almshouses are under the management of gentlemen of the town, chosen as trustees, in whose name, and that of others who may be elected to succeed them, it is settled "in trust for the benefit of the poor of Sheffield forever."

In the chapel belonging to this institution is a memorial window in memory of Miss Margaret Maria Firth, daughter of Mr. Firth, who died at the age of sixteen on October 27th, 1869, a loss which was most keenly felt by her father. In this window, which is a choice work of art, is a very accurate likeness of the deceased young lady.

If the local journal from which we have gleaned the materials for this sketch is correct, a further but less public act of charity in this direction should be mentioned to Mr. Firth's honor. A number of persons who reside outside are supplied with a weekly allowance varying from sixty cents to $1.25. By this means it is intended to reach that class of poor people who would otherwise go into the workhouse. The Almshouses are really intended for those who have seen better days. Mr. Firth's sympathies, we understand, are specially with those who have failed to make their way in business, or who, from ordinary casualties, have declined in position. The above-mentioned addition to the Almshouse scheme promises to become a very important and useful feature of outdoor charity.

Then there came a time when this princely benefactor was balancing in his mind the relative claims to priority of action of the erection of an Orphanage, or the gift of to his native town. The Orphanage was his "first love," but the Public Park was first carried out. The matter once decided upon, Mr. Firth brought his great powers to bear upon it. One site was denied him, another was found unsuitable; but he was not to be daunted. A most eligible estate, called Page Hall, was advertised for sale in a local newspaper. Early the next morning he was seen riding round the outskirts of the estate, surveying it with an eye to his design. His estimate of it was most favorable.

A PUBLIC PARK

To the gratification of the inhabitants, who always join liberal things with the name of Mark Firth, Page Hall estate was knocked down him at the price of $145,000, and that very d it became known that he had made the purcha for the benefit of the people of Sheffield. Sin that time the Park has been considerably e larged. With these additions the land set apa for the use of the people is about thirty-six acr

Mr. Firth is not only benevolent in himse but the cause of well-directed benevolence others. As an example of this may be cited t case of Miss Marshall of Bridgehouses, who le it is said, a considerable sum of money to distributed in any charity or put to any chari ble purpose which the discretion and directi of Mr. Mark Firth might determine—a proof the confidence inspired by genuine firmness a character.

Mr. Firth has been a member of the Sheffi School Board from its formation, having b elected to the honorable position of vice-pr dent. He has been specially prominent in great work rising out of the awakened inter in education—

THE CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY SCHEME.

The success of the lectures and classes taught the gentlemen sent from Cambridge has justi Mr. Firth's anticipations. He therefore, early in the movement, sought information a what had been done in Nottingham, and timated that if these lectures and classes g further promise of succeeding in Sheffield would make special provision for the stud having a permanent "home." The result wa gratifying that Mr. Firth gave instructions f site to be secured. Various places were gested; ultimately the site upon which F College was subsequently erected in West St belonging to Messrs. Sanderson Brothers & Limited, was secured for about $40,000.

It is certainly a singular and remarkable that the spot chosen is that where Mr. Firth himself employed in his early days. It is that in the history of any man so extraord a change in fortune has to be recorded. stated Mr. Firth's intention is to spend $2 upon the College. It is also his wish scholarships should be established and endo The sum required to carry out the schen scholarships will be $50,000, and in all prol ity Mr. Firth will offer $5000, and challeng town to provide the balance. This, how will be subject to the condition that the su of the movement justifies the erection of manent establishment.

Mr. Mark Firth belongs to the New Conn Methodist body, of which he is a libera porter. In early life Mr. Firth was a at South Street congregation, Sheffield. told that in the discharge of this, as in duties, he showed great diligence, and wa effective and industrious. He was t member of the South Street congregation, he left, with his family, on the erect Broomhill Chapel, which is more conveni reaching from Oakbrook. He remains a m of the Broomhill Chapel, to the building which he gave $2500, and $5000 to the ment. He also contributed very liberally Methodist New Connexion College at Ra near Oakbrook, his princely mansion. his own body he has given more liberally Church of England than to other religio munities, but nearly all deserving interes enjoyed the fruits of the generous promp his nature. In support of every national tion, both local and general, he has frequent and liberal contributor. As a m has adopted "Deo non fortunâ,"* which i that he is a Christian from conviction, believer in what is called "chance."

SUNDAY-SCHOOL TEACHER

In 1864 Mr. Firth entered the Town of Sheffield, and for three years ad sanitary measures which he clearly fores necessary for the health of the town, bu his fellow-townsmen were not prepared t take. The consequence was he was def

---

* From God, not from fortune.

He's not dead, thank Heaven !" was the d tor's reply, "and we have at last brought him r nd a little. He'll know you, sir ; but it's a s ous case, though the skull is not fractured, a at first feared, and the greatest care will be n dful to insure his recovery. Don't go in, si until I prepare him a little for seeing you."

Shure, I knew he'd soon be here," said Jem- though somewhat faintly, when he was told P cival had come. "I expicted it ; and don't b feared, docther, it doesn't at all excite me. S re he cudn't stay away when he knew how a where I was. Go, God bless you ! and bring h in to me."

'ercival was greatly alarmed at his servant J my's condition. He was very pale from loss o blood and from the shock which he received t his whole system. Percival, however, con- c ed his feelings as much as possible, and with a nile approached him.

O Jemmy !" he said, as he stooped over h where he lay, "this is a sad affair. Don't s much, but tell me, my own dear fellow, in a w d how you are, and is there any thing you w I should do for you ?"

Well," said Jemmy faintly, "I don't feel at a comfortable, that's the thruth, masther. Me h d's all in a dhin ; and, masther dear, git me out o his soon, for enthroth I want to be away, far a can, from Bridget's Alley."

r. Moriarty's suggestion was that Jemmy s uld be removed to the nearest hospital, and P cival would have consented to this, but bear- i in mind Jemmy's desire, he asked would it n be possible to take him without risk to his o lodgings in Rathmines ; and being assured t t, with a proper mode of conveyance, that m ht be done, he made arrangements for so d ng.

(To be continued.)

THE COMING OF ANTICHRIST.

By Archbishop Trench.*

T e Great Crisis at Hand—The Coming Man—Needed Caution—What will the Issue be ?—he Antichrist of St. John and St. Paul—Anti "not Instead Of, but Against—The seudochrist—Antichrist's Apocalypse.

A TREMENDOUS crisis is at hand for the C rch of Christ, and is growing nearer and m re threatening. We are indeed wrapped a ady in the skirts of the coming storm. It is a ruggle in which every thing is at stake—one f n which the Church must come forth triumph- a , 'as an army with banners,' or not come f h at all ; perishing as the false religions of t world have done ; and itself by this doom be- t ying that it was one of these, in no essential d ering from the others.

When I speak of a crisis which the Church is p sing through, it will be plain to you that I am s aking not of this Church of ours in particular, b of that whole society which claims to rest on a pernatural basis ; to be the embodiment of a d ine idea and purpose ; to have God in the n lst of it.

The Man in whom will finally concentrate it- s all the hatred of the world against the idea of a ving God, the great Antichrist who is yet to be r ealed, will oppose and exalt himself above all w ich is called God, or is worshipped ; even the f e religions of the world, in so far as they are w ships at all—acknowledgments by men of a g ater than man—will be hateful to him and w red against by him, no less than the true.

"'THE KINGDOM OF MAN

i at hand'—such will be the good tidings of g at joy which he will proclaim, which his ser- v its and forerunners are proclaiming already. hat will be the end of the kingdom of that cked One a sure word of prophecy has told u ; but meanwhile the waves of the sea rage h ribly, and it must be sorrowfully owned of t Ship of the Church that it is but ill prepared t meet the storm.

'What confusion has overtaken the crew ! Some there are of these who would prefer to knock a hole in the bottom of the ship and that all should go down together, rather than that any but themselves should have a share in the navigation of it, or establish their claims to an interest to it, or as much as their right to a passage by it ; while the motley company which remain often find enough to do in hindering where they should be helping one another, not a few of them counting it an omen for good and a pledge of the final safety of the ship, that its crew should thus be broken up into so many discordant bands.

"With all this unbelief in the air, with our people liable to inhale it at every moral and intellectual breath they draw, I often ask myself what our present duty toward them is. Shall we seek to forewarn them against assaults on the truth which they are pretty sure to hear of ? or shall we count them sufficiently forewarned in the knowledge which they have of Christ the Saviour ?

"How many of us, forcing our way, it may be, into regions of physical science where we are guests and strangers, may only invite and court defeats ; which many will regard as defeats not of us, but of that faith whereof we had too rashly appointed ourselves the defenders. Thus, who among us does not tremble a little when he hears the doctrine of Evolution taken in hand in the pulpit by one to whom all would most gladly have listened on repentance toward God and faith in our Lord Jesus Christ ; but who certainly has never made a special study of that about which he ventures to speak, nor taken the measure of those whom he challenges to the conflict.

"When I speak this language, do not suppose that there are not for every one of us times to speak, as well as times to keep silence. It is one thing when the votary of physical science stands upon his own ground ; it is another when he intrudes upon ours. There is not the humblest among us who should shrink from meeting him there. The ground which we keep there we keep not for ourselves, but for our King.

"Surely it ought not to be impossible for us, inexpert though we may be in the dialectic fence, to show what the true worth is of those 'ideal substitutes of God,' which the adversaries offer in the room of Him whom they would take from us, by aid of which substitutes they would reconcile us to our loss ; or more audaciously still, would prove to us that we have suffered no loss at all, since, though they may take from us God, they give us something else which will be full compensation, according to that strange delusion of theirs, that they can blot out the sun in our heaven, and yet keep the sunshine still.

"It needs not to have been a man of war from one's youth, it is enough to have learned in our heart of hearts what that means, 'I believe in God the Father Almighty,' to hold and more than hold our own in conflict with one of these ; for indeed what can gainsayers and deniers do here against one whose conviction of the primal truths on which his moral being rest, is anterior to all proofs, unassailable by all disproofs ; who feels that for him, if these were gone,

'The pillared firmament were rottenness,
And earth's base built on stubble.'

WHAT THE ISSUES WILL BE,

if those forlorn Evangelists of a heaven without a God, and thus of man without a hope, gain a wide acceptance, as it seems only too likely that for a time they will—what the reaction of all this will be on the moral life of mankind it is only too easy to forecast. It is not too much then to say that the whole future of the human race depends on the question whether it will hold fast the idea of a living God, or suffer itself to be robbed of it ; and to you—to every one of us—it is given to contribute in what we have grasped for ourselves, in what we are able to impart to others, our share to the decision."

In connection with this solemn and weighty utterance, it may be interesting to some of our readers to quote some remarks of Archbishop Trench, of a more critical character, from his valuable work on the "Synonyms of the New Testament." "The word Antichrist" (Greek, Antichristos), Dr. Trench there observes, "is peculiar to the Epistles of St. John, occurring five times in them (1 Ep. 2 : 18, bis ; 2 : 22 ; 4 : 3 ; 2 Ep. 7) ; and nowhere else in the New Testament. But if he alone has the word, St. Paul, in common with him, designates the person of this great adversary, and the marks by which he shall be recognized ; for all expositors of weight, Grotius alone excepted, are agreed that St. Paul's 'Man of Sin,' his 'son of perdition,' his 'lawless one' (2 Thess. 2 : 3, 8), is identical with St. John's Antichrist ; and, indeed, to St. Paul we are indebted for our fullest instruction concerning this arch-enemy of Christ and of God."

Having given his reasons for rejecting the opinion of those who take "anti" to mean "instead of" or "in the place of," rather than "against" Christ, and building thereupon the conclusion that the Pope of Rome is the only and final Antichrist, the Archbishop proceeds : "To me St. John's words seem decisive that resistance to Christ, and in defiance of Him, this, and not any treacherous assumption of his character and offices, is the essential mark of the Antichrist ; is that which, therefore, we should expect to find embodied in his name.

"The Antichrist is one who shall not pay so much homage to God's Word as to assert its fulfilment in himself, for he shall deny that Word altogether ; hating even erroneous worship, because it is worship at all, and every thing that is called 'God' (2 Thess. 2 : 4), but hating most of all the Church's worship in spirit and in truth (Dan. 8 : 11) ; who, on the destruction of every religion, every acknowledgment that man is submitted to higher powers than his own, shall seek to establish his throne ; and, for God's great truth that in Christ God is man, to substitute his own lie, that in him man is God.

"THE TERM PSEUDOCHRIST"

(Greek, Pseudocristos), with which we proceed to contrast it, appears only twice in the New Testament ; or, if we count, not how often it has been written, but how often it was spoken, only once ; for the two passages in which it occurs (Matt. 24 : 24 ; Mark 13 : 22) are records of the same discourse. . . . . .

"The distinction, then, is plain. The Antichrist denies that there is a Christ ; the Pseudochrist affirms himself to be the Christ. Both alike make war against the Christ of God, and would set themselves, though under different pretences, on the throne of His glory. And yet, while the words have this broad distinction between them, while they represent two different manifestations of the kingdom of wickedness, there is a sense in which the final 'Antichrist' will be a 'Pseudochrist' as well ; even as it will be the very character of that last revelation of hell to gather up into itself, and to reconcile for one last assault against the truth, all anterior and subordinate forms of evil.

"He will not, it is true, call himself the Christ, for he will be filled with the deadliest hate against the name and offices, as against the whole spirit and temper of Jesus of Nazareth, the exalted King of Glory. But, inasmuch as no one can resist the truth by a mere negation, he must offer and oppose something positive, in the room of that faith which he will assail and endeavor utterly to abolish.

"And thus we may certainly conclude that the final Antichrist will reveal himself to the world —for he too will have his apocalypse (2 Thess. 2 : 3, 8)—as, in a sense, its Messiah ; not, indeed, as the Messiah of prophecy, the Messiah of God, but still as the world's saviour ; as one who will make the blessedness of as many as obey him, giving to them the full enjoyment of a present material earth, instead of a distant, shadowy, and uncertain heaven ; abolishing those troublesome distinctions, now the fruitful sources of so much disquietude, abridging men of so many enjoyments, between the Church and the world, between the spirit and the flesh, between holiness and sin, between good and evil."

An extract from a Charge to his Clergy, delivered i October last.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, January 7th, at 3.30 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Congress Reassembled January 6th, after the holidays. The members of both Houses were slow in making their appearance, but those present immediately proceeded to business. Many new bills were introduced, indicating that a busy session is intended. The Indian Question, including the charges against Commissioner Hayt, is referred to a committee appointed by the Board of Commissioners, and the charges will be supported by General Fisk. Among the new bills introduced is an important one by Mr. Cox, designed to regulate immigration. Among its provisions is a section making it illegal on the part of ship-owners to bring into the United States any immigrants who are paupers or convicts, or are lunatic, idiot, deaf and dumb, blind, maimed or infirm, unless relatives or other persons able and willing to support them are ready to do so. All persons belonging to either of the above classes are to be sent back to the place from which they were brought, at the expense of the owners or consignees of the vessel which brings them. Financial questions will of course be a prominent feature in the debates.

The Maine Electoral Difficulty has not been settled by the decision of the Supreme Court. Governor Garcelon said that the decision of the court may be valuable as a guide in the future, but could not influence him to retract his action. Both houses of the Legislature assembled January 7th. It was expected that a quorum would not be formed, but the presence of Mr. Hale, the only Republican there, made up the requisite number. In the Senate the petitions of the counted-out members were referred to a special committee. The State Capitol was packed with people, but good order was preserved. Several allegations of attempted bribery were brought before the Senate, and Mr. Blaine's name was used in connection therewith; but he indignantly denies any implication with the matter, or that he has been mixed up in the affair in any way. In the dead-lock of affairs Major-General Chamberlain issued a general order, stating that in view of the extraordinary situation now presented at the seat of government, he would assume command and protect the public property and institutions of the State, in trust for the people, until the governor's successor has been legally elected and duly qualified.

Startling Disclosures, involving Grave charges against two well-known merchants in New York, have given a shock to commercial society in the city. The suspension of the Grocers' Bank, on December 31st, led to an investigation of its affairs, which disclosed the fact that one of its principal debtors was Mr. J. Lloyd Haigh, whose contract for the wire used in the suspension bridge being now constructed between New York and Brooklyn, had given additional prominence to the house. Mr. Haigh owed the bank about $97,000, a large part of which was said to be covered by securities bearing the names of responsible persons. It is now stated by the receiver of the bank that the securities are forgeries, and a prosecution has been commenced against Mr. Haigh.

This disclosure was followed January 8th by another still more surprising. The committee of the New York Produce Exchange having decided on removing their balance of funds from one bank to another, the treasurer was directed to carry the decision into effect. The fund was stated by the treasurer to be $31,000, but on inquiry at the bank it was found to be only $301. The treasurer had used the money in his business, and concealed the fact by keeping a duplicate bank-book. He was so overwhelmed by the impending discovery that he committed suicide. He was highly respected in the city, and business men felt the utmost confidence in his integrity. By the fever of speculation and the haste to be rich, the Bible warns us, men fall into snares, (1 Tim. 6:9).

A Collision on the Elevated Railroad in New York on January 7th, came near resulting in a serious loss of life. There is a junction of the Sixth and Ninth Avenue lines at Fifty-third St., and as two trains approached this junction at right angles to each other, the engineer of each train increased his speed to gain precedence over the other train. The result was that the engines came into collision and were thrown off the track, both injured. But for the support of a building against which one of the engines was thrown by the shock, it and the cars attached would have probably descended into the street. As it providentially happened, the passengers, though much alarmed, were unhurt.

Earnest Protests are being made by the Missionary Societies engaged in labor among the Indians against the Government method of dealing with the tribes. Drs. Alden, Lowrie, Shippen, Strieby, and Firris, Rev. Mr. Morehouse, and Friend Smiley, representing different societies, have had an interview with President Hayes and with the Board of Indian Commissioners, and forcibly stated the case against the administration. The societies are supposed to exercise an influence in the appointments of agents and others who represent the government in Indian matters, but the deputation complained that the gentlemen they had nominated were not appointed by the board, but others had been placed in office who were notoriously incompetent, and for many reasons unfitted for their posts. They also contended that the character of the Indians had been wilfully misrepresented in the press and at Washington, and several ministers spoke authoritatively on the question, they having had direct personal dealings with the Indians.

The Niblo Bequest to the Young Men's Christian Association, New York, amounts to $150,000, and has been paid over. Mr. William Niblo, who died in August, 1878, appointed the Association his residuary legatees, and desired that the legacy might be used for the maintenance and enlargement of the Association library. The money will for the present be invested, and only the income be used for the benefit of the library.

The Victim of a Mock Marriage paid her Life as the penalty of her misplaced confidence at Bath, Pennsylvania, last week. Some months ago a man named George Youngs went to Bath, from Schenectady, where he became acquainted with Miss Alice Boers, the daughter of a prominent citizen. The acquaintance went on until Youngs made a proposal of marriage. The girl's parents were not satisfied as to the young man's moral character, and refused their consent to the match. The pair then ran away and returned in a few days, saying they were married and showed a marriage certificate as evidence. They were received by the parents of the girl, but on investigation it was found that the clergyman's signature to the marriage certificate was forged, and that the ceremony Youngs had performed w mock ceremony at a disreputable house, a b companion of his having impersonated the c gyman. When the news was carried to young wife, she fell to the floor dead. You fled, and no trace of him has yet been fou He has a wife and two children in Schenecta

The tendency of books read by young la of the present day is to make them disreg God's commandment to honor their paren and in no instance is it more frequently di garded than in the most important step of t lives, when the wisdom and experience of pare is most valuable.

A Disastrous Fire Occurred in New York January 5th, in which seven persons lost their li The building destroyed was Turn Halle, in E Fourth Street. It was used as a meeting-pl for German societies, and the upper floors w occupied by the lessee and his family. A wa was killed by jumping from a window; a b nephew of the proprietor of the hall, was su cated; another waiter was burned to death, a woman servant was suffocated. Two oth were seriously injured by jumping from w dows, both of them dying soon afterward; the proprietor, his wife, and her sister were verely burned. Seven other occupants of building escaped uninjured.

The Fatalities of Christmas Festivities.—F. Janes, of Paris, Ky., met with a sad death Christmas night. He was personating Sa Claus, and while distributing presents, his clo ing, which was covered with cotton, took fi and, before it could be extinguished, he was tally burned. At Pulaski, Ohio, a young m named Lynn was dressed in a costume made cotton batting, to represent Kris Kringle. Sc after the distribution of presents had begun hat, which was made of the same material, tc fire from a wax candle in the tree, and in an stant the flames had completely enveloped hi and it was several minutes before they could extinguished. It is feared that the injuries received will prove fatal.

A Letter in a Glove.—A Little Girl Aw down in Maine wrote a letter and placed it i glove which she had been knitting for a ma facturing firm. It was found by one of t salesmen of a Chicago fancy-goods house, a was read aloud to his associates. It ran: "I a little girl only eight years old. My name Cora Norwood. I live in Bucksport, Me. knit these gloves for eight cents a pair. I w the gentleman who buys them would send m wax doll for a Christmas present, as I have nc and want one very bad." The clerks imm diately purchased a splendid wax doll and f warded it to her by the United States Expre This prompt response to her request from p sons she had never seen was doubtless a pleas surprise to the child, but the happiest result the incident would be that it might lead h thoughts to Him who though unseen is e ready to hear and answer the petitions of H children.

Dr. Deems, Pastor of the Church of t Strangers, New York, said farewell to h church and congregation before starting on h tour in the Holy Land, on the evening of D cember 29th. A large attendance had been a tracted by the opportunity of saying farewell the beloved pastor. After reading the report the year's work, Dr. Deems said good-by to h family, and went on board of the German which sailed at six o'clock the following mor ing. A delegation of the young men belongi to the church accompanied him on board, a presented him with a basket of flowers. D Deems will, on his arrival at Liverpool, sta immediately for Alexandria viâ Brindisi, make a tour of Egypt and the Holy Land. H expects to be away six months, and during th time his pulpit will be occupied by his son, t Rev. E. M. Deems, who has for the past tw years been pastor of a church at Archmon Colorado. A portrait and life of Dr. Deems a peared in the Christian Herald, November 27t 1879.

The Roman Catholic Bishop McCloskey has eed that parochial schools be established where in the diocese of Kentucky. The e closes as follows: "Now, it is our will command that where there is a Catholic ol in a parish, the parents and guardians in places send their children or wards to such olic school, and we hereby direct that this lation be enforced under pain of refusal of ution in the sacrament of penance."

Father Brady says with reference to this decree: The success of our church has its foundation in e success of our parochial schools. Many of rgest and most prosperous congregations— as St. Patrick's and St. John's, for instance their present good state to early prosperity their parochial schools." It is expected that ird of the Roman Catholic children who been attending the public schools will be rawn from them. The edict has created commotion in Louisville, where some 7000 n Catholic children attend the public ols.

The bishop is undoubtedly doing the best for n community, but if he knew what it would have his sins pardoned by Jesus Christ, d of by some priest, he would see that there is no terror in his refusal of absolution. The nent of Christ renders pardon free, not ional.

A Serpent in a Cider Cask.—A Farmer in oreland Co., Pennsylvania, was recently seriously ill, and shortly afterward other ers of his family were similarly seized. it was noticed that all those who were g had partaken of cider from a barrel recently purchased from a neighbor. The vender sent for, and questioned as to the ingredients the liquid. He described them and they ose generally used. He then drank, some , and was immediately prostrated by the ymptoms which had appeared in those ken. The head of the cask was then d off and the cider run out: it was then red that a large black snake had entered rel and had poisoned the contents. Solomon likens intoxicating liquor to the bite of a pe and the sting of an adder (Prov. 23:32), his case the ordinary evils of the drink were ied by the actual presence of the serpent.

A Letter of Thanks was Forwarded to the Street Prayer Meeting last week. The aid:

'Toward the end of September we sent you a signed 'James 5:15' to ask you to pray an invalid who had suffered many years and mind had become weakened by disease. thought that she was drifting farther and from Christ, and could not return to her ve for him. From that date this tried egan to improve, physically and mentally. general health is to-day better than it has years, and she can now say, with great ce and joy: 'I know whom I have believed, and am persuaded that He is able to keep which I have committed to Him against that We do not feel that we can be thankful to God for what He has done for us, and would like the prayer-meeting to return to Him for His wonderful goodness to

The Testimony of Fourscore Years' Life y years spent in the service of Christ an interesting incident in the service at Paul's M. E. Church, New York, on January e service was one of those held daily at s during the week of prayer, and minis- everal denominations took part in the ings. As the venerable Dr. Stephen H. , rose to address the meeting a deep fell on all present, and he was listened with close attention. He said: "No one brought to Christ a weary and broken heart, without being sent away filled to overflowing with new happiness and new grace. to-day I rejoice to testify that now, at the of my fourscore years, I find myself more than ever nothing, and Him more than ever everything. Never before was Jesus so dear to me. Never before was His salvation so precious to my soul. Never before did my pilgrim way seem so smooth, so happy, and so full of peace, as since He has stripped me of every thing of self, and clothed me with the glorious garments of His salvation."

An Intrepid Doctor Recently Placed his life in peril in the exercise of his profession in Texas. He was warned some time ago that having voted as a member of a grand jury for the indictment of a certain band of desperadoes, they intended to murder him. One night a man rode up to his ranch and informed him that the wife of the ringleader of the gang was ill, and that he must attend her. He naturally thought that it was a trick to get him out and kill him, but he got his horse and rode away with the messenger right among the gang of desperadoes, and, dismounting, entered the tent of the woman. There lay the sufferer, while the man who had promised to kill the physician stood near by. The desperadoes were impressed with his courage and his humanity, and trebled his fees instead of shooting him. That was a case of personal courage, but the love of Christ has thousands of times inspired timid persons with equal courage. (Isa. 40:29.)

Where the Wine Comes From.—Mr. Eli Johnson, in his recent lecture in Brooklyn, explained the way in which "imported wines" and "French wines" are manufactured out of common apple whiskey, fusel-oil, sulphuric and tannic acids, and similar ingredients. Mr. Johnson also warned his hearers, saying, "Cider is made without apples at all, and then from it all kinds of wines are made. Ale and beer are made of capsicum, cocculus indicus, quicklime, copperas, strychnia, and tobacco." In confirmation of his assertions, Mr. Johnson said that "at the death of a prominent wine importer, recently, not a single bill or invoice could be found among his papers, but his factory was filled with machinery and drugs for the making of liquors. Port and sherry wines were made in this way, at a cost of about fifteen cents per bottle. Recipes are published for giving bottles and barrels a time-worn and dusty appearance, to simulate great age."

The Established Church of New York is a title that will surprise those Americans who believed that established denominations had no place on this side the Atlantic. Yet it has been proved by hard facts and figures that the Roman Catholic Church in New York has received at the public expense real estate in the city to the value of three and a half million dollars; and out of the State and City Treasury grants in money to the amount of five million dollars have, during the last eleven years, been made to them. Protestant taxpayers should see to this.

A Judge Sentenced Himself at Memphis, Tenn., recently, to a fine for unpunctuality. It appears that Judge Eldridge is noted for strictness in requiring the officers of his court to be punctual, and is careful to set them the example; but one day he was late himself, and, on mounting the bench, turned to the clerk and said: "Mr. Clerk, you will please enter a fine against Judge Eldridge for absence without an excuse." The Attorney-General and another advocate, to the great amusement of those present, pleaded against this order, reminding the Judge of his punctual habits; but he declared that the fine must stand.

The Cost of a Load of Sand.—It is Remark-able that the obstinacy with which a dispute is pursued frequently involves a larger loss than was originally feared. A legal contest at St. Louis was commenced between two men over a load of sand; one man alleged it to be worth $1.75, and the other appraised it at $1.50. The expenses of the contest so far, exclusive of counsel fees, amount to over $77.

The Portraits of the Rev. Newman Hall, the eminent evangelical minister of London, author of "Come to Jesus," and of his father, the late Mr. John Vine Hall, author of "The Sinner's Friend," will appear in the next number of this journal.

THE BEST OF ALL SIGHTS.

A Short Sermon, written at Mentone, by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"But we see Jesus."—HEBREWS 2:9.

The Eyes of the Soul—The Renewed Nature has New Senses—It Actually Sees Jesus—I. The Sight is a Compensation—Sights which Cause Sorrow—The Main Battle Won—A Pledge Given of All the Rest—The White Horse at the Door—II. It Produces Exultation—The Unhappy Condition is Ended—A Thrice Blessed Condition—All Apprehension Cleared Away—III. It Inspires Expectation—As to the Person of Jesus—As to His Place—As to His Position.

IN holy Scripture faith is placed in opposition to the sight of the eyes, and yet it is frequently described as looking and seeing. It is opposed to carnal sight because it is spiritual sight; a discernment which comes not of the body, but arises out of the strong belief of the soul, wrought in us by the Holy Spirit. Faith is sight in the sense of being a clear and vivid perception, a sure and indisputable discovery, a realizing and unquestionable discernment of fact. We see Jesus, for we are sure of His presence, we have unquestionable evidence of His existence, we have an intelligent and intimate knowledge of His person.

Our soul has eyes far stronger than the dim optics of the body, and with these we actually see Jesus. We have heard of Him, and upon the witness of that hearing we have believed, and through believing there has come to us a new life, which rejoices in new light and in opened eyes, and "we see Jesus." In the old sense of sight we speak of Him as of one "whom having not seen we love," but in the new sense "we see Jesus."

Beloved reader, have you such a renewed nature that you have new senses, and have you with these senses discerned the Lord? If not, may the Holy Spirit yet quicken you; and meanwhile, let us whom He has made alive assure you that we have heard His voice, for He saith, "My sheep hear My voice;" we have "tasted the good word of God;" we have touched Him and have been made whole; we have also known the smell of His fragrance, for His name to us is "as ointment poured forth;" and now, in the words of our text, "we see Jesus." Faith is all the senses in one, and infinitely more; and those who have it not are in a worse case than the blind and deaf, for spiritual life itself is absent.

I. Come, then, brethren beloved, whose eyes have been illuminated, let us muse awhile upon our privileges, that we may exercise them with delight, and praise the Lord with them. First, let us regard the glorious sight of Jesus as a COMPENSATION.

The text begins with "but," because it refers to some things which we do not yet see, which are the objects of strong desire. "We see not yet all things put under Him." We do not as yet see Jesus acknowledged as King of kings by all mankind, and this causes us great sorrow, for we would fain see him crowned with glory and honor in every corner of the earth by every man of woman born. Alas! He is to many quite unknown, by multitudes rejected and despised, and by comparatively few is He regarded with reverence and love. Sights surround us which might well make us cry with Jeremiah, "Oh that my head were waters, and mine eyes a fountain of tears;" for blasphemy and rebuke, idolatry, superstition, and unbelief prevail on every side.

"But," saith the apostle, "we see Jesus," and this sight compensates for all others, for we see Him now, no longer made a little lower than the angels, and tasting the bitterness of death, but "crowned with glory and honor." We see Him no more after the flesh, in shame and anguish; far more ravishing is the sight, for we see His work accomplished, His victory complete, His empire secure. He sits as a priest upon the throne at the right hand of God, from henceforth expecting till His enemies are made His footstool.

This is a divine compensation for the tarrying of His visible kingdom, because it is the major part of it. The main battle is won. In our Lord's endurance of His substitutionary griefs, and in the overthrow of sin, death, and hell by His personal achievements, the essence of the conflict is over. Nothing is left to be done at all comparable with that which is already performed.

The ingathering of the elect, and the subjection of all things, are comparatively easy of accomplishment now that the conflict in the heavenly places is over, and Jesus has led captivity captive. We may look upon the conquest of the kingdoms of this world as a mere routing of the beaten host, now that the power of the enemy has been effectually broken by the great Captain of our salvation

The compensation is all the greater because our Lord's enthronement is the pledge of all the rest. The putting of all things under Him, which as yet we see not, is guaranteed to us by what we do see. The exalted Saviour has all power given unto Him in heaven and in earth, and with this "all power" He can, at His own pleasure, send forth the rod of His strength out of Sion, and reign in the midst of His enemies. With Him are all the forces needful for universal dominion, His white horse waits at the door, and whensoever He chooses He can ride forth conquering and to conquer. At a word from His lips the harlot of Babylon shall perish, and the false prophet shall die, and the idols of the heathen shall be utterly abolished. The empire of wickedness is as a vision of the night, a black and hideous nightmare pressing on the soul of manhood, but when He awaketh He will despise its image, and it shall melt away.

Turn we then, wiping our tears away, from the wretched spectacles of human superstition, scepticism, and sorrow, to the clear vision above us in the opened heaven. There we see "the Man," long promised, the desire of all nations, the deliverer, the death of death, the conqueror of hell; and we see Him not as one who girdeth on His harness for the battle, but as one whose warfare is accomplished, who is waiting the time appointed of the Father when He shall divide the spoil.. This is the antidote to all depression of spirit, the stimulus to hopeful perseverance, the assurance of joy unspeakable.

II. Nor is this sight a mere compensation for others which as yet are denied us: it is in itself the cause of present

EXULTATION.

This is true in so many ways, that time would fail us to attempt to enumerate them. "We see Jesus," and in Him we see our former unhappy condition forever ended. We were fallen in Adam, but we see in Jesus our ruin retrieved by the second Adam. The legal covenant frowned upon us as we beheld it broken by our first federal head; the new covenant smiles upon us with a whole heaven of bliss as we see it ordered in all things and sure in Him who is head over all things to the church. Sin once doomed us to eternal despair, but not now, for He who hath put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself hath justified His people by His resurrection. The debt no longer burdens us, for there in eternal glory is the Man who paid it once for all.

A sight of Jesus kills each guilty fear, silences each threat of conscience, and photographs peace upon the heart. There remains nothing of all the past to cause a dread of punishment, or arouse a fear of desertion; for Christ that died ever liveth to make intercession for us, to represent us before the Father, and to prepare for us a place of everlasting rest. We might see ourselves as dead under the law were it not that He has blotted out the handwriting which was against us; we might see ourselves under the curse were it not that He who was once made a curse for us now reigns in fulness of blessing. We weep as we confess our transgressions, but we see Jesus, and sing for joy of heart, since He hath finished transgression, made an end of sin, and brought in everlasting righteousness.

The same is sweetly true of the present, for we see our present condition to be by virtue of our union with Him. We see not as yet our nature made perfect, and cleansed from every tendency to evil; rather do we groan, being burdened, because of the sin which dwelleth in us, the old man which lusteth and rebelleth against the blessed dominion of grace; and we might be sorely cast down and dragged into despair were it not that "we see Jesus," and perceive that in Him we are not what the flesh would argue us to be.

THRICE BLESSED

He represents us most truthfully, and looking into that mirror we see ourselves justified in Christ Jesus, accepted in the beloved, adopted of the Father, dear to the Eternal heart, yea, in Him raised up together, and made to sit together in the heavenlies. We see self, and blush and are ashamed and dismayed; "but we see Jesus," and His joy is in us, and our joy is full.

Think of this, dear brother in Christ, the next time you are upon the dunghill of self-loathing. Lift up now your eyes, and see where He is in whom your life is hid! See Jesus, and know that as He is so are you also before the Infinite Majesty. You are not condemned, for He is enthroned. You are not despised nor abhorred, for He is beloved and exalted. You are not in jeopardy of perishing, nor in danger of being cast away, for He dwells eternally in the bosom of the Lord God Almighty. What a vision is this for you, when you see Jesus, and see yourself complete in Him, perfect in Christ Jesus!

Such a sight effectually clears our earthly future of all apprehension. It is true we may yet be sorely tempted, and the battle may go hard with us, but we see Jesus triumphant, and by this sign we grasp the victory. We shall perhaps be subjected to pain, to poverty, to slander, to persecution, and yet none of these things move us because we see Jesus exalted, and therefore know that these are under His power, and cannot touch us except as He grants them His permit so to do.

Death is at times terrible in prospect, but its terror ceases when we see Jesus, who has passed safely through the shades of the sepulchre, vanquished the tyrant of the tomb, and left an open passage to immortality to all His own.

We see the pains, the groans, and dying strife; see them, indeed, exaggerated by our fears, and the only cure for the consequent alarm is a sight of Him who hath said, "He that believeth in Me, though he were dead, yet shall he live. And whosoever liveth and believeth in Me shall never die." When we see Jesus, past, present, and to come are summed up in Him, and over all shines a glorious life which fills our souls with unspeakable delight.

III. Thirdly, "we see Jesus" with gladdest

EXPECTATION

His glorious person is to us the picture and the pledge of what we shall be: for "it doth not yet appear what we shall be: but we know that, when He shall appear, we shall be like Him; for we shall see Him as He is." In infinite love He condescended to become one with us here below, as saith the apostle, "Forasmuch then as the children are partakers of flesh and blood, He also Himself likewise took part of the same;" and this descent of love on His part to meet us in our low estate is the assurance that His love will lift us up to meet Him in His high estate.

He will make us partakers of His nature, inasmuch as He has become partaker of our nature. It is written, "Both He that sanctifieth and they who are sanctified are all of one: for which cause He is not ashamed to call them brethren." What bliss is this, that we should be like to the incarnate God! It would seem too good to be true, were it not after the manner of our Lord to do great things for us, and unsearchable.

Nor may we alone derive comfort as to our future from His person, we may also be made glad by a hope as to His place. Where we see Jesus to be, there shall we also be. His heaven is our heaven. His prayer secures that we shall be with Him where He is, that we may behold His glory. To-day we may be in a workhouse, or in the ward of a hospital, or in a ruinous hovel, "but we see Jesus," and we know that erelong we shall dwell in the palace of the great King.

The glory of Jesus strikes the eye at once, and thus we are made to exult in His position, for it, too, is ours. He will give to us to sit upon His throne, even as He sits upon the Father's thr He hath made us kings and priests unto (and we shall reign forever and ever. What of rest, happiness, security, and honor our g ous Bridegroom has attained, He will certa share it with His spouse; yea, and all His pe shall know what it is to be heirs of God, heirs with Jesus Christ, if so be that we s with Him that we may also be glorified toget

How soon our condition shall rise into plete likeness to the ascended Lord we ca tell, but it cannot be long, and it may be a short time. The veil of time is in some very thin, another week may be the only se tion. And then! Ah, then! We shal Jesus, and what a sight will it be! Heave in that vision. 'Tis all the heaven our lo hearts desire.

The sight of Jesus which we now enjoy foretaste of the clearer sight which is res for us, and therefore it will be a happy wi to be much in the enjoyment of it. A thou things tempt us away, and yet there is no of them worth a moment's thought in con son. What are works of art and discoveri science if compared with our Beloved? are the gems which adorn the brow of beau the eyes which flash from the face of lovel if placed in rivalry with him? Other ma weighty and important, call for our tho and yet even these we may place in a second when Jesus is near.

We may not be doctors of divinity, m we would desire to be deeply instructed truth; "but we see Jesus." Into many m ies we cannot pry; "but we see Jesus." the divine sovereignty harmonizes with responsibility is too deep a problem fo "but we see Jesus." The times and the s baffle us, the dispensation of the end is d us; "but we see Jesus." Glory over us, seeing prophets! Deride us, ye deep-gl philosophers! We leave you to your boa We are poor, short-sighted beings, and but little; but one thing we know—wher were once blind, now we see, and " Jesus."

This sight has made us unable to see things which now dazzle our fellow-men. can see priestly power in a certain set like themselves. This we cannot see, fo see Jesus," as ending the line of sac priests, and bestowing a common priesthoo all the saints. Many see great wisdom various schools of doubt, in which we see ing except pretentious folly, for "we see and all human wisdom pales before the of God, which is perfected in Him.

Come, beloved, let us get to our secret bers of communion, and see Jesus there the hill of Pisgah. Let us turn the p Scripture, and see Jesus there amid the spices. Let us frequent ordinances, es the breaking of bread, and see Jesus ther us watch in our experience, as we are con unto His sufferings, and see Him there. go in the field of holy labor, and as we g selves and put on the yoke of service, le our Master there. Yea, in all things let to see our Lord, for nature and Provide perience and Scripture, are hung with which reflect Him. Till the day break shadows flee away, let us continue to ga Him, till our eyes shall actually see Him selves and not another. Be this the gr tinction of our lives: whatever others or not see,

"WE SEE JESUS."

[The prayers of the readers of this Jou requested for the blessing of God upon its in America and England, and those whose articles, or labors for Christ are printed in for its weekly circulation of more than copies to be blessed by the Holy Spirit to version of many sinners and the quick God's people. Mr. Spurgeon and Dr. especially request prayer every Sunday on behalf of their labors.]

EXPERIENCE IN AFRICA.

A Recollection by Major Malan.

"If we suffer, we shall also reign with Him."—2 Tim. 2 : 12.

All that I have, O Lord ! is Thine ;
  All that I am, Thy Spirit wrought ;
What would I not for Thee resign,
  Whose precious blood my ransom bought !
    Lord, here I am ; my life, my all,
    I hold obedient to Thy call.

ALLEN GARDINER.

How a Letter Came—A Last Sunday's Meeting King William's Town Barracks Hospital—Missionary's Sermon—The Commander-in-Chief's Letter.

My regiment had been moved from Singapore to South Africa while the decision of the Horse Guards was awaited as to the complaint of a Roman Catholic soldier against me for distributing tracts and reading the Bible to little gatherings of the men. Very graciously did the Lord prepare for me against the arrival of that decision. How tender He is in all His dealings with His children ! He had appointed that it should reach me in a garrison commanded by one of His servants, with whom I was living as a brother.

Thus, instead of receiving an official letter, the contents of which would have been soon known all over the garrison, a friend told me that a letter had come from the Horse Guards, a friend's voice prepared me for its contents, and a friend's hand gave it to me to read.

The Sunday before it arrived I had gone, as was my wont, to visit the sick of my regiment in hospital. As I went through the wards, I told the men that I would read in a ward in which there was a man very ill of consumption. Several came ; among them two Roman Catholics—an old soldier and a recruit. They walked across the hospital square, to come and hear me read God's Word. They sat close to me, using the Douay Testaments which I had supplied for the hospital.

I read the account of our Lord's visit to the sisters at Bethany. Well do I remember my closing words on that, the last occasion I ever read the Word of God to my fellow-soldiers until after I had resigned my commission : "Yes, my dear comrades, if we do what Mary did—if we believe in the Lord Jesus as our Saviour and Lord—if we sit at His feet and hear His words, the world may do what it likes. We may lose health, wealth, or position ; we may lose friends, or whatever we hold most dear on earth—we have chosen, by God's grace, that good part, which shall not be taken from us."

Little did I think that in a few hours I should have taken from me that which I then valued most on earth—the privilege of telling British soldiers of the love of God and the unsearchable riches of Christ.

The same day I heard that a missionary had arrived in town who had been laboring faithfully among the heathen. I went at once to see him. He told me he was going to preach that night, and I went to hear him. His text was : "It is the Lord ; let Him do what seemeth Him good." I remember asking myself, "Do I want a sermon on this subject ?" and replying, "Well, if I don't now I may soon, so I had better listen."

Two days afterwards the decision of the Commander-in-chief arrived. There is no need here to say more than this : "I have to request that Major Malan may be informed that it is not within his province to impart religious instruction to the soldiers under his command, and that he must discontinue the distribution of tracts of any religious tendency among them." The plain meaning of the first part of this sentence was, that I was forbidden to speak to my fellow-soldiers about their God and Saviour. The latter part referred to the fact that I had got the families in my regiment to take in the British Workman and other similar papers.

Official language can always be variously interpreted ; but no soldier receiving such an injunction from the Commander-in-chief would have otherwise interpreted it. Had I, after the receipt of this communication, spoken to soldiers about God, I might have been charged with the serious military crime of "disobedience of orders."

The demands of the military obedience are, like the commandments of God, exceeding broad. I had not expected such an order ; there was no reason for it. I had not been charged with religious intolerance, or with having been biased by religion in the discharge of my duty. But the Lord had prepared me for it, and when I had finished reading the letter I was able to say, without a regret, "It is the Lord ; let Him do what seemeth Him good."

There could be no mistake as to the meaning of the injunction from the Horse Guards. The colonel of my regiment, on receiving a copy of it from me, thus wrote : "I presume it will now be a matter for very serious consideration whether, with hands tied, you remain in the service or devote yourself to the better work."

I simply asked the Lord to guide me. I cast myself on Him. All I prayed was that He would not allow me to go back from Him on account of this, and that He would open me a wide door among civilians.

When the wing arrived at King William's Town, there being no spare room in barracks, I had at once hired and fitted up a room in the town, where the men might go for the reading of God's Word and prayer. This was finished before the order came. That day, or the next, was my evening for reading to my comrades. I went over to the room shortly before they assembled, and told the old soldier who lived in the house to tell them that I was very sorry not to be able to come, but that I was prevented by duty. The order from the Horse Guards was, in fact, an imperative prohibition of my doing so any longer.* What course I followed will appear in the sequel.

---

* This was some years ago. More liberty is now granted to English officers.—[Ed.]

ANECDOTES BY MR. H. VARLEY.

The Rapid Growth of Sin—The Ruling Passion—Intemperance Written on a Man's Forehead—Do you want to Buy 'Life', Sir ?—The Sultan Gold-Mine—There is no Law against Love—A Forcible Illustration.

THE Rev. Henry Varley has been delivering a series of addresses to young men only, in the north of London. The meetings have been numerously attended, and have been composed of the class for whose benefit these special addresses were designed. We give a few anecdotes which will enable our readers to judge of the faithful appeals made to heart and conscience.

THE RAPID SNAKE-LIKE GROWTH OF SIN.

Joseph Cook called sin an eternal mother, and it is a startling fact that sin breeds. You know that. Let one sin be committed, and see how it will breed other sins, before you are twenty-four hours older, which will exert a strong influence over you. When I was in Australia, I remember a female snake being killed, and afterwards it was found that there were no less than forty-seven tiny reptiles in that snake near the birth ! If you young men give way to sin, the very spawn of that which means permanent moral evil will certainly be scattered through your being. I do not say it may be permanent moral evil at the time, but it will certainly end in that. You know, if I may use a homely example, if there is a potato with even a small speck of disease in it, in the very nature of things that potato can never be perfect. You know that the corruption must spread, and that nothing can stop it. I have seen in Australia some of those giant monstrous trunks that form so many natural bridges over the valleys. I have stood and watched them wonderingly, as they look so sound and massive. "They are dead, sir," says my driver. I do not even ask him, "Will they live again ?" To ask such a question would be an insult to common-sense. And I tell you, sin is on the road to death, and that it must as certainly reach that goal as that the sun will rise to-morrow.

THE RULING PASSION STRONG IN DEATH.

A physician had a patient nearing his last hour, who in his day had been a great miser. On his death-bed he was seen tightly hugging two bags, one of which was full of plate and the other of gold. "I am so glad you came in, doctor !" said the dying man. "All night long they have been trying to steal my treasures from me, but they shall not !" And then he hugged them closer still. You may say, perhaps, the poor man's brain was affected, but it is the kind of derangement which sin ever carries with it. It is, in so many words, nothing but the harvest of sowing to the flesh.

I met a poor man the other day with written on his face as in letters of flame. I had known him as a young man when, in company with others, he could sit down to his three or four glasses of wine, and call it "the feast of reason and the flow of soul ;" but now he had become what I saw him to be—a bloated wreck. Am I the loser to-night because for twenty-seven years I have been a practical abstainer ? Oh, if you want vigorous mental power, if you want the athletic qualities of the runner or the cricketer, do not part with your strength ! I have seen a young man with lustreless eyes, pale and sunken cheeks, trembling hands, cowering even in the daylight from all who knew him. What does it mean ? That he has parted with his glory—his strength. The old adage is true, "You cannot eat your cake and have it." You cannot have your sovereign in your pocket and spend it.

INTEMPERANCE

Said a clerk to me the other day at a bookstall, where I was looking at some of the papers, "Do you want to buy 'Life,' sir ?"

"No," was my answer, "it is the wrong name for a paper of that kind. You should call it 'Death.'" Let us have things called by their right names. Gambling, intemperance, and sin in every form should have Death written upon them, for the outcome of them all is to be separated from God, separated from spirituality, from every thing beautiful and lovely, from motherhood and fatherhood, from God. It is to be an eternal orphan. Oh, it is this which inspires me to preach the Gospel to all I meet, to plead with men, to weep for them, if by any means I can save some ! Oh, the havoc sin is making in this great city of ours ! I long—and can you wonder at it ?—for the

SECOND COMING OF THE LORD

to put a stop to the moral carnage on every hand.

When in Australia I went down the mine known

AS THE SULTAN GOLD-MINE.

Its shaft is 800 feet deep. It was computed that about 150,000*l.* was expended around the mouth and on the workings of this mine. I descended, and tracking the narrow passages we came at last to the miners, who, with their lamps in their hats and their tools in their hands, were steadily working away to the vein of quartz in which it was known gold would be found. I said, "Well, you have not come to the gold yet. You must have strong faith to go on working away here." Now, some of you know that there was a capital of some hundreds of thousands of pounds wasted through the failure of the veins in which the gold was supposed to be. But let me say that there is not one of you here who shall sink his shaft into God's mine—who, in other words, shall read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest the truths of God's Book—without certainly becoming possessed of the wealth which neither moth nor rust shall corrupt, and which no thief shall steal.

THERE IS NO LAW AGAINST LOVE,

but all the commandments are against lust. As Christ's servant, believing that He is at the doors, believing in His speedy return, and that the terrible mystery of iniquity is at its close, I implore you to think seriously of this. There is much nowadays that is making our most intelligent men say, "The world is at its wit's end !" I see human rule utterly breaking down everywhere, and it is neither Mr. Gladstone nor Lord Beaconsfield that England at this moment emphatically wants. England and the world may be said to be sighing for the coming of the King whose administration shall be in righteousness. What is needed now is the firm hand to put down sin, and He is coming who shall put down all rule and all authority under His feet. What is the meaning of that great cry from Russia and the Nihilists? Is there not a prayer going up from multitudes of the oppressed, O God! interpose for us in our dreadful serfdom and slavery? And depend on it that cry does not ascend in vain. God's enemy is sin, and that enemy must be put down by the Second Coming of Christ.

I remember one Sunday hearing a preacher give of a man's powerlessness to recall that which has been said or done. On each side of the pulpit there is a large glass globe, and he suddenly struck one of these. Instantly a wave of sound went floating through the building. He called to it to come back. But it went on still sounding. Presently he said, "You saw me strike that globe? I did it. But I have absolutely no power over the result of my action. That wave of sound is going on and on. And so we are giving out force and influence the issues of which will be irrevocable."

A FORCIBLE ILLUSTRATION

SINAI AND SION.

A Sermon by Rev. W. Morley Punshon, LL.D.

(Continued from p. 29.)

"FOR ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched."—HEB. 12 : 18.

"BUT ye are come unto Mount Sion."—HEB. 12: 22.

II. The Sinaitic was

A RIGOROUS DISCIPLINE;

the Gospel is a system of love. If you think of all the accessories in the giving of the law, you will find that it gendered bondage; that though the mountain was a material one, yet the people might not touch it; if a beast touched the mountain it was to be stoned or thrust through with a dart. They stood afar off. There was darkness; there was tempest; there was a voice majestical even to terror. When the utterance did come it was a command and precept altogether—not a word of mercy, not the faintest intimation of recovery for the erring, or of salvation for the sinner.

Even when the provision of sacrifice was introduced, the privilege was restricted, and the access was difficult. Only the High Priest could come into the holiest—he only once a year; at all other times it was jealously closed: then not without blood in acknowledgment of his transgressions and in deprecation of the wrath that he had deserved; and whenever the worshippers went into the temple, there was the veil, thick and shrouding and impenetrable, concealing from the view the presence of God. It was a glorious dispensation, notwithstanding; glorious in itself, far above human desert; glorious inasmuch as it gave access to God, and the means of impression and salvation.

But it was introductory, rudimental—an infant stage of God's purposes, which their development has left far behind—only the strict corrective discipline which, like a stern schoolmaster, was intended to bring us to Christ. The system under which it is our privilege to live is very different and very superior. Our God is not remote, but near. He does not shroud Himself in divine darkness, and from some inaccessible summit of fire address us in thunder and in flames. We do not come to a solitary mountain, but to a peopled city, gay with the rapture of life and social with the hum of men, the city of the living God. Our law is the Gospel—mercy is the very essence of religion.

Our very threatenings are fringed with sunlight. Our every precept has a promise. In its heart our sacrifice has been once offered, and does not need any repetition, but preserves through countless years its efficacy and its power. Our blood fadeth not in its crimson, our voice falters not in its advocacy; but through all time and for all enormities of crime the blood of sprinkling yet speaks and pleads, all prevalent for the help of man. The holiest is not now concealed—the veil is rent. The privileged priesthood has died out as an order in the church, and each one of us, grasping the hand of his divine Daysman, may go right in without misgiving and without fear, and be bold in his access to the throne.

And then, only think of the companionship. I cannot enlarge upon it. The apostle takes you very rapidly through it in the verses in connection with the text. The most exalted associations in the universe become yours if you are faithful in the improvement of your privileges. When you come to Mount Sion there will be an innumerable company of angels. Heaven and earth are reconciled and united in the new covenant, and an innumerable company of angels smile down upon the church of the first-born, upon the earliest regenerated, upon the predestined heirs of that heaven in which they abode from the beginning.

The chariots of God on Sinai were twenty thousand, even thousands of angels, but they terrified the people then, and the poor multitude quailed down on the plain, stricken with the consciousness of sin. The angels live yet, and are bright in the glory of their first estate, but they minister to the people now; they bear in their hands some helpless child of grace, lest in the world's rugged and wayward pilgrimage he should dash his foot against a stone. And they look on, for there is no envy in the angels now. There was once, when one of them fell because of it, but they look on now, sympathetic and unenvying, while poor ransomed mortals are lifted up into a glory that is higher and brighter than theirs.

And then, besides this, you come into union with all that believe, all that are professors of the same precious faith, and whose names are written in heaven—your hallowed confederacy. You can claim help from sufferers everywhere; it is a commonwealth. Your wants and sorrows are the wants and sorrows of all. The sympathy of the Hebrew was a very contracted sort of thing—bounded by kindred and clanship, and so on. Hence the priest and the Levite could not come down from the proprieties on the other side of the way and assist the poor plundered stranger. But the sympathy to which you are entitled is a sympathy catholic as the heart of Christ, and universal as the brotherhood of man.

"Ye are come to God,

THE JUDGE OF ALL."

He was the special lawgiver to the Hebrews, and yet they dared not come to Him; but the energy and force of this passage in reference to the Christian is that through Christ he may come straight up to the Judge—not to the Father, but to the Judge—and claim by virtue of his substitute acquittal, and smile, and recompense, and reward.

And then we read, "Ye are come to the spirits of the just made perfect." For them the tears are shed—for them the crown is won. But you are linked to them yet—by covenant, and by struggle, and by faith you mingle with them. Across the dark waters which separate you there are mutual interests and a hearty oneness of feeling. They look down—a cloud of witnesses—in loving and helpful encouragement of your strife, for they know what it is.

They have struggled themselves, and have themselves overcome; and you, at the heat of the battle, gaze wistfully upward toward them where they are in their brightness and in their beauty, and—

"E'en now by faith you join your hands
With those who went before,
And greet the blood-besprinkled bands
Upon the eternal shore."

And then, crown of all other privileges—we could not leave that out—the reason why all other privileges are inherited: "Ye are come to and to the eloquent blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel." The Hebrew's day of atonement only came onc year—Jesus is ever nigh. In all your lapses shortcomings, your sudden yieldings to tem tion, your unworthy acts of compromise to e there is heaven and the divine Advocate. H on earth is the open fountain. Your mean propitiation are ever at hand.

JESUS THE MEDIATOR,

The voice that pleads for you does not k how to be silent. The tired sun may pa sometimes, perhaps, in his march; the l may drop upon weary wings; there may con shadow upon the bright hues of the ocean, a tremor of age upon the everlasting hills; through all times, and through all change, atonement retains its efficacy, and the speal blood yet pleads with its glad tidings before throne. "Ye are not come to Sinai, bu Sion."

Brethren, I want you to know why it is th have brought the matter before you. Why i sinner, I have brought this matter of lofty p ilege before you, who have nothing in the w to do with it? Why, that I may just unfol fore you the wealth that you are refusing and unsearchable riches that you are casting av the patrimony that once belonged to you, from which you have been disinherited in co quence of your transgressions.

Why, O believer! have I brought this m before you? Why, that you may take a lo your treasure—that you may revel in the ri that there is no fear of exhausting, and that may find a force coming from the Saviour' monition, upon the conscience of every o you, "Except your righteousness exceed righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees shall in no case enter into the kingdo heaven."

AN EXECUTOR'S CONSCIENCE QU ENED.

MR. GADSBY, a minister residing near chester, England, some years ago was gr in want of twenty pounds ($100). When h gan to prepare for the Sunday work, no text could he think of but, "Lord, help His account of what followed is in the subj words:

"While preaching on the Sunday morni had so many thoughts and illustrations, a out of the subject, that I felt great liber preaching. One of my illustrations was ab man I had known who was a deacon of a ch and had been an executor for two orphan chil He was tempted to make use of the money much of it was lost. This so preyed upo mind that he began to drink. He lost his acter, lost his peace of mind, and died, wit reputation of a rogue. 'Now,' I said, 'ha man, the executor, when he first thought o ing the children's money, resisted the te tion by calling on God to help him—help to be honest, help him to do nothing but w professing Christian ought to do—instead c ing the money, his good name, his pea mind, and perhaps his life, God would heard his prayer and saved him.'

"After finishing the service, when I got t bottom of the pulpit stairs, a young man there, with his hat in his hand, wishing me in private. I took him into the vestry requested his errand, expecting it woul something about his soul. For several mi we were both silent, but at length he said:

"'You knew my mother, Mr. Gadsby? when she died, she left me some money—in all she had, except two small sums she w me to give: one sum of five pounds to a old woman of her acquaintance; and speak you she said, "Our minister needs help, wish you to give him twenty pounds." the five pounds to the old woman; but, thi no one knew, I resolved never to give yo twenty. But, while you were talking abo roguish executor this morning, I felt thu struck, and I have now brought you the t pounds. Here it is: do take it, and forgiv

"It was now my turn to be thunderstru was amazed; and while the young man wa ting the twenty sovereigns into my hand, I trembled all over. God had heard my prayer; He had helped me and sent me the twenty pounds. It was mine and I took it. I shook the young man by the hand, and, without putting the money into my pocket, I went quickly home, spread it out on the table before my wife, saying, 'Here it is, here it is. God knew where it was, and He has sent me the twenty pounds, and delivered me out of my trouble. He has heard my prayer and helped me, and I will trust Him, and praise Him as long as I live.' "

A MISSIONARY'S SERVANT.

THE labors of Dr. Morrison, the celebrated missionary in China, were so arduous when he first went there, that he wrote home to the Missionary Society in England to send out another missionary to help him. When the committee received his letter they set to work to inquire among their friends for a suitable young man to go out as missionary. After a while, a pious young man who loved the Lord Jesus came from the country and offered himself. He was poor, had poor clothes on, and looked like a countryman—rough and unpolished. He went to these gentlemen and had a talk with them.

They then said he might go out of the room till they consulted with each other about him. When he was gone they agreed that it would not do to send him to Dr. Morrison as a missionary, as he was but a rough countryman. Finally, they said to one of their number, Dr. Phillips, "Tell the young man that the committee do not think him fit to be a missionary, but if he would like to go out as servant to a missionary, we will send him." The Doctor did not much like to do it, but he told the young man that they did not think he had education enough, and some other qualifications necessary for a missionary, but if he would go as a servant they would send him.

Now, many persons would have said, "No; if I can't go as a missionary, I won't go at all." But the young man replied, "If they do not think me fit to be a missionary, I will go as a servant; I am willing to be a hewer of wood, a drawer of water, or do any thing to advance the cause of my Heavenly Master." He was sent out as a servant, but he soon became a preacher, and finally, as the Rev. Dr. Milne, was considered one of the best and greatest missionaries that ever went out to any country.

FROZEN IN A BLIZZARD.

THE much dreaded Blizzard has during the past month visited the State of Minnesota, and several fatal results have been reported. The narrow escape from death of one sufferer is recounted in the Fergus Falls Journal. It appears that a resident of Marston was making his way to his home on the night of December 13th, when he was overtaken by the storm; his lantern was blown out and he lost his way. He wandered helplessly in the snow all night, unable to discover his whereabouts, and when morning broke found himself out of sight of any house, and in a part of the country of which he knew nothing. He wandered about all day and through the following night, occasionally burrowing in the snow to get warmth. Just as he was losing all hope and he found his strength deserting him, he was seen by a pastor of the German Methodist church, who procured assistance and conveyed him to the house of a friend. It was found that his nose was swollen with frost and broken open and bleeding. His mustaches and whiskers carried a mass of solid ice, which prevented him from drinking water, for the want of which he was suffering. His face and ears were badly frozen, but worst of all his feet were solid to the ankles and his hands nearly to the wrists. His condition excited much alarm, but he was sedulously cared for, and is now recovering. He says that he became delirious while wandering over the prairie, and saw visions of home and family, of warm houses with nicely spread tables, and that he actually advanced to these visions to find them a cold and hollow mockery.

What a type was this hopeless wanderer of the sinner pursuing visions of happiness and peace in the world, before the great Shepherd finds him and leads him to the haven of rest and safety!

PROPHETIC ASPECT OF EUROPE.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

The Four Horn Kingdoms being Formed—Disquietude among All Nations—Infidelity Advancing.

THE Berlin Congress in July, 1878, and the Russo-Turkish war of which it was the settlement, advanced, by a very decided stage, the fulfilment of the prophecy in Revelation 16:12, about the shrinkage and drying up of the Turkish Empire or mystic Euphrates; and also the prophecy in Daniel 8:8, 9, 22, 23, about the latter-day revival of the four ancient horn kingdoms of Alexander's successors, namely, Greece, Egypt, Thrace-with-Bithynia, and Syria.

Those four kingdoms became all absorbed into the one Empire of Turkey, but Prophecy said they must reappear at the Time of the End (Dan. 8:19, 22, 23); and consequently in 1829 Greece, and in 1831 Egypt, after revolting against Turkey, became separate and independent kingdoms.

And now Thrace is beginning to be formed, because by the Berlin Congress Turkey in Europe having lost Bulgaria and Servia, thereby has the Balkan Mountains made its northern boundary, which was the very boundary line of Thrace; and thus three sides of Thrace—the north, east, and south—have already become visible, and it only remains for the fourth side, on the west, also to be made visible by further wars; then Thrace will have reappeared, just as Greece and Egypt already have done.

It will still further remain for Syria to be separated from Turkey to complete the predicted reappearance of those ancient four kingdoms—an event which will betoken the End of this Dispensation to happen within a few years' time.

For Daniel states in his eighth chapter that when these four-horn kingdoms shall have distinctly reappeared, there will arise out of one of them a little horn, or sovereign—i.e., ruling over a little kingdom in comparison with those four larger ones—who shall be a king of fierce countenance and crafty policy, and shall "wax exceeding great, toward the south (Egypt), and toward the east (Thrace and Syria), and toward the pleasant land of Judea." His first rising as a horn out of one of the four horns (Dan. 8:9) denotes his little kingdom being carved out of one of those four kingdoms, just as if, for instance, he should have Macedon given him out of Greece to reign over.

This Little Horn is afterwards to make a seven years' covenant with the Jews seven years before the End, and gradually to gain power over all nations, and to persecute Jews and Christians everywhere during the final three and a half years, and then perish at Christ's descent at the battle of Armageddon (Dan. 9:27; 7:25; Rev. 13; 19:19, etc.). This Little Horn, or Personal Antichrist, will probably be a Napoleon, and whether Prince Jerome Napoleon, who is now the head of the Bonaparte dynasty, will be the man, events will erelong show.

PRESENT DISQUIETED STATE OF THE WORLD.

The London Times of December 16th said: "The approach of Christmas is not heralded this year by signs of 'good-will among men.' In whatever direction the eyes are turned they see swords being sharpened for the strife; on every side the ears are filled with a noise of embittered dispute and mutual threats. France, according to the hopes or fears of Frenchmen of all parties, totters on the brink of a great political crisis. French democrats are not content with freedom from a military despotism and unchallenged liberty to make what converts they can. The Republic under which they live reminds them too painfully of an ideal Republic which is to commence by a tyranny over opinion.

"Russia is staggering under the shock of volcanoes working in darkness, on which repression exercises only the same power as water exercises on burning oil. Military policemen crush the centres of disaffection to find that they have only multiplied them. Russian enthusiasm has emancipated the Balkan populations at the cost of accepting for itself an intolerable yoke of domestic suspicion and terror.

"Italy, the instant it has escaped from one parliamentary dead-lock, seems gayly to prepare itself for another. Spain has been unable, even amid the festivities of its young king's marriage, to enjoy a truce from internal discords. Externally, the conflict in Cuba has been smothered for a couple of years, to burst out as apparently inextinguishable as ever. Belgium, which might have been thought an oasis of orderly constitutional liberty on the European continent, is withered up with ecclesiastical rancor. On one frontier of Turkey there is an armed neutrality, in which the neutrality is less conspicuous than the arming. On another frontier there is a sound of war, which may not be the less menacing that Constantinople does not appear to inspire it.

"Germany is too strong for open enemies; but its strength is purchased at a heavy price. It is turning railway contractor, with a certainty of the usual results when states intrude into trade. With the same motive of scraping together means for defraying war expenditure in times of peace, the Imperial Chancery is playing fast and loose with every principle which in the range of political economy the wisdom of the nineteenth century seemed to have established beyond the chance of cavil.

"Great Britain is no better able than its neighbors to smooth its brow in preparation for Christmas. It is abundantly supplied with matter of contention at home. In Ireland, it has a problem to deal with, the more difficult, if not insoluble, that it is no work of the present generation, but of a dozen generations which preceded. On the one side of the Empire darkens the thick cloud of Irish poverty, deepened by rhetorical disaffection, eager to protest against every manifestation of charity which does not imply political concessions. The cares of empire on the west are balanced by others on the east. This Christmas the British nation cannot help regarding with anxiety, however unmixed with fear, the perils of its soldiers amid the seething turmoil of Afghan anarchy.

"If the world be not satiated with the spectacle of confusion, controversy, and misery throughout Europe and Asia, then in Africa Egyptian bondholders may solace themselves with the prospect of wars in Africa between their debtor and his Abyssinian neighbor. Should a makeweight still be wanted, it is always possible to throw in a revolution in San Domingo, or a bloody war about a guano deposit or nothing at all in Chili and Peru."

Prof. Van Oosterzee, an evangelical professor in Holland, recently declared, "A wave of infidelity is steadily advancing over Protestant Europe, and not even the most favored country will escape it. They have had it in Germany, and now we have it in Holland; they are beginning to get it in Scotland. In twenty years they will have it to the full, and all their theology will not save them." There is reason to fear the professor is right, but the Bible-reading habits and strong practical piety of Scottish Christians, we may hope, will be used by God to stem the flood.

A Practical Joke with a Fatal Termination was played in Chicago on December 27th. John M. Waite and M. B. Gould, prominent and respected business men of Chicago, intending to play a practical joke upon a colored janitor, disarranged the contents of Mr. Waite's room, and then concealed themselves in a closet until the janitor appeared. The latter becoming excited at the condition of the room, drew his revolver, and hearing a noise in the closet tried to open the door, and failing in that, fired through the door, killing Mr. Gould. The use of revolvers is far too much allowed in this country. Moreover, it seems the height of folly to have played a practical joke on a man carrying a revolver.

A WEIGHT OF WEALTH.

(Continued from page 31.)

The Old Lighthouse Keeper.

Elijah Dunnit had earned his epithet old from having set himself up early as a teacher of others. He had joined the Methodists of Dartford when there was a drunken and swearing vicar of Clifford, in old Charles Clifford's bachelor days; and his affection for Ernest, and reverence of William Britton, had not shaken his loyalty to his early choice.

He had been a local preacher for the Methodists at a time when to be that exposed him to ill-will and persecution in his native village; but he had never wavered. He had forsaken neither his village nor his work as a preacher in it; and his dogged perseverance and undoubted courage had prevailed over his persecutors in the long-run.

Ernest had always felt a strong friendship for old Dunnit, even as a lad, when he had stolen within earshot of his out-door preaching, and found it more interesting than the more literary sermons of the vicar. Old Dunnit was also an excellent authority about the weather and the tides, and he had been the best fisherman in the village, until a sharp attack of rheumatic fever had laid him low, and made it dangerous for him to resume his old occupation.

Ernest had then made him keeper of the lighthouse, where, as he said gratefully, he had always a good roof over his head, and strong walls to keep the wintry storms out. No danger of old Dunnit neglecting his duties as the last keeper had done.

Mr. Britton had found more real friendship with Elijah Dunnit than with any other of his parishioners; and old Dunnit prized his friendship next to Ernest's. Ever since Ernest had become vicar of Clifford, he had led the choir at the morning service, though he could not be present in the afternoon; for he was appointed by the Methodist minister at Lowborough to preach in distant villages, often having to walk five or six miles after his preaching was over, and hasten back without resting, to kindle his lamp in the light-house and hold his own special service there.

This February afternoon, as his clergyman approached him, he stood up and took off his knitted woollen cap, whilst a bright light came into his blue eyes, which were growing a little sunken under his white eyebrows.

"It's a rare sight always, sir," he said, after they had shaken hands cordially, and Mr. Britton had taken a seat beside him; "it's a rare sight is the sea! I'd never grow weary of it. It's part of the Lord's speech that He's utterin' to us day after day; but oh, what a world o' meanin' there is in every word of it! I wonder sometimes if I shall make it out through all eternity. (See Ps. 19.)

"Sometimes it seems to mean perfect peace, and sunshine, and love, and praise; and it looks like unto the sea o' crystal mingled with fire, stretchin' out before the throne o' God, with the harpers standin' on it, harping with their harps. And then a change comes, and it's all wild, and cruel, and ragin', and like unto the wicked that have no peace; and it's constantly castin' up mire and dirt, and I say in my heart, thank God, there'll be no more sea o' wickedness, but there'll be a sea o' glass before the throne. Ah, there's a meanin' in every look of it, if I could only make it out!"

"Elijah," said Mr. Britton abruptly, "what sort of lad was young Charles Clifford?"

"Why," answered old Dunnit, "he was like the sea when it's all foam, and froth, and breakers, and mischief. He was never quiet, was Master Charlie. If I'd only know of his repentance I could almost wish him safe in Abraham's bosom with poor beggar Lazarus. It 'ud be a rare bad thing for Clifford if he ever come back troublin'; even if he'd got conversion he'd always be a light-headed, skittish fellow; like the silly women that Paul says are 'ever learnin', and never able to come to the knowledge of the truth.' (2 Tim. 3 : 7.) Some folks need a deal o' conversion, and he'd be one of them. He'd want convertin' scores o' times before he'd leave off backslidin'. No, no; pray God Master Charlie may never come back to Clifford!"

"Why, Elijah!" exclaimed Mr. Britton, "are you setting your face against a prodigal?"

"No, sir; not if he be a true prodigal," he answered; "let him come home a true prodigal, willin' to be one of th' hired servants, and he'd be welcome. But Master Charlie would never be like that. In these times prodigals are quite angered if they don't find the fatted calf cooked at once for' em, and rings ready for their fingers, and the easiest shoes for their feet. They think it a far finer thing to have gone away and wasted their substance in riotous livin', than to have stayed quiet at home, like th' elder brother that was always with his father.

"And there are folks that teach as much. 'The greater the sinner the greater the saint,' they say. No, I say; the saints o' the Bible were never great sinners to begin with. There's Abraham, and Moses, and Daniel, and the prophets, and John and his fellow disciples. I'd not trust to Master Charlie ever bein' much of a saint; but Master Ernest, God bless him, isn't far off the kingdom o' heaven; he's very nigh its gates."

"Not inside yet?" asked Mr. Britton with a smile.

"Not quite. As far as I can judge," replied old Dunnit, "he's a grand man; but the world has its grip on him yet. But he's at the gate of his father's house, and never strayed away into the far country, like Master Charlie. He's given peace and quietness to Clifford, such as never was in my days. I'd a line or two of one of our hymns runnin' sing-song through my head as you came up here, sir—

'Glide our happy hours away,
Glide wi' down upon their feet.'

Thanks be to the Lord and Master Ernest!"

The old rhyme, which had been running through Mr. Britton's brain came back again as Dunnit spoke, and a flush of self-reproach passed over his pale and quiet face. He wished his mind was freer from old college studies. Here was a point to be gained in his upward course.

"But if Charles Clifford came back, he could have no claim on the estate," he said musingly.

"Folks aren't altogether sure," answered old Dunnit; "there was a talk just at first—a bit o' whisperin' talk—that Master Ernest didn't seem quite easy about taking the place. We were all hearkenin' out for some fresh news, either as Master Charles was come, or Master Ernest would na' enter altogether into full possession. There were folks as said Julia Rush and her mother knew where he was bidin'; but it's ten years ago now since his father died, and no news of him yet. It was his own father that ruined him; for 'He that spareth his rod hateth his son; but he that loveth him chasteneth him betimes'" (Prov. 13 : 24).

A slight shadow of anxiety flitted across the vicar's face, as the thought of his own children rapidly crossed his mind. He was well aware that they never received any chastisement from himself, beyond a mild rebuke, which was seldom heeded.

"It's a hard thing to be a good father," he said.

"Ay, so it is," assented old Dunnit; "it's not a easy thing to be good at aught; even a good lighthouse man. Now and again I leave my oil-can till there's barely enow' to keep my lamps burnin' all night. I sometimes do wonder that the Lord said as half the virgins were wise, and only half of 'em foolish. If He'd a said nine out o' the ten were foolish, it 'ud have seemed more life-like. I've had to melt down all sorts o' grease to keep my light up, and all because o' my own folly.

"There's plenty of oil kept up at the Court for me, if I'd only recollect it betimes; but instead o' that I've been forced to take my wife's grease, ay, and the butter too once. I made a kind of a parable of it the next Sunday, and told 'em how we were forced to use up our own good things to keep our lamps a burnin', if we neglected goin' to Him as was willin' and eager to give us th of oil.

"God Almighty doesn't wish to take awa gifts—our boats, and nets, and flocks, houses, and children; but if we won't kee lamps burnin' for want of the oil He's rea give us into th' bargain, we're forced to us those other gifts of His. That seemed to hold on them, sir. My wife didn't mind th of her butter when she saw what came of it she takes care I'm never out of oil since th

"Have you many of the men up her Sunday nights?" asked Mr. Britton.

"Mostly the wastrels," he replied, "the would come whether there's meetin' or them as have no pleasant fireside, and the are out at service with the farmers, and th love to keep a watch o'er the sea. A few c lasses and women come in the summer, give them no encouragement; it's like h them in the forecastle. Keep to your own says I. There's the church, with a good and comfortable seats, and plenty o' light no slippery path to travel along, shriekin' if slip on a bit of seaweed.

Old Dunnit had spoken out of the fulne his heart, and the vicar neither misunder him nor felt offended with him, though he s with a sudden sense of humor quickly repr

The sun had gone down while they were ing, and he went indoors with Dunnit to k the lamp in the small, square tower.

It was no dwelling-place, but simply the bare walls of the old chapel, with a small in one corner, and a single chair and table b it. A few rude benches stretched acros room; planks, with the bark left on the side, supported on rough logs. At the we end rose the belfry, now the lighthouse t with a ladder leading up into it. This wa Dunnit's meeting-room.

His home was in a little cottage, scarc gunshot away, but well sheltered from th of the winds and waves which beat again lantern hill. Behind it a meadow sloped u cliff; and before it lay a little plot of g never touched by the salt tides, but kept a cool and green by the moist breezes swe across the sea.

Mrs. Britton had come to visit Mrs. D that very afternoon. A very quiet woma old Dunnit's wife—a little older than hi and accustomed to regard him somewhat indulgent mother regards a grown-up son, she has spoiled a little in his young days. received her visitor, the vicar's lady, wit coming civility and ceremony, and h accompanied her to the garden-gate o departing, and was about to turn back in house, when she heard her name called clear, young, ringing voice.

"That's Miss Rose!" she exclaimed t self, and her face brightened with a pe tenderness; "she always reminds me of fl and sunshine, and birds singing; ah! a bright angels too! Clifford 'ud be a du place without Miss Rose!"

She went back to her garden wicket shaded her wrinkled face with her ha watch Rose coming up with swift, half-ru steps from the beach, where Ernest Cliffo making his boat secure against the inc tide. She had grown into a tall, slim girl a simple and natural grace in all her move and a delicate poise of her pretty head, perhaps from Ruth Symons. There w assurance of perfect health and undimmed ness about her, constituting her chief c which worked subtly upon those who had upon life's ordinary lot of impaired vigo only a moderate share of gladness.

Rose had never been ill, and had kno troubles but those arising from her mother's whims, from which her father h ways speedily rescued her. She was the idol village. From the time when she had brought a motherless baby into Clifford, mother in the neighborhood had caresse petted her.

Her father, and Mr. Britton, and old Dunnit had each sown some good seed in her young heart. But she had had no opportunity, as yet, of learning trust in God through bitter mistrust of man, or of cleaving to God because she found it vain to lean upon any fellow-creature. There was no void in her life. Her father was, in her eyes, love and wisdom personified. Clifford was the small kingdom over which she reigned absolutely. Who could be happy if she was not?

As she came up to Mrs. Dunnit, laughing and almost breathless, she bent down her sweet young face, and kissed the old woman who had been watching for her.

"There, mammy!" she said gayly, "that's because you look such a dear, peaceful old darling. I don't kiss everybody, you know; only my father, and granny when she is good, and one person besides—the best, and sweetest, and dearest of all living creatures. Guess who it is."

"Not a sweetheart, Miss Rose!" cried Mrs Dunnit in a tone of real alarm.

"A sweetheart!" echoed Rose with a flash of disdain; "who would want a sweetheart with such a father as mine! No, no, Mrs. Dunnit. It's Ruth; Miss Ruth Symons, my friend, and my father's friend."

"I'm glad it's nobody else!" answered Mrs. Dunnit, greatly relieved; "but you spoke so warm and hearty, Miss Rose, my dear! You're too young yet; and don't you go and throw away your girlhood on a sweetheart. You've got your best days, and make the most of her."

"I hate talking about such things," said Rose with crimson face, and her head tossed back. "But isn't Mr. Britton a good man, Mrs. Dunnit?"

"He's a very good man," answered Mrs. Dunnit heartily.

"Besides," went on Rose, "I have great news to tell you. We are going to London, my father and I! We set off on our travels next Monday morning, early. Father says now I am near eighteen it is time I saw the world a little; but I shall never love any place so well as Clifford. I can't imagine being happy anywhere else; not really happy and at home. I shall enjoy going to London; and we are to be away three months, till the end of May, perhaps. Granny is quite wild because Dr. Welsh says she must not go after all. She has been counting upon it all winter; and she said she would have another doctor, who would let her go; but my father says she shall not come with us, if there is any risk. Mrs. Dunnit, did you ever know two such good men as my father and Mr. Britton?"

"No, never, Miss Rose!" she responded fervently, "none save my old man. Eh! but Clifford is a favored place now! Sometimes I'm afraid it's like old Capernaum, lifted up to heaven; and the folks there wouldn't turn and repent, and it was thrust down to hell, for its hardness of heart.* There's no upper sort of sin, Miss Rose, such as Master Ernest and Mr. Britton can see; but there's a deal o' natural sin out o' sight. But there! Don't thee look low cast. Clifford's a favored place; a very favored place."

(To be continued.)

THE TEMPTATION OF JESUS.

S. S. Lesson for Jan. 25. Matt. 4:1–11. Golden Text, Heb. 2:18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

It is written of our beloved Lord, "In all things it behoved Him to be made like unto His brethren" (Heb. 2 : 17), and temptation was not excepted. For only "in that He Himself hath suffered being tempted, is He able to succor them that are tempted." He must occupy, by conquering it in person, all the ground which man had lost by sin, and drive the enemy from every position which he had taken.

The three evangelists who deal with the details of our Lord's life on earth all mention that His temptation immediately succeeded His baptism. St. Mark says (1 : 12), "And immediately the Spirit driveth Him into the wilderness. And He was there in the wilderness forty days, tempted of Satan; and was with the wild beasts;" no human hand, or voice, or heart to sympathize, but "the angels ministered to Him." St. Luke tells us (4 : 1, 2) that He was full of the Holy Ghost when He was thus tempted: "And in those days He did eat nothing." Both Matthew and Luke tell us that it was after, and not during, these forty days, that He was "an hungered."

Every true child of God has to do with temptation, and often the enemy seeks to lead us into great error on this subject. On the one hand he suggests, If you were a child of God, you would not be so much tempted; the Lord's own temptation is our blessed refuge from this lie. On the other hand he leads some of God's children to live in an atmosphere of constant temptation, in which they cannot distinguish temptation from sin, and in which they seem to think it is their misfortune to be overcome again and again, and they are always excusing themselves. Can it be necessary to say that to live by the faith of the Son of God is to live a life of overcoming, in which victory is the result of every struggle, as it was with our Lord? Let us not forget that, being full of the Holy Ghost, He was led by the Spirit to His temptation, while very often we, being full of ourselves, are led by our own perverseness into ours.

The aim of the enemy in all our temptations is that we may fall into his snare (2 Tim. 2 : 26); God's aim is our perfecting in patience. Therefore He says, "Count it all joy when ye fall into divers temptations; knowing this, that the trying of your faith worketh patience. But let patience have her perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, wanting nothing" (James 1 : 2–4). Thus a temptation defeated may prove our greatest blessing, and though we may fear as we enter into the cloud, yet we have the pledged word of God (1 Cor. 10 : 13), "There hath no temptation taken you but such as is common to man: but God is faithful, who will not suffer you to be tempted above that ye are able; but will with the temptation also make a way to escape, that ye may be able to bear it."

The Lord's example to us is very teaching. When fighting not against flesh and blood, but against principalities, against powers, etc. (Eph. 6 : 12), He did not strengthen His body by taking food, but met the enemy fasting. And when the pangs of hunger were allowed to come upon Him, and the enemy came to Him and said, "If thou be the Son of God, command that these stones be made bread," He could speak from the experience of the past forty days that which He quoted from the written Word, "It is written, Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God." When we are called by God to fast and pray, not by any spirit of legality or by imitation of others, and when we in this manner pass through deep waters of conflict with the enemy, it is an absolute fact which many of God's people have experienced, that there is a power in the written Word of the living God to impart strength to body as well as soul.

In this first of our Lord's temptations which is revealed to us, the enemy comes to suggest a doubt. He does not say, "Thou Son of God, or because thou art the Son of God, command these stones," etc., but "If thou art." This is just his method with many weak believers. If thou wert a child of God, thou wouldest be much more like such an one. If thou wert a child of God, thou wouldest be much more joyful, etc. And he makes use of his own snares, and says, If thou wert a child of God thou couldst not be tempted about such and such a thing. Let him inject a doubt as to our standing in Christ, he has already then got a foothold, and he can easily lead us from thence into the commission of sin. We are only safe in the certainty of our standing place in Christ. It is neither our likeness to this or that Christian, our joy, our feelings, our freedom from temptation, or aught else in us, which makes us to be children of God. But "as many as received Him, to them gave He power to become the sons of God" (John 1 : 12).

Jesus was the living Word, and when He used the written Word against the enemy, temptation again on the same point became impossible to Him. And in measure as we become in our experience living examples of the truth of God, one thrust with the sword of the Word is enough to frustrate the enemy. What had he further to say on this point when the Lord Jesus had already proved, during forty days and nights, that "man doth not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God"? Let us also dare by faith to put God's Word in every thing to the proof; thereby we are temptation-proof.

The enemy now tried another device. It is as though he had said, "Now thou art so holy and supernatural, thou canst live without food, and nothing can hurt thee;" go a step farther, "If thou be the Son of God, cast thyself down from this pinnacle of the temple, for it is written, He shall give His angels charge concerning thee, and in their hands they shall bear thee up, lest at any time thou dash thy foot against a stone." He would lead on to presumption; and with how many of God's dear children has he succeeded! Oh how many have been placed on the pinnacle of the temple by their reputation, and they have counted on their own strength and their own past experience, and fearful falls have been the result!

The Lord Jesus silenced him with another Scripture. The enemy had met with his Master; in the first temptation he was conquered, and now he knew he had to do with the Son of God; and Jesus in His quotation assumes the authority which for our sakes He had laid down for a time, and said, "It is written again, Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God." Satan had attempted to bring the power of Scripture to bear upon Jesus; but in missing out a part of His quotation, "to keep thee in all thy ways" (Ps. 91 : 11), the sword of the Spirit had no power in the enemy's hands, while he himself was defeated by it a second time.

The third temptation was the most daring one: "the devil taketh Him up into an exceeding high mountain, and sheweth Him all the kingdoms of the world, and the glory of them; and saith unto Him, All these things will I give Thee if Thou wilt fall down and worship me." Could this be a temptation to Jesus? Let us not forget that He was man, and that He emptied Himself, and then we can get a glimpse of how the Son of God, who "knew no sin" (2 Cor. 5 : 21), "suffered, being tempted." Not the horrible vacillatiom of an unrenounced will, the questioning, How far dare I go without losing my soul? Sin had no attraction for Him. But He suffered. Perhaps the very suggestion of gaining the world, and laying it at His Father's feet, without having to bear the shame and agony which the imputation of the world's sin should bring upon Him, may have caused Him intense suffering. But there was no wavering: "Jesus saith unto him, Get thee hence, Satan; for it is written, Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve."

"Then the devil leaveth Him, and behold angels came and minstered unto Him." Luke tells us, "When the devil had ended all the temptations, he departed from Him for a season." This is enough to disclose to us that the enemy had not ceased forever his attacks even upon our Lord. Immediately afterwards we read, "Jesus returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee," strengthened, not weakened, by the conflict. He came out of it, having been "tempted in all points like as we are, yet without sin." And therefore is He able to succor them that are tempted. The enemy can meet us on no ground which is unconquered by our great Captain. Therefore sin is so exceedingly sinful in us who are God's children. The provision for our victory is made, we can conquer if we will, although alone through Him.

---

* Matt. 11 : 23.

FOREIGN TOPICS

The English Position in Afghanistan continues to excite uneasiness in Great Britain. The latest reports say that every thing gives token of a severe winter, and many persons believe that General Roberts' difficulties have only just begun. The troops have exchanged the thin canvas of their tents at Sharpur for the strong mud walls of houses at Cabul, and the sick are comfortably housed in the barracks. But there is a great want of winter clothing, and especially of fuel. Caste is strong among the Sepoys, who refuse to drink at wells which are common to all. Forage for the animals is very hard to find, and the slaughter of horses and camels has already begun. The advantage of holding the city is considerable, and there is no immediate fear that provisions will run out. But what disheartens Sir Frederick Roberts and his countrymen at home is that the war seems now to be practically interminable. The crops having been gathered, the tribes have leisure to fight and pillage till the spring. Their check on the heights above Cabul is known to have been very slight. Mahomed Jan, the former Governor of Ghaznee, the most formidable leader in the field, is gathering forces in his old territory. A proclamation of amnesty has been issued, in which only the prominent leaders are excepted.

The Continent of Europe is Rife with Rumors of coming wars. Every day the cable brings reports of complications and jealousies which may at any time produce a general outbreak. The attitude of Russia toward England is declared to be "without question unfriendly," and the English Government will lay before Parliament when it meets, unmistakable evidence of Russian intrigue in Afghanistan. The London Standard of January 10th says, "the Governments of Austria and Germany are about to communicate with that of St. Petersburg regarding the concentration of Russian troops in Poland, and, if the reply is unsatisfactory, will adopt defensive measures. Under these circumstances nobody cares to deny that Europe may be on the verge of a crisis which will lead it nobody knows whither."

The Dangerous Illness of the Young Queen of Spain is announced: A despatch to the Daily News from Paris says: "It is stated in medical circles that the health of the Queen of Spain has received a severe shock, owing to the attempted assassination of King Alfonso. She has been attacked with epileptic fits, to which she was not previously subject." It is to be hoped that Alfonso will see in this new affliction the chastening hand of God, and endeavor to discover whether there is any thing in his life and government, any great sin for which God is punishing him personally.

The Change of Ministry in France has issued in the premiership being intrusted to M. de Freycinet, who is a Protestant. It is remarkable that in a land so thoroughly given over to Roman Catholicism and infidelity so important a position should be held by an avowed Protestant. The new premier has stated his conviction that "the close contact of the Papal power with the civil power paralyzes its efforts and creates difficulties." He is not the first statesman nor the only one now living who has made the discovery that wise and just government is impossible where the Roman Catholic Church is allowed to exercise its power over the people.

The Distress in Ireland Continues to Cause serious apprehension, and it is feared that unless prompt aid be rendered a time of suffering unknown of late years must ensue. Bishop Fitzgerald, in the south-west portion of Cork County, writes: "Private benevolence is doing wonders, but all private or eleemosynary assistance, however extensive, cannot possibly keep the people alive during the next five or six months." A proposition has been made to devote $12,500,000 of the surplus funds accruing from the confiscated revenues of the Protestant Church in Ireland for the prosecution of relief works, but it excites much hostility in certain quarters. The advocates of this measure support it by strong arguments, and it is believed that Parliament will sanction the proposal. It is feared that if the Government remains supine and does not adopt energetic and thorough measures for the relief of the people, a very dangerous impetus to the home-rule movement will be given.

In Connemara, while a number of bailiffs were serving a series of ejectment papers upon several tenants of the district, under the protection of a detachment of constabulary, a large company of tenantry assembled, and finally attacked the ejectment servers. The bailiffs called for help upon the constabulary, who at first fired upon the people, and afterward charged them with fixed bayonets, wounding a large number, some of them, it is believed, fatally. The mob retreated, but continued throwing missiles and firing scattering shots at the constabulary, from behind casual defences by the hedges. The whole district is declared to be in revolt as a result of the disposition on the part of the landlords to press evictions there, and further disturbances are imminent. Two hundred extra policemen have been drafted.

The Glasgow Bank Failure Involved an amount of misery in England and Scotland the full extent of which will never be known. The report of the liquidators, lately published, shows how deep and wide-spread it must be. Over twenty million dollars have already been collected from the shareholders, of whom there were 1819. Some of these were utterly ruined by the first call, which was for $2500 on every $500 share. The next call was for $11,250 on each share, but there were then only 1518 shareholders left on whom to levy it. Of these a large number were unable to meet the call, and many gave up to the liquidators at once the whole of their property. The failure up to the present time has resulted in the entire financial ruin of more than a thousand persons, and the liquidators have not yet ended their demands on the remaining shareholders. The vast aggregate of misery involved cannot be imagined, and some individual cases are pitiable in the extreme. Numbers of persons who had invested their savings in these shares, and considered themselves provided for for life, have now to begin again to labor for their bread. How true are the words of Scripture: "Riches certainly make themselves wings; they fly away as an eagle"! (Prov. 23:5).

The Turkish Priest who was Condemned to death for assisting a missionary to translate Christian books has had his sentence commuted to banishment for life. Sir Austin Layard, the British ambassador, obtained this mitigation of punishment, but not until he had threatened to break off all friendly relations between England and Turkey. At his trial the priest defended himself with ability, showing from Mohammedan law that he had committed no offence, and had done no more than the Porte had in giving permission for the circulation of the Christian Scriptures in the empire. The court, however, which was composed of bigoted Ulemas, who, doubtless, had the priest in abhorrence as a reformer, found judgment against him and notified the Sultan thereof. He was returned to the palace while the Sultan considered his case, occupying a kind of dungeon, with no floor and no furniture save a bed. No communication with him was permitted.

The Intense Cold which has Prevailed in Paris during the last month has drawn forth the charitable impulses of many who have hitherto been regarded as among the most frivolous of humanity. The correspondent of a London newspaper says: "A remarkable feature of the streets is the open-air fires, some of which have been lighted at the expense of the municipality, and others at the cost of wealthy inhabitants before the doors of their houses. The charitable zeal which the rigorous weather has called forth does not seem to abate. There is as great rivalry in good works among ladies as there used to be in mundane frivolity. Many have bravely gone to serve in improvised soup-kitchens, and others act as district visitors to inquire into the circumstances of applicants for relief, and with their own hands distribute clothing, both and new, which is collected by good Samari for their famishing brethren and sisters. fore the last war no such spirit of fraternity isted, but since it appears to have gone on g ering strength.'

Eleven Little Orphan Girls—the First ceived into Mr. Spurgeon's newly-formed phanage for Girls—occupied seats on the l platform at the Tabernacle, along with Stockwell boys, on Sunday, December 20th, t presence creating considerable curiosity. services were conducted by Rev. E. P. Ga of Bristol, formerly a student in the pas college. He made an earnest appeal to the gregation not to let the contributions to Spurgeon's institutions languish in the abs of the pastor. He also read a Christmas g ing from Mr. Spurgeon at Mentone to his fl The health of the eminent preacher has gr improved.

The Sunday Stone.—In an Oxford Mus may be seen a strange stone. It is compose carbonate of lime, and was taken from a which carries off drain water in a colliery. stone consists of alternate layers of black white, so that it has a striped appearance. was caused in the following way: When miners were at work the water which ran thr the pipe contained a good deal of coal-dust, so left a black deposit in the pipe. But no work was going on—as, for instance, i night—the water was clean, and so a white was formed. In time these deposits quite the pipe, and so it was taken up. Then it found that the black and white layers fo quite a calendar. Small streaks, altern black and white, showed a week, and then a white streak of twice the usual size. This Sunday, during which there was, of cours work for twenty-four hours. For this reas was called the Sunday Stone. Men forget their lives leave a record of their acts ofte seen by them, in which sins they have comm and forgotten will appear as plainly as the l in this stone, if not washed away by the blo Jesus.

A Wreath of Ivy Around the Head Royal Corpse.—The property ivy has of a ing itself to circumstances is most striking lustrated by an incident related in an En journal by Miss Strickland. The body of arine Parr, one of the wives of King H VIII. of England, buried at Sudley, was d terred, through curiosity, on several occas The last time the coffin was opened, "it discovered that a wreath of ivy had entwine self around the temples of the royal corpse berry had fallen there at the time of the pre exhumation, taken root, and then silently day to day woven itself into this green sepul coronal."

Famine in Armenia.—Telegrams Rece from British consuls, dated January 4th, that a terrible famine prevails in the distric Baskaleh and Bayazid, in Armenia. The thorities are helpless to aid the people, and feared the famine will become general on eastern frontier of Turkey.

Discouraging Reports Come from the Ny Mission in Africa. Hostile influences at on the mind of King Mtesa have put him i attitude of antagonism to the missionaries. has accused them of complicity with an sion of his territory by the Egyptians. Hea potentates find it difficult to discriminate tween the acts of Christian governments an religion the missionaries are teaching. know how little Christian principle has t with the policy of governments, but we ca wonder that in the mind of an African kin principle and the policy should be assoc with each other.

The "Tombs of the Kings," which are ated a short distance to the north of Jerusa have recently been purchased by a French and by her orders excavations have been u taken there. Capitals and other architectur mains have been found.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

Published at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

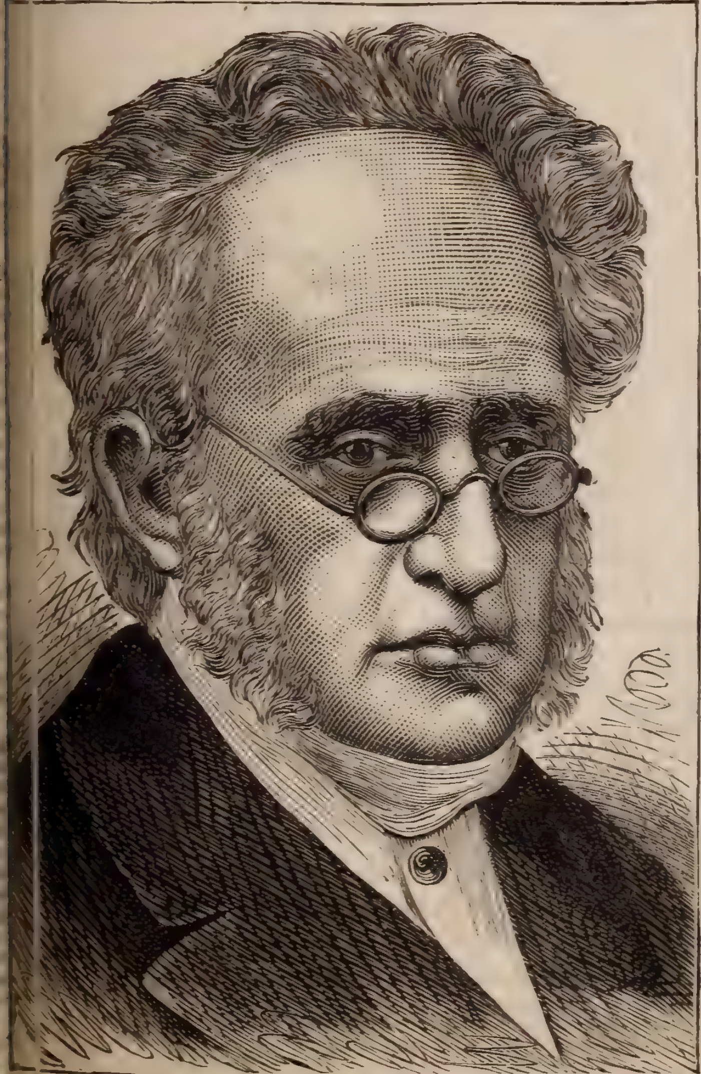
is Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TALMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. HAY AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

Single Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, JANUARY 22, 1880. 14th Year. No. 4—New Series.

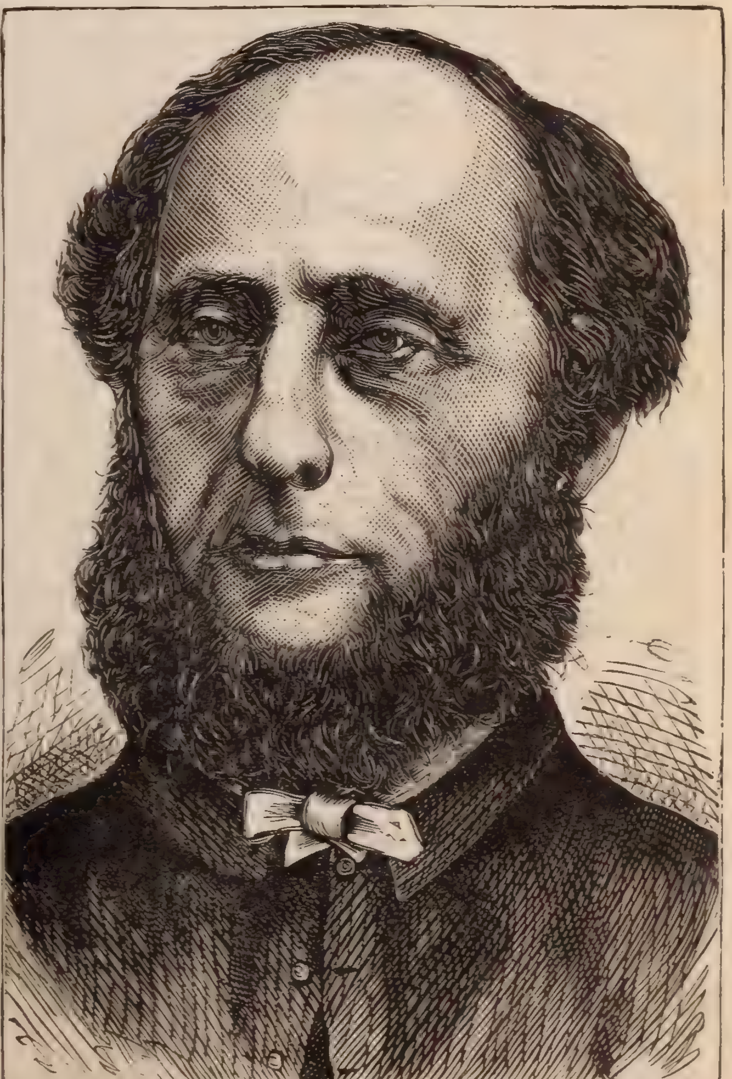
CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORTRAITS OF THE LATE MR. JOHN VINE HALL AND THE REV. NEWMAN HALL, LL.B., with Sketches of their Lives.
HUNGER IN IRELAND. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
A Scotch-woman's Faith—Insanity Produced by Intemperance.
ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE. A Thrilling Serial Story by the Author of "Felicia Cuffe."
MY RESOLVE IN AFRICA, by Major Malan.
THE TRIBULATIONS OF SCRIPTURE, by Mr. W. Maude—A Hunter's Discovery of a Crazed Man.
CURRENT EVENTS: Financial Topics in Congress—The Maine Complications—A Sunday Pastime Interrupted—A Shocking Disclosure—Accidents on the Ferries—A Young Lawyer's Suicide—An Unexpected Meeting—A Miser's Death in a Stable—A House Demolished by a Train—God's Carriage—A Christian Philanthropist's Misfortunes, etc.
A HAIRBREADTH ESCAPE AND A DESPERATE BATTLE. A Reminiscence by Mr. John Vine Hall.
THE HUNGER-BITE. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon—The Indian Opium Trade.
A Short Homily on the Tay Bridge Accident—Signs of the End—An Unusual Noise.
A WEIGHT OF WEALTH. (Continued.)
True Disciples. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The English Position in Afghanistan—Irish Distress—An Imperial Scandal—A Series of Riots—A Fall into a Grave—A Letter from Mr. Spurgeon—A Scene at a Wake—The Wounded Officer, etc.

Cul



The late Mr. JOHN VINE HALL, Author of "The Sinner's Friend."



Rev. NEWMAN HALL, LL.B., Author of "Come to Jesus."

THE LATE MR. JOHN V. HALL,

Father of Rev. Newman Hall.

His Early Dissipation—His Marriage at Worcester—His Conversion and Spiritual Struggles—His Deliverance from Inebriety in 1818—Anecdotes about Him—How his "Sinner's Friend" was Written.

JOHN VINE HALL, author of "The Sinner's Friend," was born at Diss, in Norfolk, England, March 14th, 1774. His father had accumulated property, but lost it, and "Little Jack" was sent, at eleven years of age, as errand-boy to a bookseller at Maidstone. He soon won the confidence of his employers, and became chief assistant. At the age of twenty-five a higher salary induced him to become clerk and traveller to a wine merchant.

His genial spirit and manners had exposed him to social dangers which were now increased, and he frequently gave way to intemperance, and even embraced infidelity, from which, however, he was delivered by reading Bishop Porteus's "Evidences of the Christian Religion." From evil associations he endeavored, after three years, to escape by leaving Maidstone and taking a bookseller's business in Worcester.

In 1804 he there met a young lady whom at first sight he resolved to win. Her mother, Mrs. Teverill, came of an old family, and was justly proud of her daughter, who was good-looking, clever, and well educated. Moreover, she was only sixteen; and Mrs. Teverill became strongly opposed to her union with a stranger who had just opened a shop in the city, and of whose former life unfavorable rumors might have reached her. These difficulties were overcome by the ardor of affection, and in 1806 John Vine Hall married Mary Teverill, who became the guardian angel of his life, and instrumental in his salvation.

During his brief residence in Worcester he had won the respect of all who knew him; but his reformation was superficial, and his old habits of inebriety reasserted their power. His young wife, now a mother, bore up bravely before the world, often transacting his business and writing his letters, to shield him from disgrace. Her only reproaches were irrepressible tears; while, without ceasing, she sought the help of God.

At length those prayers seemed about to be answered. On March 14th, 1812, his thirty-eighth birthday, he became the subject of strong

RELIGIOUS CONVICTIONS.

Yet he relapsed again and again into his former habits. The conflict continued for several years, as so graphically narrated in his Autobiography. In 1814 he returned to Maidstone, as master of the bookselling business to which he had gone as errand-boy twenty-eight years before. Old friends greeted him joyfully and again were a snare.

In March, 1816, it was suggested that the craving for strong drink which he was so unable to resist might be treated medically. A physician ordered a tonic, and advised abstinence from brandy. The advice was eagerly followed, but after a season of sobriety wine overpowered him. He was in such distress on recovering from this attack, that on the day when his son Newman Hall was born, May 22d, 1816, he signed a paper, in the presence of two witnesses, giving authority that if necessary the severest measures might be taken, extending even to the confinement of his person. This he delivered to one of them as his own authority for any action they might take, so earnest was his desire for reformation.

On September 22d, 1816, after a long struggle, he was advised by his physician to give up wine and ale, confining himself to porter. He ever after looked back to that day with especial thankfulness as a new era in his life. But two years more elapsed before his final emancipation. After many months of sobriety porter was found to be dangerous, and was relinquished in July, 1818, the doctor still advising him to take table beer, but this also in a few weeks had to be abandoned, since which time, till his death, not a drop of intoxicating liquor of any description ever passed the surface of his tongue. The old temptation lost its power. He had no longer any desire for it. The taste and smell became hateful.

In a private box, opened after his decease, a bottle containing a little sediment was found wrapped up in a newspaper report of his temperance speech narrating his own history. On the outside was written, "This phial is one of upward of 200 of those out of which J. V. H. drank a preparation of steel in the year 1816. It is preserved, like the pot of manna, to show the way in which the Lord delivered his servant out of the wilderness—out of an horrible pit—out of his besetting sin. Oh, praised be the Lord! This medicine was persevered in about seven months. For the last eighteen years nothing stronger than tea, coffee, or milk has ever entered his stomach. November 22d, 1836. J. V. H."

During a period of forty-two years his life was one of progressive

HOLINESS AND USEFULNESS.

Overflowing with gratitude for his own salvation, he devoted himself to the service of his Divine Redeemer and the benefit of his fellowmen. As the author of "The Sinner's Friend," as an officer of a church, as a witness-bearer for Christ in all places and at all times, few private Christians have been more zealous and useful.

In 1850 he retired from business, and four years after left Maidstone to reside in London, where three of his sons were settled. As an elder of Surrey Chapel, and in his daily life, he continued his labors of love, till on September 22d, 1860, the anniversary of the day when he totally relinquished the use of wine, and which he always commemorated with special gratitude, he was taken to the presence of that Sinners' Friend whom he had delighted to extol.

In May of that year, at the age of eighty-seven, he fell from the step of a van and received an injury on his leg, which led to that fatal illness. His end was peace. His wife died triumphantly a few years afterwards, aged eighty-five.

He was a good musician. At fourscore he still played well on the flageolet and drew from the flute a peculiarly rich tone, while the fine tenor voice he consecrated to "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs" must have been a great acquisition in the convivial circles of his earlier years. He was to the last witty and facetious, had a store of capital anecdotes, and could imitate to perfection the Scotch, Irish, and Welsh diction.

He was always ready to help the weak. He often related how, on hearing the shrieks of a woman, he with one blow of his fist felled the ruffianly husband who was beating her, receiving for his reward a wound from the woman's patten, which left its mark on his forehead till the day of his death. Afterward, whenever he saw a man and a woman quarrelling, he moderated his indignation by saying to himself, "Remember the patten!" He once pinioned a highwayman single-handed, retaining him in his grasp till assistance came.

He was punctuality itself. At seven in the morning he was regularly seated at Scott's Bible. At eight, to a minute, he rang for family worship, which he conducted with great fervor, but which was not long. He never kept any one waiting for him a moment. He wrote with his watch open before him to secure exactness.

Why do you believe in Christ? was a question once asked him by a philosophical sceptic. He replied, "I have an argument you cannot answer—I believe in Him because I feel Him in my heart—He is here!" Thus he loved the Saviour's cause, and delighted to promote it. His house became a home for ministers, who were entertained with generous hospitality.

No pressure of business kept him from the week-night prayer-meeting or the week-night lecture. Whoever else was absent, his minister might rely on him. His motto was "God first, business next, pleasure last." For example: He was the proprietor of a newspaper, one of the oldest and most widely circulated in the county of Kent. For many years it had been customary for the men to work half the day on Sunday. He sent for the foreman and said this m discontinued. The foreman replied that t per could not be published in time, and th men would strike. "Then tell them, a hour's consideration, to come for their and I will find others." From that day n was done there on Sunday.

At Maidstone for a long period he re visited the prison and the workhouse, wh read and expounded the Scriptures. H sionally conducted the week-evening se and in London, until his last illness, quently took part in the devotional meet the church.

But his chief labors were with indi No suitable opportunity was ever neglect was his daily prayer that he might bea witness for Christ. When travelling he invariably introduce religious conversa so earnest yet so courteous a manner as to give offence; and so as most generall cure respectful attention from all descrip people.

On a voyage to Hull, for example, be with one passenger, he gained the atter all, until the saloon became a church. a constant visitor of the sick and dyin never went out of the door unprovided w ammunition of love, in the form of tract pen also was ever busy, and within a few of his decease he wrote to persons in w felt an interest urging them to seek th All his letters, except those of a merely l character, contained some holy counsel vout sentiment. It is easy to be "in season"—to speak for Christ on public o when asked or expected to do so; but t culty is to do so "out of season." Ho opportunities of doing good are lost b who confine their testimony to meetin vened for the purpose of hearing it!

"THE SINNER'S FRIEND."

But the most important work of his the publication of "The Sinner's Frien delighted in daily perusing "Bogatzky's Treasury." One morning the thought that what was so profitable to him mig to others who could not afford to purc book. So he resolved to extract som favorite portions, and print them in a gratuitous distribution. To this he introduction with the well-known a "Sinner, this little book is for you."

Two thousand were printed and giv Applications poured in, and another edi issued. Pious friends then insisted t should bear part of the expense. Thus became public, and soon acquired a v circulation. One by one he withdrew sages from Bogatzky, and inserted oth own, until the entire tract, with the of "a word to the poor," could claim h author.

Edition followed edition. Translati were made into nearly thirty languages; lish Tract Society, and that of America it. Nearly two millions of copies are circulation. Its usefulness has been dented. During many years, and from ters, testimony to this effect was pou author. Hundreds of most interesti came to his knowledge, and numberle have been written by him to person spiritual advice and consolation from h author.

The secret of its power was not only ness, its plainness of speech, its exal Christ, its obvious earnestness and sin intense love for the souls of men, but t prayer with which every edition was every copy circulated.

He left four sons, Newman and Ar are ministers; Warren, a printer and at Camden Town; and John Vine, who tain of the Great Eastern, and who died.

A THRILLING autobiographical na Mr. Hall will be found on page 59.

lie in these remarkable words: "Verily I you, There is no man that hath left r brethren, or sisters, or father, or moth- ife, or children, or lands, for My sake Gospel's, but he shall receive an hundred- in this time, houses, and brethren, and and mothers, and children, and lands, secutions" (Mark 10 : 28–30).

hich words of the Lord Jesus it is prob- t Paul referred when he exhorted the at Lystra, Iconium, and Antioch to con- the faith, reminding them that "we rough much tribulation, enter into the n of God" (Acts 14 : 22). While John es himself to the seven churches in Asia "brother and companion (or fellow-) in the tribulation and kingdom and ce in Jesus Christ" (Rev. 1 : 9).

"the tribulation in Jesus," or in other he Church's tribulation, is commensurate whole earthly existence. Its sources ous and constant. Consciousness of her ure, the latent when not overt hostility orld, the malignity of Satan and his d the gracious educative discipline of ne Husband and Lord; these are ever less in operation, and serve to make the of the Church one of suffering and on from her Pentecostal birthday to the her gathering together in the presence of ming Lord, at the sounding of the last theless, there have, doubtless, been seasons in the history of the Church, he has been called upon to endure tribu- f unwonted severity, when the furnace heated seven times more than it is wont lated, as when it is said to the Church na, "Ye shall have tribulation ten days" 10); supposed by some to have refer- he ten great Pagan persecutions through e early Church had to pass.

this tribulation of the Church it is not ntion to speak particularly at present; refore, having thus briefly indicated its and special character, we may at once to notice in the second place was most distinctly and emphatically d by the Lord Jesus in what is called rophecy on the Mount," recorded in the ourth and twenty-fifth chapters of the ccording to Matthew, and also, more suc- in the thirteenth chapter of the Gospel g to Mark, and the twenty-first chapter ospel according to Luke. In the first of rratives, having referred to the "abomi- f desolation, spoken of by Daniel the pro- anding in the Holy place;" a prediction ertainly received, at least, an inchoate t in the planting of the standards of the legions—the eagles upon which were of idolatrous worship to the Roman - in the lines of the besieging army under n, and their subsequent setting up on of the Temple after the taking of Jerusa- Titus; our Lord gives a warning to that are in Jerusalem to flee to the ns;" a warning which we know the Christians actually obeyed by fleeing to town on the northern boundary of en proceeds: "For there shall be great on, such as was not since the beginning orld to this time, no, nor ever shall be. cept those days should be shortened, hould no flesh be saved; but for the sake those days shall be shortened" 4 : 15–22). Now the parallel passage in 's Gospel—for that it is a parallel pas- a chronological parallel the most able tators are now pretty well agreed—reads when ye shall see Jerusalem compassed nies (= "When ye shall see the abomi- of desolation"), then know that the n thereof is nigh." (Luke 21 : 20–24.) we are plainly taught that the period of tribulation extends from the events which led to and accompanied the destruction of Jerusalem to the close of the present Gentile dispensation. Nor is there any real contradiction or even inconsistency between the prophecy as recorded by the Evangelist Matthew and the Evangelist Luke. The tribulation of Israel commences and ends in

THE TRIBULATION OF ISRAEL.

A TERRIBLE CRISIS.

The commencing crisis was the siege and destruction of Jerusalem, accompanied by all the appalling sufferings of the Jewish people, of which their historian Josephus has left us so ghastly a narrative; and the closing final crisis is that which they have yet to endure under the last personal Antichrist. These two crises in their main features bear a striking resemblance to each other, and they alone seem to be referred to by Matthew. Luke, however, shows us that they are only the beginning and ending of one long period of tribulation, extending over many centuries of more or less severe suffering to be endured by the Jewish people during their dispersion among the Gentiles.

This interpretation of the narratives of the three Synoptists alone enables us to affect a substantial harmony between them, without having recourse to the arbitrary and untenable assumption that while Luke describes only the events connected with the destruction of Jerusalem; Matthew, on the contrary, refers only to events to take place at the close of this dispensation.

Mark, it is immediately after and in obvious connection with the announcement that "Jerusalem shall be trodden down of the Gentiles, until the times of the Gentiles be fulfilled," that Luke refers to the abnormal celestial phenomena which are to indicate the imminent "coming of the Son of Man with power and great glory." And surely it is difficult to doubt that the time, as well as the events themselves, are identical with those spoken of by Matthew, when he says: "Immediately after the tribulation of those days shall the sun be darkened, and the moon shall not give her light." (Matt. 24 : 29–31.)

The point we desire clearly to bring out is this: Luke, as all admit, speaks of the destruction of Jerusalem as the days of Divine vengeance and wrath, to terminate only with the times of the Gentiles, and to be immediately followed by the predicted signs in the heavens, and the coming of the Son of Man. Matthew tells us that "Immediately after the tribulation of those days," these signs are to appear, and the coming of Christ is to take place.

But when he speaks of "those days," to what days does he allude? What days have been previously spoken of? Plainly, days commencing with the destruction of Jerusalem, and which must continue their course to the end of the present age, since they are to be followed "immediately" by its closing events. Therefore, according to both Matthew and Luke, the tribulation of Israel has already extended over more than eighteen centuries, and in this sense, as well as in that of the severity of its crisis, it may truly be called "a great tribulation, such as was not since the beginning of the world, no, nor ever shall be."

The attempt, which has not unfrequently been made, to eliminate from St. Matthew's prophecy all allusion to the destruction of Jerusalem, seems to us absolutely hopeless. The occasion of the whole discourse was, as we learn from the commencement of the chapter, the disciples drawing Christ's attention to the massive strength and grandeur of the Temple, and His exciting their profound astonishment by His startling reply: "See you not all these things? Verily I say unto you, there shall not be left here one stone upon another, that shall not be thrown down." Revolving these strange tidings in their troubled minds, they on the first opportunity ask Him, "Tell us when shall these things be?" By "these things" obviously meaning "these things respecting the destruction of our glorious Temple." Is it possible to suppose, then, that in the discourse which the Lord thereupon delivers, He actually gives no answer, does not, in fact, refer to their special inquiry? Would not this be as though having selected one text, He preached His sermon from another altogether different?

III. The third tribulation, to which we may now proceed to refer, is distinguished from all other tribulations in the same way, and by the same inpired writer, the Apostle John, as the last personal Antichrist is distinguished from all preceding manifestations of the "Mystery of Iniquity;" namely, by the use, in the original, of the definite article. In his first epistle, the beloved disciple writes: "He is the Antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son" (2 : 22); and in like manner in the book of Revelation (ch. 7 : 14) he speaks of or, as it is literally, "the tribulation, the great one." Now this tribulation, though intimately connected with the tribulation of Israel, of which we have just spoken; being, as we apprehend, so far as Israel is concerned, identical with its closing crisis, will at the same time by no means be confined to Israel; on the contrary, it will not only embrace the then existing ten kingdoms of the Roman world, but spread the wings of its terror over the whole earth. It will be the darkest hour in this world's dark history, as it will be the last before the dawn.

THE GREAT TRIBULATION;

In reference to the Jews, Daniel speaks of it as "a time of trouble, such as never was since there was a nation, even to that same time; and at that time thy people (the Jewish remnant) shall be delivered, every one found written in the book" (Dan. 12 : 1). Jeremiah says of it: "Alas! for that day is great, so that none is like it. It is even the time of Jacob's trouble, but he shall be saved out of it" (Jer. 30 : 7).

As regards apostate Christendom, this last great tribulation will be the period of Antichrist's tyrannical reign of three and a half years—forming the latter half of Daniel's seventieth week—concerning which we read in Revelation 13, "The dragon gave to him (the beast) his power, and his seat and great authority."

Again, regarding the false prophet who is to exercise all the power of the first beast before him (or, in his presence), it is said: "And it was given him to give breath unto the image of the beast, that the image of the beast should both speak, and cause that as many as would not worship the image of the beast should be killed" (Rev. 13). Hence the "great multitude whom no man can number" who, in the seventh chapter, are said to "come out of the great tribulation," are "of all nations, and kindreds, and peoples, and tongues,"—testifying to the extents of Antichrist's persecution; while to the Gentile church of Philadelphia the gracious promise is given: "Because thou hast kept the word of my patience, I also will keep thee from (or, out of) the hour of temptation, which shall come upon all the world, to try them that dwell upon the earth" (Rev. 3 : 10).

We see, then, that the last or "great tribulation" differs from all others, not only in intensity, but extent. Other periods of Divine judgment have affected special classes of mankind, and particular nations, but this shall darken into a very noon of night over all the earth; the Gentile and the Jew, the rich as well as the poor, the righteous and the wicked, all will have to drink of that awful cup, in which will be mingled the fullness of God's wrath and Satan's rage.

Reader, ere we close these remarks, let us ask ourselves this solemn question—supposing, as, indeed, there is much to lead us to apprehend, the awful hour of which we have been speaking to be even now near at hand, how will it be with us? Remember, before the flood came Noah and his family were taken into the ark. Before Sodom and Gomorrah were destroyed Lot had escaped to Zoar. And, in like manner, ere the "last and direst storm" bursts upon the world, Christ's ready and waiting saints will have been caught up to be with Him for ever. "Watch ye, therefore, and pray always, that ye may be accounted worthy to escape all these things that shall come to pass, and to stand before the Son of Man" (Luke 21 : 36).

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, January 14th, at 2.30 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Attention of Congress during the Past week has been chiefly devoted to financial questions. Senator Bayard's bill withdrawing the legal-tender quality of the greenback has been unfavorably reported on by a majority of one in the Senate Committee, and the minority presented their favorable report. From the discussion which ensued Senator Bayard is not sanguine of passing his bill.

In the House Mr. Fernando Wood introduced a measure designed to reduce the interest paid on the national debt to three and a half per cent. He proposes to authorize an issue of bonds to the amount of fifty millions of dollars, which shall be redeemable after the expiration of fifty years; the bonds to bear interest at three and a half per cent, and to be issued in exchange for those now in circulation at higher interest.

The Complication in Maine shows Signs of nearing a solution. Major-General Chamberlain, the commander of the State militia, who was appointed by ex-Governor Garcelon guardian of the State property and buildings, received notification from Mr. J. D. Lamson, president of the Senate, that he had accepted the position of acting Governor, and that he called upon the General to recognize his authority. General Chamberlain wrote Mr. Lamson declining to obey him, and demurring to his title and right to act in the capacity he had assumed. Subsequently the legislature, composed exclusively of Fusionists, the Republicans having withdrawn and formed two Houses of their own, elected as Governor, Major Smith, the Greenback candidate of the September elections. Meanwhile the Republican Houses had obtained a decision from the Supreme Court of the State approving their organization, and General Chamberlain in consequence declined to recognize Major Smith as Governor, alleging as a reason that his claims to the office would not be vouched for by the Supreme Court. The Republican Houses have now elected Mr. Daniel F. Davis Governor, and General Chamberlain has resigned his trust into his hands. It seems probable that the Republican Governor, supported by the Supreme Court and the State militia, will succeed in establishing his authority, and that further agitation may be averted.

The Need of the Country in the Present Day was the subject of some strikingly characteristic remarks by the Rev. Joseph Cook, in the prelude to his last Monday's lecture at Boston. He said: "There is a greater demand for uprightness in this country than there is a supply to meet it;" and added: "It is our duty to keep the Republic pure, and this can only be done by its being governed by pure men." The sacred trust which our forefathers of the Mayflower and of the War of Independence left to us is in danger of being forgotten in these days, as well as the solemn warnings of Holy Writ (Prov. 14 : 34).

A Shocking Disclosure of Cruelty practised under the guise of charity was made January 17th in New York. For some years an institution, known as the Shepherd's Fold, has been in existence for the benefit of little children neglected by their parents. Suspicion was excited by the emaciated appearance of a child in St. Luke's Hospital, who had been an inmate of the home, that the other children were being shamefully treated there. A raid was made upon the place, and a heartrending scene presented itself. Children almost starved to death, covered with dirt and sores, and suffering from diseases brought on by over work and insufficient food, were found in "the home," and evidences in the sleeping apartments and other rooms, of gross neglect and cruelty, which had been practised on the helpless little ones. The children were removed to places of safety, and an investigation has been ordered by the court.

A Sunday-morning Pastime was Interrupted at Yonkers on January 11th. Early on that day the police received intelligence that a cockfight was proceeding at a saloon in the neighborhood. A small force immediately went to the place, and having ascended to the third floor, found eighty-seven "respectable persons" watching a fight between birds from White Plains and Yonkers. Betting was going on, and the most intense interest was being taken in the fortunes of the champions. The "respectable" spectators were all arrested, and marched through the streets between files of policemen into the presence of Judge E. P. Baird, who fined them $3 each and discharged them. Forty-five birds and the cock-pit were confiscated, and proved a source of embarrassment to the police, who had to procure a separate box for each bird to prevent a general fight taking place between them. The paltry punishment inflicted on the spectators seemed a mockery, but it is satisfactory to find that the confiscation of the birds was a more serious punishment for the owners, several of whom offered $100 each for their pet birds, which offer was of course rejected. The desecration of the Lord's Day by a sport so degraded ought to arouse Christian citizens to the necessity of some stringent measures being adopted to deliver the community from a repetition of it.

"Four Thousand Unlicensed Liquor Saloons exist and thrive in New York City," is the assertion of Dr. Howard Crosby, who has given careful attention to the subject, and has done all he can to close these places. A reporter of the Tribune visited several licensed houses in Chatham Street recently, and from his description it seems impossible to conceive how vile a place must be, to be too vile to have hope of obtaining a license. Low, disreputable haunts, where immoral practices are carried on, and where drunken orgies resulting in desperate fights are constantly going on, have licenses showing they have been recommended by inspectors "as proper places to sell liquors," and besides these are the four thousand unlicensed places. Surely it is time the responsibility for this state of things were fixed on the proper officials, and they were removed to give place to efficient and God-fearing men.

A Young English Lawyer named Henry A. Holland committed suicide in New York, January 12th. He was twenty-eight years of age, a graduate of Oxford University, and the son of an Episcopal clergyman at Bath, England. He left a letter behind him, in which he said: "I end my life because I have arrived at a point where it appears to me not to be worth while to struggle any longer. . . I die trusting the great unknown future entirely into the hands of Him who can alone control it, if it be controllable; that if I thought it to be against His laws for me to end my life, I would not do it; my faith in His power and goodness is absolute, and I put myself in His hands with as much co dence as I would fall asleep in the arms of best friend." The impatience under trial wh this young man displayed in taking away his was a direct contradiction of his concluding sertion of his faith in God's goodness power. That faith would have taught him t his troubles should have been laid before G whose goodness and power might be trusted t move them, or support him under them. Th who contemplate self-murder ought to rem ber that what they call faith in those circ stances is really presumption.

The Dangers of Ferry Travel on the Crow rivers which run on the east and west sides New York were illustrated last week by events which should be the subject of gratit to God that great loss of life was averted. January 14th the steamer G. T. Olyphant, necting with Hunter's Point, came into collis with a Grand Street ferryboat in the East Ri and was so severely injured that she turned tom upwards. Providentially there were fourteen passengers on board, who were rescued. Had the collision occurred on succeeding trip, the steamer would have crowded with passengers, and many must been lost.

The other calamity was the sudden death his post of duty in the pilot-house of the fe boat Fulton, of the pilot of the boat. The was crowded with several hundred passenger their way from Brooklyn to New York. boat had not left the slip, and, not understan the delay, one of the officials went up to the p house, and found the pilot dead in his chair. his death had occurred in mid-stream, it is cult to see how a serious accident could been averted.

The Homeless Children of New York.— J. J. Astor has sent out recently from the o of the Children's Aid Society a "New party" of 100 homeless children to homes in West and South, at an expense of $1500. makes during seven years a total number of homeless children whom this generous frien the poor has placed in homes, mainly in West, at an expense of $9750. Many of t lads have now grown up, having farms of t own and doing well in the world. In thu moving children from scenes of temptation, giving them an opportunity of leading up and honorable lives, Mrs. Astor has been means of fulfilling God's promise to destitute forsaken children (Psa. 27 : 10).

An Unexpected but Eventful Meeting tween two old friends occurred at a missi Water Street, New York, recently. A sea tain who had found rest and peace in belie at one of the meetings at the Mission H rose at a subsequent meeting and related hi perience. He afterward asked the praye those present for an old friend of his, also a tain, whom he had not seen for some t Having received the blessing himself, he anxious that his friend should also enjoy it. his amazement the man for whom he was as prayers rose in the meeting, and on his ow count asked for prayer. His friend's con for his soul touched his heart, and has bee means of his conversion. Neither of the knew of the presence of the other in the me until the first one rose to relate his experie

Mr. Moody at St. Louis, in Delivering an dress on the Lord's Prayer, dwelt with esp emphasis on the words, "Forgive us our passes as we forgive those who trespass ag us." While he was speaking, about fifty pe rose and left the church. Mr. Moody, not their exit, said that he had known persons had heard about this requirement for for ness hastily to leave the church and seek those they needed to forgive, and he h that those who were then leaving the cong tion were prompted by such a spirit.

A Picture of the Tay Bridge in Scotland the terrible accident which occurred there cember 28th, with a full account of the cala will appear in the next number of this jour

The Cunard Steamship Batavia arrived in New York on Jan. 11th, after a passage of fifteen days from Liverpool. During seven days it experienced one of the most violent storms ever encountered on the Atlantic, and was in jeopardy every hour of going to the bottom. One of the passengers afterward wrote: "Among the personal effects which I managed to get ashore in of duty is an overcoat which, through continued intimacy with salt water, has become an interesting specimen of cloth transformed to pasteboard. If I were an ancient Roman, living in Rome and doing as Romans did, I should hang the coat up in some temple as a votive offering for my safe deliverance. But, being only an American, I keep the coat and give you an account of what might almost be called an adventurous voyage." In Psa. 107 : 23–31, we have the view which the child of God takes of perils by sea. But this passenger, whose life God graciously spared, immediately takes his pen and boasts that though a professing Christian, he has not as much religion as the heathens of ancient Rome.

Seven New York Theatres during 1879 took in almost a million and a half of dollars. The exact figures are $1,462,795, as given by the New York Herald. One theatre received $26,500 in one month for one popular play. Another theatre took in $1820 on a single night. Another received $23,500 for a series of performances for children. The attendance during the year at eight theatres was more than two millions and a quarter of people. These figures do not include half even the large theatres, and they take no account whatever of the hundreds of variety theatres and shows in the city. With such figures before us, the question is not whether it be morally right or wrong to go to the theatre, but whether it be right to countenance, in the most indirect way, such a dissipation of thought and such a fearful waste of time and money. God's word in Rom. 14 : 15–21 affords a plain and forcible answer.

A Miser's Death in a Stable at San Francisco is reported as having occurred December 9th in circumstances of abject misery. The man, whose name was McGlurn, was proprietor of a livery stable, and occupied himself in the most menial employments about his establishment; he had for many years occupied a loft in his stable, and there he died. In his last illness he refused to pay a physician to attend him unless he would guarantee a cure. He left a will bequeathing the whole of his estate to his wife, who with his daughter, are earning a living in Rhode Island as domestic servants. He separated from his wife a number of years ago because she bought a silk dress. After the death of this miserable man it was found that he had hoarded money to the amount of $200,000. What a commentary on Ecclesiastes 5 : 11!

The Death of Frank Leslie, the well-known New York publisher, occurred January 10th, at the age of fifty-nine. He was highly respected by his numerous employés, many of whom speak of his kindness to them in illness, and of his benevolence to the widows of their fellow-workmen. He had a strong love for animals, and to Frank Leslie's support Mr. Bergh owes much of the success of his efforts in aid of the suppression of cruelty to dumb brutes.

A Train Demolished a House at St. Louis on the night of December 27th. It appears from the St. Louis Globe-Democrat that a working-man named McCormick and his young wife and infant child occupied a cottage situated directly at the end of a side track of rails, having no bumper to prevent the cars from rolling off. On Saturday night McCormick was away from home at his work, and his wife and child retired to rest early. The woman does not know how long she slept. When she came to her senses she was underneath a wardrobe, a pile of broken furniture, dishes, pictures, and other household goods. Her little baby was by her side, badly bruised, and crying at the top of its voice. The house had been moved several yards from its foundation, and was a complete wreck. A freight train had been backed down the rails and had struck the house with overwhelming force. The woman was much bruised, but not otherwise injured; but it is thought the child will not recover from the shock. Had McCormick been at home and sleeping in his usual place, he must have been killed.

It seems extraordinary that a house should have been built, and people have been found willing to live in it, where it was liable to so terrible a disaster. It is like the more serious recklessness of those who for the sake of gain are content, as Lot was, to live in the midst of wickedness, or who send their children to lucrative employments where they will be associated with people whose example and influence may wreck their eternal future. (Prov. 4 : 14.)

"God's Carriage" is the Name applied to a vehicle which is seen quietly moving about day by day in the streets of Boston. It does not stand at the doors of the wealthy nor even at the doors of churches, but is often seen in localities where vice and intemperance reign supreme, and in poverty-stricken streets. Its mission has to do with lost females who are held in bondage by poverty, vice, and drink. It takes up its living burden and carries it away four miles to the Mount Hope Home, where a gentle lady presides, and where care and Christian love and kindness reign in peaceful quiet. There the lost woman is carefully tended and fed; there no intoxicating liquor offers its seductive temptation; active work and religious counsel with earnest prayer occupy the hours, and after the storms and agonies of vicious life, the inmate feels the place a heaven on earth and goes out again resolved in God's strength to lead a new life. The driver of "God's carriage," with his devoted wife, is thus quietly following in the footsteps of Him who received sinners and saved them.

The Financial Misfortunes of a Christian Philanthropist.—Deep and general sympathy is felt among all classes of society with Mr. George H. Stuart, the well-known Philadelphia merchant, who has been reduced by business losses to absolute penury. The many services rendered by Mr. Stuart to all movements having for their object the temporal and spiritual benefit of men, have made his name widely known, for he not only gave munificently, but worked actively when there was good to be done. He evinced a lively interest in Foreign Missions, and contributed liberally to that cause. The Missionary Refuge at Landour, Northern India, was his gift to the Saharunpur Mission, to all of whose operations he has made large donations. He is a Manager and Vice-president of the American Sunday-school Union. But he is best known as the President of the Christian Commission, whose kindness to the wounded soldiers who fought under both banners in the war was universally known. While deeply regretting that financial ruin should overtake this devoted man in his old age, it is matter for rejoicing that the best of his possessions can never be alienated, for it is in the hands of one of whom Paul said, "I am persuaded that He is able to keep that which I have committed unto Him against that day" (2 Tim. 1: 12).

Mrs. Amanda Smith in India.—The Indian Mirror, of Calcutta, says: "Bombay has seen a novel phenomenon. A colored lady, Mrs. Amanda Smith, has come to India to preach the Gospel. She can speak and sing, and her utterances are said to be really powerful. The lady was lately at Poona, where, we are glad to know, our countrymen accorded her a cordial welcome. We hope Mrs. Amanda Smith will come to Calcutta."

A Number of Ute Indians have been Surrendered for trial and for the present apprehensions of a renewal of the war have been quieted. The Indians, under the charge of Lieutenant Taylor, narrowly escaped lynching at Pueblo, Colorado. An infuriated crowd surrounded the hotel where they made a halt, and threats were loudly uttered against the Redskins. It is a matter of congratulation that for the honor of the country these threats were not executed.

THE HUNGER-BITE.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"His strength shall be hunger-bitten."—JOB 18 : 12.

Job's Friends did him an Injustice—The Hunger-bite—I. A Curse on the Ungodly—The Strength of Gold—Two Kinds of Hunger—Riches which Impoverish—Poor Solomon—II. A Discipline to Save the Self-righteous—An Aged Cabman—Trusting in Goodness—In Ceremonies—III. A Chastisement for Believers—A Text Chewed All Day—Little and Often.

BILDAD was declaring the history of the hypocritical, presumptuous, and wicked man; and he intended, no doubt, to insinuate that Job was just such a person, that he had been a deceiver, and that therefore at last God's providence had found him out and was visiting him for his sins. In this Bildad was guilty of great injustice to his friend. All the three miserable comforters of Job were mistaken in the special aim of their discourses, and yet concerning the speeches of each one it may be said that their general statements were, for the most part, true. They uttered truths, but they drew mistaken inferences, and they were ungenerous in the imputations which they cast upon Job.

It is true that, sooner or later, either in this world or the next, all conceivable curses do fall upon the hypocrite and the ungodly man, but it is not true that when a Christian is in trouble we are to judge that he is suffering for his sin. It would be both cruel and wicked for us to think so. Nevertheless, because what Bildad said was, in the main, true, though unkindly and wrongly applied, we feel ourselves quite at liberty to take a text out of his mouth.

It is true of many persons that their strength shall be hunger-bitten, and I shall speak concerning these words in three ways, noticing first, that this is a curse which will surely be fulfilled upon the ungodly. Secondly, this is a discipline which God often exercises upon the self-righteous when He means to save them. And thirdly—and it is grievous work to have to say it—this is a form of chastisement upon believers who are not living near to God as they ought to be—their strength becomes hunger-bitten.

I. First we shall view our text as which will be fulfilled upon the ungodly. "His strength shall be hunger-bitten."

A CURSE

It is not said that they are hunger-bitten merely, but that their strength is so; and if their strength be hunger-bitten, what must their weakness be? When a man's strength is bitten with hunger, what a hunger must be raging throughout the whole of his nature!

Now, a large proportion of men make their gold to be their strength, their castle, and their high tower, and for a while they do rejoice in their wealth, and find great satisfaction in gathering it, in seeing it multiplied, and in hoping by and by that it shall come to great store. But every ungodly man ought to know that riches are not forever, and often they take to themselves wings and fly away. Men of colossal fortunes have dwindled down to beggars; they made great ventures and realized great failures. None are secure. As long as a man is in this world he is like a ship at sea, he is still liable to be shipwrecked.

O you that are boasting in your gold, and calling your treasure your chief good! the day may come to you when your strength will be hunger-bitten, and, like the victims of famine, you will find yourselves helpless,—you whose money aforetime answered all things, and made you feel omnipotent.

But it will be said, of course, that it is not in every case that the ungodly man's strength of wealth is hunger-bitten; and I willingly concede it. But it comes to pass in another fashion. How many there are who keep their wealth, and yet, for all that, are very poor! It is not that the gold goes, but it stays by them and does not comfort them. I do not know which would be the worse of the two—to be hungry for want of bread, or to have abundance of bread, and yet remain hungry eat whatever you might. Thousands in this world are precisely in that condition. They have all that heart could wish, if their heart were right; but it seems nothing to them because they have envy in their spirits.

Remember Haman. He is invited to the banquet of wine, he is a chief noble of the empire, he has his monarch's favor; but all that avails him nothing because Mordecai sits in the gate. Envy has cankered his soul, and if he were able to mount to the throne of Ahasuerus himself it would make no difference to him; he would be unhappy there; and all because one poor Jew will not bow to him. There are persons going up and down Cheapside every day who are intolerably wretched about a something which they would hardly like to mention to reasonable men. A wretched trifle frets them like a moth in a garment, and all the glory of their position is eaten away: their strength is hunger-bitten.

Where the canker does not happen to be envy it may come to be a passion akin to it, namely, revenge. Alas! that we should have to talk of revenge as still existing upon this earth after Christ has been here and taught us to pray, "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors." Yet there are ungodly men who even think it right to foster resentments. A word uncourteously spoken, a deed unkindly done, will be laid up, and an opportunity sought for retaliation; or, if not, a hope will be cherished that some blight, or blow from God, may fall upon the offender: and if that offender still bears himself aloft, and lives right merrily, and makes no recompense for the wrong done, the aggrieved one has eaten out his own heart with chagrin, and the strength of his wealth has been hunger-bitten.

Where this has not been the case, it has, perhaps, more frequently happened that persons have been afflicted by avarice. Nothing more tends to impoverish a man than being rich. It is a hard thing to find a rich man who enjoys riches. A rich man is a man who has all he wants, and many a man is rich on a few shillings a week: a poor man is a man who does not get what he wants, and people with twenty thousand pounds a year are in that list. In fact, where shall you find such poverty as among those poor rich men?

The miser is often pictured as afraid to sleep because thieves may break in; he rises at midnight to tell over his hoarded treasure, he is afraid lest bonds, securities, mortgages, and the like may, after all, turn out to be mere waste paper; he frets and stews and mars his life because he has too great a means of living—such a man may not be very common, but it is an easy thing to find people who have very much, and yet are just as careful, just as grasping, just as fretful after more, as if they had but newly started in business, and were almost penniless—their strength is hunger-bitten.

If somebody had told them, "You will one day reach to so many thousand pounds," they would have said, "Ah! if ever I get that amount I shall be perfectly satisfied." They have saved that sum long ago, and ten times as much, and now they say, "Ah! you don't know what it is to want money till you have a good portion of it. Now we have so much we must have more. We are up to our necks in and we must needs swim where the bottom cannot be touched." Poor fools! They have enough water to float them, but they must have enough to drown in.

THE GOLDEN STREAM,

One stick is a capital thing for a lame man, as I know right well, but a thousand sticks would make a terrible load for a man to carry. When any one has a sufficiency let him be thankful for so convenient a staff, but if he will not use what he has until he has accumulated much more, the comfort of his substance is gone, and his strength is hunger-bitten.

There are cases in which the hunger-bite does not take the shape which I could well describe. Instances are met with of persons who have made their gold their strength, who are altogether unrestful. Some have thought that their brain was diseased, but it is likely that the disease was lower down, and in their hearts. We have known wealthy men who believed themselves to be poor, and were haunted with the idea that they should die in the poor-house, even when they were worth a million; and others who have quarrelled about the division of a farthing, when the loss of ten thousand pounds would have been a fleabite to them.

In great substance they have found no substantial rest. They have often wished they could be as cheerful as their own menial servants. As they have lolled in their carriage, and looked at the rosy cheeks of the urchins in the village, they have coveted their health and felt willing to wear their rags if they could possess their appetites. As they have looked upon poor persons with family loves and domestic joys, and felt that their own joys were few in that direction, they have greatly envied them. It is a great mercy when the worldling is made uneasy in this world; it is a ground for hope that God means to wean him from his idols. But, alas! there are some who do not rest here, and yet will not rest hereafter. They have no rest in all that God has given them under the sun, and yet they will not fly to Him who is the soul's sure repose.

POOR SOLOMON.

I need not dwell for another moment upon the failure of the strength which is found in riches. It is the same with all sorts of men who try to find comfort out of Christ and away from God, their "strength shall be hunger-bitten." What a melancholy instance of this is Solomon! He had an opportunity to try every thing in his quest for the chief good, and he did test every thing, so that we need not repeat the experiment. He was the great alchemist who tried to turn all manner of metals into gold, but failed with them all. At one time he was building great palaces, and when the building fit was on him he seemed happy; but when once the gorgeous piles were finished he said, "Vanity of vanities: all is vanity."

Then he would take to gardening and to the planting of rare plants and trees, and to the digging of fountains; but when he had done enough of this he looked upon his orchard and vineyards and again muttered, "Vanity of vanities: all is vanity." Then he thought he would try laughter and madness: the comic side of human life he would test, as well as the useful; so he plunged into all manner of pleasures, and gathered to himself singing men and singing women, and all delights of the flesh, but after he had drunk deep of that cup he said again, "Vanity of vanities: all is vanity."

Poor Solomon! He had great strength, but his strength was hunger-bitten. He looked here and there, up and down, on the right hand and on the left, and found no bread for his soul; he snatched at shadows and tried to feed himself with bubbles; he was devoured with hunger in the midst of plenty; and where the humble people of Israel were blessing the God who satisfied their mouth with good things and renewed their youth like the eagles, poor Solomon was complaining that there was nothing new under the sun, and that it was better for a man not to be born than to have lived at all.

Now remark that if this hunger does not come upon the ungodly man during the former part of his life, it will come to him at the close of it. While we have much to do and our minds are occupied we may be able to put off thought; but when, at last, God sends to us that messenger with the bony hand, whose oratory is soul piercing, the dulness of whose eyeless eye darts fire into the soul, then will all human strength be hunger-bitten.

When death is left alone with the man, then he perceives that his money-bags contain nothing precious, because he must leave them. How now with his broad acres? How now with his large estates? How now with his palatial residence? How now with all that he called dear? How now with his doctor's degree and his learning? How now with his fame and his honor? How now even with his domestic comforts and the joys of life? Hunger-bitten are they all. When he comes to die they cannot help him. The soul that is within him, which he would not allow to speak, now opens its hungry mouth and cries, "Thou hast denied me bread. God, and God alone, could fill me; and thou hast denied me God; and now thou feelest the hunger which has come upon me, and thou must feel it, and feel it, too, forever."

Alas, alas, alas! for a man to have spent all his life in earning a disappointment, laboring hard to lose his soul, sweating and straining to lose the race, tugging and toiling to be damned; for that is the case of many a man, and that is whereunto the tide drifteth with all mankind who seek for lasting good apart from God and apart from the blood and righteousness of God's dear Son. Of each one of them it shall be said, "His strength shall be hunger-bitten."

I have said these things mournfully to my own heart; but I would say to any of you who may not be rich, but who are looking for your good in your own little home and the comforts of it—any of you young men who are seeking the great object of life in learning, or the like—if you are not living for God, your strength will be hunger-bitten. If you do not "seek first the kingdom of God and His righteousness," whatever you gain and however satisfied you may be for a little while, an awful hunger must ultimately come upon you, and you will then lament that you spent your money for that which is not bread, and your labor for that which satisfieth not.

DISCIPLINE FOR THE SELF-RIGHTEOUS.

II. Briefly, in the second place, we shall speak of our text as indicating a kind of discipline through which God puts the self-righteous when He means to save them.

Many people are very religious, and yet are not saved. They are unsaved because they go about to establish their own righteousness, and have not submitted themselves to the righteousness which is of God in Jesus Christ. Now, these persons may for awhile be very well satisfied with their own righteousness, and if they are not the children of God they will be satisfied with it for life.

Some of them talk in this way: "I don't know that I ever wronged anybody. I have always been honest and honorable in my transactions, and I have brought up my children respectably. I have had a hard fight of it, an for all that nobody could say that I ever disgraced my character."

It is not very long ago that I was driven by cabman, an aged man, and when I got out of hi cab I referred to his age, and he remarked upo it himself: I said, "Well, I trust when this lif is over you will have a portion in a better world." "Yes, I think so, sir," he said: "I was neve drunk, that I know of, in my life; was alway reckoned a civil man; never used bad language and I go to church sometimes." He seemed t be perfectly satisfied, and to be quite astonishe that I did not express my assurance of his safety His confidence is the common reliance of al classes of Englishmen, and though they may no always put it in that shape, yet that is th notion—that by a sort of goodness, a very poo and mangled goodness, men may after all ente heaven.

Now, when God means to save a man th hunger of the heart comes in and devours all hi boasted excellence. Why, a spiritually hungr soul would take fifty years of self-righteousne and swallow them up like a morsel, and cry f more. Our goodness is nothing compared wit the demands of the law and the necessities the case. Our fine righteousnesses, how the shrivel up like autumn leaves when the Spirit God acts as a frost to them! Our virtues are a meadow in the spring bedecked with golde kingcups, but when the Spirit of God blowet upon it the grass withereth, and the flow thereof fadeth, for all flesh is grass, and all t goodliness thereof is as the flower of grass.

It is a part of the operation of the Holy Gho to wither all the goodliness of human nature, and to destroy all those lovely flowers of natural virtue in which we put such store, cutting them down as with a mower's scythe. In truth, there is none good, no, not one. We are all shut up in unbelief and sin by nature. In the best of natures sin affects the whole body, "the whole head is sick, and the whole heart faint," and it is a great blessing when the Holy Spirit makes us feel this. Painful is the feeling, but blessed is the result when, once for all, our strength is hunger-bitten.

Ay, and there are some who are very satisfied because, in addition to a commendable life, they have performed certain ceremonies to which they impute great sanctity. There is a theory abroad nowadays which some persons who are not in either the lunatic or the idiot asylum believe, namely, the theory that convey grace. It is wonderful how a rational being can ever think so, but there are persons, who are apparently rational in other things, who believe that the sprinkling of drops of water upon an infant's brow regenerates it, that the eating of bread and the drinking of wine really convey Christ to the soul, and so on: that aqueous applications and materialistic festivities can bring spiritual good to the heart—a monstrous doctrine, worthy of the priests of Baal, but so foolish as to make one doubt his ears when he hears it stated. Because they have gone through these operations, and have been confirmed, and I do not know what besides, they are content.

SACRAMENTAL PERFORMANCES

Others who happen to belong to a dissenting community have passed through the ordeal of joining the church, or have attended class-meetings, and have subscribed to the various societies, think that, therefore, they are saved. Heirs of hell will rest content with such outward things, but heirs of heaven never can. Their strength, if they make external religion their strength, will by and by be hunger-bitten, and they will cry out, "My God, my soul panteth for Thee as the hart pants for the water-brooks. I cannot be satisfied with outward forms, I want inward grace, and I cannot be content with being told that the grace was with the form. I want to know the grace of God in truth, I long to feel it, I pine to exhibit it in my own life."

To be told I was born again when I was a babe will not satisfy me; I want to feel the inner life, the new life of God within my spirit. To be told that I did eat Christ when I ate the bread will not content me; my heart longs to know that Christ is really in me the hope of glory, and that I am living upon Him. If I cannot have communion with God and with His dear Son for myself in my very soul, I turn with loathing from every substitute, ritualistic, priestly, or otherwise.

Beloved, I would have you flee from every sacrament to the Saviour; I would have you fly away from ceremonies to the cross of Christ. There is your only hope. Look to Him by faith: for all the rest without this is but outward and carnal, and can minister no good to your spirit. May your strength be hunger-bitten if you are resting in any thing which is external and unspiritual!

Many a person has known what it is to have this hunger-bite go right through every thing he rested in. I once knew what it was to get a little comfort from my prayers before I found the Saviour, but when the Spirit of God dealt with me I saw that my prayers wanted praying over again. I thought I had some sort of repentance, and I began to be contented with it; but when the Spirit of God came I found that my repentance needed to be repented of. I had felt some confidence in my Bible reading and hoped that my regular attendance upon public worship would bring me salvation; but I found that I was after all mocking the Word, for I was reading it, but not believing it; hearing it, but not accepting it; was increasing my knowledge and my responsibility, and yet was not rendering obedience to God.

Dear soul, if you are resting anywhere short of Christ, may your strength be hunger-bitten! You are at your strongest when you are utter weakness apart from Him. When you rest in Him completely, and alone, then is salvation accomplished in you, but not till then. May God in His infinite mercy grant that all your strength apart from Christ may be hunger-bitten, and that speedily.

CHASTISEMENT FOR BELIEVERS.

III. Lastly, and very earnestly—and perhaps this last part may have more reference to most of you than any thing I have said—I believe there are many of God's servants whose strength is lamentably hunger-bitten. In this age we are all busy, and through being busy we are apt to neglect the soul-feeding ordinances; I mean the reading of Scripture, the hearing of the Word, meditation upon it, prayer and communion with God. Some of you do not rise so soon as you might in the morning, and prayer is hurried over; and too often at eventide you are half asleep with the many cares of the day, and prayer is offered in a slovenly way.

Nor is this all, for during the day when, if you were as you should be, you would be praying, there is this to think of, and that, and the other, and such a pressure of business that ejaculations are few. How can you pray? You did at one time get a text of Scripture in the morning and chew it all day, and you used to get much sweetness out of it, and your soul grew; but now, instead of a text of Scripture, you have pressing engagements as soon as you are out of bed. You would, now and then, steal into a mid-day prayer-meeting, perhaps, or get two or three minutes alone, but you have gradually dropped that habit, and you have felt justified in doing so, for "really, time is so precious, and there is so much to do in this age of competition."

Dear friend, I am no judge for you, but let me ask you whether you are not becoming hunger-bitten through not feeding upon the Word of God. Souls cannot be strong without spiritual meat any more than bodies can be well when meals are neglected.

There is a good rule I have heard mothers say about children and chickens—"little and often;" and I think it is true with Christians. They want little and often during the day; not a long passage of Scripture, perhaps memory would fail, but a short passage now and a short passage then, and a little prayer here and a little prayer there. It is wonderful how souls grow in that way. Alas! I fear all this is neglected, and spiritual strength is hunger-bitten. Let us begin from this time forward to give attention to the sustenance of our souls. Let us daily feed upon the Word of God, that we may grow thereby; so shall our strength no more be hunger-bitten.

A HAIRBREADTH ESCAPE.

An Autobiographical Narrative by Mr. J. V. Hall.

(AT an anniversary of the Temperance Society, in Exeter Hall, on May 17th, 1836, the following description of a conflict was related by Mr. J. V. Hall as his experience.)

In Maidstone (at the beginning of this century) were twelve young men who were accustomed, early in life, to meet together for indulgence in drinking and all manner of excess. In the course of time some of them engaged in business; but their habits of sin were so entwined with their very existence, that they became bankrupts. Eight of them died under the age of forty, without a hope beyond the grave; three others were reduced to the most abject poverty, wretchedness, and disgrace.

One more, the last of the twelve, the worst of all, remains to be accounted for. He was a sort of ringleader, taking the head of the table at convivial parties, and sitting up whole nights, drinking and inducing others to do the same—never going to bed sober. He was an infidel, a disciple of Tom Paine both in principle and practice, a blasphemer of the Word of God; yet a good-natured man, and would do anybody a kindness. At length he went to reside at a distance, where, for a time, he refrained from dissipation, was married, and every thing seemed prosperous around him; but instead of being thankful to God for His mercy, and watching against his besetting sin of intemperance, he gave way to it, and brought misery to his family and friends, many of whom loved him dearly, because in his sober moments he was disposed to do good to every creature within his reach.

One dark night, being in the neighborhood of Stourbridge, he had been drinking to excess, and in a state of intoxication he wandered out of the house, and staggered amongst the coal-pits, which are in many places left open and exposed. These he passed in safety; but the road he took went over a canal—he missed the bridge, and rolled over the bank to the edge of the water.

And here he seemed to have arrived at the end of his wicked course; but God, who is rich in mercy, had caused a stone to lie directly in his path, and thus spared him in this the apparently last hour of his mortal existence—one turn more, and he would have sunk into eternal ruin, and his disembodied spirit been ushered into the presence of the Judge of all. The arm of mercy, however, interposed: his senses returned for a moment; he saw the water beneath him; he crawled back again into the road; there he was picked up, and lodged in a public-house for the night.

This miraculous escape, it might have been thought, would have made a deep and lasting impression on his mind; but no—it was viewed simply as a lucky escape, and he continued to pursue his career of sin as ardently as before.

Desperate Battle with a Demon, and the Victory of Prayer.

MR. J. V. HALL then proceeded to say in the same address, speaking of himself in the third person: In spite of his better judgment, the injury to his worldly interests, his desire to be esteemed by his friends, his ardent affection for his wife, together with his religious convictions, he frequently felt his old habit taking possession of him with demon power. There were then no total-abstinence societies which might shield him with their sympathy and example. When every one drank, was it to be expected he would abstain? The advice generally given was—"Use, but not abuse." Yet in his case the use was ever leading to the abuse. With his peculiar temperament and habits, one glass would so rouse his appetite that self-control was gone, and he rushed forward to the abyss which, when perfectly sober, he abhorred.

One of these sad relapses occurred on occasion of a young minister visiting the house and taking brandy and water at luncheon. Thinking there could be no harm in following such an example, he filled his own glass, and was again overcome. Entering into company, and responding generously to the greeting of his friends, a single glass would thus sometimes destroy all his good resolutions. But earnest prayers were daily offered for him by his wife, who was indeed his guardian angel. As an encouragement to intercede for others, it may be mentioned that on one particular day she specially prayed even that he, whose life and love were dearer than all the world to her, might die at once a penitent rather than live on in sin. How great must have been the delight occasioned by finding him an hour after in tears, exclaiming, "I have heard as if it was a voice from heaven, saying, 'If thou wilt forsake thy sins, they shall be forgiven!'"

This was an occasion on which, after an indulgence in drinking for some days, having come to his senses, he began to reason with himself upon his guilt and folly, surrounded with blessings, yet abusing the whole; and in an angry, passionate manner, he muttered, "Oh! it's no use for me to repent; my sins are too great to be forgiven." He had no sooner uttered these words than a voice seemed to say, with strong emphasis,

"IF THOU WILT FORSAKE THY SINS, THEY SHALL BE FORGIVEN."

The poor man started at what he believed to be a real sound, and hastily turned round, but seeing no one, he said to himself, "Surely I have been drinking till I am going mad." He stood paralyzed, not knowing what to think, till relieved by a flood of tears, and then exclaimed, "Surely this is the voice of mercy once more calling me to repentance." He fell on his knees, and, half suffocated by his feelings, cried out, "God be merciful to me a sinner!" His besetting sin now appeared more horrible than ever; but it must be conquered, or he must perish. Then commenced than that of conflicting armies—than Waterloo, or all other battles whatever—the soul was at stake; an impetuous torrent was to be turned into an opposite course. He now began to search the Bible, which he had once despised. Here he saw that crimson and scarlet sins could be blotted out and made white as snow; that the grace of God was all-sufficient. He refrained from intemperance, commenced family prayer, and hope again revived. But his deadly foe still pursued him, and he was again overcome.

A CONTEST MORE TERRIBLE

Now his disgrace and sinfulness appeared worse than ever, and with melancholy feeling he cried out, in anguish of spirit, that he was doomed to eternal misery, and it was useless to try to avert his fate. His cruel enemy took this opportunity to suggest to his mind that he had so disgraced himself that it would be better to get rid of his life at once, frequently the end of drunkards. The razor was in his hand, but the Spirit of the Lord interposed, and the weapon fell to the ground. Still his enemy pursued him, and seemed to have new power with his sin of intemperance.

He would sometimes refrain for days and weeks, and then again he was as bad as ever. Hope seemed now to be lost, and especially when, one day, after having been brought into great weakness through intemperance, death appeared to be very near, and his awful state more terrific than ever. Not a moment was to be lost; he cast himself once more at the footstool of his long insulted Creator, and with an intensity of agony cried out, "What profit is there in my blood when I go down to the pit? Shall the dust praise thee? Shall it declare Thy truth? Hear, O Lord! and have mercy upon me: Lord, be Thou my helper."

He sank down exhausted; he could say no more. That prayer was heard, and a voice from heaven seemed to reply, "I will help thee; I have seen thy struggles, and I will now say to thine enemy, Hitherto thou hast come, but no further." as to the probability or possibility of medicine being rendered effectual to stop the disposition to intemperance. The poor man would have suffered the amputation of all his limbs, could so severe a method have rid him of his deadly habit, which, like a vulture, had fastened upon his very vitals. The physician boldly declared that if this poor slave would strictly adhere to his prescription, not only the practice but the very inclination for strong drink would subside in a few months. Oh, could you have seen the countenance of that poor man when the physician told him of this: hope and fear alternately rising up, whilst he grasped the physician's arm and said, "O sir! be careful how you open that door of hope, for should it be closed upon me I am lost forever!"

A PHYSICIAN WAS CONSULTED

The physician pledged his credit that if his prescription was punctually followed the happiest results would ensue. The remedy was a preparation of steel; and eagerly did the poor slave begin to apply the antidote to his misery. Every bottle was taken with earnest prayer to God for His blessing to accompany it. He commenced taking this medicine on the first week in March, 1816, and continued till the latter end of September following; and to the honor and glory of the Lord God Almighty, who sent His angel to whisper in the poor man's ear, "I will help thee," for the glory of God be it spoken, that from the latter end of September, 1816, not so much as a spoonful of spirituous liquor or wine of any description has passed the surface of that man's tongue.

The narrative which I have thus detailed might appear almost as a fable, a tale got up for effect, but every syllable is truth; and, to the glory and honor of the Lord God Almighty, the man who has been so marvellously delivered is now in perfect health, the happy servant of the Lord Jesus Christ; and he who has been plucked as a brand from the burning, and delivered from the power of Satan, now stands before you, and it is from his lips that you have heard the goodness of that God whose mercy endureth for ever!

THE PRESCRIPTION.

As application has often been made for the prescription referred to, it is here given, simply as a record that in this particular case it was the remedy which by the blessing of God was associated with the cure:

Sulphate of iron, 5 grains; magnesia, 10 grains; peppermint water, 11 drachms; spirit of nutmeg, 1 drachm. This forms one draught—two draughts to be taken each day.

MY RESOLVE IN AFRICA.

A Recollection by Major Malan.

"Thou therefore endure hardness, as a good soldier of Jesus Christ."—2 TIM. 2:3.

My God, my Father! while I stray
Far from my home on life's rough way,
Oh, teach me from my heart to say,
"Thy will be done!"

Renew my will from day to day,
Blend it with Thine, and take away
All that now makes it hard to say,
"Thy will be done!"

If but my fainting heart be blest
With Thy sweet Spirit for its guest,
My God, to Thee I leave the rest,
"Thy will be done!"

This hymn was written by Charlotte Elliott for my mother on an occasion of great trial.

A Visit to a Mission in Kei—Urged to take the Missionary's Post for a Year—Vicompte d'Orthez the Ancient Protestant Governor of Bayonne's Answer—A Small Soldier who took Two Prisoners—My Resolve to Retire from Active Military Service.

ABOUT the time that I received the order from the Horse Guards to refrain from tract distribution,* a missionary came into the garrison from north of the Kei river. I called on him and his sister. They gave me a very cordial invitation to visit them at their house among the heathen. I asked for a month's leave, purposing to inspect the mission stations between the Kei and Bashee rivers in South Africa. My leave was granted, and I had a most interesting ride of four hundred miles. What I witnessed astonished me as to the result of the preaching of God's Word among the heathen in those parts. At the same time I saw and heard enough to convince me that there was urgent need for laborers there, the heathen numbering tens of thousands. I had the great happiness of preaching the Gospel everywhere. The missionaries gave me a warm welcome.

Those who aid foreign missions should not be discouraged by the statements which are too often made by persons who have been abroad, and who speak against missionaries and their work. The Lord has marvellously blessed the labors of His faithful servants.

The friend I first visited was very desirous of returning to Scotland to see his aged father. He could not do so, as there was no one to take his place. He had been laboring at that station very faithfully for some years. I said to him one day "If they'd give me a year's leave, I would gladly look after your people." "I wish you would indeed," he replied, with much earnestness.

I waited on God, praying for guidance during the three months which followed the receipt of the Horse Guards letter. What ought I to do? I would not disobey the order as a soldier—I could not obey it as a Christian. There was only one thing for me to do, leave the army. Wha was I? An English gentleman serving in th army for love of country and the good of its soldiers. I was occupying a purely voluntary position; and if I could not give satisfaction to th Government, duty and self-respect alike pointe to retirement from it.

A man does not lose his individuality by becoming a Christian. He is still a citizen and subject, and should seek in those positions th glory of God and the good of his neighbor. am aware that some Christians do not agree wit me on this point. They argue the death of th believer to all that is of the earth. While I agre with them in this blessed truth, I see in God Word that Christians have duties in this world

I believe there were principles of divine trut in the declaration of the celebrated Vicom d'Orthez: "Ma vie est au roi, mon âme est a Dieu, mon honneur est à moi" (My life is tl king's, my soul is God's, my honor is my own

The body is God's and ours, and also tl State's to which we belong, for loyal duty as su jects, according to His word. The soul is God and ours, for communing with Him and enjo ment of His love. The spirit is God's, but o own to guide us according to His Word in o duty to God and man. "Honor all men, love t brotherhood, fear God, honor the king" (1 Pet 2:17).

The nobleman who thus realized his honor a man was not afraid to offend a king rather th shed innocent blood. He was governor of E yonne at the time of the Massacre of St. Barthol mew. Being commanded by the king to slaught the Protestants, he had the courage to refuse do so in a letter of which the following is a tra lation: "Sire, I have communicated the lett of your Majesty to the garrison and inhabita of this town. I have only found here brave s diers, good citizens, and not one executioner Well would it have been for France had she h a few more men of his stamp!

Yes, a man's honor is his own; for, as t Scripture says, "A good name is rather to chosen than great riches;" and again, "A po man is better than a liar." My duty to G and the feeling that I could no longer consci tiously serve my country, alike dictated reti ment from the service. The Word of God gave full leave to do so. "Art thou called, being servant? care not for it; but if thou mayest made free, use it rather" (1 Cor. 7:21). I h been called, led to Christ, as a servant, a soldi a man under authority. I had not cared fo so long as I could serve God; but now th could not do so, and might be made free, I it my duty to use it rather.

As to occupation and a sphere of usefulnes knew that God would provide them. I had gi myself to the Lord Jesus, and so long as I co serve Him humbly anywhere I cared not. God of Jacob was my God. His promise Jacob was sure to me, "Behold, I am with t and will keep thee in all places whither thou go for I will not leave thee, until I have done which I have spoken to thee of" (Gen. 28: I knew by happy experience that "I am you alway" is a promise equally well kept to humble servant, whether in Europe, Asia, Afr or America.

My friend's need of a substitute in orde visit his father, and the need of the heat north of the Kei, pointed to his post as a s field of service for my blessed Master. Per ally I felt myself to be most unfit. But this is word of the Lord, "Not by might, nor by po but by My Spirit." The especial strength gave me in this decision was in His words, shall be witnesses unto Me." I knew that soldier is always a witness for his regimen army. If he be faithful and brave he may, i emergency, do the duty of two or more sold

I had learned as a soldier that as long man is willing he is generally enabled to d duty. This was illustrated in the Crimean by the following incident. There was an vanced post on the Inkerman picket, which always occupied by a double sentry—two a one occasion, when the picket was furnished my old regiment, this could not be done. A :all man, one of the rear rank of his company, fered to go alone. He did so. He was at- cked, and took two Russian prisoners. For is he received the Victoria Cross.

---

* See CHRISTIAN HERALD, p. 43.

Having without ceasing entreated the Lord's idance, I received from Him what I could not ubt were indications of His will that I should as a witness for Him among the heathen. I ade no plans beyond that of taking my friend's st during his absence. Trusting alone that e who had so wonderfully preserved me as a ldier would keep me to the end, I sat down, d wrote my request to be permitted to retire m the army by the sale of my commission. ever did I write any letter with more perfect ace of mind. At the same time I applied for ave of absence to return to England. I was rn out, and needed rest before entering upon w work.

Earnestly did I pray for grace to endure hard- ss as a good soldier of Christ Jesus. I counted lly the cost of the step I was taking, and my n infirmities in view of the work before me. t it is the privilege of faith to glory in infirmi s and necessities for Christ's sake; for when e believer is weak, then he is strong. "He said to me, 'My grace is sufficient for thee: for My rength is made perfect in weakness'" (2 Cor. : 9).

Fellow-Christian, should you find yourself liged to leave your position for the Lord Jesus' ke, be not afraid. Put your trust in Him. emember His words: "Seek ye first the king- m of God, and all these things shall be added to you." Do not gaze at the mountain which es before you as you look on your new path life. Say unto it, in the name of the Lord, Be thou removed, and be thou cast into the sea, d it shall obey you." Go straight to God's ord, and read the history of His dealings with is people of old. Do not tempt God by doubt- g His care, His power. The great sin of God's osen people was, "They spake against God; d they said, Can God?" (Ps. 78 : 19.)

SHORT HOMILY, SUGGESTED BY THE TAY BRIDGE ACCIDENT.

e Uncertainty of Life—Fearful Condition of Those who Die Unprepared—Needed Observ- ance of the Lord's Day.

AMONG the numerous reflections and remind- s which are suggested by the scene of the dis- trous calamity at Tay Bridge, Dundee, the fol- wing stand out most conspicuously:

First. THE UNCERTAINTY OF LIFE.—It was ancient heathen who said, "Every man's life s within the present; for the past is spent d done with, and the future is uncertain." A t greater authority exhorts us, "Boast not yself of to-morrow; for thou knowest not at a day may bring forth" (Prov. 27 : 1). en are like grass: "In the morning it groweth and flourisheth; in the evening it is cut down d withereth." More than one half of the man race die before they reach manhood. eath is very certain, but the time is very uncer- in. How many there are who think they shall t die because they are in good health; but ey forget that many die in good health, by cidents and other causes.

"Man's uncertain life
Is like a rain-drop hanging on the bough
Amongst ten thousand of its sparkling kindred,
The remnants of some passing thunder-shower,
Which have their moments, dropping one by one;
And which shall soonest lose its perilous hold
We cannot guess."

nce a few moments can turn the healthiest dies into breathless carcasses, how foolish it is venture far from God upon the presumption at death is far enough from us. Should we t rather in the very height of our hilarity deavor to remember that they who feast them- lves to-day may themselves prove feasts for e worms to-morrow?

Secondly. THE FEARFUL CONDITION OF HOSE WHO DIE UNPREPARED.—Strange tales have been told in the wanderings of dying men—tales so full of guilt and crime that those who stood by the sick person's couch have fled in horror and affright lest they should be scared to madness by what they heard and saw, and many a wretch has died alone raving of deeds the very name of which has driven the boldest man away. When Death comes he tears men from the most skilful aid and the tenderest affections. If he find men unprepared for his approach he relents not; they pass away with him into eternity—unconverted, unsaved. It is written of the strait gate, "Few there be that find it." How many people are hurried down into a dark grave, and into a still darker eternity! It may be thy turn next, reader. Are you prepared to die? Have you fled for refuge to Jesus? Have you found forgiveness? These are momentous questions. "It is appointed unto all men once to die, but after that the judgment." "The wicked shall be turned into hell with all the nations that forget God."

Thirdly. A PROPER OBSERVANCE OF THE LORD'S DAY.—Life and blessing will attend the man who observes the Sabbath. The importance of its religious observance is seldom sufficiently estimated. The violation of this duty by the young is one of the most decided marks of incipient moral degeneracy. Religious restraint is fast losing its hold upon that young man who, having been trained in the fear of God, begins to spend the Sabbath in idleness, or travelling, or amusement. And so also of communities. The desecration of the Sabbath is one of those evident indications of that criminal recklessness, that insane love of pleasure, and that subjection to the government of appetite and passion, which forbodes that the "beginning of the end" of social happiness and of true national prosperity has arrived.

Hence we see how imperative is the duty of parents and of legislators on this subject. The head of every family is obliged, by the command of God, not only to honor this day himself, but to use all the means in his power to secure the observance of it by all those committed to his charge. He is thus not only promoting his own but his children's happiness; for nothing is a more sure antagonistic force to all the allurements of vice, as nothing tends more strongly to fix in the minds of the young a conviction of the existence and attributes of God than the solemn keeping of this day. And hence, also, legislators are false to their trust who, either by the enactment of laws or by their example, diminish, in the least degree, in the minds of a people the reverence due to that day which God has set apart for Himself.

On December 18th, 1841, the Rev. R. Murray M'Cheyne, of Dundee, addressed the following words to his "fellow-countrymen" on behalf of the entire sanctification of the Lord's day:

"A majority of the Directors of the Edinburgh and Glasgow Railway have shown their determination, in a manner that has shocked all good men, to open the railway on the Lord's day. The sluices of infidelity have been opened at the same time, and floods of blasphemous tracts are pouring over the land decrying the holy day of the blessed God, as if there was no eye in heaven, no day of reckoning.

"Guilty men! who, under Satan, are leading on the deep, dark phalanx of Sabbath-breakers, yours is a solemn position. You are robbers. You rob God of His holy day. You are murderers. You murder the souls of your servants. God said, 'Thou shalt not do any work, thou, nor thy servant;' but you compel your servants to break Gods law, and to sell their souls for gain. You are sinners against light. You are traitors to your country. The law of your country declares that you should 'observe a holy rest all that day from your own words, works, and thoughts'; and yet you scout it as an antiquated superstition. Was it not Sabbath-breaking that made God cast away Israel? And yet you would bring the same curse on Scotland now. You are moral suicides, stabbing your own souls, proclaiming to the world that you are not the Lord's people, and hurrying on your souls to meet the Sabbath-breaker's doom."

We do not think there is any need for comment upon this bold and Scriptural utterance, and leave it therefore to the prayerful consideration of all whom it may affect. In conclusion, we observe that the North British Railway Company have always been guilty of running trains on Sundays.

The directors of the Caledonian Railway, who are not so guilty, at one time proposed running trains between Glasgow and Greenock on Sundays. The clergy of Greenock were immediately up in arms against the proposal. This, however, would have had little effect with the directors had not the merchants of Greenock come to their rescue, and declared to the directors that in the event of their carrying their proposition into effect, they—the merchants—would send all their goods by river instead of by rail. This of course, as was to have been anticipated, had the desired effect.

SIGNS OF THE END.

THE Illustrated Christian Weekly writes: "It cannot be denied that in the moral and religious tone of society at large all the world over, there has been a deterioration and a failure to respond to former remedies, of increasing and notable character. The average Christian conscience has lost much of its tenderness, and does not hesitate to act upon principles, which even a generation since would have been accepted with great hesitation.

"The lines of Christian conformity to the maxims and amusements of the world are much more loosely drawn. The participation in theatrical and operatic exhibitions, the mingling in dances, and Sabbath indulgences of reading and riding and neglect of the service of God, were very differently regarded then by most professors of religion. And as the evil has extended the old remedies of religious warning and instruction have greatly failed of their former effects.

"Is there then, some general cause which is affecting the world morally and spiritually, as well as physically? Are we drawing nigh to the 'last day,' when 'perilous times shall come'? 'For men shall' then, the apostle tells us, 'be lovers of their own selves, covetous, boasters, proud, blasphemers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, truce breakers, false accusers, incontinent, fierce, despisers of those that are good, traitors, heady, high minded, lovers of pleasure more than lovers of God, having a form of godliness, but denying the power thereof.'"

The feature of depravity described in the concluding clause, which no one but God could have foreseen, is peculiarly characteristic of the present age.

The Indian Opium Trade.—Mr. Spurgeon, writing in the New Year's number of the Sword and Trowel, says: "The opium trade, by almost universal consent, is one of the most iniquitous, most deadly, and most accursed evils of the nineteenth century. If war is slaying its thousands, the opium trade is slaying its ten thousands. Well would it have been if the virtuous and tender-hearted queen of these realms had refused the title of Empress of the Indian empire so long as the self-inflicted curse upon itself and other nations remained. Had it been conferred by India itself in commemoration of the abolition of this gigantic evil it would have been accepted as a reality rather than a romance."

General Jackson and the Unusual Noise.— An officer once complained to General Jackson that some soldiers were making a noise in their tent. "What are they doing?" asked the general. "They are praying now, but have been singing," was the reply. "And is that a crime?" the general demanded. "The articles of war order punishment for any unusual noise," was the reply. "God forbid that praying should be an unusual noise in the camp!" said Jackson.

A WEIGHT OF WEALTH.

(Continued from page 47.)

A Heroine.

FOR the last ten years Mrs. Clifford had had her own way without check. Ernest was one of those men, conscious of their own strength, who are extremely indulgent to the women related to them, and who feel that any unnecessary assertion of their authority is tyrannical. He was over-scrupulous in his chivalrous deference toward his mother; the more so as he felt that there was no very deep esteem and respect for her character in his inmost heart.

It was now, therefore, an almost unbearable trial to her to be debarred from accompanying her son and granddaughter to London. She was still under sixty; and time had not made those ravages upon her good looks which are manifest in many faces. There were no finely-drawn lines of thought and sorrow upon her smooth forehead, and her light blonde hair scarcely showed a streak of gray, while her slight and small figure was still quite young in its erectness.

When she was well dressed—and she was always well dressed now—she might easily pass for being fifteen years younger than she was; and nothing pleased her so much as to be taken for Earnest's wife. She neither felt nor looked like a woman of sixty, for her mind had not grown at all since her marriage with Charles Clifford, thirty-three years ago.

It had attained all the maturity of which it was capable during her first marriage and widowhood, and had never ripened into mellowness, but remained green and hard, like fruit that has grown in poor and stony ground. She had set her heart upon passing this season in London; and now a serious attack of bronchitis had compelled Dr. Welsh to forbid the journey, and above all the exposure to so great a change of climate.

Ernest was by no means grieved. He very decidedly preferred taking his holiday with Rose alone; though he had been too considerate of his mother's feelings to suggest such a course. He was compassionate, and unwaveringly patient and forbearing toward her; but he had never loved her since she had married the old man, whose estate he was now possessing. The impression made upon the boy had been too deep and indelible, ever to pass away altogether as he grew into manhood.

He had not left Rose's training to his mother. The only point on which his will had clashed with her wishes was that of sending the girl to a boarding-school. Rose had never left home, and he had chosen her governesses himself; asking no one's opinion, except Ruth Symons. Silently, though not quite unsuspected by Mrs. Clifford's hundred-eyed jealousy, Ruth had directed Rose's education, and found in so doing, the sweetest occupation of her dreary life.

Ernest was little over forty, and the last ten years had given him an air of distinction and of genial dignity, which had not charactized him as the poor and reserved Vicar of Clifford. The consciousness of being a good landowner, and a magistrate looked up to as one of the best on the bench, sat well upon him. He was a tall, vigorous, handsome man, and like his mother looked even younger than his years.

The certainty of being listened to had made him more fluent, on the platform of the many meetings he was invited to attend, than he had ever been in his pulpit. He was a leader of politics in the county, and reckoned upon as one of the strongest men of his party. Sir John Fortescue, the senior member for the northern division of the shire, made much of Ernest Clifford; especially since he had published a pamphlet on Sir John's favorite measure.

Many a time had Rose's pretty face flushed, and her eyes glistened through happy, unshed tears, as she had listened triumphantly to the applause elicited by her father's well-turned and well-considered sentences. He was engaged to speak at sundry meetings, religious and political, during April and May, to London audiences; and she felt assured beforehand that his eloquence would create a wonderful sensation; for Rose had never heard an orator to compare with her father.

Ernest himself looked forward to these appearances upon a wider stage with diffidence, not unpleasantly flavored with the recollection of the flattering opinions uttered by his bishop, and Sir John and other critics, well acquainted with London speeches. Both he and Rose were about to make their first appearance before the world, on the world's own stage.

Ernest had taken care to provide the means of doing so with a kind of quiet grandeur, suitable to his station. He did not like to be stinted in his expenditure while dwelling in London; and he desired Rose to look her best, the more so as Lady Fortescue had graciously offered to be her chaperone, whenever she wished to go where chaperones were necessary.

He had been very frugal in his personal expenditure in order to provide these funds; for he had made the discovery so quickly made by us all, that really his larger means were not much more elastic than his small stipend as vicar had been. Clifford Grange and his position as landowner could not be kept up as it should be, on much less than its full income; and as he had added an extra hundred a year to his friend Mr. Britton's living, it had required strict economy to secure any surplus on his annual outlay.

"It's of no use, Ernest," exclaimed his mother, the Saturday before their departure, "I must go, and I will go. If I'm too ill to go, I'm to ill to be left. It's all a nasty trick of Dr. Welsh's, to keep me here. I'm quite well enough to go with you, I'm quite sure."

"My dear mother," he answered firmly, "Dr. Welsh says the east winds in London might be fatal to you, and you hardly catch them here. It is tedious for you, I know; but there is no danger, if you take ordinary care of yourself."

"Then Rose ought to stay with me," she said peevishly.

"If there were any danger we would both stay," he answered; "but you are to have Jenny Britton with you, and you often say Jenny is more like a granchild to you than Rose. But there is Welsh coming up the drive. Now we shall have his last word."

Dr. Welsh's last word was that Mrs. Clifford could not possibly go. He would not answer for her life if she went. Then she tried to make him say that she must not be left, but that he mocked at. There was no risk at all, if she would simply take care of herself, and keep in a mild, equal temperature. After an animated dispute Mrs. Clifford took herself out of the room in high dudgeon, leaving Dr. Welsh and her son together.

"I've just come from Rockwood," said Dr. Welsh; "the old squire is on the verge of delirium tremens, and there's Ruth hovering about him like the angel she is. If there ever was a living saint on earth it's Ruth Symons." The doctor said this without being aware that it was her new, Christ-given nature that made Ruth what she was. (Ezek. 11 : 19.)

Ernest's face clouded, and his brows contracted a little. There was but one flaw in his prosperity, one cloud in his sky. His love for Ruth had grown and deepened during these ten years. What it may have lost in impetuosity and passion it had gained in strength and faithfulness. It seemed as if he was bound to stand by and see her suffer a martyrdom from which he had no power to deliver her. This was growing intolerable to him.

"Is there no chance of the old drunkard's death?" he asked, with a sharp and impatient ring in his voice.

"Well, not much," answered Dr. Welsh, with a half smile, "not if I can prevent it, you see. Of course I shall do my utmost to keep him alive; and I fancy I can drag him through. I know quite well that if I merely withheld such and such remedies, a wretched life would be taken away out of many a household; and the saints like Ruth, would get relief from their troubles.

"But what am I to do, Clifford? I'm sent for to spin out the miserable thread of their lives t the very last moment; and if I did not do a science and practice teach me, I'm neither mo nor less than a murderer."

"Is he very bad?" inquired Ernest, the frow darkening on his face.

"He's so bad," replied the doctor, "that I' banished Miss Ruth from his room, and sent i two strong men to sit up with him. I've hire a nurse for him, too, from the village here, Jul Rush; a strong, robust, handsome woman, wit more muscle in her arm than in mine. She h promised to go, on condition that she is n called a servant. I told her I could get a re lady from London if she did not come, and th decided her. She is to have unlimited authori over the old fellow; and she'll keep Ruth out the room, I'll wager. That is exactly what wanted."

"Then you think there is no danger for him said Ernest.

"Not much," he answered. "Of course the are always chances; but he has pulled throug many a time, and he'll pull through now. H constitution is as strong as a horse's. So Miss Ruth's. Look at her with all her trouble as sound as a bell, with a head as clear as h skin, and that is like alabaster. She is a sple did woman and to think of her being sacrific to that man!"

Ernest's face reflected the disgust upon D Welsh's; but he gave a turn to the conversatio It displeased him to hear the old doctor hims speak of Ruth in such homely terms of admir tion. He would see her for himself that ve evening; his poor Ruth! Why had she been bent upon her course of self-sacrifice ten yea ago? Why had she chosen her father befo him? He had seen the manner of her life, liv beside it, admired and pitied it; but he cou not understand it. With him she would ha passed her days in happiness and peace; s would not have had a wish unfulfilled if he cou have met it. They suited one another; the was no barrier between them; they were equa able to walk together side by side, with no fr ting strain, or sense of inequality.

Yet she had chosen to stay with a brute, w trampled upon her affection, and treated her he would not dare to treat the meanest of s vants. "He treats her worse than a dog thought Ernest, whose own dogs were d friends and companions to him. If Ruth's fath loved her as he loved Rose he might have h patience; but now he could not endure t knowledge of her daily martyrdom.

That evening Ernest was sitting in the sa old arm-chair beside Ruth's fire, as when he h almost fallen asleep with fatigue and exciteme the day after his stepfather's death. His thoug went back to that time as he waited for Ruth come to him; it was most natural that th should run into that channel, though they h long ceased to perplex him, except in rare m ments like these, with the question of wheth he had decided rightly about old Charles C ford's will.

He had left himself to drift in that one imp tant epoch of his life, and he was out in and calm waters, with favoring winds filling sails, and not a rock ahead. Surely the resu proved that he was right. His eyes were closed to-night when Ruth entered with her s footfall and quiet movements. The ten ye that had made him a man who thought wel himself, and who was well thought of by all ab him, had not seen much change in her, sav line or two of more settled sadness on her fa

She had been weeping, evidently, for her e lids were reddened and her lips tremulous, tho she attempted to smile as he hastened to m her. They were friends, but there could be hope at present of a closer tie. Yet Ernest co not refrain from taking both her hands in his kissing her tear-stained face.

"My father is so ill," she said, with a s "that Dr. Welsh will not let me stay with hi

"Ruth!" he exclaimed impetuously, " long is this to go on for you and me?"

"I wish you had nothing to do with it," she answered, sitting down in her own low chair, while he stood before her, looking down at her moodily and almost angrily. "If it was not such comfort to me, I could wish with all my heart that you did not care a straw about it. But, oh! Ernest, you are all the comfort I have."

"Ruth!" he cried, with hot indignation, "do you think I can stand by and see you suffer as you do, and not long to snatch you away from your suffering? I'm not hard-hearted. If I see a dumb creature in any kind of trouble, I cannot pass it by. How do you suppose I feel when I know what you have to bear day after day? You are more precious to me than anything else in life; more precious than my little Rose herself; and I ask myself as well as you, how long is this to go on for you and me?"

"As long as God wills it," she said softly.

"But does He will it?" he asked. "Are you sure that He does require this sacrifice from you? Does He always send the best and sweetest of His creatures to pass through agony? Will He heat the furnace seven times hotter than it is wont to be heated for every saint he has on earth? Ruth, I cannot believe it."

"The Son of God walked with them in the midst of the furnace," she replied, looking up to him with a smile on her pale face, "and the fire had no power, nor was a hair of their heads singed, nor did the smell of fire pass upon them. It is quite true, Ernest. I would rather stay in the furnace, with the Son of God beside me, than sit as a queen on a throne of gold.

"Only I am not quite faithful enough yet to escape having my hair singed and getting the smell of fire upon me now and then. It does not burn any deeper, and I am happier than you think—happier than if I forsook my post. I am truly happy; and if I could yet save my father, I should consider my lot more blessed than if I had been your happy wife all these years."

Her voice faltered a little as she uttered the last words, and a vivid color came into the face he was regarding so moodily.

"I have not reached your height," he answered truthfully; "I cannot see things from your point of view. I'm quite blind to your happiness, Ruth; if you could make it visible to me as visible as your red eyelids, and pale cheeks I would take comfort to myself."

"It is all my fault for giving way to crying," she said, in a self-reproachful tone; "you know quite well what inward blessedness is when outward circumstances seem all against us. I own that my circumstances seem very much against me; but have I not your friendship?"

"My love," interrupted Ernest.

"Your love," she continued, with a happy intonation of her sweet voice, "yes! your true, faithful love. And does not Rose love me? Is she not almost like my own child to me? No! I would not change my lot, loving you two, with any other woman under the sun."

"God bless you, Ruth!" he exclaimed.

"I have never said so much before," she went on; "do you wonder to hear me speak so warmly now? Ah! you are going away for a long while; and you have never left Clifford for more than a day or two before. I shall miss you sadly."

"Do not you know why I have never cared to leave Clifford?" he asked. "Don't I like to feel you within an hour's walk of me! Rose has set her heart upon this journey, or I would give it up now. If I had foreseen your father's attack—"

"Do not think of it," she interrupted; "I would rather you were away. What could you do for me? Dr. Welsh will be here every day; and there is no danger, he says. By the time you come back my father will be driving into rtford, to the magistrates' meeting, as usual. No; you must not let me interfere any longer with your plans. Put me out of the plan of your life, Ernest. It is God's will."

"How do you know it is His will?" he asked again.

(To be continued.)

TRUE DISCIPLES.

S. S. Lesson for Feb. 1. Matt. 5 : 1-16. Golden Text, ver. 14. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

WE read in chapter 4 : 23 that "Jesus went about all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of sickness, and all manner of disease among the people." Our blessed Lord came, not as a Saviour only, but as a king. How unlike other kings! "My kingdom is not of this world," He said to Pilate (John 19 : 36). This unworldly kingdom of the Lord's has laws and principles which are "not of this world," which differ in their origin and in their purposes from all which is of man, and all which is "of the earth, earthy" (1 Cor. 15 : 47).

And it is these heavenly principles which He unfolds to us in the Sermon on the Mount. He was teaching His disciples in the presence of the multitude, and thus does He ever. Paul had learned how true this was when he wrote (1 Cor. 4 : 9), "We are made a spectacle unto the world, and to angels, and to men." Oh, how short-sighted are we often, and how little do we understand the heart of our God! He seeks to justify Himself before men to prove the truth of His own word, and to justify His own character, in dealings with His willing and pliable children. And when we fret against the yoke, we hinder this great purpose of our God.

The first principle of Christ's kingdom is poverty of spirit. This is the direct opposite of the world's ideas. A man who has not spirit enough to look after his own interests is looked upon in the world as a fool. A man who does not resent an injury is suspected as having some unworthy sinister motive. The natural man does not see or appreciate the greatness and nobility of living above self, and leaving retaliation to the beasts which perish, and which have no divine origin and no eternal life. To endure grief, suffering wrongfully," to "do well and suffer for it, and yet take it patiently" (1 Peter 2 : 19, 20)—this is to be poor in spirit.

Our Lord next teaches "Blessed are they that mourn," not they that murmur or complain. Unselfish sorrow is as little understood by men in general as unselfish joy. Yet there is a "fellowship of His sufferings" (Phil. 3 : 10), who is our Lord and Head, which is divine, and which belongs to His kingdom. In Ezek. 9 : 4, the "man with a writer's ink-horn" is charged to go through the midst of Jerusalem to "set a mark upon the foreheads of the men that sigh and that cry for all the abominations that be done in the midst thereof." This is holy mourning, in which self has no place. Those who bear the burden of souls, and those cannot lightly pass over a sin in themselves—these are the blessed mourners who "shall be comforted."

Then there are "the meek," the uncomplaining ones, with heads ever bowed in unquestioning submission. These conquer by enduring, for who can quarrel with one who accepts wrong as a privilege, and who can be jealous of him who takes the lowest place? Oh what mighty power is there in true Christianity! Lived out, the gates of hell could not prevail against it.

Blessed are they which do hunger and thirst after righteousness. Like the Ethiopian eunuch, and the wise men who came from distant lands to seek the truth of God, or like Cornelius who waited with his expectant company of friends and relations to hear from Peter, all things that were commanded him of God (Acts 10 : 33)—these are blessed souls. It is a lovely sight to see an old experienced Christian learning of others, and there are none such learners; these fathers in Christ are not ashamed to learn from the little children, for they hunger and thirst ever after more of God, as the hart after the water brooks, and God says "they shall be filled." They who are full already cannot be filled. "Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing, etc. . . . I counsel thee to buy of Me," etc. (Rev. 3 : 18). Those Christians who take upon themselves to judge others and to criticise, are not among God's blessed ones.

Therefore "blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy." David says (Ps. 37 : 26), "The righteous is ever merciful, and lendeth; and his seed is blessed." It is this lesson of mercy which the Lord Jesus sought to teach in the temple, when the accusers of the woman taken in adultery stood around, hoping to find an accusation against Jesus on the ground of His mercy to the sinful. He that "knew no sin" said to them, "He that is without sin among you, let him first cast a stone at her." He alone was in the position to execute God's righteous law, and He did it not, because in His own Person He fulfilled the law and bore our sins; therefore He said, "Neither do I condemn thee: go, and sin no more" (John 8 : 7, 11). His ground for mercy was His offering of Himself once for all in our stead—our ground for mercy is quite another—we ourselves are not without sin. Let us learn this lesson in our judgment, and in our treatment of others.

"Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Any iniquity, any thing of self or sin, hinders the faculty by which we discern God in all which happens. To look upon circumstances, persons, possibilities, etc., is to have divided faith; this is not the "single eye." When we attempt to look fixedly at two objects in the same glance, neither is seen distinctly. "In Thy light shall we see light." No heart is pure in which self reigns.

And "blessed are the peacemakers," those who are always seeking to bring about an understanding, to bring together those who have been separated. This is the blessed office of those who win souls—leading them to understand their Father's heart, and pleading for them with Him. And this is the office of those who seek to reconcile divided Christians.

"Blessed are they which are persecuted for righteousness sake." Let us notice this is not for eccentricity's sake, not for the sake of the party to which we belong, only for "righteousness sake." When we are persecuted, let us allow the eye of God to search us through and through that there may be no real ground for accusations which are made against us. We may often learn a real lesson of that which is wrong in our inward experience through the false accusations of others. They often hit quite on the wrong thing, but if we are wise we shall not repudiate indignantly what we are accused of because it is false, but leave our justification to God, asking Him if He has anything to say to us through the condemnation of men. All accusation is blessed when it is for His sake.

"Ye are the salt of the earth," our Lord goes on to say. Whenever there is salt in our food we are able to discover it: salt makes its presence manifest, and salt preserves too. "But if the salt has lost its savor, which is so strong, wherewith shall it be salted? It is thenceforth good for nothing but to be cast out and trodden under foot of men." And this is the type of a lifeless, savorless Christianity, a religion without power, a life which does not tell on those around us.

"Ye are the light of the world." Wherever light comes, and in the degree in which it comes, darkness flees away. We are called to manifest, not to hide, our light, "and it giveth light unto all that are in the house." Are we light-givers to all who dwell in our houses, so that they see and understand God better through what they see of us? This is our privilege as God's light in the world. "The light of the body is the eye; if, therefore, thine eye be single, thy whole body shall be full of light; but if thine eye be evil, thy whole body shall be full of darkness. If, therefore, the light that is in thee be darkness, how great is that darkness." (Matt. 6 : 22, 23). Faith is the eye of our souls by which we behold Jesus, by which we imbibe light and life from Him. If there be self-confidence mingled with our faith, darkness is produced—we see God through fog and mist. And the Lord exhorts "Let (not make) your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify (not you), but your Father which is in heaven." "So shine," i.e. ever with a view to His glory.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Irish Troubles Continue the Leading topic of English attention. The distress in that unhappy country is rapidly increasing, and cases of death from starvation are daily reported. The relief fund organized by the Duchess of Marlborough now amounts to $92,150, and the English Government has offered loans to be expended in works of public utility for the purpose of giving employment to distressed operatives. Queen Victoria was one of the first subscribers to the relief fund ; she gave $2500. Her kindness and sympathy with any of her subjects in trouble was so generally believed, that Mr. Parnell's statement that she alone of the sovereigns of Europe refrained from contributing to the relief fund in 1847 was doubted. It now appears from reliable authority that at that time she gave $10,000, and Prince Albert and other members of the Royal family $2500 each.

Several conflicts between the populace and the men employed to serve notices of ejection on tenants who have not paid their rent, are reported, but the general state of the country is said to show a marked improvement on former periods of distress in Ireland. But for the political agitation kept up by Mr. Parnell and his friends, it is believed that the period of suffering and distress the people are now undergoing would be borne patiently and hopefully by the masses.

The English Position in Afghanistan is Still threatened by hostile movements. Musa Khan, a son of Yakoob Khan, the ex-Ameer, has been brought forward by the disaffected Afghans as a successor to his father. He is a mere boy, but is being used by a military leader named Mahmud Jan to enlist the support of that portion of the people loyal to the former rulers of the land. The grandmother of the boy, a wealthy old princess, is said to have expended a sum equal to $100,000 in getting the representatives of the Afghan tribes together in the boy's interest. The question has been considered by the English whether it would not be prudent to allow Musa Khan to ascend the Afghan throne and to assist him in quieting the country. But it is generally believed that any ruler who was known to be supported by English arms would become unpopular in Afghanistan, as was the case with Yakoob Khan.

Severe Distress in Germany has been Caused by the hard winter following a deficient harvest. The foreign correspondent of a New York journal writes : "Such a severe winter as that under which the populations of Silesia, East and West Prussia, and the Duchy of Posen have been suffering for more than a month past, has not been experienced in North-eastern Europe since the year 1812. It has come like a doom upon the poor people after an almost total failure of the potato crop, upon which the peasantry of these sterile regions mainly depend for their winter sustenance. We read of parents all but naked in wretched empty rooms forlorn of fire, the corpses of their children, victims of typhus, lying uncovered on the floor, with no means left to obtain the rudest coffin for the dead, or the coarsest morsel of food for the living ; and of women driven to despair, lying down deliberately in the snow to die, in order to put an end to their intolerable misery."

An Imperial Scandal in Russia, it now appears, has given rise to much of the internal trouble afflicting that nation. The quarrels in the Imperial family, which for some time have been notorious, and which involved a separation between the Czar and his eldest son, are said by several journalists to be caused by a sinful connection existing between the Czar and a lady of the court. The Czar has fallen completely under her influence, and allows her to control his policy of government. History records many instances of national disaster resulting from similar sins of kings, and Russia would seem to be another illustration of this principle of divine judgment. It is understood to be under the influence of this wicked passion that Alexander has put aside the projects of reform he had prepared, and which were urged upon him by his son and enlightened statesmen ; and much of the tortuous and capricious policy of the last two years, with all the horrors of the state of siege, are ascribed to the same cause.

A Series of Riots has Taken Place at Pesth, in Hungary, owing to a duel fought between Baron Maithenyi, an aristocratic politician, and Herr Verhoray, the editor of a Radical journal, in which the editor was fatally wounded. The popularity of the wounded man was very general in the locality ; an embittered feeling against the Baron and his friends was excited, which culminated in riotous demonstrations. A Pesth dispatch to an English journal asserts that upward of twenty-five persons were killed and wounded, and that fresh disturbances were apprehended. "The soldiers are confined to their barracks. The ill-feeling against the Tisza Government has doubtless much to do with the present movement. It is feared the provincial towns will follow the example of Pesth."

The Severity of German Rule in Alsace-Lorraine, the provinces wrested from France in the late Franco-German war, may be judged from two recent occurrences at Strasburg. A tobacconist was sentenced to fine and imprisonment for selling cigarettes in tri-colored wrappers, on which were printed the words "Souvenir Nationale." At the same time a man was sent to jail for criticising a speech of Bismarck in the hearing of a few people in a coffee-house.

Rev. C. H. Spurgeon's Restoration to Health is making rapid progress. Writing from Mentone on January 1st, he thus addresses his congregation and the readers of his sermons : "Beloved friends,—On this first day of a New Year I salute you with hearty good wishes, and pray that every blessing may attend your future steps. I beg also on my own behalf your prayers that through another year my ministry may be more edifying to the saints, more persuasive with sinners, and more acceptable to the Lord. I thank the great Healer that this day smiles upon me, and sees me free from pain, reviving in strength, and restored in spirit. I shall hope soon to be at work again. Oh for an anointing with fresh oil !" We are sure the American readers of his sermons will join in the prayers he asks for.

A Day Among the London Poor.—The Rev. S. Styleman Herring, of St. Paul's Cathedral, whose interest in the sick and poor is well known, thus describes one day's round of visits : "I have just visited—1, a tradesman overcome with grief at late losses ; 2, a master carpenter in hospital through same cause ; 3, a soldier's family without a bed to lie on ; 4, six children huddled over a coke fire, two nearly destitute of clothing ; 5, aged couple with widowed daughter, all wasting away ; 6, descendant of French Huguenots all but broken through want." Mr. Herring, in pleading for these poor people, whom he calls "his clients," considers that he is honored in being their advocate. A day will come when such advocates will indeed be honored (Luke 14 : 14).

Disabled Beggars.—A Writer in the London Standard has given an account of the system by which the public sympathies are often imposed upon by beggars. The success of a disabled beggar, we are told, depends not only on the extent of his disability, but also on its rarity, and on the way it catches the eyes of passengers. A man who has lost one arm is supposed to be more helpless than one who has lost one leg, and as well as a man wanting both legs. A man who has lost an arm and a leg is twice as valuable a beggar as the one just mentioned. One wanting two legs and an arm rates higher still. While the man who has no arms at all, when such a rara avis makes his appearance in the mendicant world, is above all price. We are assured by the writer that women who get hold of peculiarly hideous-looking beggars, inveigle them into marriage if they can, in order to perpetuate the profitable connection. He has repeatedly heard women of the lowest class declare that for a husband they would prefer an average begga a day laborer. In consequence, the begga quite run after by marriageable women in sphere. With such facts as these before those to whom God has intrusted this wor goods need to exercise special care how t dispense them ; and where they cannot th selves exercise the necessary vigilance, t should rather intrust the means to experier Christian workers.

The Swedish Protestant Mission in South Egypt has suffered severe persecution in " sequence of the absence of the Governor, don Pasha, who happens to be an Eng Protestant. Mr. Henderson writes : Two verted Abyssinian priests who had received b from us were seized some days ago and flog one had forty stripes, the other forty-t Their backs were dreadfully lacerated, say eye-witness, blood flowed from their mouth nose ; under all this they stood joyfully fa what they had read in the books. After flogging they turned to the officers and s 'To-day you have judged us, but another d coming when He shall judge you for whose r we have suffered this.' They were put in i and taken to a monastery, Debra-Bizen, w they are to be made to pray to the Virgin saints. Do not forget to pray for these, bretl Notwithstanding these circumstances, we going on quietly with our work in the sch and confirmed six of our scholars who par of the Lord's Supper with us."

A Scene at a Wake was Described at a lice Court at Birmingham, England, one d the Christmas week. The corpse the party "waking" was that of a man dead of malig typhus, and the wake had continued three ni when a woman present sang a song which the "boys" laugh. A man in the room bottle of whiskey in his pocket, and an old w took it out. The man then seized the w and pitched her bodily over the corpse, w was laid out on a table, and nearly tossed it Another man, who was drunk, was stagg about the room, and tumbled against a ch drawers, which fell on him. The orgies end a promiscuous fight, which brought those p into the police court.

A Wounded Officer was found by Dr. son, the eminent ambulance surgeon durin late Russo-Turkish war, being attended by cassian doctor. This doctor, understandin a bullet had lodged somewhere in the of elbow, was employing his skill to extra and in order to induce it to quit its resting was sucking the wound, in the vain hope presently the lead must succumb to the a tion. After some persuasion he was indu surrender his victim to the English "hak who on examination found the bullet to firmly imbedded in the bone as to be whol movable without the aid of surgical instru Had it not been for this opportune introdu the man would have died ; but, as it was, plete cure was effected. The Circassian d method reminds us of the futile methods a by moralists and philosophers to cure the si woes. Not until the Great Physician's po heal is acknowledged and obtained, does a sick soul find healing and peace.

A Fall into a Grave.—"A Shocking tacle," says an English journal, "was wit at an interment at Kirkcaldy recently. all the attendants and mourners had got toxicated as to be unable to conduct them properly, so that one of them when loweri coffin into the grave staggered forward a headlong into the tomb, and became jamm tween the descending corpse and the side grave. He was extricated with great diffic It is to be hoped that his accident may s to him the thought that as he has once be cued from a grave into which he had through the influence of drink, it will be the future to avoid the liquor which is send him to a grave from which there wil extrication till the day when the last grea pet shall sound.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

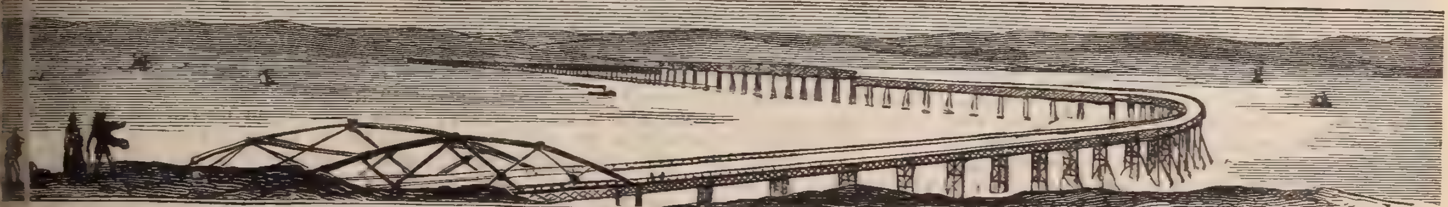
P ished at 63 Bible House, New York City, and 2 Ivy Lane, London. Edited in London by the Rev. M. Baxter, in New York by Mr. B. Aitken.

his Journal contains every week a Portrait and Biography of some eminent person; a new Sermon by the Rev. C. H. SPURGEON, of London, and the Rev. Dr. TAMAGE'S latest Sunday morning Sermon; also occasionally a Sermon by the Rev. W. MORLEY PUNSHON, LL.D., the celebrated Methodist Minister, Rev. W. M. H AITKEN, or some other Eminent Preacher; also always a Prophetic Article, and a Summary of Current Events, as well as Stories, Anecdotes, etc.

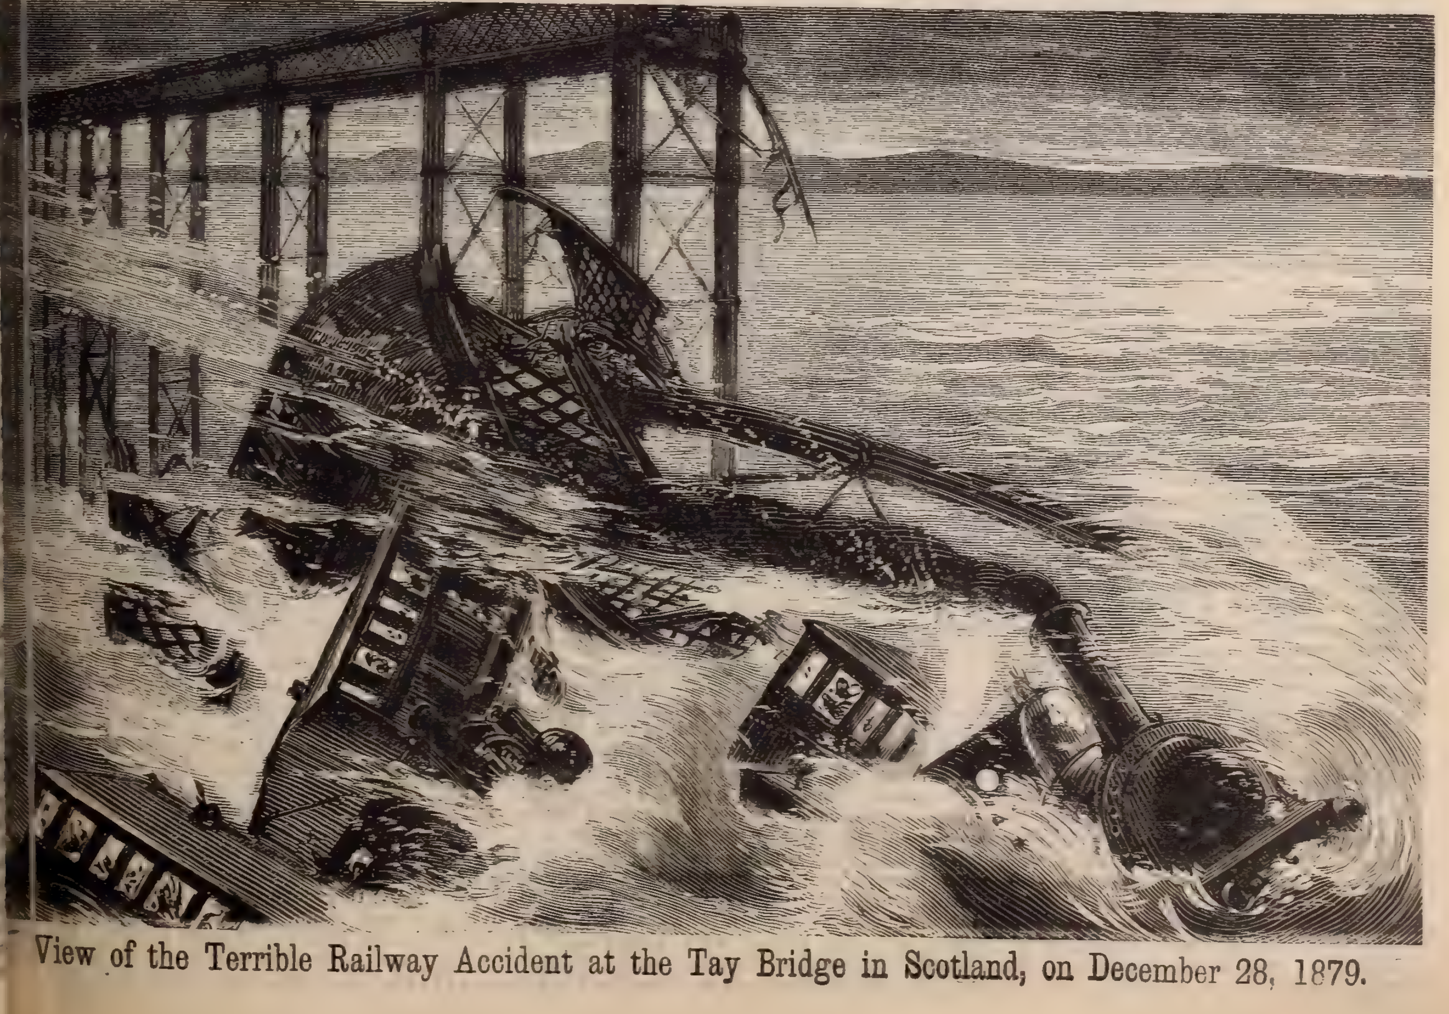
ngle Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, JANUARY 29, 1880. 14th Year. No. 5—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PI URE AND DESCRIPTION OF THE TAY IDGE IN SCOTLAND, and of the Terrible Rail- rd Accident, December 28th.
TE MB SCREWS, OR TOLERATION. A New Ser- n by Dr. Talmage.
AROLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE. A Thrilling ial Story by the Author of "Felicia Cuffe."
WATCHFULNESS FOR THE SECOND ADVENT—What it Implies, by Rev. R. Chester.
CURRENT EVENTS: Congress—The Military Called Out in Maine—The Utes at Washington—The Shepherd's Fold Revelations—Mr. Spurgeon's Letter to American Ministers—The Lessons of the Great Pyramid—A Man's Hand Caught in a Wheel, etc.
DIVERS PERILOUS PURSUITS.
CHEER UP, MY COMRADES. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
An Incident in the Crimea—A Fearful Journey.
THE MOMENTOUS DECADE.
A WEIGHT OF WEALTH. (Continued.)
The Truly Righteous. S. S. Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter.
FOREIGN TOPICS: The English in Afghanistan—The Irish Famine—A Terrible Colliery Explosion, etc.



VIEW OF THE TAY BRIDGE BEFORE THE ACCIDENT.



View of the Terrible Railway Accident at the Tay Bridge in Scotland, on December 28, 1879.

THE TERRIBLE RAILWAY ACCIDENT IN SCOTLAND.

How the Calamity was Discovered—News of the Disaster—Description of the Bridge—The Catastrophe Predicted—The Seer of Gourdie—Accidents during Construction—The Opening Ceremony—The Queen's Visit—The Train and its Journey—Narratives of Eye-witnesses—Affecting Incident—Remarkable Escapes—Diving for the Wrecked Train.

IN our issue of January 1st we gave a brief description of the appalling calamity which, on Sunday, December 28th, befell a train while crossing the Tay Bridge on its way from Edinburgh to Dundee. Regarded in its various aspects, and considering the fact that not one person was left alive to tell the tale, it is perhaps the most awful catastrophe that has ever occurred in the history of railway travelling. The train arrived safely at the south end of the Tay Bridge shortly after seven o'clock, and the bridge was then intact, for the signals were given to allow the train to cross it.

HOW THE CALAMITY WAS DISCOVERED.

The train which fell into the river was duly signalled from the Fife side as having entered on the bridge for Dundee at 7.14 P.M, It was seen running along the rails, and then suddenly there was observed a flash of fire. The opinion was that the train left the rails and went over the bridge. Those who saw the accident repaired immediately to the Tay Bridge Station at Dundee, and informed the station master of what they had seen. He at once put himself in communication with the man in charge of the signal-box at the north end of the bridge. The telegraph wires were stretched across the bridge, but when the instrument was tried it was soon seen that the wires were broken. Mr. Smith, the station master, and Mr. Roberts, locomotive superintendent, determined, notwithstanding the fierce gale that was raging, to walk from the north side across the bridge as far as possible, with the view of ascertaining the extent of the disaster. They were able to get out a considerable distance, and the first thing that caught their eye was the water spurting from a pipe which was laid across the bridge for the supply of Newport, a village on the south side of the Dundee reservoirs. Going out a little farther they could distinctly see, by the aid of the strong moonlight, that there was a large gap in the bridge, caused by the fall, so far as they could discern, of two or three of the largest spans. They thought, however, that they observed a red light on the south part of the bridge, and were of opinion that the train had been brought to a standstill on the driver noticing the accident. This conjecture unfortunately proved incorrect.

THE NEWS OF THE DISASTER.

When the nature and extent of the calamity became known, the greatest consternation was spread throughout the whole of Great Britain. In the more immediate neighborhood in which it occurred the greatest excitement was created—excitement the more intensified by reason of the difficulty in ascertaining details of the catastrophe, and information regarding the actual loss of life. The scene at the Tay Bridge was indescribable and heartrending. Thousands of persons congregated around the buildings, and strong men and women were seen wringing their hands in despair.

DESCRIPTION OF THE BRIDGE.

The Tay Bridge, which was opened on Friday, the 31st of May, 1878, was the largest railway structure over a tidal stream in the world, it being two miles and thirty-two feet long. The construction of the bridge was commenced in 1871, at a point about a mile and a half above Newport. The engineer was Mr. Bouch (who was knighted a few weeks ago), and the contractors were Messrs. Hopkins, Gilkes & Co., of Middlesborough. At the place where operations were begun the river was nearly two miles wide, with a maximum depth at high water in spring tides of forty-five feet, and with a velocity of current as high at times as five knots per hour. The bridge consisted of eighty-five spans, varying in breadth from sixty-seven to 245 feet. Of this latter width there are eleven spans, and two of 227 feet, which cross the navigable portion of the river. At this part the bridge has a height of eighty-eight feet above high-water mark, from which it slopes down to the Fife side with a gradient of one in 356, and toward the Dundee end, where it takes a curve to the eastward. The spans are formed of wrought-iron lattice girders, and the supporting piers were in some cases entirely of brickwork; in others they consisted of a substructure of brick with iron columns. Though the bridge was fragile in appearance, no doubt whatever was entertained of its strength.

THE DISASTER PREDICTED.

It must not be supposed that the accident which has happened has never been prognosticated. Ever since the bridge was projected there have been Cassandras of more or less note who predicted that what has happened would happen. Engineering opinion, however, overrode unprofessional alarmists. Eight or nine years ago the lucubrations of Mr. Patrick Mathew—the seer of Gourdie, as he was called—appeared in a Dundee newspaper. There was no doubt a good deal of nonsense in his matter, but there was at the same time some degree of sense. He called it a high, slender, rainbow-like structure—a description not inelegant, and certainly very true, of the Tay Bridge. He enumerated certain dangers, some of which were chimerical, and others undoubtedly ludicrous. His two principal objections, however, were—first, that it would be unable to resist the storms which sweep along the Tay; and, secondly, that with a train swiftly proceeding along the structure its weight and velocity would act with such centrifugal force upon the curve that the workmanship, unable to bear the strain, would give way, and the carriages with their living freight would be precipitated into the yawning river below.

Mr. Mathews was not alone in his vaticinations, though the most outspoken. Several members of the Harbor Board were against the bridge, particularly Mr. Kerr, a local merchant, and the latter gentleman proclaimed his unbelief in the scheme in no stinted fashion. In fact, for years before, and for a long time after, the commencement of the bridge, the great mass of the people of Dundee had little faith in the undertaking.

But eventually, in a lecture given by Mr. Grothe, the engineer who superintended the building operations, he maintained that when completed it would be sufficient to resist the greatest storm that had ever been known to blow down the Tay, and to support a far heavier train than was ever proposed to be sent over it. The result was that people then began to get proud of the bridge, and invited eminent persons to sail across the river and inspect the embryo piers and girders.

ACCIDENTS DURING CONSTRUCTION.

The building of the bridge was not free from accidents. One of the saddest occurred in 1873, when the bursting of a cylinder in the foundation caused the death of six workmen. Nearly three years ago two of the very girders which have fallen were blown into the river by a tremendous gale, but fortunately only one man was lost. Several minor accidents occurred, but the total number of workmen killed during the whole of the building did not exceed eight or nine.

THE OPENING CEREMONY.

After various vicissitudes the bridge was opened on the 31st of May, 1878, and a banquet was held in the Albert Institute Hall (now the magnificent home of the Dundee Free Library and Museum) in honor of the event. Flags waved, bands played, and crowds cheered. The company passed over the bridge in a special train, and walked in procession through the streets of the town to the banqueting hall. The pride of the Dundee people swelled into enthusiasm. Branch railways were made to connect the bridge with places near at hand. Thousands of working people crossed it every Saturday afternoon to enjoy the fresh breezes of the Fife hills, and special trips were run d the summer months to the ancient city c Andrews.

THE QUEEN'S VISIT.

During the summer of 1879 the height o Dundonians' ambition was attained, and Queen, who had not visited Dundee for twenty years, of her own accord passed thr the town with her suite on her way from B ral to the south, and crossed the bridge. these eighteen months of prosperity the acc has come as a sad blow.

NOT MORE THAN EIGHTY PEOPLE PERIS

Contradictory estimates were afloat for t three days after the catastrophe, and the ber of lives lost was variously estimated. some relief to know that the earlier and estimates have proved incorrect, and tha actual number of the victims has not exc seventy-five or eighty persons, includin railway servants in charge of the train; b accident even now must be regarded as the most appalling of which there is any r

THE TRAIN AND ITS JOURNEY.

It appears that the train, which consis four third-class carriages, one first-clas second-class carriage, guard's break, and e left Edinburgh on Sunday afternoon at stopping, as is usual with many Sunday at nearly all wayside stations. On arrival Fort the train was found to be five minut and here the tickets were collected. The collector says that several passengers in jok him if he thought the bridge would be a on such a night.

The train again moved on its journ those on the banks of the river relate tha saw the train enter on the bridge and sp its way across the river. The lookers-c tinued to watch the progress of the train lights being distinctly visible until the l tive entered between the high girders centre of the bridge.

The train was duly signalled from the the south end of the bridge, and the sig promptly acknowledged from the north e two minutes afterward telegraphic com tion suddenly broke down. The signal-m not at the first alarmed at this; but as t did not appear, he reported the matter station master, and that official, with th dee locomotive superintendent, crawle the iron girders to discover the cause train's non-arrival. Their task was one siderable difficulty, the high wind cor them to proceed with the utmost These officials were, however, able to enough to see that a great portion of th was wrecked. They retired as quickly a ble to Tay Bridge Station, and endeav repeated signalling, to ascertain whe driver of the Edinburgh train had noti the bridge had given way, as they had se light across the broken portion of the st and had fervently hoped that he had no chasm, and had been able to check his t put back to the Fife shore. All their e call attention were, however, unavaili telegraphic signals meeting with no whatever, and they were forced to the co that the train, with all its living frei fallen or been blown into the river.

This discovery was also made at the s by Mr. Smith, the station master, Roberts, the locomotive superintender other side of the bridge, as before mentic

NARRATIVES OF EYE-WITNESSE

At the time of the disaster a fierce was blowing, intensified by squalls of g Rain clouds swept over the sky, while gaps between them the moon shone wi lurid brilliancy. At the moment wher dent took place there were probabl small number of persons who saw any t

At the south end of the Tay Bridge signal cabin, from which the crossi bridge by trains is made known. In th box—glad of the shelter which it affor wild a night—there were two men fo ery is an ugly thing, and when brought to igh leads, I believe, to very awkward results, and specially in a commercial country like Brit n; but then, not a doubt about it, it will nev and can never in my case be discovered. I'll ke precious good care of that, for I'll always arrange, and that without fail, to take up the bill fore it comes due. This I can, of course, easi manage, either by discounting, a kind of renewal, or by a rapid sale of the lands which I y. I shall thus quietly, and no one the wiser, mak a nice little fortune, and that by an act this, though some persons call it felony, will no one in the world sixpenn'orth of harm.

T word felony, which came up in this reverie proved, however, a little startling to the courage of Arthur Lemaire. Interpret it to himself as he might, it had, somehow, an uncommonly unpleasant sound and sinister aspect, and he would not have used the word at all—would, indeed, have recoiled from it—had it not slipped out, as it were, inadvertently. Had he paused in his soliloquy for a more euphonious and satisfactory term, he would, no doubt, have put in its place some such phrase as this: "Making unauthorized use of a friend's name," or "Sparing him the trouble of writing it," or something of that kind; but he had not waited to pick and choose a suitable word, so that "felony," to his mental uneasiness and discomfort, had been inwardly spoken.

(To be continued.)

WATCHFULNESS FOR THE SECOND ADVENT—WHAT IT IMPLIES.

By Rev. Richard Chester, A.B. Rector of Middleton. Ireland.

Watchfulness Enjoined—Illustrations of what it Implies—Incompatibility of Watchfulness for Christ's Return and the Expectation of Intervening Events—Stages in the Second Advent as in the First—Christ's Coming "for" and "with" His Saints—Danger of Deception.

THERE is no position, with regard to His Second Advent, more strongly inculcated by our blessed Lord and His inspired Apostles, than that of watchfulness. Matt. 24 : 42–44; 25 : 13; Mar 13 : 33–37; Luke 12 : 35–40; 21 : 36; Thess. 5 : 6; 1 Peter 4 : 7, etc.

It is, therefore, very needful that we should clearly understand what it is rightly and fully to occupy and to maintain this position of watchfulness, lest we deceive ourselves, or be deceived by others, upon a subject so important. The figures and illustrations chosen and employed by the Lord himself, and the language used by Him, are surely the best guides to us in this matter.

Is our position at all, and, if so, how far is it, analogous to and correspondent with such?

In the Gospel we find that our Lord bids His disciples (Luke 12 : 35–37) to be like men who, with girded loins and burning lights, are spending the night-time of their Master's absence at a wedding, in utter uncertainty as to the hour of His return, and, therefore, in listening expectation at any moment hearing His knock at the door in order that when they do hear it they may open to Him immediately."

He compares His disciples (Matt. 25 : 1–13) —such of them as, when He comes, shall go in with Him to the marriage—or whom, as it is expressed (John 14 : 3), He will "receive unto himself"—to "wise virgins" who with trimmed and burning lamps have gone forth to meet the coming Bridegroom on His way—while those who at His coming He will exclude from His presence, and to whom His words shall be, "I know you not," are compared to "foolish virgins" who—absent at the moment of His arrival from the company of watchers—shall, on their subsequent effort to join it, find the Bridegroom come—the wise virgins already gone in—the door shut—and the effort to get it re-opened for their admission altogether vain.

Now if these illustrations are to be understood eal to mean what beyond question they seem to imply, is it not evident that we are not fully occupying this position of watchfulness in the sense in which our Lord has thus enjoined it, if—aware as so many are at present that the second advent is approaching—that the close of the present dispensation is at hand—we are nevertheless putting, as many of such are doing, either the Restoration of the Jews, or the Revelation of the last Antichrist, or any other event, or series of events, the occurrence of which must necessarily occupy some not very inconsiderable portion of time, between us and this approaching Advent?

In so doing are we not saying to ourselves and to others "It is true, solemnly, blessedly true, that the day is approaching, but there are some dark hours as yet between us and the dawn. If, therefore, any be disposed toward a little more slumber, a little more folding of the hands to sleep, there is still some short time for so doing, only they must be careful not to sleep too long." "It is true that the Master is on His return from the wedding, but He is some way off at present. It is not, therefore, positively needful to gird the loins, and light the lamps, and listen for the knock for a half hour or so longer." "It is true that the cry has gone forth, 'Behold the Bridegroom cometh,' but He cannot be actually here for a little while as yet; there is therefore time for those who have any other pressing matter in hand to be absent for a few minutes more upon their business or their pleasure from among the number of those who are engaged in looking out for Him."

That such is far from being the actual meaning or intention of many of those who are thus regarding events as yet future, as necessarily between us and the Advent, we may rest perfectly assured. But that such is the tendency of their views, and that there is, therefore, in the maintenance of such views a very manifest divergence from and expectation which our Lord enjoins in the passages to which I have referred, seems to me almost, if not altogether, incontrovertible.

THE POSITION OF WATCHFULNESS

The servants were not to watch for the passing footsteps of some other guests who had been at the wedding, and whose going by might prove to them that the entertainment was at an end, and their Master, consequently, near at hand. It was for the Master Himself, His own actual presence, His own knock at the door, that they were to be in momentary expectation. Even so, it seems evident to me that it is not for preceding events, however significant or conclusive as to the actual nearness of the Advent, that we are to watch, but for the LORD HIMSELF.

I am not aware of any passage of Scripture enjoining watchfulness for events; however, as certain predicted events do occur, they, like buds upon the fig-tree, may be, and are to be regarded by those who witness them, as betokening that "He (margin) is nigh, even at the doors." (Matt. 24 : 32, 33.)

But it will of course be asked, Are not the restoration of the Jews, the revelation of the last Antichrist, and several other most important and significant events distinctly foretold as necessarily to occur before the second Advent? I answer, "Yes, assuredly," if by the second Advent we mean the event foretold Zech. 14 : 1–5; 2 Thess. 1, 7, 11, 1–8; Rev. 19 : 11–21, etc., etc. But if we mean the event foretold, Matt. 24 : 36–44; 25 : 1–13; John 14 : 3; 1 Thess. 4 : 15–17, etc., etc., I venture to reply, "Most decidedly, No!"

Then, it will be said, you make out two distinct second Advents, or rather a second and a third Advent, of our blessed Lord. To this I reply again in the negative. No more than I make two distinct Advents out of His first Advent, which nevertheless included in it a coming as an infant to the manger-cradle at Bethlehem, and a coming as a full grown man to Jerusalem, to suffer and to die. There was, be it remembered, an interval, nowhere foretold, of thirty-three years between these two comings.

There seems to me to be no reason whatsoever why the second Advent—foretold in many passages of Scripture as one event—should not, nevertheless, consist of two or more separate, and very distinct and different acts or parts, with an interval or intervals between them, any more than there was why the first Advent—spoken of in Holy Scripture before it took place—and still continually spoken of by us in like manner as one event, should not have consisted, as we know that it did consist, of or parts such as I have mentioned with intervals, unforetold both as to existence and duration, between. The Lord will come for His Saints "to receive them to himself" (John 14 : 3; 1 Thess. 4 : 15–17; 1 Corinth. 15 : 51, 52). He will come subsequently with His Saints (Zech. 14 : 1–5; Jude 14, 15; Rev. 19 : 11–15). Why may there not be an interval between these? The harmony of Holy Scripture, or rather of the mind and purposes of God as revealed in Holy Scripture, required this in the one instance in order to its fulfilment. Does it not seem to do so equally in the other?

DIFFERENT ACTS

Why may not many, we know not how many, events predicted to occur before His descent upon the Mount of Olives with His Saints, occur during an interval between His so doing, and His previous descent for them to the air?

Had views, similar to those at present so generally entertained concerning the second Advent, been held by Simeon, and Anna, and all who, at that time, "were looking for redemption in Jerusalem" (Luke 2 : 25–27), can we not well suppose such to have said, "This cannot be the Messiah whom we look for." He cannot come as yet. It has been foretold by the prophet Isaiah that His coming shall be preceded by "the voice of one crying in the wilderness, prepare ye the way of the Lord;" and also by the prophet Malachi that God will send "His messenger before His face, to prepare His way before Him." "This voice has not as yet been heard; this messenger has not as yet gone forth; therefore the Messiah cannot as yet have come." Had they thought or spoken thus we now know how wrong it would have been. May we not be equally wrong if we suppose that the Lord cannot come again until the Jews shall have been restored, and the "Man of Sin" revealed? May God, the Holy Spirit, guide us into all truth.

A FEARFUL JOURNEY.

JUST as an express train was about to start for Scotland, there was seen on the platform a gentleman whose cheek had the consumptive mark upon it. The porters asked him several questions about his luggage, of which there was a good deal, and when he had been asked several times by different persons, another came up, and said, "Where are you going, sir?" Being of short temper, and in great haste, he said, "To hell!" A servant of Christ passed by at that moment, and heard the answer. He sought to get in the same carriage, and did so, but at the other end of it; and this gentleman was talking very freely to different persons upon common topics, and the man thought, "I will get a word in if I can." So he joined in the general tenor of the conversation till they alighted at a refreshment station, when, taking the opportunity, he said to the gentleman, "When do you expect to get to the end of your journey?" "Oh," said he, "I am going to cross to such and such a town by the boat to-night, and hope to get to my journey's end about twelve o'clock to-morrow morning." The man said, "I think you misunderstand my question. You said, when the porter asked you just now where you were going that you were going to a very different place." "Ah! yes; I recollect I did," said the gentleman; "but I am sometimes very hasty." The other said to him, "Was it true? Are you going to hell? If so, when do you expect to there?" And he began to talk to him about that sickness which he could see so plainly in his cheek, and warned him that unless he sought another road, and fled to Christ, the only refuge, he would certainly reach that dreadful road. There are some who, if they were labelled as to where they are going would have to be directed "to hell."

CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, January 21st, at 4.35 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Financial Questions remain the Topic of the hour in Congress. On January 20th an energetic speech was delivered by Senator Beck, of Kentucky, in opposition to the withdrawal of the legal-tender quality of the greenback. But the general feeling of Congress appears to be that a return to hard money is the only sound and safe course in the interests of the nation. It is also urged that the present prosperous epoch in which an unprecedented influx of precious metals into the country has taken place, is an opportunity to inaugurate the change which should not be neglected. It is therefore considered probable by persons moving in influential circles that some steps of a tentative character in this direction, will be taken by Congress during the session, but that Senator Bayard's resolutions will not pass in their present shape.

Rumors of a Fusionist Plot in Maine to seize the State House have moved the Republican governor to call out the military for its protection. The unusual step has occasioned considerable excitement, and an unprecedented demand for guns and revolvers is reported by commercial men in the State. The plot of the Fusionists is stated by Governor Davis to have included the burning of the houses of prominent Republicans, the doomed houses being indicated by triangular pieces of paper which had been affixed to the doors on Thursday night. All the State troops are now on duty, and a Gatling gun commands the entrance and terrace of the State House, while a company of soldiers patrols the streets. The state of confusion produced by the so-called Fusion party it is fervently hoped may end without bloodshed; but there is no doubt hat with two rival executive governments in existence in the State, affairs in Maine are in a highly dangerous and critical condition.

The Ute Indians at Washington complain itterly of the treatment they are receiving. ey aver that they are not allowed to present eir version of the difficulty openly to the pub- , but are restricted in their communications to ecretary Schurz and the officials of the Inte- or Department. Chief Ouray in particular els the injustice with which he is being treat- , and complains that he has not been allowed talk with a single person whom he could look on as a friend. It is also reported that Ouray a his people, the Uncompahgre Utes, are determined not to be banished from Colorado. It is said that Ouray himself declares that if this great government is not able or willing to protec him and his people in their rights, they will try o protect themselves. This of course does not apply to the White River Utes, who, Ouray admits, have forfeited their rights under the eaty.

General Fisk, who is the uncompromising assailant of the Indián policy of the government, stigmatizes the non-payment of the money due the Utes under the Brunot compact as another cause of the trouble. He considers the failure to send supplies to the Utes aggravated their discontent. Referring in his recent speech to the reported impracticability of hauling supplies to the White River Agency in the month of September, General Fisk points out that Major Thornburgh found it possible to take his supply train within a few miles of the agency as late as last October.

General Fisk says that in his opinion another cause of discontent was the mistake made in taking the nomination of Agent Danforth's successor out of the hands of the missionary society which had sent him into the field. Mr. Danforth, he understood, felt compelled to retire from the agency at the end of four years' faithful service because of the difficulties of his position, caused by the neglect of the Indian Office to furnish supplies, or even to answer his most important and urgent appeals for help.

The Disclosure of the Horrors of the Shepherd's Fold, to which allusion was made last week, reveals more shocking details as the investigation proceeds. In addition to deficiency of food, neglect of the sick, insufficient clothing, and lack of educational training, there are now revelations of gross immoralities, which, though reported to the principal, were suffered to go on unchecked.

A Letter from Rev. C. H. Spurgeon to the American Baptist ministers in reply to their cablegram of sympathy for him in his painful illness, was read at the conference in Brooklyn last week. Mr. Spurgeon wrote:

"I thank the Conference very heartily and humbly. I am honored by such a kind deed, and I am not the less comforted. What greater joy can I have from my fellow-men than to be remembered by them in the hour of affliction with prayers and sympathies? God bless you, my brethren, and reward you a thousand-fold for this loving remembrance of one who has no other right to it but that which arises out of oneness of heart in our one Lord, one faith, and one baptism. By such brotherly kindness may the American and English baptized churches be welded into a more complete unity, so that fraternal love may abound! May the Lord bless and prosper you among the nation to which you belong, and may the truth more and more abundantly prevail upon your continent and with us! I am recovering slowly from a very severe illness, and your telegram has acted both as a tonic and as a cordial to me. Again I thank you from the bottom of my heart.

"Fraternally yours, C. H. SPURGEON."

The Tract Society's Work in Texas has been abundantly blessed by God. The State is one third larger than France, and schools are few and churches small and feeble. The herdsmen live from five to twenty miles apart, on ranches occupied on an average by fifteen persons. Into these homes the Tract Society has sent its valuable evangelical publications, and many cases of saving conversion through their agency have been reported. The society expended last year nearly thirty-seven thousand dollars in colportage alone. It has made an earnest appeal for funds to aid in carrying on this good work. The CHRISTIAN HERALD has a large circulation in Texas, and is warmly welcomed from week to week in many families there.

Another Accident on the Metropolitan Elevated Railroad in New York occurred January 24th. The train to which the accident happened is called the "emigrant train," and was used for conveying the employès of the company to their homes after the day's work was concluded. After the last up train from Rector Street had arrived at the northern terminus, about twenty men entered the "emigrant train," which started down the up track, owing to the proper track being occupied with the trains ready for use the following morning. The conductor foolishly ordered the engineer to put on good speed, saying, "We have no stops; go ahead; put on the steam you can;" and also to cross to down track at 135th Street. The arrangen had been to cross at 145th Street, and switches for the purpose were left open.

Arriving at 145th Street, it was the duty of engineer, if he intended crossing, to mode his speed to about six miles an hour; but as intention was to cross ten blocks lower, the t came to the switches at the rate of thirty miles an hour. The switchman signalled open switch, but it was too late, and the en entered the sharp curve. It ran some feet, l ing over on its side wheels, and finally fell the street; the coupling-iron broke, which vented the car following in the descent; car struck some empty cars standing on middle track and fell over on its side. The on board the train were all more or less inju and the conductor who was in the engine ca the time lies at the hospital in a critical co tion.

Dr. Harman Loomis, of Brooklyn, the known worker in the cause of Gospel Tem ance, and who was for twenty-five years Secre of the American Seaman's Friend Society, January 19th. His rearrangement of the b of the Bible in chronological order occu much of his time of late years. The work, w is said to be of a very valuable character, just been issued to the public.

A Man's Hand was Caught in the Cogs mill-wheel and held there for six hours at V ville, on January 12th. The engineer of per's paper-mill was engaged soon after mid of Sunday in cleaning the cogs of the wheel turned on sufficient water to move it slo while he proceeded with his work. In some one of his hands became fixed in one of the and the wheel stopped, holding his hand fi The men did not come to work until seve the morning, and the engineer remained for six hours a prisoner with his hand al crushed. There have been cases in which have been thus held by one member of the when the prospects of relief were hopeless, they have amputated the member to save t selves from dying of starvation; thus illus ing our Saviour's command in spiritual ma to sacrifice the right hand or the right eye the soul's salvation is imperilled by eith them.

The Lessons of the Great Pyramid fo the subject of an essay read by Dr. Hoyt a Baptist ministers' conference. To make h marks more clear to the brethren, Dr. hung a chart of the pyramid on the wall, a it explained the different measurements c architectural wonder, whose base covers teen acres of ground, or about four of ou blocks. "It has thirty feet of apex, and is h than the highest known tower in the w As originally finished, it was perfectly sn from the top to the bottom. The grand g is twenty-eight feet high and 1882 inches from which the premillenarians argue th world's great cataclysm will occur in 1882. king's chamber is thirty-three feet long, eminent theologians consider symbolize thirty-three years of the Saviour's li earth."

The great pyramid is the most scienti accurate building in the world; and a few ago an eminent scientist in Brooklyn, who a believer in premillenarian or pyramidal ogy, remarked to Dr. Hoyt that it was the swerable argument of the ages and of the against materialistic philosophy, because it s the perfection of man in his infancy—a tion which he has not attained to in this progress.

Mr. Moody has applied to Gov. Phel , o souri, to obtain the pardon of Joseph Kee once postmaster of Glasgow, Mo., who is sentence of seventeen years' imprisonme forgery. He heard Mr. Moody preach af committed his forgery, and was converte Mr. Moody's advice he gave himself up authorities and confessed his crime.

Roman Catholic Fair for the Benefit of SS. Peter and Paul's Church, says a recent number of the Springfield Journal, Ill., opened last evening at G. A. R. Hall. "The ladies had a number of tables with a variety of articles for sale and raffle. A supper table was arranged with substantial viands. The polls were opened, and voting commenced for a handsome arm-chair, a number of measures, and a silver pitcher.

The voting for the different prizes offered resulted as follows, when the polls closed last night, and will be continued to-night :

For the most popular saloon keeper, a silver pitcher—Michael O'Conner, 5 ; Henry Eifert, 3 ; F. Loeder, 7 ; Henry Muttera, 1 ; John S oneman, 1 ; George White, 1 ; Gregor Thom 3.

Most popular liquor dealer, set of polished copper measures—L. S. Ensel, 1 ; C. A. Helmle, 1 oe Eck, 20 ; C. A. Mauer, 4 ; J. P. Fixmer, 5.

Most popular brewing company — Frank R sch, 14 ; Schiltz & Co., 16."

the Church of Rome were founded upon the fe of God and the love of Christ, it would not thus encourage the great curse of America and England.

Sinner Converted through Reading the CHRISTIAN HERALD. One of our subscribers in Pennsylvania writes that he gave a copy of the paper to an intelligent young man, who was brought to repentance by the reading of Mr. Spurgeon's sermon. "He called aloud, 'Oh, Jesus, have mercy on me!' and in a few weeks I saw him at prayer-meeting, and he stood up and said that that sermon was the cause of enlightening and converting him." Results of this kind are encouraging to the conductors of the CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Joke that Cost a Life.—Mr. William Bailey aged about thirty years, died recently, in B ah, about eight miles from Norwich, Connecticut. He was of strong, hearty physique, and his talents and character gave promise of a fine future. His illness was brief, and of a singular nature. The young man's death was the result of a joke by one of his companions. One day a short time before he was taken ill, William crossed his father's kitchen to sit down in a chair near which a friend was standing. As he stooped down, without looking behind him, his friend jokingly pulled the chair from behind him and he fell to the floor heavily. The jarring blow affected the spinal column fatally. Thoughtless persons by silly acts of this kind often do injuries that they regret all the rest of their lives.

Frivolous Pretexts for Obtaining Divorce are becoming alarmingly successful in the courts. A lady recently gained a judgment in the Virginia Court of Appeals granting her divorce on the ground that her husband, who had been a Democrat, had joined the Republican party. The shock, she said, was too great for her domestic happiness. And the judge accepted the plea. "The husband," he said, "had deserted his friends and gone over to the enemy. It was perfidy, the moral taint of which the wife felt attached to him, and would probably exclude him from the best society in the State." Christ's injunction on this subject appears in these days to have been forgotten or ignored (Luke 16 : 18).

A Convict's Mission has been in Operation for two years in Water Street, New York, and has done much good. A convict named Mike Du n was liberated from prison in the latter part of 1877, and being out of funds went to Jerry McAuley to try to victimize him by extorting money on a false plea. But through Jerry's exhortations and prayers he was brought to God and has established the Convict's Mission through which he has rescued from a life of many of his old prison acquaintances.

A Wife's Loss by her Husband's Slavery to drink has come before the Iowa courts for compensation. The New York Daily Witness reports that a business man in Jones County, possessed of considerable property and engaged in a business producing $1500 per year, fell under the power of intoxicating liquor and became a confirmed drunkard. He lost his property and his business was ruined. His wife thereupon commenced a suit under the civil damage act against every liquor-seller in the city. There were eight of them, and seven paid her a sum of money as a compromise. The eighth dealer was condemned by the jury to pay ten thousand dollars, to reimburse the money the husband had squandered, and two thousand more by way of punishment. The dealer appealed, but the judges confirmed the decision.

The Largest Penalty Inflicted for many Years for injury by accident has been exacted in the case of the Third Avenue Railroad, New York, for injuring a boy. The boy, who was fourteen years old, had, by the accident, two ribs, both arms, a leg, and a collar-bone broken, and will always be incapable of physical and mental labor. The verdict was for fifteen thousand dollars, and considering the quantity of fracturing done by the servants of the company, the damages do not seem excessive.

A Lady's Ribs Broken by her Dressmaker.—The New York Tribune relates an incident which shows what risks some ladies are willing to run that they may present a fashionable appearance. The Tribune says : A lady's ribs were broken by her dressmaker in Lyons, N. Y., a few days ago. That friend of the household had attempted to fit a dress to her, and had caused so much pain in her right side that the work had to be abandoned. The lady was in a state bordering on hysterics when medical aid was summoned, and an examination revealed the fact that one of her ribs was broken.

One Thousand and Eighty Feet Below the surface of the earth is one of the many out-of-the-way places where the CHRISTIAN HERALD finds its way. At the bottom of one of the pits at Hebburn Colliery, Great Britain, one hundred and eighty fathoms deep, a boy employed to shut the doors for the purpose of directing the current of air, was seen reading a paper to others. On being asked what it was, he said the "CHRISTIAN HERALD," and not only recommended it in the most glowing terms, but was highly delighted because his father, who had been a drunkard, had become much impressed through reading it. This was the first religious paper the boy had known his father to buy. The boy is a converted lad, and is not ashamed to let his light shine in a dark place like a coal-mine.

A Ghastly Warning is Furnished to Evildoers by the criminal record of the past week. The brutal murder of two women, one in Chicago, the other in New York, occurred on Saturday, January 17th. In each case the woman was leading an immoral life, and death by violence resulted from association with vicious men. The Chicago victim was shot, and the one in New York was beaten over the head with some heavy weapon until she died. The account in its simplicity carries its own lesson, and ought not to be concealed from young people who may be tempted to forsake the paths of virtue. The beginnings of evil are so insidious, and the first steps aside from the right course seem so innocent and so easy to retrace, that the solemn warnings of life, such as these two horrible crimes, are placed by God like grim finger-posts, in the path of those liable to stray, telling them plainly that the end of these things is physical and spiritual death (James 1 : 15).

A Deaf and Dumb preacher.—Mr. Job Turner, a deaf-mute, who has for some time been acting as a lay reader in connection with a church mission to deaf-mutes, was ordained a deacon by the Rev. Bishop Whittle in St. Paul's Church, Richmond, Va., last Sunday. A number of deaf-mutes were present. The Rev. Dr. Gallaudet interpreted the service and preached the sermon. The address to the candidate, having been written, was read for the benefit of the congregation, as it was delivered in the sign language.

not intend you to take part in the harve not cause you are such a good hand at sowing ; hat as He has crops that need sowing all the y

CHEER UP, MY COMRADES!

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"And Josiah set the priests in their charges, and encouraged them to the service of the house of the Lord."—2 CHRON. 35 : 2.

Different Persons who are Discouraged in the Work of the Lord—I. Those who Think they can do Nothing—Want of Power often Means Want of Will—Incapacity through Sickness—The Law of David—Silent Service of the Sick—Refreshing of Saints, Angels' Work—II. Workers who Think they are Laid Aside—The Uses of Inactivity—Prayer for Those at Work—The Master Gunner—III. Those who Have Small Talent—The Temptation to Idleness Comes most to One Talent People—A Perfect Nuisance to the Devil—IV. Those who are Under Difficulties—A King and his Officer—V. Those who are not Appreciated—VI. Those who have had Little Success—Sir Christopher Wren—A Brave Old Man—The Church that Went to See its Pastor Burned.

JOSIAH, as you remember, in the early part of his reign set his face against the idolatries that prevailed, to root them out of the land. He then bent his thoughts upon repairing and beautifying the temple. After that it was his heart's aim to restore the sacred services. to observe the solemn feasts, and to revive the worship of God after the due order, according to the words of the book of the covenant that was found in the house of the Lord. Our text tells us something of the method with which he went to work ; and it may well serve us as a model.

The first thing is to get every man into his proper place ; the next thing is for every man to have a good spirit in his present place, so as to occupy it worthily. I will suppose, dear friends, that in the providence of God you are in your place, and that by the direction of God's Spirit you have also sought and found the precise form of usefulness in which you ought to exercise yourself. To-night it shall not be my business to arrange you ; but assuming that it is well for you to keep where you are, my object shall be to encourage you to do your work for your Lord without being cast down. I am hardly going to preach so much as to talk to different in the work of the Lord, that we may rouse them up, rally them round us, and encourage them to keep rank.

PERSONS WHO ARE DISCOURAGED

I. And, first, I would speak a little to those who think that they can do nothing. They will tell me that in such a sermon not a sentence can concern them : if I am to encourage men to the service of the house of the Lord, it will be in vain for them, as they can do nothing at all. Well, dear friends, you must not take that for granted ; you must make quite sure that you cannot do any thing before I may venture to speak to you as if it were a matter of fact ; for sometimes there is a want of way because there is a want of will. Though I do not go so far as to allege that this is your case, we know too well that "cannot" often does mean "will not," and not to have triumphed may mean that you have not tried. You have been so discouraged that you have excused yourself for inaction, and your inaction has grown into indolence.

Aptitude, I have often noticed, comes with employment, and through negligence and sloth people become enervated and helpless. You say that you cannot move your arm, and so you do not move it ; take heed, for by and by your pretence will become the parent of real powerlessness.

But I will take what you have said as being true.

YOU ARE ILL ;

the vigor you felt in the bright days of health fails you now ; you have to suffer pain, weariness, and exhaustion ; you are often detained at home ; and home seems now to you a gloomy hospital all the day long, rather than a genial hostelry when evening shadows fall. Little indeed, therefore, can you do ; so little, that you are apt to reckon it as nothing at all.

Now, I want to encourage you first by reminding you that the law of the Son of David is the same as the law of David himself; and you know the law of David about those that went to the battle. There were some that were lame, and some that were otherwise incapable of action, and he left them with the baggage. "There," he said, "you are very weary and ill: stop in the camp: take care of the tents, and the ammunition, while we go and fight."

Now, it happened once on a time that the men that went to fight claimed all the spoil. They said, "These people have done nothing: they have been lying in the trenches: they shall not carry off a share of the booty." But King David there and then made a law that they should share and share equally—those that were in the trenches and those that engaged in the fray. "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff: they shall part alike. And it was so from that day forward, that he made it a statute and an ordinance for Israel."

Nor is the law of the Son of David less gracious. If by sickness you are detained at home, —if for any other reason, such as age or infirmity, you are not able to enter into actual service, yet if you are a true soldier and would fight if you could, and your heart is in it, you shall share even with the best and bravest of those who, clad in the panoply of God, encounter and grapple with the adversary.

Because you cannot do much you must not infer that therefore you are not saved; for if you were to be among the chief of Christian workers it would not prove that you were certainly a child of God. Do not fret, then, because you are shut out from the cheerful activities in which others share; for, as long as your name is written in heaven, and your heart truly follows after the Lord, you shall have an abundant recompense at the last great day, even though here you are doomed to be a sufferer rather than a worker.

But to me it seems more than possible that some of you, dear friends, whose minds are tinged with melancholy, have painted your own lot in deeper shades than the justice of the case deserves. Is your life indeed a dull routine, which, for lack of busy change and lively enterprise, leaves no record behind? Not so, methinks. "The rich relics of a well-spent hour" do sometimes pour around your path a stream of light that cheers our eyes, though it may escape your notice.

I have sometimes been called to visit bedridden persons who have been unable to rise for many, many years, and it has been within my knowledge that their influence has extended over whole parishes. They have been known as poor pious women or as experienced Christian men, and many have gone to visit them. Christian ministers have said that they derived more benefit from sitting half an hour talking to poor old Betsy than they did from all the books in their library, and yet Betsy said that she was doing nothing. Look at your case in that light, and you will see that you can praise God upon your bed, and make your chamber to be as vocal for God as this pulpit ever can be.

Besides, dear friends, do you not think we frequently limit our estimate of serving God to the public exercises of the sanctuary, and forget the strong claims that our Lord has upon our private fidelity and obedience? You say, "I cannot serve God," when you cannot teach in the school or preach in the pulpit, when you are unable to sit on a committee or speak on a platform: as if these were the only forms of service to be taken into account.

Do you not think that a mother nursing her baby is serving God? Do you not think that men and women going about their daily toil with patient industry discharging the duties of domestic life are serving God? If you think rightly you will understand that they are. The servant sweeping the room, the mistress preparing the meal, the workman driving a nail, the merchant casting up his ledger, ought to do all in the service of God.

Though, of course, it is very desirable that we should each and all have some definitely religious work before us, yet it is much better that we should hallow our common handicraft, and make our ordinary work chime with the melodies of a soul attuned for heaven. Let true religion be our life, and then our life will be true religion. That is how it ought to be. "Whether ye eat or drink, or whatsoever ye do, do all in the name of the Lord Jesus, giving thanks unto God and the Father by Him."

So, then, let the stream of your common life as it flows on, obscure, unobserved, be holy and courageous; you will find that while "they also serve who only stand and wait," you shall not be neglected or overlooked who simply sit at Jesus' feet and listen to His words when you can do no more. This is service done for Him which He can appreciate; complain who may.

Know, too, my dear sister, that by thy sorrows the Lord has drawn out thy sympathies. Thou, my dear brother, know that by the discipline which has chastened thee, thou hast learned to be a comforter. Say you, then, that you cannot do any thing? I know a few secrets about you that you forget. You do not reckon yourself up as we reckon you Did you not try to cheer a poor neighbor the other day by telling of the Lord's goodness to you when you were very sick yourself? How started from your eye that tear most sacred shed for a fellow-creature's pain? Is it not your habit, poor sufferer as you are, to let drop just a few words for your Master to others in a like condition whenever you can?

You tell me that you cannot do any thing. Why, dear hearts, the refreshing of God's saints is one of the highest works in which any one can be occupied. God will send prophets to His servants at times when they need to be rebuked; if He wants to comfort them He generally sends an angel to them, for that is angels' work. Jesus Christ Himself, we read, had angels sent to minister to Him. When? Was it not in the garden of Gethsemane, when He was bowed down with sorrow? Comforting is not ordinary work: it is a kind of angelic work. "There appeared unto Him an angel strengthening Him." A prophet was sent to warn the Israelites of their sin; but when a Gideon was to be encouraged to go and fight for his country it was the angel of the Lord that came to him.

I have known some who have never known suffering or ill-health, and when they try to comfort God's weary people they are dreadfully awkward over it. They are like elephants picking up pins: they can do it, but it is with a wonderful effort. God's tried people comfort each other con amore; they take to the work as a fish to water. They understand the art of speaking a word in season to him that is weary, and when this is the case they may not complain that they are doing nothing.

II. Now let me address a few words to another class of WORKERS WHO THINK THAT THEY ARE LAID ASIDE.

"Dear sir," says one, "I wish you would encourage me. I used to be useful once; at least, I was recognized as one of a band of men who worked together right heartily, but since I have changed my residence I am unknown in the neighborhood where I am living, and I seem to have dropped out of the ranks. I have done little or nothing lately, and I feel uneasy about it. I wish that I could get to work." My dear brother, I hope you will; but do not waste five minutes in thinking it over.

These times need so much Christian effort that when a man asks me, "How shall I do work for Christ?" I am accustomed to say, "Go and do it." "But what is the way to do it?" Start at once. Get at it, my brother. Do not be out of harness a minute. But suppose that you are obliged to desist awhile, do not let your interest in the cause of our Lord and Master decline.

than he, our blessed Saviour Himself, was thirt years—I will not say doing nothing, but certain ly doing no public work. When you are in a re tired and inactive position, be preparing for th time when God brings you out again. If yo are put away on the shelf, do not rust there, bu pray the Master to brighten you up so that whe
He comes to use you again you may be fully fi ted for the work which He has in hand for yo

Spend your time in prayer that you may be for the Master's use, and, meanwhile, be prom in helping others. You remember that, at t siege of Gibraltar, when the fleet surrounded and determined to storm the old rock, the go ernor fired red-hot shot down upon the men-war. The enemy did not at all admire the go ernor's warm reception. Think how it w done. Here were gunners on the ramparts f ing away, and every man in the garrison wou have liked to do the same. What did those who could not serve a gun? Why, they hea the shot; and that is what you must do.

I am master gunner here generally: heat shot for me, if you will. Keep the furnace ing, so that when we do fire off a sermon it m be red-hot, through your earnest praye
When you see your friends sitting in the Su day-school, or standing out in the street wo ing for God, if you cannot join them yet s
"Never mind: I will heat the shot for the My prayers shall not be wanting, if I can c tribute nothing else." That is counsel for who are for awhile laid on the shelf.

THOSE WHO HAVE SMALL TALENT.

III. Others there are who are much disco aged because they have but small ta
"Oh," they say, "I wish I could serve Je Christ like Paul, or like Whitefield—that I co range the country through, proclaiming His name and winning thousands of converts.
I am slow of speech and dull of thought,
what I attempt produces little or no effect."

Well, brother, mind that you do what can. Do you not recollect the parable of men who had talents intrusted to them?
not want to lay undue stress upon the fact it was the man who had one talent who bu
it. Yet why is he represented as doing so think it was not because the men of two and talents do not sometimes bury theirs, but cause the temptation lies most with the one t people. They say, "What can I do? Wh the use of me? I may be excused." Th the temptation.

Brother, do not be entangled in that s
If your Lord has only given you one talent.
does not expect you to make the same int upon it as the man does with five; but stil does expect His interest, and therefore d wrap your talent in a napkin. It is but strength imparted that any of us can serve
We have nothing to consecrate to Him b gift we have first received from Him.

You have no self-reliance, you tell me.
take refuge in God, I entreat you, for yo dently want more of the divine succor. G get it; it is to be had. He girds the weak strength. "The young men shall faint a weary, but they that wait upon the Lord renew their strength." Why, I think yo more likely to do good than if you had fiv ents, for now you will pray more and yo depend more upon God than you would done if you had possessed strength of own.

One other word. As you are not en with many talents, mind you economize you have. Do you know how merchant tradesmen who have only a small capital i ness manage to compete with those wh larger means? They try to turn their over every day. The costermonger afford to deal out his goods to gentleme will pay him in three months. Not h must get his ready money at the door, an go and buy another stock to-morrow m and turn it over, or else he could not pick living with so small a capital. If you ha ninepence, make it "nimble," and you v as much profit out of a nimble ninepence as another out of a lazy crown.

Activity often makes up for lack of ability. If you cannot get force by the weight of the ball, get it by the velocity with which it travels. A little man with one talent all ablaze may become A PERFECT NUISANCE TO THE DEVIL, and a champion for Christ. As for that great divine with his five talents, who marches on so sleepily, Satan can always overmarch him. If you can but turn over your one talent again and again, in the name of God, you may achieve great wonders. So I would encourage you in the work of the Lord.

IV. With workers who are under great difficulties I would now have a word. I have known the day when perplexities pleased me, dilemmas fforded me delight, and instead of declining a lifficult task I rather liked it. Even now I enjoy uzzling over a problem, and attempting what thers decline. Nothing good in this world can e effected without difficulty. The biggest iamonds lie under heavy stones which sluggards annot turn over. That which is easy to do is ardly worth doing. In the face of difficulty the man of ardent, persevering spirit braces up his erves, sharpens his wits, and brings all his owers into play to achieve an object that will eward his efforts.

Have you great difficulties, dear friend? You re not the first worker for God who has had ifficulties to encounter. Let us go back to loses again. He was to bring Israel out of gypt; but his path did not appear very plain. le must go before Pharaoh and issue God's ommand. Pharaoh looked him through when e said, "Let my people go." The haughty onarch was greatly surprised to hear anybody, specially a Hebrew, talk like that; and so he ade him begone. But Moses returns with, Thus saith the Lord, Let my people go;" and is courage was not even then crowned with mmediate success. There must be plague upon lague, plague upon plague, till at last proud haraoh's heart was broken, the Israelites were ved from the hand of him that hated them; d Egypt was glad when they departed.

Look at Nehemiah, and Ezra, and Zerubbabel, d those that built Jerusalem the second time. hese good men wrought zealously, but Sanballet d Tobiah were jeering and jesting, and trying throw down the wall. If you build a city ithout difficulty, it is not Jerusalem. Be sure that. As soon as ever you begin working for od you will find a great power working against u. If you encounter opposition, take it as a od sign.

When our young men go to a provincial town preach, and I want to know how they are getng on, after listening to their story, I ask, "Has mebody slandered you yet? Do the newspapers nounce you as a fool?" If they say "No," I nclude that they are not getting on much. If rist's cause is prospering, the world will reoach the soul-winner; if you do damage to the vil's kingdom he will roar at you. Should ur course be smooth, it is because he says, There is nothing to disturb me in that man's onotonous talk. I need not let fly the fiery rt of calumny at him: he is a chip in the rridge, I will let him alone."

Such a man generally goes through life very mfortably. People say, "He is a quiet, ffensive sort of man." We do not want such diers in the service of Christ. "What a disreeable person!" said a king once of an officer ose sword rattled on the floor. "That sword his is most offensive." "Sire," said the officer, hat is exactly what your majesty's enemies nk." When ungodly persons say that we are ublesome, we are not broken-hearted at being t of their good looks. If the king's enemies nk us troublesome, we reckon it to be high ise.

V. Fain would I now speak a passing word of nfort to another class of workers—

THOSE THAT ARE NOT APPRECIATED.

m not going to say much, because I have not ch sympathy with them. Yet I know that the smallest slight chafes those who are over sensitive. They murmur, "I do my best, and nobody thanks me." You think yourself a martyr, and complain that you are misrepresented. Be it so, dear friend; that was your Master's lot, and it is the lot of all His servants. This is a cross we must all carry, or we shall never wear the crown.

Do you fancy that this is a new experience? Look at Joseph. His brethren could not bear him, and yet it was he that saved the family and fed them in time of famine. Look at David. His brothers asked why he had left the charge of the sheep to come down to the battle, suspecting that the pride of his heart had brought him among the soldiers and the standards. Yet nobody could bring back Goliath's head but that young David. Take a lesson from the ruddy hero: take no notice of what your brethren say about you. Go and bring back the giant's head.

Be certain of this, that to be kept in the rear rank is often necessary to future eminence. If you take a man and put him in front, and pat him on the back and say, "What a great man he is!" he will make a false step before long, and there will be an end of your hero; but when a man is brought forward by God, he is often one whom everybody criticises, finds fault with, and declaims as an impostor, but the banter he is exposed to serves as ballast for his mind. When he comes off with success he will not be spoiled with conceit, for the grace of God will make him bow with gratitude. Do not ask to be appreciated. Never be so mean as that. Appreciate yourself in the serenity of conscience, and leave your honor with your God.

THOSE WHO HAVE HAD LITTLE SUCCESS.

VI. I must speak now, in the last place, a little more at length to those who are discouraged because they have had so little success.

It was my great delight a few evenings ago to meet a splendid band of men and women who are the Sunday-school teachers of this church. You will think it strange that I did not till then thoroughly estimate the extent of their work, as I had never added up the total of the various schools; but when I did so, and found that they mounted up to six thousand children, I felt full of joy. I shall run over with delight if they increase to twelve thousand in another twelve months. For so large a district this would not be too many, but still our present number is most encouraging.

Now, I know that some of our teachers are working away in back streets, in rooms not connected with any place but this, and we hardly knew of them, because they were pursuing their simple, unobtrusive labors so quietly. Are there any of you who fear that you have toiled in vain and spent your strength for nought? I would entreat you, dear friends, not to be satisfied with casting in the seed unless you reap some good results; yet do not be so faint-hearted as to give up because of a little disappointment. Though you cannot be satisfied without fruit, yet do not cease to sow because one season proves a failure.

I do not know what was the result of Noah's ministry, but I do know that he was a preacher of righteousness for a hundred and twenty years, and yet he never brought a soul into the ark except his own family. Poor preaching we may count it, judging by the influence it exerted: and yet we know that it was grand preaching, such as God commended. Do not, then, grudge the time, or the strength, you lay out in the service of our great Lord because you do not see your efforts thrive, for better men than you have wept over failure.

Did it never strike you that you may be now employed in breaking up ground and repairing the soil from which other laborers who come after you will reap very plentifully. Perhaps your Master knows what a capital ploughman you are. He has a large farm, and He never means to let you become a reaper because you do the ploughing so well. Your Master does not intend you to take part in the harvest because you are such a good hand at sowing; and as He has crops that need sowing all the year round He keeps you at that work. He knows you better than you know yourself. Perchance if He were once to let you get on the top of a loaded wagon of your own sheaves, you would turn dizzy and make a fall of it; so He says, "You keep to your ploughing and your sowing, and somebody else shall do the reaping."

Peradventure when your course is run you will see from heaven, where it will be safe for you to see it, that you did not labor in vain nor spend your strength for nought. "One soweth and another reapeth." This is the divine economy. I think that every man that loves his Master will say, "So long as there does but come a harvest, I will not stipulate about who reaps it. Give me faith enough to be assured that the reaping will come, and I will be content."

When old St. Paul's Cathedral had to be taken down in order to make room for the present noble edifice, some of the walls were immensely strong, and stood like rocks. Sir Christopher Wren determined to throw them down by the old Roman battering-ram. The battering-ram began to work, and the men worked at it for hours and hours, day after day, without apparent effect. Blow after blow came on the wall; tremendous thuds that made the bystanders tremble. The wall continued to stand till they thought it was a useless operation. But the architect knew. He continued working his battering-ram till every particle of the wall felt the motion, and at last over it went in one tremendous ruin.

Did anybody commend those workmen who caused the final crash, or ascribe all the success to them? Not a bit of it. It was the whole of them together. Those who had gone away to their meals, those who had begun days before, had as much honor in the matter as those who struck the last blow. And it is so in the work of Christ. We must keep on battering, battering, battering, and at last—though it may not be for another thousand years—the Lord will triumph.

I wish we had the spirit of that brave old man who was condemned to the stake. They were going to burn him. He knew that the sentence was to be carried out the next morning, but with a soul full of courage, and with a merry heart, he sat the last thing at night talking with his friends—fagots and fire to face in the morning, recollect—and he said to one of them, "I am an old tree in my Master's orchard. When I was young I bore a little fruit by His grace. It was unripe and sour, but He bore with it: and I have grown mellow in my older days, and brought forth some fruit for Him by His grace. Now the tree has grown so old that my Master is going to cut it down and burn the old log. Well, it will warm the hearts of some of His family while I am burning;" and he even smiled for joy to think that he might be put to so good a purpose.

I want you to have that spirit, and to say, "I will live for Christ while I am young: I will live for Him till I die, and if I die a painful death, I will pray to die for Him, and warm the hearts of my brethren. You know that the persecutions of those martyr days begat such heroism and gallantry among disciples as prudent people in peaceful times can scarcely credit.

It is said of the old Baptist church over in the City that the members went to Smithfield early one morning to see their pastor burnt, and when some one asked the young people what they went there for, they said that they went to learn the way. That is splendid! They went to learn the way. Oh, go to the Master's cross to learn the way to live and die! See how He spent Himself for you, and then sally forth and spend yourselves for Him.

O Lord, set us in our charges, and encourage us in the service of Thy house! "Let the beauty of the Lord our God be upon us; establish Thou the work of our hands: yea, the work of our hands establish Thou it." May the blessing of our covenant God rest upon you, my brethren, for Jesus' sake! Amen.

[Portion of Scripture read before sermon—JOHN 21.]

DIVERS' PERILOUS PURSUITS.

The Disagreeables—Temperate Men—Divers' Dresses—Under Water—Can They See?—Accidents—Spiritual Lessons.

THERE are many lives full of hardship and danger, and yet their charm is not confined to those who read or write or dream about them. The recent Tay Bridge disaster has called into requisition the skilled services of experienced divers, and it will interest our readers to learn something of the men themselves, and the dangerous work in which they are engaged. "You may depend upon it," said one of their number recently, "no man continues to be a diver from choice. I am a diver because I have drifted into the business, and I have a wife and family to keep. I should like to get as much money as I can in the shortest possible time, and then get out of it." The diver's own estimate of his calling is an interesting fact to begin with; and there are facts which, however prosaically told, are calculated to feed the interest with which, in spite of himself, a romance-loving public will invest his avocation.

FIRST EXPERIENCES

of diving are by all accounts extremely disagreeable. Headache and unpleasant sensations in the ears are encountered by every diver at first, and these experiences recur to him when he resumes diving after having been long out of practice, or when he goes to an unusual depth. They are due to the pressure of the air in the diving dress—a pressure which increases as the diver descends. Some suffer so much that they never make a second trial. Only temperate, athletic men, who are not supposed to be subject to any disease, specially attributable to the nature of their work, are found to be practising the diver's calling. But should any thing be wrong with the diver—if he but have a simple cold—it tells upon his capacity for diving work. Therefore he may not trifle with his constitution in any way, and many of the men are absolute teetotalers, and think it the height of folly to stimulate themselves with alcohol when at work.

THE DIVER'S DRESS.

The dress and attachments now in use cost no less than five hundred dollars. The man about to descend first clothes himself in guernseys and overalls to keep his diving dress proper from chafing. The dress itself is of waterproofing, lined with a strong solution of india-rubber. The diver's assistants—often three in number—pull on this dress for him, and attach it to hooks on his breastplate. By means of a metal band and screws, the india-rubber collar of the dress is firmly attached to the breastplate, and the penetration of water rendered impossible. A globular helmet of tinned copper, with brass fittings, is placed on the diver's head and screwed tightly down upon the collar fittings. At each side of the helmet are strong plate-glass windows or bull's-eyes, guarded with brass frames. In front is a round hole, through which the diver can still speak to his friends. He gives them directions about the fastening of his weights. His clogs, each of which has about fourteen pounds of lead attached to it to help him to sink, are examined and found in order. He has "leads," weighing thirty pounds each, lashed to his back and breast, and a "life," or signal line, is carefully fastened around him within reach of his hands. He has a strong knife, or a small axe, in a sheath at his side. His hands only are left bare.

READY TO GO UNDER WATER.

At a given signal one assistant takes hold of a tube, and making sure that one end is properly attached to the back of the helmet, connects the other with an air-pump. He proceeds to pump air into the head-dress, and his companion examines the head and breast-valves which are to relieve his master of the surplus and exhausted air. It is now safe to shut up the diver entirely. Accordingly the second assistant screws another window into the hole in the helmet front, hands the life-line to the third assistant, and assists the diver to commence his descent. The diver having gone below, has now left his life in the hands of his assistants. They are, therefore, bound to be the most careful and trustworthy of men. Often they are brothers or other near relatives of the diver. Two of them keep the air-pump going at the rate of speed required by the diver, and the third finds out and interprets to them his wishes by means of the life-line. The diver loses all sense of weight in the water, and suffers only from pressure of air on his head, from coldness of the hands, or general exhaustion. When he has too much air he can relieve himself by opening his breast-valve, or by signalling to his assistants to pump more slowly. The bubbling of the water above the escape-valve on the top of the helmet is always visible in smooth water, and indicates to those above the direction of the diver's movements.

CAN HE SEE?

In the sea, light can reach the operator through many fathoms of water, but in the rivers it is often otherwise. Eternally rushing seaward, and gathering in their course the washings of the hillsides, their own often falling banks, and the refuse of every ungrateful village and town through which they pass, the river water is seldom clear. Indeed, in some cases the darkness is as black as pitch.

When to the silence and loneliness of ocean or river depths are added the blackness of darkness and the dread presence of dead bodies, the diver must have courage who boldly descends. In the operations not yet concluded at the Tay Bridge the less experienced divers were by some suspected of succumbing to the terrors of the situation. The suspicion, after all, had probably but small foundation; at least two of the divers strongly declared that no "eerie feeling" would prevent them doing their duty, and said that if necessary they would be glad to bring up the dead even in their arms. Still, the very way in which these men talk of this subject seems to show that below water they cannot face the dead with the callousness of men who are brought into contact with bodies on shore—that, in fact, they have to reason with themselves against a natural timidity.

ACCIDENTS SOMETIMES HAPPEN.

A diver from one of Her Majesty's ships once found himself in a terrible position. He had gone down to clear the anchor chains of some awkward foul. When he wished to return, he discoverd that, either by the play of the tide, or by his own movements when absorbed in his work, his life-line had got twisted round the anchor cable. He could not give the signal that he wished to rise. His friends above could not haul him to the surface. He cut his rope and climbed hand over hand up fathoms of chain, and reached the top nearly dead with exhaustion. An accident occasionally happens to a diver's dress, as when one day a diver was excavating in an old and flooded pit, and a bucket descending upon a helmet with a window on its top, broke the glass and let the water in. Only the quickness of the life-line holder saved that diver's life.

AN INCIDENT IN THE CRIMEA.

By Major Malan.

THE following incident on my arrival at the seat of war in the Crimea, twenty-five years ago, is one not easily forgotten.

My detachment landed, marched along the wharf of Balaklava, halted, and piled arms. More than an hour was passed waiting for the arrival of a ration of grog, which was issued to the men before commencing their march to the front. I was not at all pleased by the arrival of this refreshment. I had striven to keep the men together, and prevent them from getting drink before starting to join their regiment, and I thought, and still think, that this dram was not only superfluous, but injurious in view of a hot and weary march.

Two old soldiers had joined at Scutari. A greater contrast between any two men it was hardly possible to find. The taller was a very good soldier—quiet, patient, and ready to do anything. The shorter was what is known in the service as "a thorough blackguard." I had discovered this by his defaulter sheets, and had kept my eyes on him on landing, but while I watched the issue of the grog this man slipped away. He returned before the party marched off, and took his place in the ranks.

It is a very heavy pull up the hill which rises above the Balaklava plain, and the detachment halted there for a quarter of an hour. I gave the word "Quick march," and went to the rear-guard to ascertain that all was right. When running after the party I saw that "the old soldier" was standing still, leaning on his rifle, and that he was drunk. I shouted to the sergeant of the rear-guard, which was then moving, to make the man a prisoner. As soon as the drunken man heard my voice it seemed as if he was demonically possessed. He started, grasping his rifle by the barrel, and advanced rapidly toward me. With an oath and several opprobrious adjectives, winding up with "little recruit," he clubbed his rifle, swearing that he would dash out my brains.

He had hardly concluded these words when the gentlest possible tap from the butt-end of Sergeant Fraser's rifle laid him at full length on the ground. He was not in the least hurt, but his rage and indignation at this unexpected stopper to his drunken braggadocio were intense. He had been treated far more gently than he had promised to treat his officer. Sergeant Fraser had perceived what was going to happen, and as the only way of preventing the man from committing an act the consequences of which would have been most serious to him, he gave him a touch on the top of his forage-cap, which, as the doctors would put it, induced a temporary cessation of the cerebral functions, and caused him to measure his length on his mother earth. The rifle dropped from his grasp. Sergeant Fraser picked it up and gave it to one of the rear-guard, which had now reached the spot.

"Get up, and look sharp about it," said an old sergeant of the Rifle Brigade, who was in command of the guard; "we've no nonsense here. You're 'before the enemy' now, and you know the meaning of that!"

The drunken hero did know the meaning o those words, and they had the effect of making him rise quickly from the ground.

Seeing that Sergeant Fraser and the Rifl sergeant were quite equal to the emergency, ran after my men, who had not gone far. I another half hour they were met by the band o the regiment. How my heart beat at this welcome sight! It was a sure sign that the arden desire to join headquarters was near its accomplishment, and the crashing brass and the drum of the band rang out the well-known air,

"'Twas on the plains of Flanders,
Our fathers long ago"

When in another half hour "the draught"—the party of recruits—entered the regimenta camp, they were surrounded by a crowd c tanned, weather-beaten, bearded veterans. A hand was laid upon my shoulder, and a kindl voice said, "The sergeant-major has charge c your men now; come with me to my hut. The senior captain, who had been through th whole campaign, was the brother officer wh gave me this considerate welcome. In a fe moments I had shaken hands with several of m new companions in arms, and after paying m respects to the gallant old colonel of the reg ment, I realized that the ambition of my chil hood had been gratified, and I had a place amor the brave men who fight the battles of the country. I did not sleep much that night, f the booming of the heavy guns was a new ar strange lullaby.

When the orderly-room bugle sounded ne morning, I met Sergeant Fraser just as t prisoners were being marched from the guar tent. "You've not entered that business again him, Sergeant Fraser?" I said, laughing.

"No, sir," said the sergeant; "I knew y would not wish it."

The braggadocio soldier of yesterday was meek as could be when he came before the co manding officer. "Drunk on the line of march." He was "very sorry." He made the usual excuse—it was "the first time he had been brought up since he joined this time." A prisoner could not appear in the orderly-room earlier than the first morning after he had joined his regiment, but officers are glad of any excuse to be lenient, and with a warning that another act of drunkenness would bring him to a court-martial, he was dismissed with a very light punishment for so grave an offence.

A few days afterward, when I paraded with the regiment to go into action, the swaggerer was lying drunk in the guard-tent, as useless as such men generally are when there is any real work to be done!

Again and again, as the scenes of those eventful days rise up unbidden from the past, the calm, quiet, conduct of Sergeant Fraser, the ready zeal with which he engaged in whatever was his present duty, and the pleasure with which he undertook whatever could further the good of his comrades or the interests of the public service, give him the foremost place in his old officer's regard of the many in the ranks of our army with whom I was then so well acquainted.

At Sebastopol there fell on the glacis of that blood-stained earthwork a brother officer who had indeed been as a brother to me. Fellow adets at the Royal Military College, under officers in the same company, we had joined the ame regiment and shared the same tent. Well acquainted with his most private thoughts and acts while living, affection thus records the death of Lieutenant Wright in the service of his country. Hope anticipates meeting him again n that better world where war will be unknown, whose inhabitants shall enjoy glory, peace, and est forever.

"To-day the noise of battle;
The next the victor's song!"

It is a mistake to suppose that soldiers delight n war. There have been, and may be, professional butchers, men of no feeling, whose only dea of glory consists in the slaughter and carnage of their fellow-beings. But such men would be epudiated as soldiers in the armies of any civilized nation.

A well-known occurrence in the Peninsular War will give the best idea of the peaceful inlination of contending armies the moment that he stern work of battle has ceased. During the attle of Talavera a short truce was made. Officers and men from both sides went down to rink at a little stream which ran between the ostile armies, and an interchange of the common courtesies of life in the field took place, ntil the bugles recalled the combatants to their anks, once more to renew the desperate struggle. Wars are made by rulers, not by soldiers.

THE MOMENTOUS DECADE.

The Flight of Time—What Will the Eighties Bring Forth—Murmurings of Approaching Storm—An Eternal Name.

THE velocity with which Father Time flies is most apparent to those who look back; but with all his celerity, he moves but slowly and heavily orward to the man whose whole employment is to watch his flight. Time is often blamed as if e were a great thief; it is people's own fault. Use him well, and you will get from his hand more than ever he will take from yours.

The epoch in which we live is characterized y deep solemnity and attended by serious ircumstances. There is a growing conviction among the people of God that every year, yea, every day and hour, brings us with accelerated speed nearer to the great crisis of the world's istory. These are times to make all men think, Christian men especially so; for there is nothing more manifest than that the King of ings is marshalling His armies, preparing His ay, and maturing all things for His Second Advent in glory.

The decade of the eighteen hundred and seventies is now a thing of the past, and we have entered on the momentous decade of the eighteen hundred and eighties, during which the concluding events of the present Gentile dispensation associated with the Second Advent of Christ are expected by prophetic expositors to be likely to occur. It is, in fact, probable that the decade of ten years from 1880 to 1890 will be signalized by the most unprecedented and momentous occurrences that have ever transpired during the whole 6000 years of the history of mankind.

The year on which we have entered will, we doubt not, be most pregnant with stirring events. The revolutionary spirit of the age has faith in nothing but itself, and is laying violent hands on all existing institutions, while an invisible hand seems writing upon every edifice the sentence that startled the Chaldean monarch in the hour of his godless revelry. There can be little hesitation in saying that we have arrived at an epoch in the history of the world in which one of those mighty revolutions, happily rare in the annals of mankind, is impending. Human society, long troubled with a sense of discomfort, is now, as it were, convulsed with birth-pangs.

There are

MURMURINGS AND FEARS

all around us, and to be heard on every side, indicating that there is now stealing over the minds and hearts of the many who have slept too long in the lap of self-indulgence and carnal security a presentiment of imminent calamity; that before long that sinful sleep will be roughly broken by Him who is about once more not only to shake the earth, but also heaven. But, "to the upright there ariseth light in the darkness," and the believer in the Lord knows that when this earthly house is shaken and the old roof falls away, the house not made with hands will display itself in its spiritual symmetry, its imperial beauty, and its abiding strength, and that it will inclose Him forever within its "everlasting doors."

How cheering the hope, amidst the din of war, the acclamations of false joy, the yell of idolatry, and the groans of creation, that a period is hastening when the fleeting shadows and phantoms of the night shall have vanished, and peace shall stretch her shady wings over the sons of men; when rivers of joy shall water this vale of tears; when Cherubim to Cherubim shall cry, Holy, Holy, Holy is the Lord God of Hosts, the whole earth is full of His glory (Isaiah 6).

Shall, then, the Christian fill his mouth with dust and his heart with rubbish, occupying his time with that which is not bread, while the true manna of the kingdom is his for the taking, and golden joys and pleasures are his forever? Nay, nay! would it not be better that, instead of our Lord sighing over us, we were found sighing and crying for the abominations that exist, having no part or lot in any of them; being like men that wait for their Lord, that whether He come in the first watch or the second watch, we may be found waiting and longing for His appearing? (Ezek. 9).

Till then the Spirit and the Bride, looking heavenward, say "Come;" the individual believer, taking up the cry, says "Come." And whosoever desires Him, and is athirst for Him, let him too join the cry, and say "Come." "He who testifieth these things saith, 'Behold I come suddenly.' Amen; even so come, Lord Jesus."

How important it is to determine whether we are the friends or the enemies of Christ—whether we have a saving interest in Him! Is He "made unto us wisdom, and righteousness, and sanctification, and redemption"? If so, during the year 1880 let our gratitude be testified by a thankful acknowledgment, by a public confession of Christ, by fervent devotion and self-sacrifice, and by an entire acquiescence in the design of His death.

Every thing in this transitory world is constantly shifting and changing. Those things which seem most likely to continue are destined to perish. The earth, however firm and constant in its revolutions, will pause in its course, and be burned up. The ocean, that has borne on its bosom the produce of distant climes, and rolled its waves on the shores of the globe for ages, will disappear. The sun, which has held its position in the solar system with undiminished lustre from the birth of creation, will set to rise no more. The heavens, however magnificent and serene, shall be folded up and pass away with a great noise; the elements, however frigid, shall melt with fervent heat; but the name, friendship, and work of Jesus will evermore endure.

Names, however great in reputation or in history, may be forgotten, but will be immortally remembered. Prophecy said of Him, "He shall be great, and shall be called the Son of the Highest." His name is great in the imperishable fulness of its meaning, in the peerless character it represents, in the unutterable grandeur of its associations, in the perennial efficacy it imparts, in the radiant hope it inspires, in the priceless blessings it reveals, and in the unfailing perpetuity with which it is invested. "His name shall endure forever." Cities may be laid waste, empires may rise and decay, crowns may rust and thrones crumble into dust, but "His name shall endure" (Psalm 72:17).

THE NAME OF JESUS

When the names of philosophers, heroes, statesmen, and kings have perished, "His name shall endure, and men shall be blessed in Him." His name alone is excellent in all the earth, and shall go down the accumulating ages, gathering influence and fragrance with the flight of years, and awaken new songs of joy among the nations of the saved. His dear name is more effulgent than the sun, more replete with blessings than the earth, and shall survive the wreck of the highest mountain or the deepest rock. "It hath pleased the Father that in Him should all fulness dwell." "God hath highly exalted Him, and given Him a name which is above every name; that at the name of Jesus every knee should bow, of things in heaven, and things in earth, and things under the earth; that every tongue should confess that Jesus Christ is Lord, to the glory of God the Father" (Phil. 2:8–11).

If Jesus be your Friend, Saviour, Brother, then, dear reader, whatever may be woven by the Divine Artificer in the hidden loom of the future, the year will be to you a happy and most blessed one, and your destiny the eternal companionship of Him who is the altogether lovely, "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever."

Jews Bidding for Palestine.—An English society journal says: "A negotiation is on foot between members of the house of Rothschild and the venerable Sir Moses Montefiore on the one hand, and the Ottoman Government on the other, for the cession, under certain conditions, of the Holy Land. The Ottoman Empire is almost at its last gasp for want of ready money. The Jewish race wish a habitat of their own. As the Greeks, though a scattered people, living for the most part in Turkey, have a Greek kingdom, so the Jews wish to have a Hebrew kingdom. This, it will be remembered, is the leading idea of George Eliot's 'Daniel Deronda.' Few persons, I fancy, and probably the gifted authoress herself not more than others, imagined that the dream of the Mordecai of those pages was in the least degree likely so soon to be realized. I am not possessed of any information as to the nature of the new Jewish State—whether it is to be Theocratic or Royal—but I am told that the arrangements with reference to it are all but completed. Prophecies have a way of fulfilling themselves, more especially when those who believe in them are possessed of the sinews of Government. The day, 'when the dispersed of Israel shall be gathered into one' is confidently looked forward to, not only by Hebrews, but by multitudes of Christians; and it seems at hand. Lord Beaconsfield, the author of 'Alroy,' would be gathered to his fathers in greater peace were he permitted, under his administration, to see this day and be glad."

A WEIGHT OF WEALTH.

(Continued from page 63.

An Unlovely Character.

Ernest Clifford's question was a searching one. He had asked Ruth how she knew that the will of God was for her to reject his offer of marriage, and remain by the side of her depraved and now afflicted father.

"Well,"she said, with a quiet sigh," at anyrate God chooses our relationships for us. I did not choose my father, and brothers, and sisters. But He has made me one of them, of the same flesh and blood; and it seems to me that it is right to stand here in my place, till He sends some one else to fill it, or removes me from it Himself. I must do all I can for them.

"If they were good, and prosperous, and happy, I might be free to be happy myself; happy in my own way. But would God have me forsake them, and leave them all to sink farther into dark depths of misery and degradation, while I was sitting somewhere in the sunshine? That was not our Saviour's life, Ernest."

"I wish I was wretched and degraded," he said, looking at her with a faint smile on his grave face. She shook her head, with a laugh; but still he could not help noticing, with soreness of heart, how red her eyelids were, and how languid was her whole aspect, as soon as the laugh had died away from her lips. Say what she might, it was a dreary, unwholesome life she was leading, shut out from all society and companionship; all but the distasteful intercourse she was forced into with her father's drunken visitors. Squire Symons had forbidden any other of his children to enter his doors, and he was jealous of Ruth holding any communication with them. Few of the ladies in the neighborhood kept up even a slight acquaintance with Squire Symons's youngest daughter; and Mrs. Clifford, who was her nearest neighbor, was too jealous of her to be cordial with her. Ernest thought of it all, as he gnawed his lips, and stared moodily into the fire.

Ruth's thoughts were busy too. She had been passing through a harder time than Ernest himself suspected. Only the day before, by dint of persistent and passionate entreaties, she had wrung from her father a small sum of money to remit to her needy brothers and sisters. They were away in the world, having shaken off their load; but they were not sparing of their claims, or their reproaches, when she was compelled to send a pitiful denial to their appeals.

They were unjust to her, these elder ones, who had not possessed the patience and fidelity which kept her at home. It was growing more difficult to be patient and faithful. She could not keep herself from dwelling sometimes upon what she was giving up for them, and from being tempted to lay down the cross, which was growing so much heavier as years went by. It tried her almost beyond endurance, for Ernest to question whether it could indeed be the will of God to exact from her such a sacrifice of herself.

But Ernest could not see as she saw. He had never been called to bear a heavy cross, and to bear it as she did, with doubts and misgivings sometimes assailing her; yet with an inward conviction that it was laid upon her by the hand of God Himself (James 1 : 2, 3). Perhaps the day would come when he would understand why she chose the painful lot of sacrificing herself to her poor, degraded father, and unreasonable brothers and sisters.

As they sat there, not talking much, but each busy with thought, the deep silence of the night was startled by the sudden outbursts of rough shouts and cries from the room where Squire Symons was under the custody of the men Dr. Welsh had sent in to watch him. The uproar resounded through the house, and cut Ernest to the quick. Was it possible to leave Ruth here, within the same walls that sheltered the raving madman? But she remained calm, though sad, and her clear, dark eyes met his own bravely. There was no symptom of fear or excitement about her.

"It is my poor father," she said; "you can do nothing for me if you stay. Go away now; and go to London without any fear or trouble for me. You will write to me some time?"

"I will," he answered. "God bless you, and keep you! You are too good a woman, Ruth. If you were lower down, I should be more worthy of you."

"If I were far, far higher up," she whispered, "I should not feel worthy of you. You are the best man I ever knew, Ernest; and I love you with all my heart."

The next day Ernest and Rose started for London, and Mrs. Clifford remained the sole inmate of the Grange. But as the widow confined herself pretty closely in the house, Mrs. Britton began to feel herself the sole representative of that class to which the village children were taught to look up in the words of the catechism, "to order myself lowly and reverently to all my betters." As the only lady in the place, she was bound to pay more frequent pastoral visits than before; those close, domestic, inquisitorial visits for which Mr. Britton was so unsuited.

Clifford was too small to be divided into districts; and the cottagers were accustomed to see first one, and then another, of the gentlefolks, as they called the inmates of the Grange and the Vicarage, enter their houses for a friendly chat. The visitor they liked most to see was Miss Rose, whose face was so bright and winsome, and whose eyes never fastened themselves cruelly on some dirty spot, and whose ears seemed deaf to the cries of the children, unless she had some toy or sweetmeat in her pocket to pacify them. Mrs. Clifford, too, was welcome: she was neither dictatorial nor close-handed; though she delighted in acting the grand lady.

But it was at Mrs. Britton's approach, soft and stealthy, with her muffled voice and blinking, all-seeing eyes, that the faces of the cottage housewives clouded over, as they made a desperate attempt to fling some nuisance out of sight, or hush up some troublesome child. Yet it would have been difficult, if not impossible, to convince Mrs. Britton that she was not a great help to her husband, and a special favorite among his parishioners.

There was nothing to hide or hush up in Mrs. Dunnit's spotless and peaceful kitchen. Her old husband was busily at work in the potato-patch, where she could see him through the little lattice window, whenever she glanced through it. He had brought in a large bunch of wall-flowers, which she had put into a jug of blue ware; and their sweet scent was filling the warm and pleasant room.

It was the hour Mrs. Dunnit most enjoyed. Her household work was over, and the kettle was hanging over the fire, slowly heating for tea, whilst she was knitting by the fireside, with the low-toned boom of the tide stealing in through the open door. It was all peace and quietness, and even her tranquil face fell a little, when she heard Mrs. Britton's subdued "Good-afternoon, Mrs. Dunnit."

"Well, this is comfort, Mrs. Dunnit," the visitor continued, wiping her feet with elaborate care on the mat at the door; "I do envy you, indeed, as much as it's right to envy anybody, you know; not more than that. You are the very picture of plenty and content! If it had only pleased God to cast my lot like yours! But what with the children at the Vicarage, and the strange guests Mr. Britton brings to it, and our many, many claims, I've no hope of comfort like this."

"Children are a great blessing, ma'am," answered Mrs. Dunnit, sighing. It was her sorrow that she had lost all her children, and it jarred upon her to hear any mother complain of the trouble they gave her, as Mrs. Britton was in the habit of doing.

"That was under the old dispensation, you know," remarked Mrs. Britton. "I'm not sure that it is so now, when one is poor. Not in our station, I mean, when they must be well clad, and well shod, and well educated. There, people like you are better off again. You have no anxiety what your sons and daughters are to be. There is always plenty of work they can do. Oh! I wish I could teach other people to be contented with their happy lot."

"Contentment's a rare herb," said Mrs. Dunnit.

"So it is; so it is!" agreed Mrs. Britton; "but you might all cultivate a little of it, couldn't you? Oh! be contented, be contented! I am always saying; you don't know what we have to do and bear."

"It's easy to be content with other people's lot," observed Mrs. Dunnit.

"Yes, we see how many blessings they despise and abuse," replied Mrs. Britton. "Ah! there's good old Dunnit at work in his garden, passing his time away in it. He's contented, I dare say, at this moment."

"Elijah is always content," said his wife, almost huffily; "there never lived a man as cultivated content for himself, and all about him, more than my Elijah. He's as happy as the day's long."

"That's well!" sighed Mrs. Britton; "there's no shoe that pinches him. He has a good place, a good home, and good wages, and no children to hang on him. If Elijah were not content, who should be? Shall I read you a chapter, Mrs. Dunnit?"

Mrs. Dunnit reached down the large old Bible from the window-sill, where it generally lay with old Dunnit's spectacles on the open page. She was far better acquainted with its contents than Mrs. Britton; but she sat still, and listened courteously, whilst the Vicar's worldly-minded wife read through a psalm as part of her pastoral duty. It was a short one, and soon ended.

Mrs. Britton had another call to make before returning home. It was a point with her not to miss seeing Mrs. Clifford every day now she was left alone, with no companionship except her own eldest child Jenny. Two or three times a week this visit was paid late in the afternoon, when Mrs. Clifford never failed to ask her to stay the evening. The dinners at Clifford Grange were always exceedingly good, even when no guests were expected; and no one knew better than Mrs. Britton how much more nourishing it is to sit down to a well-cooked meal, which presents itself with no anxiety or care, than to one which has been a worry to you all the morning. So she mounted with greater alacrity the steep, short cut leading from old Dunnit's cottage to Clifford Grange.

Mrs. Clifford had cherished in her bosom a keen sense of injury from the moment that Dr. Welsh had pronounced his last word against her visit to London. She had been there only once since her first husband died; and she had then gone, an obscure and unnoticed woman. Now that Ernest was shining there as a star of some magnitude in certain religious and political circles, in which glory she must have had a good share, she had been cruelly prohibited from accompanying him and Rose.

Rose's letters were full of triumph and exultation; and the girl was receiving enough attention to turn her head for life. Extreme bitterness and indignation were gnawing at Mrs. Clifford's heart, and the sharpest sting of all was the conviction that her compelled absence was not considered a great misfortune by her son and granddaughter.

Jenny Britton was having a rather dull time at Clifford Grange. Now and then she was tempted to think that the blessings of life were very unequally and mysteriously distributed, when Rose was the heiress of Clifford and the idol of every one belonging to her, while she was the eldes daughter of a poor vicar, with a terribly large family, and actually expected to be thankful to take Rose's place in waiting upon a peevish and capricious old woman. Jenny's courage and patience were tested to the utmost, and only kept up to the mark by her mother's tearful exhortations and her father's unwordly sympath and tenderness.

Mrs. Britton lectured her on the advantages o keeping in with the mistress of Clifford Grange, who, with all her faults, was always liberal to her dependants; whilst Mr. Britton, in his dreamy, solemn voice, and his far-away gaze, talked of bearing one another's burdens, and so fulfilling the law of Christ, telling his daughter it was Christ-like to soothe the fretfulness of an old woman's weary spirit.

Jenny was always glad to see her mother come in to dinner, and for the long evening which followed. Mrs. Britton listened with patient submissiveness to Mrs. Clifford's strictures upon Rose's career, and her caustic anger against Dr. Welsh, and her reflections upon Ernest's neglect.

Now and then, with a soft, purring gentleness, she murmured a half remonstrance, which served only to keep up a pleasant tartness in the conversation—for Mrs. Clifford was pleased with a very slight opposition. Mrs. Britton could also hint at a fault, when she seemed to be pointing out a good quality, and no one could be quicker than Mrs. Clifford in seizing on such a clew.

"I might almost as well be childless," remarked Mrs. Clifford as they drew their comfortable chairs round the glowing fire. "Here I am left, week after week, and month after month, with no companionship except that of strangers."

"Don't say that, dear Mrs. Clifford," remonstrated Mrs. Britton with effusion; "surely you cannot call poor Jenny and me strangers. We have known you far too long not to love you dearly. I believe Rose herself does not love you more than my poor Jenny does."

"I dare say not, I dare say not!" she replied. "I must say Rose is not all I should like my grandchild to be. She has too many ways and whims of her own, and Ernest fosters them most foolishly. For my part I think it is a very good thing for a girl to be brought up humbly, with no high views as to the future; just as Jenny is. I hardly see how it could be managed otherwise; but it is a bad thing for young people to have parents able to study all their likes and dislikes, as Ernest does. It is Rose here and Rose there, as if there was no one but Rose in the world.

"She needs trouble, Mrs. Britton, real trouble; and Ernest shields her from every rough breath. When I was her age I was already Ernest's mother, and that means a deal of sorrow and trouble. I was a widow before I was twenty; a widow, with a fatherless boy. Yes, I had my share of trouble by the time I was Rose's age."

"It is a good thing to bear the yoke in one's youth," quoted Mrs. Britton.

"You may well say that," continued Mrs. Clifford. "I am always saying to Ernest, 'Rose wants trouble. Only look at what my life has been.'"

(To be continued.)

THE TRULY RIGHTEOUS.

S.S. Lesson for February 8th.—Matt. 5 : 17, 26. Golden Text, Ps. 51 : 6. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Our blessed Lord, having announced the principles of His kingdom in the early part of the Sermon on the Mount, proceeds to contrast them with the law of Moses, not in order to depreciate the law, but, as Paul says (Rom. 3 : 31), to "establish the law." "Think not," He says, "that I am come to destroy the law or the prophets: I am not come to destroy but to fulfil. For verily I say unto you, till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law, till all be fulfilled." He shows how obedience to the law insures a position of honor in His kingdom (ver. 19). And then he adds, "For I say unto you, That except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven."

It is important for us to know what was the righteousness of the Scribes and Pharisees, and whether our righteousness comes up to, equals, or exceeds theirs; for unless it exceeds theirs we can in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven. Let us hear the testimony of one who shall be his own witness. "I am not as other men are, extortioners, unjust, adulterers. I fast twice in the week, I give tithes of all that I possess" (Luke 18 : 11, 12). What is the Lord's testimony about them? "They make broad their phylacteries, and enlarge the borders of their garments." They "pay tithe of mint and anise and cummin;" they "make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter;" they "appear beautiful outward" (Matt. 23 : 5, 23, 25, 27). But there is a flaw in all this righteousness: "All their works they do to be seen of men." They know not what it is to stand as Elijah stood, before the living God. They do not understand, as Enoch and Noah did, what it is to walk with God.

It was a righteousness in which self was sought. They had their reward. They sought self-satisfaction, and they found it; they desired the praise of men, and they obtained it. But God was not in all this; there was no exchange between Him and them, no intercourse. They offered to Him without making sure as to whether the offering was accepted. They afflicted themselves with fasting and long prayer, which, without the Spirit of God, must have been a hard service. They compassed sea and land to make one proselyte, for they were zealous and heart-whole in all they did; but nothing came of it. They remained where they were—inflated, intoxicated, with the sweetness of their satisfaction that they exceeded others—to awake one time from their dream in the presence of Him of whose righteousness they were ignorant (Rom. 10 : 3).

Does our righteousness exceed theirs? This is no light question. Some will say, of course it does, for we stand in the perfect righteousness of Christ. This is true of every believer in doctrine, but how is it in practice? Is there no going about to establish our own righteousness? Is there no expectation from ourselves, and no disappointment with ourselves? Is self really out of the question? Does such a thought never arise, "I thank Thee that I am not as other men are"? And, on the other hand, is the righteousness of Christ become, not merely a covering of our unrighteousness, but a life and atmosphere and being by which, in our thoughts and words and deeds, we become "righteous, even as He is righteous?" (1 John 3 : 7).

A faith in the righteousness of Christ, which has no transforming power upon our life and walk, leaves us almost behind the poor Pharisees. They seemed in their way to hunger and thirst after righteousness, and although it was not that which God could accept, while the whole foundation was wrong, yet they may rise up in judgment against such as quietly sleep upon the fact that Christ has died for them, and make use of their safety through His blood in order to lead a life of ease and self-indulgence, in which there is no fasting twice in the week, and perhaps no tithe of their property given to God. Surely if the sense of duty, as with Paul, or the spiritual pride of, as with the Pharisee, led them to make sacrifices, surely the principles of faith and love which govern us have not become ruling passions in our souls if they do not lead us to a self-abnegation greater than theirs. We want the searching of such an elder of the church as the Apostle James among us to say, Show me thy faith by thy works.

The first comment in detail which our Lord makes upon the law refers to the sixth commandment, "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time," etc.; "But I say unto you, that whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause shall be in danger of the judgment," etc. The little child must be reproved for his actions, and they who are under the law must be reproved for acts of transgression. But the elder children must learn to know the thoughts and intents of their hearts, that they also may be set right. "The law was our schoolmaster to bring us unto Christ" (Gal. 3 : 24). But when we are come to Christ we are under another regimen: "Whosoever is angry with his brother without a cause," is in the same danger as he who has committed murder—just as the sinful look, in the light of His purity, ranks with the breaking of the seventh commandment.

"Therefore if thou bring thy gift to the altar, and then rememberest that thy brother hath aught against thee" (not if thou hast aught against him), "leave there thy gift before the altar, and go thy way; first be reconciled to thy brother, and then come to offer thy gift." God can accept nothing from us while we are holding a false position with regard to any of our fellow-creatures. As God can afford to forgive the unworthy by means of His great salvation, so we as His children and representatives ought to be able to afford forgiveness to every one who sins against us. But if we sin against them, then God can hold no intercourse with us until all is confessed, forgiven, and brought right. God's children must be righteous in their relations to men, for God's grace cannot stand on unrighteous ground.

This is the secret of much coldness and death among God's children. Old sores are left unhealed, misunderstandings, which an open, humble, and prayerful explanation in the name of the Lord Jesus would have removed, remain festering, and exhale unhealthy odors in the Church of Christ. A man who seeks not his own cannot but be a peacemaker; he has a heart large enough to be the friend of everybody. He thinks more of the loss and the suffering of those who sin against him than of his own loss or suffering, which he takes, not from his adversary, but from God.

The law of Christ's kingdom is, "Agree with thine adversary quickly, while thou art in the way with him." Who is our adversary? In the Greek it is, He who has a legal claim against thee. This is first He whose law and precepts we have set at naught. Let us keep a clear conscience with our God, letting no single thing remain between us and Him, no unbalanced accounts, no open questions. Keep short accounts with God. Moody used to say, "All power in prayer, all brightness and liberty in testimony, is held back by a single known stain upon the conscience, one unchristlike thought indulged." As an eyelash in the eye, which irritates and inflames, as a stoppage in the digestive organs, so the smaller thing in which we are not in harmony with God puts the whole into disorder.

But others, too, have a legal claim upon us if we, who profess to live Christ's life, are continuing to live our own. They have a right to expect that we shall see things in a Divine light, and speak and act with a Divine power; and when they perceive that we are irritated by the same things which would irritate them, or that we are wanting in consideration and failing to place ourselves in their position, that we may spare them trouble, time, etc., they have a claim upon us that we should humble ourselves and confess our fault, without any regard to the provoking cause in them. Oh! this is a hard lesson to learn, and slowly learnt; but when patience has her perfect work, then shall we be "perfect and entire, wanting nothing" (James 1 : 4).

The only possibility of agreeing with those who see all things through the dark fog of their own self-interest, is to acknowledge where we were in fault without referring to their share of it. We live and walk upon the understanding that we Christians are dead men, and have not to be considered at all, so that all the consideration must be expended on those who differ from us; then we are free. And they, if they have any thing of honesty of heart, will soon perceive that we have the best of it; and how much more noble is the Christian's path than that of the natural man! But if we do not obey this command of the Master, what then? We are witnesses of His kingdom, and we cannot lightly sin against its precepts, "lest at any time the adversary deliver thee to the judge, and the judge deliver thee to the officer, and thou be cast into prison. Verily I say unto thee, Thou shalt by no means come out thence, till thou hast paid the uttermost farthing."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Distress in Ireland Increases, and Fears are entertained that no adequate provision has been made as yet to prevent large numbers of people dying of starvation. The London Telegraph reproaches England with its apathy and the paucity of its contributions. "Every day," it says, "brings nearer the dreadful time when the last morsel of food shall be eaten, and the cry of famine, poignant now, shall rend the heavens, and death and disease shall stalk through the land." The Times says that nothing blunts the edge of charity so much as the agitation of the land question. Meanwhile Lady Burdett Coutts has despatched her commissioner to the distressed districts, and the Duke of Connaught, third son of Queen Victoria, is preparing to visit Ireland and see for himself the real state of affairs.

The invitation of the House of Representatives to Mr. Parnell to deliver an address is freely commented upon by the English press, and is regarded as an unfriendly act.

General Roberts, the English Commander in Afghanistan, has appointed Sirdar Wali Mahomed, the son of a former Ameer, Governor of Cabul and the surrounding district. It is expected that, should he show capacity for government in this position, he will be proclaimed Ameer. Musa Khan, the aspirant to that position, has been deserted by his followers, owing to dissensions among the leaders, and all danger from that source is thought to be over; but Mahomed Jan, who, notwithstanding his recent defeat, is very popular among the Afghans, will, it is feared, lead an attack on the English at an early date.

A Protégé of Russia, Abdul Rahman Khan, is reported to have left the Russian headquarters and proceeded to Balkh, with the view of putting forward his pretensions to the throne. He is a nephew of Shere Ali, and his father Afzul was once formally recognized by the English as Ameer. But Afzul's government was overthrown by Shere Ali, and his family was driven into exile. Since that time his son has been in receipt of a pension from Russia, and has been treated with distinguished consideration in that country. His arrival at Balkh is thought to be a project on the part of Russia to embarrass England.

A Terrible Colliery Explosion at the Fair Lady pit in Staffordshire, England, occurred January 21st. It is the same pit in which six men were killed last autumn. The report states that 77 men were in the workings at the time of the explosion. The scene at the mouth of the pit was heartrending. Twenty-five corpses have already been brought up, a majority of them being so disfigured as to be unrecognizable. The few who were rescued alive died soon after they were brought up. One of the recovered corpses had lost part of the head. Some of the others were burned to cinders, while some appear to have been killed by the concussion. The disaster is attributed to the gaseous nature of the coal seam. A fire raged in the pit with great violence after the disaster, hindering the efforts of the explorers, and precluding all hopes of any of the victims being rescued alive, but the fire was ultimately subdued, and large quantities of débris have been removed, enabling the explorers to proceed more rapidly. It was then officially announced that the total number of deaths was seventy. Toward evening five more bodies were recovered from the mine, and twenty others were found in the pit.

The Metropolitan Tabernacle.—The special services conducted at the Tabernacle by Messrs. Smith and Fullerton, which commenced on December 28th, are being continued. The gatherings, which consist of noon prayer-meetings and evangelistic services in the evening, have been well attended. The New Year's prayer-meeting, although held at the early hour of seven on Sunday morning, drew together at least 500 persons, and in the afternoon there was a service for young people.

A Remarkable Movement for the Promotion of Prince Jerome Napoleon to supreme power in France has just been started by some party which, although obscure at present, may, in the Providence of God, be permitted to carry its point. The Prince still leads a quiet and retired life; but some of his friends or adherents have published and extensively circulated a pamphlet which sets forth his titles to the succession of the Bonapartes. This pamphlet is entitled "Prince Napoleon," and beneath the name figures the Prince's portrait. The pretender, who is at once a prince and a democrat, a possible President and Cæsar expectant, is represented in surtout, wearing four decorations and military medals and the riband of the Grand Cross of the Legion of Honor. The head more than ever resembles that of the first Emperor. Nothing could be more imperial, and peasants when they first see it will certainly involuntarily ejaculate "There is Napoleon!"

The most is made of every point in the Prince's career which has been to his credit, while his vices and unpopular qualities are studiously passed by. There is also a flattering expression of confidence in the right of the people to say whether a man is or is not fit to be their ruler. Then, after mentioning Jerome's misgivings at the Prince Imperial's departure for the Cape, his grief at his cousin's tragical death, and his letter to the Empress, the pamphlet plainly says: "This event imposed new responsibilities and duties on Prince Napoleon. Everybody acquainted with him knows that he is worthy to continue the Napoleonic traditions, and that they are deposited in energetic and capable hands."

Meteorological Tables have been Published in England, showing that 1879, which closed with a series of awful and devastating storms, was one of the most remarkable years of the present century in England. Comparisons have been made as to the rainfall of 1879 with that of sixty-four years back, and it has been found that during the first nine months of the past year no less than 29.0 inches of rain fell, while the nearest approach to that amount was in 1828, and then it was two and one half inches short. During the quarter ending with September rain fell in fifty-three out of seventy-eight days, the total amount being 11.75 inches. In April, May, and June rain fell almost constantly, and the sun was but rarely seen. The month of July was the most remarkable on record, rain falling every day during the first half of the month, turning to snow in some districts on the 4th, 8th, and 9th. August brought a change for the better, and agriculturists began to think that their misery was over. But a sudden change took place toward the end, and at its close all hope of saving even a moderate harvest was blighted.

Mr. Henry Varley, the Evangelist, has Conducted a series of mission services recently in York, England. Though the very extreme weather prevented many from attending, the mission has been a very successful one. The Lord enabled His servant to declare the whole counsel of God with faithfulness and power. A number confessed Christ in the inquiry-room, and many others have admitted to be convinced of sin who were not able to stay to the after meetings. In one family, the wife, three sons, and two daughters, all professed to rest on Christ's finished work. The Bible-readings—attended every afternoon by several hundred believers of all denominations—increased daily in numbers and interest, and were times of much spiritual refreshing.

A Turkish Prison.—The Reforms in Asia Minor which the Sultan of Turkey promised in return for the guarantee of England appear to be still far from realization. An American traveller recently visited a Turkish prison at Jaffa, which he describes as merely a large paved court, open to the sky, and opening into it on all four sides were vaulted rooms. On the floors are a few dirty mats, and on them were squatting or lying, some of the prisoners, and a number were walking about the courts. There were seventy-five in all—arrested upon charges of murder, theft, assault, and debt. All wer one common den. No bed-clothing is prov them; all sleep in their clothes, which are changed during the time spent in confinen
No food is given them by the authorities.
depend upon their relatives or friends, or charity of those who pity their condition.
stench of the court was awful. The vi asked an official if reform had commence Jaffa, as announced in Constantinople pa
With a cynical smile and an Oriental shr the shoulders, he replied, "Not yet," looked as if he pitied the foreigner's simpli

The First Methodist Chapel in Manche England, was built in 1750. Christopher Ho in preaching at a conference some time afte large chapel in Oldham Street was built, gratulated the people on the progress Methc had made in Manchester. "You have here may be considered," said Hopper, "a nobl
fice, and have now become a great people; recollect the period when you were few in ber. When I first made my entrance among
I preached in an old garret that overhun river in the neighborhood of the old b
The coals were in one corner of the roor looms in another, and I was in danger of bre my neck in getting up to it. When the co gation was collected the first evening, it d consist of more than thirty persons."

Blindness Among Russian Soldiers.
Russian oculist Skrebizky has lately visite inspected twenty-six military hospitals in F
He estimates the number of soldiers still who lost their sight during the late war at 2,000. Only four per cent of this numbe become blind through the direct action of v causes. The remaining ninety-six per cent o loss of sight to defective sanitary arrange want of personal cleanliness, insufficient clo and bad food. These men were dragged b potic conscription to serve in a war which no interest to them, and then disabled by adequate provision made for them. Prayer be offered that spiritual sight and saving Christ may be vouchsafed to them.

An Attempt to Secularize the Sabb
London has been defeated. The Court of Common Council has refused t the Guildhall Library to be opened on afternoons. A petition to have it oper presented and supported by 557 signat persons, most of whom gave their addr the city; but it was met by counter-p more numerously signed.

A Child was Suffocated by its Moth recent Sunday in London. The fatl mother took the child to be christene Catholic Church in the neighborhood, ar ward a pint of rum and a pint of whis sent for. Afterward a further quar spirits was consumed, and it was suppo
during the orgies the child was suffocate mother. The discovery that it was d made by the police, whose attention was to the house by a fight which was goir side. The mother is only twenty years and the infant was her first child. She r in ignorance of its death till the followi ing.

Unclaimed Treasures.—The London
tor" states that there is a box at th of England containing "a diamond coronet, and ear-rings," which belongs body unknown; and there is a heavy plate deposited in a private bank near dred years ago, all record of the own which is lost apparently beyond ho owners of these valuable articles are dead; but the fact reminds us that the of grace, pardon, and peace offered by men without money and without claimed by comparatively few.

Samuel D. Waddy, who has just be ed to the British Parliament after a s test in the district which for a long represented by the late John Roebuc known in England as a gifted Methc preacher and platform orator.

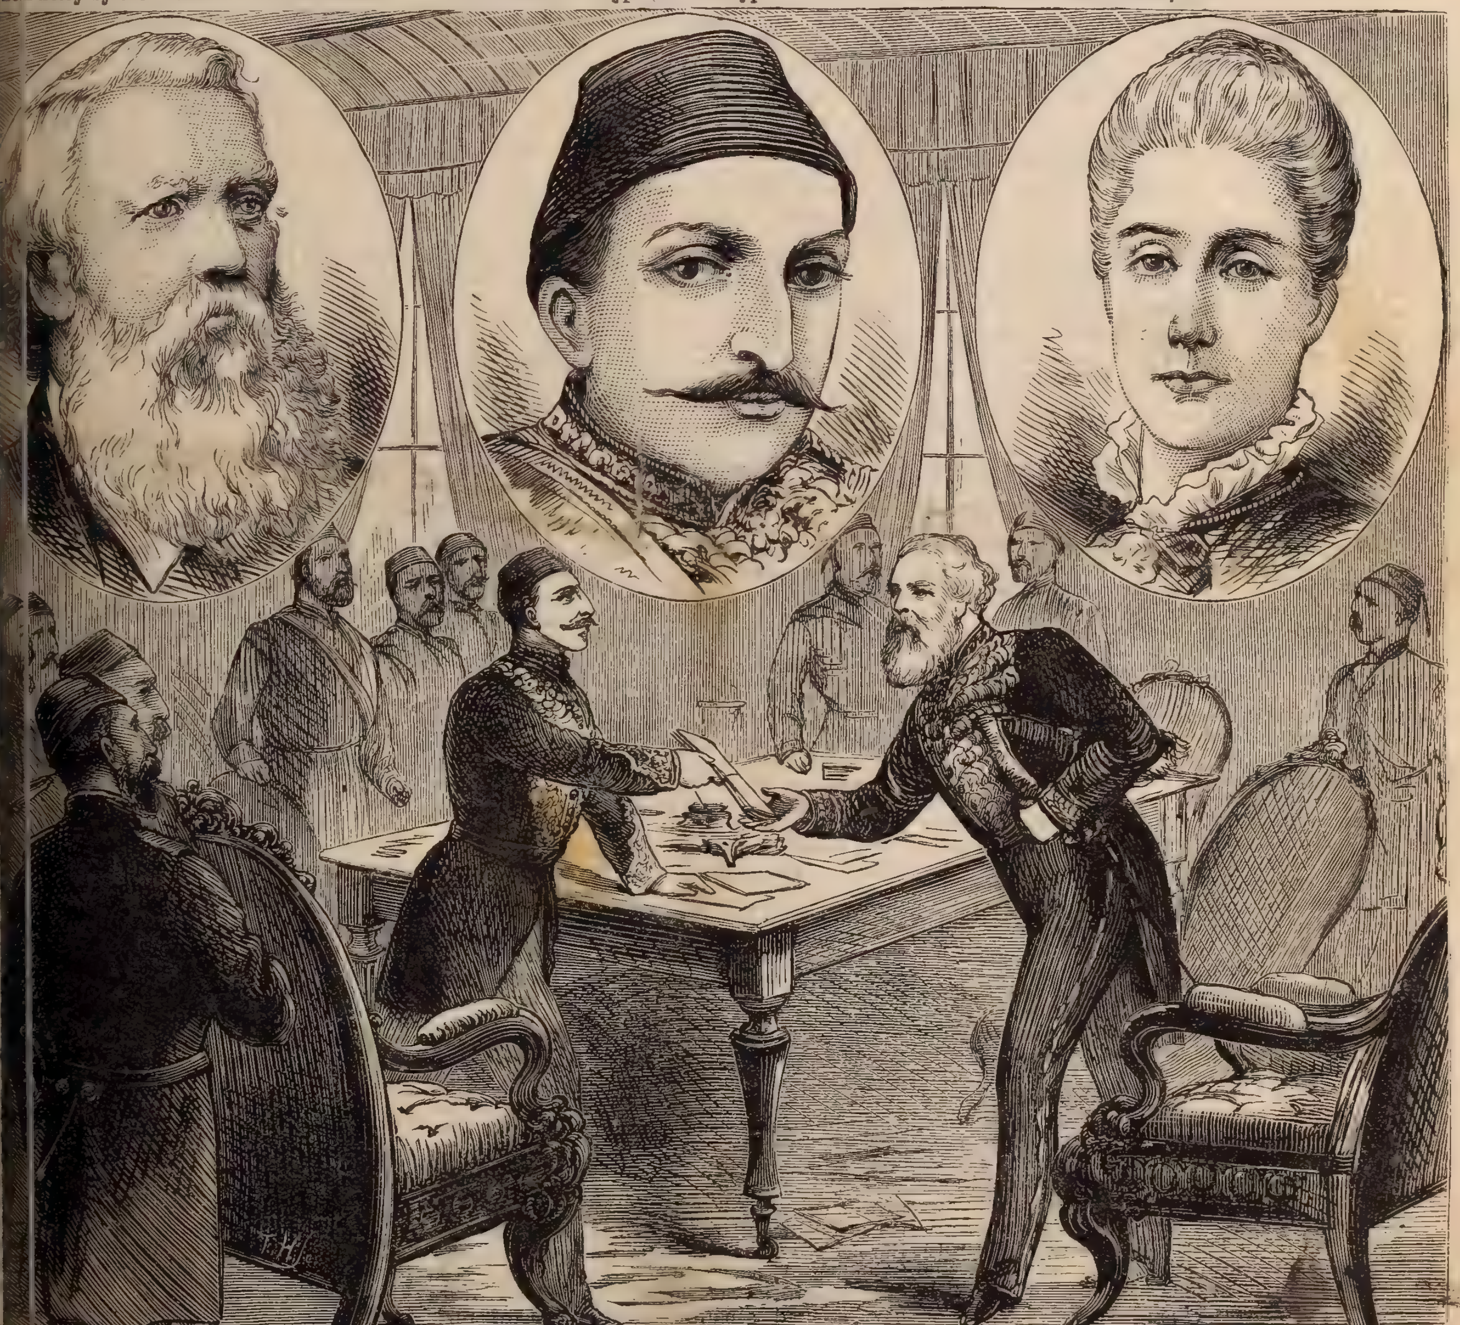
THE CHRISTIAN HERALD AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.

Sigle Copies, Three Cents. THURSDAY, FEBRUARY 5, 1880. 14th Year. No. 6—New Series.

CONTENTS OF THIS NUMBER:

PORRAITS OF THE SULTAN OF TURKEY, SIR H. AYARD, AND LADY LAYARD.
TH PREY TAKEN. A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage.
ARNLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE. A Thrilling Serial Story by the Author of "Felicia Cuffe."
PROPHETIC IMPORT OF THE SULTAN'S CONCESSION, by Rev. M. Baxter.
CURRENT EVENTS: Mr. Hayt's Removal from Office—The Maine Settlement—The Corner in Grain—A Petrified Child—Picture Sermons in Chicago—A Philadelphia Cockatoo—A Terrible Death, etc.
ANTICHRIST—Type and Antitype.
THE KEYNOTE OF A CHOICE SONNET. A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.
A WEIGHT OF WEALTH. (Continued.)
The Tongue and the Temper. Sunday-School Lesson by Mrs. M. Baxter—Two Country Girls in London.
FOREIGN TOPICS: An English Parliamentary Election—The Irish Famine, etc.



Scene of the Turkish Sultan handing back Dr. Koelle's papers to Sir H. Layard on Jan. 3, 1880, and Portraits of Sir H. Layard, the Sultan, and Lady Layard.

THE SULTAN OF TURKEY.

The Occasion of his Proclamation—Early Life—Personal Description—Visits France and England—Introduces European Customs to his Household—His Studies—A Model Husband and Father—Political Leanings—Attitude toward the Greeks—His Aversion to Dismemberment or Reform—Broken Promises—Recent Quarrel with England—Concedes Sir H. Layard's Demands—Fate of the Turkish Empire.

ABD-UL-HAMID II. was born on August 6th, 1842, and is the fourth son of Abd-ul-Mejid, who died on June 25th, 1861. He was proclaimed Sultan on the 31st of August, 1876, as successor to his younger brother Murad V., who was deposed in consequence of his mental incapacity to transact public business. His installation was attended with all the usual congratulations and rejoicings. Hamid's mother dying young, he was adopted by a childless lady of his father's harem, who, out of the strongest affection for his mother and himself, made him heir to considerable wealth which she possessed.

Like his brother Murad, Abd-ul-Hamid was very dissipated during his father's lifetime, but his robust constitution enabled him to withstand those enervating excesses which utterly prostrated his brother. At the time of his accession to the throne a Turkish correspondent gave a very interesting account of this prince, whom he described as "thin and sinewy-looking, with bright dark eyes and a quick flashing glance."

In 1867 his uncle Abd-ul-Aziz Khan, who was then Sultan of Turkey, concluded a treaty of commerce with France and England, and in July of the same year visited the exhibition at Paris, and a few days afterward went to London, where he met with a most flattering and enthusiastic reception. The present Sultan accompanied Abd-ul-Aziz on his European trip, and contracted a taste for French clothes and French customs, many of which he has since introduced to his own household.

He is exceedingly fond of maps, both celestial and terrestrial, while the study of military, geological, and statistical charts constitutes his favorite pastime. It is reported also on trustworthy authority that he is neither a drunkard nor a spendthrift; indeed, if anything, he is somewhat "near" and parsimonious; he is fond of animals, of which he has a considerable menagerie, and is the husband of only one wife, living until just before his supreme investiture at a small palace at Kiahat Hané with her and their children, and, according to the European custom, eating at the same table, and playing with the little ones like a model paterfamilias.

Nevertheless, he is a staunch member of what is called the orthodox Old Turkey party, and is very punctilious in his religious ceremonial observances, though "many-tongued rumor" says that he is not quite so strict a Mussulman and disciple of Mahomed as he professes to be. Though strenuously opposed to what is designated the Young Turkey party, he is no unreasonable fanatic, and is said even to be well disposed toward the Giaours—a term meaning infidel, and applied by the Turks to all disbelievers in the religion of Mahomed as the Prophet of Allah, and especially to Christians. He entertains, however, neither toleration nor consideration for the Greeks, whom he cordially and undisguisedly detests.

During the latter days of his brother's rule he was kept carefully under surveillance, and little was accurately known concerning him, save that, with commendable prudence, he persistently refused to ascend the throne until Murad's state was authoritatively pronounced to be hopelessly incurable, and that as a member of the "Old Turk" party he advocated war with Russia to the death rather than countenance in the most distant manner any compromise which should bring about a disintegration of the Ottoman Empire.

Since the Treaty of Berlin in 1878, he has shown the greatest reluctance to carry out the reforms, both in Europe and Asia, which were expressly stipulated. But upon pressure being put upon him in November last by the English Government, the Porte submitted, and new pledges were obtained for the speedy and thorough performance of its treaty engagements.

Promissory notes are the well-known diplomatic coinage of the Sultan's ministers. For twenty years they have been pledging themselves to ameliorate the condition of the Christian populations of Turkey, with what results the world is but too familiar. However, on Saturday, the 8th of November last, the Sultan himself presided at a council of state, and exhorted its members to use every effort toward the regeneration of the country. The Turkish newspapers were at the same time peremptorily ordered by him, under pain of suspension, to cease their virulent attacks upon England.

THE DIFFICULTY ABOUT DR. KOELLE.

All anxiety arising from the reluctance of the Porte to honor its stipulations being allayed, and the task of reform appearing to have been fairly commenced, Englishmen were beginning to breathe freely again, when, at the beginning of the present year, Europe was suddenly startled by the announcement that the British Ambassador had suspended official relations with the Porte. The reason for the movement on the part of Sir A. H. Layard was the utter disregard which the Sultan showed to his demands for the release from prison of a Mussulman schoolmaster named Ahmed Tewfik, who had been condemned to death for assisting Dr. Koelle, a Christian missionary, in the translation of the English prayer-book into Turkish. Dr. Koelle himself was returning home from the schoolmaster's house one evening last September, when he was arrested and taken to the police station. All his papers were impounded at the same time, and retained by the chief of the police.

Under these circumstances the Porte was expostulated with by Sir A. H. Layard, and an application made for the restoration of Dr. Koelle's papers, but no notice whatever was taken of the request. The British ambassador, therefore, on the 24th of December presented an ultimatum to the Porte demanding three things—that the missionary's papers should be returned, that the schoolmaster should be liberated, and that Hafiz Pasha, the police minister, who had been instrumental in securing the death sentence on Ahmed Tewfik, should be dismissed from office.

Every kind of pressure was used to induce the Sultan to yield. Even Germany and Austria united with England in asking the Porte to comply with the British demands. It was apparently felt that the time had come to let Turkey know in the most emphatic manner that Europe must have her will, and that Christendom would not tolerate the putting to death of a man in Europe for assisting a Christian in translating a Christian book.

On the 2d of January news arrived from Constantinople that Sir. A. H. Layard had had a long audience with the Sultan on that day, and that the result had been satisfactory. The confiscated papers were gracefully handed over by the Sultan on the 3d instant, and official relations were resumed as soon as the requisite formalities had been observed. This scene is the subject of our picture on the frontispiece.

And so, for the present, open and final rupture is averted. We say for the present, because whatever prudence may characterize the rulers of the Sublime Porte, the dismemberment of the Turkish Empire must be followed by its utter and irremediable ruin. A few years ago the maintenance of the integrity of the empire was made the object of such anxious effort on the part of the chief western kingdoms, that nothing seemed more improbable than its partition. But as has been shown in the prophetic work "Coming Wars,"* much has already been done toward its overthrow. Egypt and Greece have secured separate governments of their own; the Berlin Treaty wrested away some of the finest of its remaining European pr and Syria is being prepared for a similar tion by the assumption of its protectorat British Government.

Thus "The way of the kings from the the Jews—is being prepared, according inspired prediction in Rev. 16 : 12, tho full restoration and conversion of God's people will not be effected until the ush of the millennium, "when the Lord sh up Zion, and shall appear in His glo: 102 : 16).

---

* Coming Wars and Ten Signs of the Approaching Crisis, by the Rev. M. Baxter.

THE RIGHT HON. A. H. LAYARD,

British Ambassador in Turkey.

The Coveted City—Sir A. H. Layard's An Early Studies and Travels—His Ex of Ancient Sites—His Excavations at —Contributions to the British Muse Official Appointments—Receives the of the City of London—Becomes M Parliament—Visit to the Crimean Wa cation of his Works—Further Hon Present Post—Recent Diplomatic Ac Results.

FOR many years past, owing to the position occupied by Turkey with re other European powers, the ambassadc Constantinople has been regarded lish politicians as one of the most in diplomatic posts within the gift of Quee ria, and during the great events whi taken place in that quarter of the globe Eastern Question was rekindled by the tion in the Herzegovinia, in the summer it was felt to be more necessary than the British Sovereign should be adequa resented at that coveted city which co the narrow strait between Europe and A

The Right Hon. Austen Henry G.C.B., who at present holds that taken a very lively interest in Easter from early life. He is the son of H. T ard, Esq., and grandson of the late Dr. Dean of Bristol. He was born in March 15th, 1817. Having commen study of the law, which he soon relinqu more congenial pursuits, he, in 1839, s a course of travel, visited various northern Europe, and proceeded throu nia and Roumelia to Constantinople, one period he acted as a correspond London newspaper, and afterward through various parts of Asia, and lea Arabic and Persian languages.

In his wanderings he made it a spec to explore those spots believed to have sites of ancient cities, and when at Mc the mound of Nimroud, he was impelle irresistible desire to examine carefully ity to which history and tradition poi "birthplace of the wisdom of the We hearing that a Frenchman, M. Botta, carrying out excavations at the cost of ernment, and had found a great numbe ous marbles, Mr. Layard longed for th tunity of making similar discoveries.

Returning to Constantinople he laid before Sir. Stratford Canning, who, in erously offered to share the cost of and in the autumn Mr. Layard set off f and began his labors in a spot previou turbed. Here he ultimately succeede earthing some of the numerous wonder mens of Assyrian art which enrich th Museum, London, and with which his always be associated. For a time, both the English Government and t Museum authorities failed to appre value of Mr. Layard's researches.

EXCAVATIONS AT NIMROUD,

He was appointed Unpaid Attaché t bassy at Constantinople, April 5th, Under-Secretary of State for Foreign Lord Russell's first administration for a in 1852. Lord Derby, who acceded to February of that year, offered to reta that capacity until the return of Lord England, and then give him a diplo ment. This offer Mr. Layard, after taking advice of Lord Russell, declined. In the ion cabinet under Lord Aberdeen he was d various posts, which, as they were of a e to remove him from the field of Eastern es, he declined.

853 he was presented with the freedom of ty of London, in consideration of his dis- es among the ruins of Nineveh, and after- went to Constantinople with Lord Strat- de Redcliffe; but, disagreeing with his he returned in the course of the year to nd. In the House of Commons, where he member for Aylesbury, he became the ad- of a more decided course of action on astern Question, and delivered several en- and impressive speeches on that impor- bject.

54 he again proceeded to the East, was a tor of the important events then taking n the Crimea, witnessed the battle of the from the maintop of H.M.S. Agamemnon, mained in the Crimea till after the battle kermann, making himself acquainted with tual condition. He became one of the urgent among the members of the House Commons in demanding the committee of in- into the state of the British army, and he leading part in the investigation to which tributed his evidence.

the formation of Lord Palmerston's first stration, in 1855, he was again offered a ut as it was unconnected with the foreign of the country he declined it, became one leaders of the Administrative Reform As- on, and brought before the House of Com- in June, 1855, a motion embodying their which was rejected by a large majority. 7–8 he spent some time in India, endeav- o ascertain the cause of the rebellion.

he general election in March, 1857, he lost t in the House of Commons for Ayles- nd was also an unsuccessful candidate at n April, 1859, but was returned one of the rs for Southwark in December, 1860.

48–9 he published "Nineveh and its Re- " and in 1853 a second part of the work. Monuments of Nineveh" appeared in , and an abridged edition of "Nineveh Remains" in 1851.

Layard, who had been elected Lord Rec- Aberdeen University in 1855 and 1856, be- Under-Secretary of State for Foreign in Lord Palmerston's second administra- n July, 1861, and retired on the fall of Russell's second administration, in July, He was appointed a trustee of the British in 1866. He was Chief Commissioner rks in Mr. Gladstone's administration, December, 1868, at which time he was to the Privy Council, until November, hen he retired from Parliament on being ted Envoy Extraordinary and Minister tentiary at Madrid, and when Sir Henry as transferred to Vienna in 1877, he then ost has been no sinecure, and though a rable portion of his difficult negotiations n subjected to hostile criticism and in- nimadversion, he has, on the whole, dis- the difficult functions of his onerous with conscientiousness and diplomatic His recent action in "suspending official s with the Porte," by which Great Britain prised on New Year's Day, was at first to arise out of a dispute of a very trivial but the light of facts which have since blished has revealed the full gravity of ir. The crisis was, indeed, a very seri-

MBASSADOR AT CONSTANTINOPLE.

Ambassador's demands were not pressed n or too firmly, and they were of a na- t left him no opening for honorable re- thout full and complete victory, if such a s possible in diplomatic dealings with ute Turk. It seemed absurd that such a s the suspension of diplomatic relations, rest stage to a declaration of war, should have been necessary to restrain the Turkish Government from executing vengeance, in defiance of its treaty engagements, upon a poor schoolmaster whose poverty, rather than his will, had consented to his translating, or correcting the translation, of certain Christian writings.

Sir Austen Layard, it would appear, did not intervene too hastily or too energetically. It was more than three months since Ahmed Tewfik was seized and thrown into prison with the worst malefactors. Much indignation was felt among the Christian community at the outrageous treatment of Tewfik and his impending fate, before the ambassador was moved to insist peremptorily upon his release.

The Sultan himself has taken a keen personal interest in the punishment of Ahmed Tewfik, and has vigorously supported his fanatic spiritual adviser, the Sheik-ul-Islam. The obstinacy with which they have insisted upon so gross a breach of express stipulations shows what chance there is of obtaining from the present Turkish Government, steeped to the lips in bigotry and corruption, any of the reforms for which Lord Beaconsfield and his colleagues took credit beforehand as the certain fruits of Lord Salisbury's policy.

The result of the firm stand which Sir Austen Layard took in relation to the recent dispute has been justified by the results. The papers taken from Dr. Koelle by the police, and on which the whole controversy between England and the Porte turned, are now in the possession of Sir Austen Layard, while the release of Ahmed Tewfik has taken place, or will do so in the course of a very brief period of time. His destination is said to be one of the islands of the Archipelago; and the reason for his removal there, is that the Turkish authorities consider that they could not save him from fanatical assaults were he to remain in his own country. It is said that a considerable sum of English money has found its way to the home of Tewfik's family, but we are not told whether it emanated from the missionary society with which Dr. Koelle was connected, from the British Government, or through private benevolence. Sir A. H. Layard has received a formal explanatory letter which he demanded from Hafiz Pasha, the Police Minister, and has declared it to be amply satisfactory. The whole affair may, therefore, now be regarded as completely arranged.

LADY LAYARD.

Her Family—Her Great Humanity—Life in Spain—Her Remarkable Adventure in Saving Marshal Serrano—Removal to Constantinople—The "Ladies' Association."

LADY LAYARD is the third daughter (Mary Enid Evelyn) of Sir. John Josiah Guest, of Dowlais (who was created a baronet in 1838, and died in 1852), by his second wife, Lady Charlotte Elizabeth Bertie, only daughter of the ninth Earl of Lindsey. Her eldest brother is Sir Ivor Bertie Guest, and she was married to the Right Hon. Austen H. Layard in 1869.

As the wife of the Ambassador of Great Britain to the Porte, Lady Layard has greatly endeared herself as a lady of exceptionally kind disposition, and shown herself to be gifted with singular mental and bodily activity. Her extraordinary services at the British Embassy at Constantinople during the Russo-Turkish war in 1876–7, were most highly appreciated both by English residents and visitors in Turkey, more especially the humane efforts which she made in the interests of the wounded soldiers, and the poor refugees who in consequence of the war had fled from their homes to the large cities.

Lady Layard by her great hospitality gained the affection, not only of the wealthy who were on visiting terms at the Embassy, but of the destitute Turks, Armenians, Bulgarians, and other outcasts who sought shelter in Constantinople.

Her ladyship is also deservedly remembered in Spain, where, during the long period of her husband's diplomatic charge of British interests at the capital of Alfonso, she was a leader of the English society, and when the learned minister and his wife took their departure from Madrid the English residents and visitors there felt that they had sustained a great social loss.

During the Spanish civil war, while her husband was Minister Plenipotentiary, Lady Layard passed through some very one instance of which we now record.

TRYING ORDEALS,

At the time of the Federal Republic in Spain in 1870 Mr. and Mrs. Layard were in Madrid. Marshal Serrano, previously Regent, was supposed to be implicated in a conspiracy to overthrow the existing government, and his life being threatened, he took refuge in the British Legation. As this retreat was considered unsafe for the Marshal, Mr. and Mrs. Layard carried him offin disguise to Santander.

On arriving at the railway station the Marshal gave his arm to Mrs. Layard, while Mr. Layard walked behind with the bags, and in this manner they got safely into the town. The station was crowded by red republicans on the look-out for political fugitives, and if they had discovered Serrano they would have torn him to pieces.

At the principal station on the line the "reds" searched the several carriages, but Mr. Layard stood at one door and Mrs. Layard at the other of the compartment they occupied, to prevent the men from entering; claiming the right of free passage as British representatives.

On reaching Santander Mrs. Layard walked through the crowded station leaning on the Marshal's arm to the British Consul's house. A tug steamer was engaged to take Serrano to Biarritz starting at dusk. At the last moment, just as the tug was starting, the French consul, who had made all the arrangements, insisted on running back for a pillow. In his absence two civil guards came up and demanded permission to search the steamer. Mr. Layard stood in the gangway and with considerable courage refused to admit them. The steamer started, and Marshal Serrano was saved.

There may be some doubt how far Mr. Layard was justified in using his position as British Minister in assisting a Spaniard to escape from his own countrymen, who believed him a traitor; but Mr. Layard probably thought that as he was acting in the interests of justice and humanity, he was justified in using all the power at his disposal. If the Spanish Minister in London had assisted a British subject to escape, there would probably have been some explanation demanded by Queen Victoria's Government, and a gunboat sent to Madrid to wait for it.

For the part she had taken in the matter Mrs. Layard received the thanks of the British Government in a special dispatch, the only instance on record of a lady being so honored.

But when Mr. (now Sir A. H. Layard) was transferred to Constantinople, the noble qualities of Lady Layard were most eminently displayed. Accounts reached the Embassy of the dreadful condition of the wounded Turkish soldiers. The Sultan's means were inadequate for their wants, and a few ladies presented the case to Lady Layard, and as promptly as possible a "Ladies' Association" was formed, with her ladyship as president, and their labors in the cause of suffering humanity will never be forgotten.

With their own hands they worked for many hours a day, and during the period of the war made nearly 60,000 bandages, 2000 shirts, besides many other things suitable to the distressed soldiers' wants. Widows and orphans have reason to bless her name, for she fed, and clothed, and sheltered them. Lady Layard received from the sultan's own hand the "Chefket," a first-class order of mercy.

The Mission at Beyrout, Syria.—Rev. Dr. Jessup, writing to the Turkish Mission Aid Society in London, says: "I have now been at home in Beyrout for three weeks, and have had time to look about me. As the year draws near to its close, the reports of work done, and of work to be done, of fruits gathered and new openings for useful labor, are cheering to the heart."

THE PREY TAKEN.

A New Sermon by Dr. Talmage, preached on Sunday Morning, February 1st, 1880.

"The lame take the prey."—Isaaih 33 : 23.

Great Achievements Made by Men under Disadvantages—Three Great Poets who were Blind—Other Famous Invalids—Social Disadvantages Overcome—As in the Secular so in the Spiritual—Eminence in Christian Life attained by Invalids—Blindness with Spiritual Sight—A Sublime Answer—Cure of a Lad blind from Infancy—Diseased and Crippled Saints—A Man on Crutches—The Orphans—Orphans made such by the War, who have Prospered in Church and State—Men of Small Talent—Great Works Done by Ordinary Men—Too Many Christian Overlookers—Characteristics of the Successful Christian Worker—An Heroic Rescue by an Engineer—Those who are Astray—A Sinner Slain in his Iniquity—The only Suitable Prayer--A Tremendous Gospel—A Dying Pilot on the North River.

THE utter demolition of the Assyrian host was here predicted. Not only robust men should go forth and gather the spoils of conquest, but even men crippled of arm and crippled of foot should go out and capture much that was valuable. Their physical disadvantages should not hinder their great enrichment. So it has been in the past, so it is now, so it will be in the future. So it is in all departments. Men labor under seemingly great disadvantages, and amid the most unfavorable circumstances, yet making grand achievements, getting great blessing for themselves, great blessing for the world, great blessing for the church, and so "the lame take the prey."

Do you know that the three great poets of the world were totally blind? Homer, Ossian, John Milton. Do you know that Mr. Prescott, who wrote that enchanting book "The Conquest of Mexico," never saw Mexico, could not even see the paper on which he was writing? A framework across the sheet, between which, up and down, went the pen immortal. Do you know that Gambassio, the sculptor, could not see the marble before him, or the chisel with which he cut it into shapes bewitching? Do youk now that Alexander Pope, whose poems will last as long as the English language, was so much of an invalid that he had to be sewed up every morning in rough canvas in order to stand on his feet at all?

Do you know that Stuart, the celebrated painter, did much of his wonderful work under the shadow of the dungeon where he had been unjustly imprisoned for debt? Do you know that Demosthenes by almost superhuman exertion first had to conquer the lisp of his own speech before he conquered assemblages with his eloquence? Do you know that Bacon struggled all through innumerable sicknesses, and that Lord Byron and Sir Walter Scott went limping on clubfoot through all their life, and that many of the great poets and painters and orators and historians and heroes of the world had something to keep them back, and pull them down, and impede their way, and cripple their physical or their intellectual movement, and yet that they pushed on and pushed up until they reached the spoils of worldly success, and amid the huzza of nations and centuries, "the lame took the prey"?

You know that a vast multitude of these men started under the disadvantage of obscure parentage. Columbus, the son of the weaver. Ferguson, the astronomer, the son of the shepherd. America the prey of the one; worlds on worlds the prey of the other. But what is true in secular directions is more true in spiritual and religious directions, and I proceed to prove it.

INVALIDS EMINENT IN CHRISTIAN LIFE.

There are in all communities many invalids. They never know a well day. They adhere to their occupations, but they go panting along the streets with exhaustions, and at eventime they lie down on the lounge with achings beyond all medicaments. They have tried all prescriptions, they have gone through all the cures which were proclaimed infallible, and they have come now to surrender to perpetual ailments. They consider they are among many disadvantages; and when they see those who are buoyant in health pass by, they almost envy their robust frames and easy respiration.

But I have noticed among that invalid class those who have the greatest knowledge of the Bible, who are in nearest intimacy with Jesus Christ, who have the most glowing experiences of the truth, who have had the most remarkable answers to prayer, and who have most exhilarant anticipations of Heaven. The temptations which weary us who are in robust health they have conquered. They have divided among them the spoils of the conquest.

Many who are alert and athletic and swarthy loiter in the way. These are the lame that take the prey. Robert Hall an invalid, Edward Payson an invalid, Richard Baxter an invalid, Samuel Rutherford an invalid. This morning, when you want to call to mind those who are most Christlike, you think of some darkened room in your father's house from which there went forth an influence potent for eternity.

A step farther: Through raised letters the art of printing has been brought to the attention of

THE BLIND.

You take up the Bible for the blind, and you close your eyes, and you run your fingers over the raised letters, and you say: "Why, I never could get any information in this way. What a slow, lumbrous way of reading! God help the blind."

And yet, I find among that class of persons, among the blind, the deaf and the dumb, the most thorough acquaintance with God's word. Shut out from all other sources of information, no sooner does their hand touch the raised letter than they gather a prayer. Without eyes, they look off upon the kingdoms of God's love. Without hearing, they catch the minstrelsy of the skies. Dumb, yet with pencil, or with irradiated countenance, they declare the glory of God.

A large audience assembled in New York at the anniversary of the Deaf and Dumb Asylum, and one of the visitors with chalk on the blackboard wrote this question to the pupils: "Do you not find it very hard to be deaf and dumb?" And one of the pupils took the chalk and wrote on the blackboard this sublime sentence in answer: "When the song of the angels shall burst upon our enraptured ear, we will scarce regret that our ears were never marred with earthly sounds." Oh! the brightest eyes in Heaven will be those that never saw on earth. The ears most alert in Heaven will be those that in this world heard neither voice of friend, nor thrum of harp, nor carol of bird, nor doxology of congregations.

A lad who had been blind from infancy was cured. The oculist operated upon the lad, and then put a very heavy bandage over the eyes, and after a few weeks had gone by, the bandage was removed, and the mother said to her child, "Willie, can you see?" He said, "Oh! mamma, is this Heaven?" The contrast between the darkness before and the brightness afterward was overwhelming. And I tell you the glories of Heaven will be a thousandfold brighter for those who never saw anything on earth.

While many with good vision closed their eyes in eternal night, and many who had a good, artistic, and cultured ear went down into eternal discord, these afflicted ones cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and He made their sorrows their advantage, and so "the lame took the prey."

In the seventh century there was a legend of St. Modobert. It was said that his mother was blind, and one day while looking at his mother he felt so sympathetic for her blindness that he rushed forward and kissed her blind eyes, and, the legend says, her vision came immediately. That was only a legend, but it is a truth, a glorious truth, that the kiss of God's eternal love has brought to many a blind eye eternal illumination.

A step farther: There are those in all communities who toil mightily for a livelihoo They have scant wages. Perhaps they are d eased, or have so they are hindered from doing a continuc day's work. A city missionary finds them the dark alley, with no fire, with thin clothi with very coarse bread. They never ride in t street car; they cannot afford the five cen They never see any pictures save those in t show-window on the street, from which they often jostled, and looked at by some one w seems to say in the look, "Move on! what you doing here looking at pictures?"

PHYSICAL INFIRMITIES,

Yet many of them live on mountains of tra figuration. At their rough table He who fed five thousand breaks the bread. They talk of of the good times that are coming. This wo has no charm for them, but Heaven entran their spirit. They often divide their scant cr with some forlorn wretch who knocks at th door at night, and on the blast of the night wi as the door opens to let them in, is heard voice of Him who said, "I was hungry and fed me." No cohort of Heaven will be bright to transport them. By God's help t have vanquished the Assyrian host. They h divided among them the spoils. Lame, la yet they took the prey.

I was riding along the country road one and

I SAW A MAN ON CRUTCHES.

I overtook him. He was very old. He was ing very slowly. At that rate, it would h taken him two hours to go a mile. I s "Wouldn't you like to ride?" He said, "Th you, I would. God bless you." When he beside me, he said, "You see, I am very l and very old, but the Lord has been a good l to me. I have buried all my children. Lord gave them, and the Lord had a righ take them away. Blessed be His name. I very sick, and I had no money, and my ne bors came in and took care of me, and I wa nothing. I suffer a great deal with pain, then I have so many mercies left. The Lor been a good Lord to me." And before we got far, I was in doubt whether I was giving a ride, or he was giving me a ride! He "Now, if you please, I'll get out here. help me down on my crutches, if you pl God bless you. Thank you, sir. Good-m ing. Good-morning. You have been feet t lame, sir, you have. Good-morning."

Swarthy men had gone the road that da do not know where they came out, but every ble of that old man was toward the shining With his old crutch he had struck down ma Sennacherib of temptation which has mast you and me. Lame, so fearfully lame, so aw lame; but he took the prey.

A step farther: There are in all commu many ORPHANS.

During our last war and in the years immedi following, how many children we heard "Oh! my father was killed in the war." you ever noticed—I fear you have not—how those children have turned out? Starting the greatest disadvantage, no orphan could do for them what their father would done had he lived. The skirmisher sat night, by the light of fagots, in the s writing a letter home, when a sharpsho bullet ended the letter which was never fo never posted, and never read.

Those children came up under great disa tage. No father to fight their way for Perhaps there was in the old family Bi old yellow letter pasted fast, which to story of that father's long march, and h suffered in the hospital; but they looke further on in the Bible, and they came t story of how God is the Father of the fath and the widow's portion, and they soon their father's place in that household. battled the way for their mother. They on up, and many of them have already, sixteen years since the war, taken positi church and state. While many of those who suffered nothing during those times have had some go out into lives of indolence and vagabondage, these who started under so many disadvantages because they were so early bereft, these are the ones who took the prey.

MEN OF SMALL TALENT.

A step farther: There are those who would like to do good. They say, "Oh! if I only had wealth, or if I had eloquence, or if I had high social position, how much I would accomplish for God and the church!" I stand here to-day to tell you that you have great opportunities for usefulness.

Who built the Pyramids? The king who ordered them built? No; the plain workmen who added stone after stone and stone after stone. Who built the dikes of Holland? The government that ordered the enterprise? No; the plain workmen who carried the earth and rung their trowel on the wall. Who are those who have built these vast cities? The capitalists? No; the carpenters, the masons, the plumbers, the plasterers, the tinners, the roofers, dependent on a day's wages for a livelihood. And so in the great work of assuaging human suffering and enlightening human ignorance and halting human iniquity. In that great work, the chief part is to be done by ordinary men, with ordinary speech, in an ordinary manner, and by ordinary means.

The trouble is that in the army of Christ we all want to be captains and colonels and brigadier-generals. We are not willing to march with the rank and file and do duty with the private soldier. We want to belong to the reserve corps and read about the battle while warming ourselves at the camp-fires, or on furlough at home, our feet upon an ottoman, we sagging back into an arm-chair.

As you go down the street, you see an excavation and four or five men are working, and perhaps twenty or thirty leaning on the rail looking over at them. That is the way it is in the church of God to-day: where you find one Christian hand at work, there are fifty men watching the job!

Oh! my friends, why do you not go to work and teach this Gospel? You say, "I have no talent." You have. It may be the carpenter's plane; it may be the mason's wall. The robe in which you are to proclaim this Gospel may be a shoemaker's apron. But woe unto you if you preach not this Gospel somewhere, somehow! If this world is ever brought to Christ, it will be through the unanimous and long-continued efforts of men who, waiting for no special endowment, consecrate to God what they have. Among the most useless people in the world are men with ten talents, while many a one with only two talents, or no talent at all, is doing a great work, and so "the lame take the prey."

There are thousands of ministers of whom you have never heard—in log cabins at the West, in mission chapels at the East—who are warring against the legions of darkness, successfully warring. Tract-distributers, month by month undermining the citadels of sin. You do not know their going or their coming; but the foot-falls of their ministry are heard in the palaces of heaven. Who are the workers in our Sabbath-schools throughout this land to-day? Men celebrated, men brilliant, men of vast estate? For the most part, not that at all.

I have noticed that the chief characteristic of the most of

THOSE WHO ARE SUCCESSFUL

in this work is that they know their Bibles, are earnest in prayer, are anxious for the salvation of the young, and Sabbath by Sabbath are willing to sit down unobserved and tell of Christ and the resurrection. These are the humble workers who are recruiting the great army of Christian youth—not by might, not by power, not by profound argument, not by brilliant antitheses, but by the blessing of God on plain talk, and humble story, and silent tear, and anxious look. "The lame take the prey."

Oh! this work of saving the youth of our country—how few appreciate what it is! This generation tramping on to the grave—we will soon all be gone. What of the next?

AN ENGINEER ON A LOCOMOTIVE

going across the western prairies day after day, saw a little child come out in front of a cabin and wave to him; so he got in the habit of waving back to the little child, and it was the day's joy to him to see this little one come out in front of the cabin door and wave to him, while he answered back.

One day the train was belated and it came on to the dusk of the evening. As the engineer stood at his post he saw by the headlight that little girl on the track, wondering why the train did not come, looking for the train, knowing nothing of its peril. A great horror seized upon the engineer. He reversed the engine. He gave it in charge of the other man on board, and then he climbed over the engine, and he came down on the cowcatcher. He said, though he had reversed the engine, it seemed as though it were going at lightning speed, faster and faster, though it was really slowing up, and with almost supernatural clutch he caught that child by the hair and lifted it up, and when the train stopped and the passengers gathered around to see what was the matter, there the old engineer lay, fainted dead away, the little child alive and in his swarthy arms.

"Oh!" you say, "that was well done." But I want you to exercise some kindness and some appreciation toward those in community who are snatching the little ones from under the wheels of temptation and sin—snatching them from under thundering rail-trains of eternal disaster, bringing them up into respectability in this world and into glory for the world to come. You appreciate what the engineer did; why can you not appreciate the grander work done by every Sabbath-school teacher this afternoon?

Oh! my friends, I want to impress upon myself and upon yourselves that it is not the number of talents we possess, but the use we make of them.

GOD HAS A ROYAL FAMILY

in the world. Now, if I should ask, "Who are the royal families of history?" you would say, "House of Hapsburg, House of Stuarts, House of Bourbons." They lived in palaces and had great equipage. But who are the Lord's royal family? Some of them may serve you in the household, some of them are in unlighted garrets, some of them will walk this afternoon down the street, on their arm a basket of broken food; some of them are in the almshouse, despised and rejected of men, yet in the last great day, while it will be found that some of us who fared sumptuously every day are hurled back into discomfiture, there are the lame that will take the prey.

One step farther: There are a great many people discouraged about getting to Heaven. You are brought up in good families, you had Christian parentage; but you frankly tell me that you are astray, a thousand miles away from the right track, you say.

My brother, you are the one I want to preach to this morning. I have been looking for you. I will tell you how you got astray. It was not maliciousness on your part. It was perhaps through the geniality and sociality of your nature that you fell into sin. You wandered away from your duty, you unconsciously left the house of God; you admit the Gospel to be true, and yet you have so grievously and so prolongedly wandered, you say rescue is impossible.

It would take a week to count up the names of those in Heaven who were on earth worse than you tell me you are. They went the whole round of iniquity, they disgraced themselves, they disgraced their household, they despaired of return because their reputation was gone, their property was gone, everything was gone; but in some hour like this they heard the voice of God, and they threw themselves on the divine compassion, and they rose up more than conquerors. And I tell you there is the same chance for you. That is one reason why I like to preach this Gospel, so free a Gospel, so tremendous a Gospel. It takes a man all wrong, and makes him all right.

In a former settlement where I preached, a member of my congregation quit the house of God, quit respectable circles, went into all styles of sin, and was slain of his iniquity. The day for his burial came, and his body was brought to the house of God. Some of his comrades who had destroyed him were overheard along the street, on their way to the burial, saying, "Come, let us go and hear Talmage damn this old sinner!" Oh! I had nothing but tears for the dead, and I had nothing but invitations to the living. You see I could not do any otherwise. "Christ Jesus came to seek and save that which was lost." Christ in His dying prayer said, "Father, forgive them," and that was a prayer for you and a prayer for me.

Oh! start on the road to Heaven to-day.

YOU ARE NOT HAPPY.

The thirst of your soul will never be slaked by the fountains of sin. You turn everywhere but to God for help. Right where you are, call on Him. He knows you, He knows all about you, He knows all the odds against which you have been contending in life. Do not go to Him with a long rigmarole of a prayer, but just look up and say, "Help! help!"

But you say, "My hand trembles so from my dissipations, I can't even take hold of a hymn-book to sing." Do not worry about that, my brother; I will give out a hymn at the close so familiar you can sing it without a book. But you say, "I have such terrible habits on me, I can't get rid of them." My answer is, Almighty grace can break up that habit and will break it up. But you say, "The wrong I did was to one dead and in Heaven now, and I can't correct that wrong." You can correct it. By the grace of God, go into the presence of that one, and the apologies you ought to have made on earth make in Heaven.

"Oh!" says some man, "if I should try to do right, if I should turn away from my evil doing unto the Lord, I would be jostled, I would be driven back, nobody would have any sympathy for me." You are mistaken. Here, in the presence of the church on earth and in Heaven, I give you to-day the right hand of Christian fellowship. God sent me here to-day to preach this, and He sent you here to hear this: "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thought, and let him return unto the Lord, who will have mercy, and unto our God, who will abundantly pardon." Though you may have been the worst sinner, you may become the best saint, and in the great day of judgment it will be found that "where sin abounded, grace does much more abound," and while the spoils of an everlasting kingdom are being awarded for your pursuit, it will be found that the lame took the prey. Blessed be God that we are, this Sabbath, one week nearer the obliteration of all the inequalities of this life and all its disquietudes.

Years ago, on a boat on the North River, the pilot gave a very sharp ring to the bell for the boat to slow up. The engineer attended to the machinery, and then he came up with some alarm on deck to see what was the matter. He saw it was a moonlight night and there were no obstacles in the way. He went to the pilot and said, "Why did you ring the bell in that way? Why do you want to stop? there's nothing the matter." And the pilot said to him, "There is a mist gathering on the river; don't you see that? and there is night gathering darker and darker, and I can't see the way." Then the engineer, looking around and seeing it was a bright moonlight, looked into the face of the pilot, and saw that he was dying, and then that he was dead.

God grant that when our last moment comes we may be found at our post doing our whole duty; and when the mists of the river of death gather on our eyelids, may the good Pilot take the wheel from our hands and guide us into the calm harbor of eternal rest!

"Drop the anchor, furl the sail,
I am safe within the vale."

ARNOLD PERCIVAL MONTAIGNE;

Or the Heir of a Deferred Inheritance.

A Thrilling Story by Henry Martin, Author of "Felicia Cuffe."

(Continued from page 71.)

The Forgery—How the Proceeds were Invested—A Renewal Refused—Arthur Lemaire's Despair—He Contemplates Suicide—He Resolves to Appeal to his Sister—Lucie Disturbs his Reverie.

ARTHUR LEMAIRE, tempted to forgery by the pecuniary bait, reasoned and sophisticated, and, as a matter of course, his evil self gained the victory. In affairs of prudence, it is said, we should think twice before we act, but in cases of conscience only once.

Arthur Lemaire knew the aphorism, but, alas! he did not act upon it. Copying the autograph of Percival from a letter of his before him, which had been written to his sister, and which Arthur furtively took for the purpose from one of Lucie's drawers, though with some tremor, for an avenging eye as he wrote seemed to peer at him from out a thunder-cloud, he forged Percival's name to a promissory note of the value of $15,000. And as he looked at it when completed, to stay the agitation within him which he could not suppress, he said, "I am sure I do not mean to wrong him of a stiver." And then he added, with a melancholy attempt at humor, to further relieve his feelings, "After all, the use of his name for three months or so isn't much by one who is going to give him for all his days an only sister."

The immoral and perilous transaction succeeded well for a time. Arthur, with the money which he received for the bill upon discounting it at the bank, and having added to it his own small capital, made two or three excellent purchases, one of them to the amount of $45,000. For the capital he had schemed to have in hand, aided by a fresh mortgage of the land for the balance, enabled him to make this large investment, so that, in his own esteem at least, he was becoming an extensive landowner.

A week before the bill to which he had put Percival's name was due, he presented another for the same amount at the bank, intending with the cash received from its discount to pay the outstanding one. Upon calling at the discount office an hour after, however, he was astounded to get the promissory note back, the clerk informing him politely that, from the critical condition just then of the money market, the bank directors, against their general wish, had resolved to contract their discounts, and for the present would only accommodate their long-established and usual connections.

The blood started back from Arthur Lemaire's cheek at this communication, his brain whirled, and for some time he was all but unconscious. He saw too well, at a glance, what the intelligence he had received meant to him—nothing less than that he was a ruined man, that his felonious act must come to light, and that he must face the certainty of social disgrace and imprisonment. Oh, with what a terrible load of misery did he turn away from the bank counter that hour and pass into the street! All things taking their hue from his own inward dismay. With tightened lips and clouded brow he walked he knew not whither, his temples throbbing and his limbs moving mechanically along the pavement. Fortunately none of his friends met him, or his appearance and manner would have led to remark and awkward inquiry. He hardly came to himself until he reached, in the direction of the Phœnix Park, on the outskirts of the city.

"What in the world am I to do?" he frantically inquired of himself. "I am truly in a dreadful position. Fate, black as night, gathering around me. Oh, how the snares of evil entangle those who dally with and yield to them! The glittering baits of sin are surely nothing but allurements of Satan to destruction. And yet," he continued, "who would have thought of things turning out as they have done? It's a shame and a foul wrong for the bank, by its use and wont, first to encourage such an act as mine, and then, in the crisis of need, withdraw its hand so spitefully.

At this moment the waters of the Liffey, the river upon which Dublin is built, and which runs at some distance from the wall on one side of Phœnix Park, and which was now gleaming in the sunlight, flashed upon Arthur Lemaire's vision, and the thought of self-destruction rose up strong and urgent within him. "One determined plunge in there," he said, as he looked toward the stream, "and in a few moments my misery would be over."

He had turned toward the river to contemplate more closely this guilty impulse, when his better nature, from earliest age religiously instructed at home, getting opportunity to speak, suggested to him,—

"The suicide is both a monster and a coward, for he of all criminals does most violence to nature, while he also meanly evades a difficulty, in your case self-made, in place of manfully meeting it. The Lemaires through all the past have never been poltroons; your progenitors, as you have been told at home, have feared none but God, and will you dishonor the name and practically disown the spirit and conduct of your Huguenot ancestors?"

His soul startled and stirred by the voice of his conscience, he, after a little thought, said in response, "No, I will not, must not, be the first to fly from man, and sacrilegiously rush, with all my sins upon my head, into the presence of my Maker! Besides," he added, in a moment or two, "the evil I have done will, I fear, entail sorrow enough at home, without my adding to it the shame and horror which would fall upon all near to me, and especially upon my dear mother, by an act of self-destruction. No! Whatever I do, I am firmly resolved not to heap up guilt on guilt and sorrow upon sorrow in this way."

From ancestral pride and good early teaching brought to this conclusion, the question, however, of what was to be done in his terrible dilemma shortly after pressed itself anew upon Arthur Lemaire's consideration. Should he fly the country, and leave matters to be settled in some way, as they best could, by his friends left behind him? This seemed for a while a promising expedient; yet, upon second thoughts, it did not so strongly commend itself for adoption. Exile was hard, very hard, to entertain—moreover, successful flight was exceedingly problematical; above all, he had formed lately a passionate attachment for a young lady in his neighborhood, and how could he abandon her? Stunned by sudden terror, her image hitherto had not come up before him, but now the thought of fleeing his native land recalled to memory the loved one, and his whole being violently drew back from the project of self-banishment.

Still he moved upon the road along the Phœnix Park wall, lost in utter bewilderment, and at last the form of his sister Lucie flitted in imagination before him. "She has often, to my sore annoyance," he said, "disparaged and rebuked me; but still, as I have good reason to know, she has a kind, sisterly heart, and is, moreover, full of resource, and clear-headed.

"Might it not, then, be well," he asked himself, "to put my case in the best light that I can before her, and see what she would advise? What I have done, it is certain, must, at some time or other, become known to her, and if it will serve me, why not tell it now, and be myself the bearer of the evil tidings?"

After a little further reflection, even a scheme for getting out of his difficulty, to be proposed for Lucie's execution, was suggested to him. "Why should I not, after all, get her," he inquired, "to strongly hint to Percival the dreadful dilemma I am in from the want of 3000*l.*, and, without making known any thing of the forgery at all, ask him through her to lend it me? Why, 3000*l.* would be a mere bagatelle to him, for I know he has a much larger balance at his bankers'. He is, I must confess, too, a somewhat generous fellow—is not over fond of money—and I am pretty certain would therefore not refuse my request. At all events, I am he would not if Lucie would prefer my rec to him, and then, with this loan, why I c meet gayly the forged bill that is coming Without a doubt this is the very way to ge of the cruel and tormenting toils which are ing around me. How came I not to think before? I was a dolt!" And at the wor turned himself in his course, and set his toward his father's dwelling, which now, his wandering steps, was, however, some distant.

Arthur Lemaire brought his reflection a close by "thinking aloud" this summa them, "I am up to my very neck in the sl of difficulty!" At these words he slackene pace—moved yet slower and slower, and came finally to a complete standstill, both b and mentally. Unconscious of all around his mind in stupor and a perfect blank, th no knowing how long he would have th mained had he not been aroused from his erable state of abstraction by a tap on the s der, while a voice, which he recognized a cie's, said pleasantly,

"Arthur dear, what in the name of w are you about, posing yourself in that statu immobility? Have you turned Indian faki sorbed in the contemplation of the absolut what is the meaning of your wrapt attitud declare, were it not for your ungraceful m costume, you would not do badly for a mo a sculptor—Marius surveying the ruins of thage—or let us say, had you on my attire, statue of Lot's wife just turned into a pil salt. I could not have supposed, Arthur, added, with a little laugh, "that such a fixedness was possible to your restless nat

It was plain Lucie was in a cheerful moo day, explained by the fact that in the m she had received a letter from Percival, her a full and amusing account of Jemm Janie's wedding, and informing her that or two later he would return to Dublin an his condition of exile, following up the i tion by the stock quotation so well know "absence makes the heart grow fonder," forth. She was thus living in an atmosph sweet delight, and, joyous of heart, was for any little pleasantry. A look, howeve Arthur's pale and haggard face informed a moment there was something gravely with him, and, without seeking to pry in secrets, she anxiously waited to receive himself some explanation of his trouble.

Arthur, however, did not speak a wor truth he did not know what to say or how gin his communication. Impulse to known and dread to reveal the burden mind were at war within him, so that b them in silence reached their father's dw As they walked side by side, Arthur, ho all the time struggled hard in thought cover some path of escape out of his jeopardy, and was desirous especially of some method of introducing in a plausib the subject of an appeal through his sis money to Percival.

It is likely this never would have come had not Lucie herself inadvertently releas from his difficulty. After they entere house, coming with a lively manner in brother's room, where he was again standing, she said, "Arthur dear, I have commission for you. Percival writes me be here in a day or two, and I wish that good fellow, you would go for me to Cl lor's and get them to give you that purs made for Percival, and which I have ask to fit with a gold clasp. They promised have it done at once. Will you to-morro a good brother, ask about it, and see they disappoint me?"

The word purse, as associated with the money, gave Arthur the clew he was so an searching for. It furnished the means of ing about the value, as the world goes, o and gold, and of his own imperious nee

(To be continued.)

PROPHETIC IMPORT OF THE SULTAN'S CONCESSION.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

Turkish Persecution of Christians Diminished ever since 1844—The Notable Mohammedan Edict of Religious Toleration in 1844—Six Dates Ending in that Year—Only 45 Years Remaining until 1890, as the End of the Age.

The obliging and even submissive promptitude of the Sultan of Turkey in personally delivering back to the British Ambassador the papers of an arrested missionary, is one of many events which plainly evidence the nearness of the close of this dispensation and of the Second Advent of Christ.

More extraordinary is the contrast between the mild and yielding temper of Turkey now, and its former haughty and fierce intolerance against Christians, when the Turkish Empire was, in Scripture language, the Second Woe to Christendom for 391 years, from 1453 to 1844 (Rev. 9 : 15; [illegible]). Evidently the mystic Euphrates is drying up, and the Advent of Christ at the Seventh Trumpet and the Seventh Vial is close at hand (Rev. 16 : 12–17).

In the ninth chapter of Revelation the Turkish or Ottoman Power is depicted under the emblem of countless armies of horsemen coming across the river Euphrates and overspreading Christendom in Asia and Eastern Europe like a cloud. And power to kill Christians is declared to be given to them for a year and a month and a day, i.e., [illegible]1 days, which in the year-day historical fulfilment denoted, according to general agreement of expositors, 391 years.*

Now it is most remarkable, as commentators have shown, that it was in A.D. 1453, when the Turks captured Constantinople, that they virtually completed their conquest of the principal provinces which thenceforth were necessarily called the Turkish Empire. This formidable persecuting empire then commenced its predicted [illegible] years of the Turkish Woe, which consequently ended in 1844. And it was on March [illegible]st, [illegible]44, that the Sultan abolished the persecuting law of killing Christian converts from Mohammedanism, and thus for the first time in the history of the Turkish Empire an edict of religious toleration was established in it.

The causes of this intervention of European Powers to obtain this remarkable edict were these: In August, 1843, a Christian Armenian youth who, after becoming a Mohammedan from fear of punishment, had returned to his Christian faith, was put to death. This called for the interposition of the British Government and its serious remonstrances, and produced, in November, 1843, some promises of no longer punishing such converts with beheading. In December, 1843, however, a young Greek, who had become a Mussulman, having returned to his own creed as a Greek Christian at Bilégik, adjoining to Brussa, was executed. This drew forth decisive despatch from the English Government to their ambassador at Constantinople, demanding that Turkey should abolish, once for all, the execution of converts to Christianity.

It required the efforts of five European Powers, Austria, Prussia, France, Russia, and England, to overcome the obstinate reluctance of the Porte to change the Turkish law. The difficulties were thus stated by the Turkish Grand Vizier: The laws of the Koran compel no man to become a Mussulman; but they are inexorable both as respects a Mussulman who embraces another religion, and as respects a person not a Mussulman who, after having of his own accord publicly embraced Islamism, renounces that faith. No consideration can produce a commutation of the capital punishment, to which the law condemns him without mercy. The only mode of escaping death is for the accused to declare that he has again become a Mussulman."

The Sultan, even on March 14th, 1844, tried to put off the European Powers with a statement that the law did not admit of such a change; but the ambassadors refused to receive this. Their resolute firmness at length obtained the following of the Sublime Porte relinquishing the practice of Executions for Apostasy:

"OFFICIAL DECLARATION"

"The Sublime Porte engages to take effectual measures to prevent henceforth the execution and putting to death of the Christian who is an apostate from the Mohammedan faith. March 21st, 1844."

The eminent Rev. E. Bickersteth, in his "Guide to the Prophecies," justly observed on this: "The date of this official declaration, March 21st, is very remarkable, as being in fact the first day of Nisan, the first sacred month of the Jews in 1844. And this is the more remarkable, as it is connected with the termination of the remarkable date of the 2300 years (Dan. 8 : 14) which began with Ezra's commission to restore the sacrifices in Artaxerxes' 7th year in B.C. 456–7, and therefore ended on March 20th, A.D. 1844 (Ezra 7). And on the first of Nisan, March 21st, 1844, the (legislative) power of the Mohammedans to persecute Christianity passed away, and liberty was given for Christian worship, the true cleansing of the sanctuary.

"This is the more remarkable also as 1844 was the 1260th lunar year of the Mohammedan Calendar (which commences at the Hegira or Flight of Mahomet, A.D. 622), and so the closing year in Mohammedanism of that remarkable prophetical period of 1260 years. A letter from Tangiers, dated June 20th, 1844, given in the public journals, stated: 'It seems that the Moors have always had forebodings of this year. For a long time they have been exhorting each other to beware of the 1260th year of the Hegira, i.e., A.D. 1844.'

"Another material point connected with this event is the passing away of the Turkish Woe of 390 or 391 years (Rev. 9). It is the general voice of Christian interpreters that the sixth angel sounding the second Woe Trumpet describes the Turkish woe. The importance of this fact will be seen by the prophecy in Rev. 9 : 14–18. We are, therefore, clearly on the verge of the great events of the Second Coming of Christ and the Resurrection."

These sound views of Bickersteth, as above stated, are in the main agreed to by other expositors, including Mr. Grattan Guinness, in his "Approaching End of this Age."

No less than six prophetic dates apparently terminated in 1844–5, as follows:

BEGINNING.	SIX DATES.	ENDING.
B.C. 676, the captivity of Manasseh and of the Ten Tribes.	2520 solar years, or "seven times," Dan. 4 : 23.	End A.D. 1844.
B.C. 602, the overthrow of the throne of David.	2520 lunar years, bisected in A.D. 622.	End A.D. 1844.
B.C. 456, Artaxerxes' decree to rebuild Jerusalem, Ez. 7.	2300 years, Dan. 8 : 14.	End A.D. 1844.
A.D. 545, the completion of Justinian's Code of Laws.	1290 years, Dan. 12 : 11.	End A.D. 1844–5.
A.D. 622, the Hegira, when Moslem Calendar begins.	1260 lunar years of Mohammedan cal., Rev. 11: 2,3.	End A.D. 1844–5.
A.D. 1453, the capture of Constantinople by the Turks.	391 years, Rev. 9 : 15.	End A.D. 1844.

The momentous conclusion which these facts seem to bring us to (for we do not venture a positive assertion) is, that if the 1290 years did terminate in 1844–5, then the 1335 years which commenced with the 1290, and are only 45 years longer, will terminate about 1890 as the End of this dispensation and as the verge of full blessedness. "Blessed is he that cometh to the 1335 days" (Dan. 12 : 12).

A MOHAMMEDAN AND HIS WIFE CONVERTED.

A VISITOR of the Mildmay Conference Hall Bible Flower Mission in London, relates the following narrative:

It was in a workhouse infirmary that I first met with Jane Bond. She seemed very ill and prostrate, but gladly received the little bouquet I gave her, and as I read the text attached to it, she burst into tears. Grieved to see her so affected, I entered into conversation with her, and found she was much troubled on account of sin.

She did not possess a Bible, but the following week I gave her one, in which I had marked several texts as specially suitable for her to read, and with which she seemed greatly delighted. I was much interested in her case, and took my sister-in-law to see her, who also read with and talked to her of the fulness and freeness of God's salvation. After a short time, in answer to our prayers, we rejoiced together to hear her declaration of assurance that her sins were all pardoned—blotted out in the blood of Christ.

Then she told us of her husband, who had been born and brought up in the Mohammedan faith, and how she longed for him to be a partaker in her joy. We spoke to her of the promise, "Whatsoever ye shall ask in prayer, believing, ye shall receive" (John 16), which seemed to strengthen and comfort her.

Some years previously Jane Bond had gone out to India as needlewoman in the service of a peeress, and had there met with and married her husband, who at that time was a man of wealth and position. In consequence of his marriage with a Christian woman he underwent the most bitter persecution from all his friends and relations, his mother three times employing agents to murder his wife. Fearing that at length these efforts might succeed, he brought her to England. For some time after his arrival here his mother sent him a handsome monthly remittance, but this suddenly stopped, and by its failure he was reduced to the necessity of seeking some employment.

About this time he met with a severe accident, which has caused the loss of his leg, by three different amputations. He was for twenty-one months in a hospital, and his wife meanwhile tried to support herself by needlework, but she was able to obtain so little employment that on his discharge they became reduced to the greatest poverty, and finally applied for shelter to the parochial authorities. The poor woman had suffered so much from want and privation that she became very ill, and was placed in the infirmary, where I first saw her.

We succeeded in finding her husband, and gave him a Bible also. In the course of a few weeks, with the combined help of some of the ladies who visited the same workhouse in connection with the Bible Flower Mission, we took a room for Jane and her husband, and gave the wife some needlework as a means of support. We were very anxious to get the husband something to do also, but on account of his inability for active employment we found this more difficult to meet with. During this trying time deep searchings of heart had been going on, and he was constantly found reading his Bible. I was away from town for some weeks after they settled in their home, and a gentleman connected with the mission took my place in visiting them. Before my return I received a letter from the happy wife, telling me that her husband was now able to rejoice with her in Christ as his Saviour.

He has since been baptized in the church, and by this public profession of his faith has given up every expectation of regaining the property he had hoped some day to claim. Lately, a sort of paralysis has set in, and the doctors tell him he will gradually become quite helpless, but he often expresses his gratitude to God for not sending this affliction till He had brought him where alone he can find strength to bear it.

---

* The Seven Seals, Seven Trumpets, and many other prophetic visions of the Book of Revelation have double fulfilment. First, within nearly 1900 years, and secondly, within nearly 1900 days, just at the close of the first fulfilment. The First is called the year-day historical fulfilment, and the second is called the literal-day Futurist fulfilment. Thus the Sixth Trumpet in Revelation 9 has a figurative accomplishment during [illegible]91 yrs, and afterward a more literal one during [illegible]91 days.

CHRISTIAN HERALD
AND SIGNS OF OUR TIMES.
OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

SUBSCRIPTION-PRICE, $1.50 per annum, payable in advance. Money orders and cheques should be made payable to MR. BENJAMIN AITKEN, 63 Bible House, New York. The paper may also be obtained weekly from all newsdealers in the United States and Canada.

Special terms to Ministers, Clubs, and Agents.

We shall be happy to forward, postage-paid, a package of specimen copies to any minister who will distribute them among his congregation.

LAST week's edition of the CHRISTIAN HERALD was mailed to subscribers on Wednesday, January 28th, at 4.35 P.M., at the Post Office, New York.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Maine Difficulty, it is hoped has Reached a final and peaceable settlement. The Fusionist legislature applied to the Supreme Court for an opinion on the situation. As that court had already expressed its unanimous opinion, the course of the Fusionists seemed useless; but it was thought that questions framed ex parte might elicit something more favorable to the Fusionists. The judgment of the court was, however, again unequivocally against them. The legislature then met and adjourned until the first Wednesday in August next; but it was generally understood that the adjournment meant dissolution. Accordingly seven senators and twenty-two members of the House went to the State House and took their seats with the Republicans. The seal of the State was in the possession of the Fusionists, and it was feared it might be used in a way to create serious trouble; but on January 31st Mr. P. A. Sawyer, the Fusionist Secretary of State, handed it over to the Republicans with other effects and valuable documents in his possession.

The Removal from Office of Mr. Hayt, the Indian Commissioner, by Mr. Carl Schurz, is a step which has taken every one by surprise except those cognizant of the revelations made before the House Committee which has been sitting with closed doors over three weeks. Something was known of the serious nature of the charges brought against the Commissioner by General Fisk, but it seemed incredible that they could be true, or if true that they could have escaped the knowledge of Mr. Schurz or the President. Scarcely any one believed that Mr. Hayt could have been allowed by either of them to remain in office if such charges could be substantiated against him. It is not certainly known what particular offence on Mr. Hayt's part precipitated his abrupt dismissal; but it is known that Mr. Hammond, formerly a subordinate of Hayt's, had an interview with General Fisk, and made important disclosures which may have so implicated the Commissioner as to have rendered his retention of office impossible.

It is, however, certain that the Utes were badly treated by the bureau, and that evidence was offered to the committee showing that the supplies due according to the Brunot treaty at the Ute agency were deposited 175 miles away, and the Indians were required to fetch them thence. Evidence was also given that the Northern Cheyennes had been defrauded, and that they were starving when the massacre took place at Fort Robinson.

There is no doubt that the treatment of the Indians by the United States Government has been for some time a grave sin and scandal, and that the cause of religion and even of civilization has been degraded by cheating, lying, and disregard of treaty obligations. The investigation now in progress ought to be continued until the whole system is laid bare, and a radical reform instituted, and so the nation be delivered from this grievous sin against God.

The Duty of Government as to the Liquor Traffic.—At the meeting of the American Temperance Union in Haverley's Theatre, New York, on January 25th, Rev. W. H. Boole protested against the inaction of our administrators in the liquor business. He contended that government, in regulating the sale of poisons the quarantine of vessels coming from infected ports, the storage of combustibles, and the adulteration of articles of food, had adopted the principle of protecting the people against injury from the carelessness or cupidity of unprincipled persons. Having established that principle, he urged that the unrestricted sale of intoxicating liquors by licensed and unlicensed persons was a glaring inconsistency, the abolition of which the people ought to insist upon.

The Rev. George C. Needham, who recently accepted the charge of the Chicago Avenue Church, has found out a way of making his services attractive to the masses. Every week an artist is engaged, under Mr. Needham's instructions, in preparing large pictures to be used the following Sabbath evening to illustrate the sermon. The mountains and rocks of the Bible have formed the subject of two sermons, and the pictures which can be seen all over the church have been found to give a vividness and an actuality to description which arrests the attention which Mr. Needham then directs to the gospel truth he desires to impress. Numbers of persons hitherto unaccustomed to attend any place of worship are in this way attracted to the church, and give a sustained and close attention to the sermons, which are of an eminently practical character.

A Monument to the Memory of Dr. Lovick Pierce, to be erected at his burial-place, Columbus, Ga., is contemplated by the Southern Methodist Church. The services rendered by Dr. Pierce to the Church throughout his long life were too valuable to be allowed to pass without some enduring mark of recognition.

Mrs. Hayes's Social Triumph at the White House is described in a recent Washington letter by Rev. Lyman Abbott. It appears she went to Washington determined not to offer wine to her guests; this was the determination of a lifetime, and she would not and could not abandon it. To give a State dinner without wine was declared to be impossible; all Washington society was opposed to her; it even became a Cabinet question. For a year she was a target for the sort of arrows which it is so hard for any woman to bear unflinchingly. But she bore it all; by her patient persistence and her tact she carried the day and conquered social despotism on its own field. She never has offered wine; Washington follows her lead; and it is doubtful whether any State capital, not excluding the capital of Maine, is a more thoroughly temperance city than Washington to-day. The moral courage and endurance required for a struggle of this kind can only be rightly estimated by those who have fought a similar battle in their own smaller circles.

The Corner in Grain appears so far to have been a decisive failure, and it is doubtful whether any of the operators will realize the gains they hoped for. As soon as it became clear that the European harvests were so poor that an unprecedented demand for grain would be created, the speculators commenced the gigantic task of buying up all the stocks. The grain elevators of Chicago, New York, and other cities were filled almost to bursting with a stock of over forty million bushels, and a rise of forty-five to fifty cents a bushel immediately occurred. But European purchasers could better afford to wait than the speculators could afford to hold, and transactions ceased; the result has been a downward rush of prices which at one time near being a panic.

Dr. Talmage in his Friday evening le emphatically denounced the scheme. He sa

"The United States is capable of being almoner of the world. Foreign nations c America, 'Give us 230,000,000 bushels of gr and we say, 'You shall have it if you will us more than it is worth.' If this inform is correct, I prophecy the ruin of multitud the grain merchants of the United States. a traffic in the hunger of nations will not b erated in heaven, if it is on earth. God smash the ring. If God smites the harvest and there be no food, all we have to do is to to the inscrutable. But if after God has the nation's cup, grasping men lift it be reach of the people I sound the tocsin of al He who gambles in breadstuffs gambles i man blood, and with all popular outcry we resist it. Anything that touches the bread tion touches the vitals. This blockade o wheat market robs the masses of the peo home and abroad only to enrich the gambl grain. If we are unjust to other nations, l look out for retribution."

The Ownership of a Large Estate at more is expected soon to come before the for adjudication. It is estimated to be $6,000,000. The present possessors inherit an ancestor named Edward Fell, who squ on the land in the early part of the last cen It appears from documents recently disco that the land in question had been "gra by the British government at a prior da Lady Lucine Germon, a refugee from San mingo, whose heirs, now numbering sixtee sons, have advanced their claim to the pro The question will probably be stubbornly tested and will turn on legal technicalities. Christian may well be thankful that his ti his heavenly inheritance does not resembl of this Baltimore estate. He may be po this world's possessions, but no claim can from him the mansion in heaven purchas him by the blood of Jesus.

The Eighty-Seventh Birthday of Mr. Ed Lyon, of Rochester, was celebrated recentl Mr. Lyon showed his gratitude to God f long and prosperous life by giving $25, the Presbyterian Board of Home Missions directs that the money be invested in U States four per cent bonds, and the intere propriated to the support of five mission who shall engage in work west of the M sippi, reports of their labors being made quarter to the church in Rochester of whic Lyon is a member. When the bonds b due in 1907 the Board will be at liberty to what use it chooses of the funds.

On the Outposts of Civilization far W the Missouri a Presbyterian church has jus completed. Though most of its membe in sod houses and holes dug out of the g the church they have erected cost $2000 the day of dedication only $340 remained raised, and that amount was promptly scribed in full, with $100 additional to pu carpets, lamps, etc. The church is situ Beaver City, Nebraska, and is thirty miles west than any Protestant church; it is th one in the county.

A Brave Rescue by a Child is Re from Troy, N. Y. On January 24th tw dren, one a boy four years old, and the o girl of eight, were playing with their sle the street. They lost control of their sle it plunged into the river at the foot street, carrying the boy with it under the His sister rolled from the sleigh before it r the stream. The girl, with surprising c and presence of mind, dashed into the c current until it reached her arm-pits, and her brother, carried him dripping but safe shore.

A Letter from Granville Ohio, with quest for prayer, has been received; a from S. A. P., to be sent to Dr. Talma the Irish Famine Relief Fund.

One Christian Worker, Relying only on the help of God, has been enabled to do great things in Brooklyn. It appears that in that city of churches, with 500,000 inhabitants, only 60,000 attend Christian worship. The Union Mission, organized and conducted by Rev. B. W. Wright, has made the 440,000 outsiders the field of its operations. Its headquarters are 187 Classon Avenue, ormerly a lager-beer saloon, and in that building tales have been told which would move the most stony heart to tears. Once, a father, despairing of his son's ever being rescued from runken habits, resolved on having him arrested, ut before doing so took him to the Mission. That young man was so changed by the grace of God, that he is now an active member and earnest worker in a Christian church. Not long since the touching sight was seen in the Mission of a dy, her beautiful face bearing witness of the ouble she suffered, coming to the platform and ying her babe there, and kneeling down beseeching mercy and pardon, and going away re- icing in hope.

The Mission its spreading its branches all over Brooklyn, and many who were regarded as hopelessly depraved and lost to society and to od have been reclaimed, and are now clothed d in their right mind. An interesting account the rise and progress of the Mission appeared the New York Daily Witness of January 19th.

Seven Hundred Dollars in Answer to Prayer. A Christian merchant of New York related at the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting January 15th, for the encouragement of others, an incident which occurred during the week, in his own experience. A remittance of $700 he expected and sorely needed did not arrive, but a letter came postponing payment. The Christian man went with his disappointment and perplexity to the Great Source of help, and bowing his head spread his trouble before the Lord. He had not risen from his knees many minutes, when his clerk, who had been opening the next mail, entered with the contents, among which was a check far $ o—the very amount of which he stood in need. A person sceptical on such cases read of the circumstance, and being in a merchant's office expressed his incredulity. To his astonishment the merchant said, "The case was my own: here is documentary evidence of its veracity."

A Cockatoo Recently Displayed an Affectionate fidelity to a former owner which carries a silent reproof to many Christian people. The bird was presented to the Zoological Gardens at Philadelphia by a gentleman about to visit Europe. He was away three years, and on his return visited the gardens. Standing where the bird could not see him, he called it by name. The bird on hearing the well-known voice recognized it immediately, and flew about the cage in an eager desire to see its master. On the gentleman coming within sight, the door of the cage had to be opened lest the bird should injure itself against the bars. The three years' separation had not impaired its memory of former kindness, and it perched on the gentleman's shoulder and evinced all the signs of joy it was capable of. If the nature of the bird could be so affected by the loving care of its owner, how severe is the reproof it conveys on faithless and backsliding Christians, and what an illustration it is of the complaint of God, "The ox knoweth his owner, and the ass his master's crib: but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider"! (Isa. 1:)

A Child is Becoming Petrified at Cleveland, Oh This remarkable phenomenon is described by the correspondent of the New York Times, who says: "The most extraordinary case of sclerema, or petrifying of the skin, known in medical history, was that of a child brought to Cleveland, from New Philadelphia, January 29th, who is becoming literally a petrified child. The flesh is as cold and hard almost as marble, and while the child, which is nearly three years old, continues to live, it can only freely move its lips and eyes. It has none of the warmth and pliability of human flesh, and sleeps with its eyes open presenting a most ghastly spectacle. Until six months ago it was in perfect health. The disease is one of the connective tissues between the skin and flesh, whose origin is unknown, but is supposed to be caused by perverted nutrition. This is the thirty-fifth case discovered, and is an important one, inasmuch as no instance has heretofore been known where the entire body was affected. The child must die, as complete petrifaction will ensue."

This peculiar case is a strange type of physical disease, but in spiritual matters petrifaction is only too common. Large numbers of people in Christian lands have listened for many years to sermons and prayers and to the glad message of peace in the gospel, but have never made practical application of the truth for themselves, and their souls have become hardened until the most earnest appeals have ceased to move them. The word of warning falls on their ears as the seed in Christ's parable is described as falling on the wayside (Matt. 13:4).

"God have mercy on my family! God have mercy on my soul!" was the oft-repeated cry of a man named Mylon as he lay dying on Saturday night at Elizabethport, N. J. He had been intoxicated earlier in the day, and had become embroiled in a quarrel in a bar-room, which he had entered to obtain more liquor. The bar-keeper's wife refused to supply him with drink without payment, and the excited man struck her; the bar-keeper drew his pistol and shot the man fatally in the left side, and fired at his friends who came to his assistance, wounding several of them. The sense of his position overwhelmed Mylon, as the pain of his wound sobered him, and he gave utterance to the cry for mercy which he repeated continually during his dying moments. We can only hope that the piteous cry of the wretched man was heard by a merciful God, but it is a fearful thing to die in such circumstances and at that time to have to offer that prayer.

Messrs. Pentecost and Stebbins commenced evangelistic services in Detroit January 4th, with encouraging prospects of success. The First Congregational Church was the place chosen as the scene of their labors, and a large audience assembled. The Bible readings, which began Monday, the 5th, in the Young Men's Christian Association Hall, were removed the next day to First Church for lack of room. The inquirers' meetings have been well attended, and many conversions have taken place.

The Town of Oberlin, Ohio, has been Purified by the closing of all the places where intoxicating liquor was sold. The inhabitants are now turning their attention to the tobacco stores with the view of closing them or preventing the weed being sold to boys in the schools.

A Munificent Donor.—The Large Sum of $77,000 was last week presented by Mr. George Seney, President of the Metropolitan Bank of New York, to the endowment fund of the Wesleyan University, Middletown, Conn. This amount makes a total of $130,000 given by Mr. Seney to the same fund within a year. While assisting the young men of the denomination, Mr. Seney has not forgotten the aged ministers, for we learn that recently he sent his check for $2500 to Presiding Elder Beach as his annual contribution to the support of the worn-out preachers of the New York East Conference.

The Negro Exodus.—Gov. St. John, of Kansas, estimates that since last April at least 16,000 colored refugees have arrived in that State, and that not less than 12,000 of them have been destitute of food and means, and very scantily clad. He expects many thousands to come this year.

Subscribers frequently write to us for Single copies of the CHRISTIAN HERALD. We always endeavor to oblige them, but single and occasional copies can more easily be obtained from a newsdealer. Sometimes we receive complaints that the CHRISTIAN HERALD cannot be obtained from a particular newsdealer. Such complaints are promptly attended to, when made to us, but in all cases we desire that our friends will give the name and street address of the dealer who does not keep it for sale.

THE KEY-NOTE OF A CHOICE SONNET.

A New Sermon by Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

"My soul doth magnify the Lord."—LUKE 1:46.

Mary's Reason for Rejoicing—The Christian's Privilege a Higher Mystery—The Suggestions of Mary's Magnificat—I. An Occupation—1. For All Sorts of People—2. In All Places—3. In Solitude—4. Needing no Money—5. Nor Talent—6. The Greatest Mortals can Engage in it—"Greatening God"—II. A Remedy for Self-Congratulation—Mary knew she would be Famous—III. A Fruitful Utterance for Holy Feelings—IV. A Reason for Hopefulness—In Forecasts of the Future—In Regard to the Salvation of Others—V. A Guide in Theology—Faith Better than Philosophy—How to Magnify the Lord.

MARY had received a wonderful intimation from heaven of which she herself scarcely understood the full length and breadth. Her faith had apprehended a great promise, which as yet her mind hardly comprehended. Her prayer, "Behold the handmaid of the Lord; be it unto me according to thy word," showed her joyful submission and childlike confidence, and this made her blessed with the blessedness of patient hope. Under divine guidance she made a speedy journey into the hill country to see her cousin Elizabeth, and from her she received a confirmation of the wonderful tidings which the angel had brought to her. Elizabeth herself had been favored from above, for the Lord had looked down upon her, and taken away from her the reproach of barrenness. Amongst other choice words, Elizabeth said to her, "Blessed is she that believed: for there shall be a performance of those things which were told her from the Lord."

When Mary had thus been comforted by her friend, and her spirit had been elevated, and her confidence confirmed, she began to sing unto the Lord most sweetly, saying, "My soul doth magnify the Lord." Now, if it is a good time with any of you—if in communion with some older believer your confidence has been strengthened, make sure that the Lord has a return for it When your own heart is lifted up, then lift u the name of the Lord. Exalt Him when He exalts you.

You will perhaps tell me that the Virgin had very especial reason for magnifying the Lord, and I answer, Assuredly she had. "Blessed is she among women," and we are not backward to own the eminent honor which was put upon her. Blessed indeed she was, and highly favored. But yet, is there any true believer who has not also received special favor of the Lord? Sitting down quietly in our chamber, can we not each one say that the Lord has favored him or her with some special token of divine love?

I think there is something about each believer's case which renders it special. We are none of us exactly like our brethren, for the manifestations of divine grace are very various; and there are some bright lines about your case, brother, which will be seen nowhere else, and some peculiar manifestations about your happiness, my sister, of which no one else can tell. I might not be straining words if I were to say to many a sister in Christ here, "Hail, thou that art highly favored, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among women." And I might say the same to many a brother here: "Hail, thou that art highly favored, the Lord is with thee: blessed art thou among men. The Lord hath done great things for thee, and let thy spirit be glad."

True, there is one point in which we cannot be compared to Mary literally. She was to be the mother of the human nature of our Lord; but there is a parallel case in each one of us in which a higher mystery—a more spiritual mystery—gives us a like privilege, for, behold, the Holy Ghost dwells in each believer. He lives within us as within a temple, and reigns within us as in a palace. If we be partakers of the Holy Ghost, what more can we desire by way of favor from God, and what greater honor can be bestowed upon us?

But now, having introduced to you her magnificat, we will dwell upon these words, "My soul doth magnify the Lord," and I do earnestly hope that many of us can adopt the language without being guilty of falsehood: we can as truly say as Mary did, "My soul doth magnify the Lord." If there are any of you present to-night who cannot say it, get to your chambers, fall upon your knees, and cry to the Lord to help you to do so; for as long as a man cannot magnify God he is not fit for heaven, where the praises of God are the eternal occupation of all the blessed spirits. If you cannot magnify God, it probably is because you are magnifying yourself. May the Lord cut self down and make nothing of you, and then you will make every thing of Him. When you sink in your own estimation, then will God rise in your esteem. May God the Holy Ghost make it so.

I. Touching these words, I notice that, first, our text suggests to us for all gracious people: "My soul doth magnify the Lord." Here is an occupation for all of us who know the Lord, and have been born into His family.

AN OCCUPATION

1. Observe, it is an occupation which may be followed by all sorts of people. This humble woman speaks of her low estate, and yet she could magnify the Lord. All believers, of every rank and condition, can attend to this work. There are some things that you cannot do, but this one thing every gracious heart can do, and should delight to do—namely, to magnify the Lord.

2. This is an occupation which can be followed in all places. You need not go up to the meeting-house to magnify the Lord, you can do it at home: you need not step out of your own quiet little room, for you may sit still, and all alone you may magnify the Lord. You may be tossed about upon the sea in a storm, but you may trust His name, and be calm, and so magnify Him. Or, you may be no traveller, and never o a hundred yards out of the village in which ou were born, but you may magnify the Lord st as well for all that.

"Where'er we seek Him He is found,
And every place is hallowed ground;"

and in every place this hallowed occupation may be carried out, and we may always say—at least the place will not prevent our saying, "My soul doth magnify the Lord."

3. This is not an occupation which requires a crowded congregation, it can be fitly performed in solitude. I suppose that this sonnet of the Virgin was sung with only one to hear it, her cousin Elizabeth. There is a quorum for God's praise even where there is only one; but where there are two that agree to praise God, then is the praise exceeding sweet. Ah, my dear sisters, you will never stand up to speak to thousands, and many of my brethren now present would be very timid if they had to praise the Lord before a score. Never mind about that. Praise does not require even two or three, but in the quiet of the night, or in the loneliness of the wood far away from the haunts of men, your soul may pursue this blessed task, and daily, hourly, constantly sing, "My soul doth magnify the Lord."

4. This is an occupation also, dear friends, which requires no money. Mary was a poor maiden. She had no gold or silver, and yet did she sweetly say, "My soul doth magnify the Lord." It is an honorable thing to be intrusted with this world's treasure to lay it out for Jesus. The church has its temporal needs, and happy is that man who is privileged to supply them: but this kind of work can be followed by the child who has no money, and by the workwoman who scarcely knows how to find herself in bread. It may be followed by the poor man reduced to the workhouse; and by the poor woman who lies in the infirmary breathing out her life. "My soul doth magnify the Lord" is as fit for paupers as for peers.

5. And this is an occupation, dear friends, which I commend to all here present, because it does not require great talent. A simpleton may sing, "My soul doth magnify the Lord." We have each one a soul, and when that soul has been renewed by grace it can follow this blessed pursuit of magnifying the Lord. Perhaps you have not the abilities of Mary, for she was, doubtless, a woman of considerable culture, like Hannah who preceded her, whose song she partly borrowed. Hannah seems to me to be one of the most gifted women of the Old Testament, and to be worthy of more notice than is generally given to her.

But if you could not write a hymn, if you could not compose a verse, if you have no ability that way, ay, and if you cannot sing—and there are some of us that have such cracked voices that we never shall, and there are one or two brethren here who have such bad ears for time that I generally hear them a note behind everybody else, as I did to-night—well, never mind about that, our souls can magnify the Lord. It is an occupation that does not depend upon the voice, or upon any kind of talent whatever.

"My soul doth magnify the Lord." I would invite all my brothers and sisters here to take this for their occupation as long as they live, and never to cease from it. Nay, even should death for a moment suspend it, let them so praise God that it shall be no new work for them to begin again and praise Him forever in heaven.

6. Dear friends, albeit that this magnifying of the Lord is an occupation to be taken up by all Christians, do not let us think little of it. To magnify the Lord seems to me the grandest thing we mortals do, for, as I have already said, it is the occupation of heaven. When the saints of the Most High pass into their glorified state they have nothing else to do but to magnify the Lord.

The word signifies, to put it in a Saxon form instead of a Latin one, to "greaten God." We cannot make Him really greater, but we can show forth His greatness. We can make Him appear greater. We can make others have greater thoughts of Him, and that we do when we are praising Him. We can ourselves try to have greater and yet greater thoughts of Him—make Him to our apprehension a greater God than we once knew Him to be; and this, I say, is no mean occupation, because it is followed in heaven by all redeemed and perfected spirits. Even here, it is the end of every thing.

Praying is the end of preaching, for preaching and hearing are nothing in themselves except men be brought to Christ and led to prayer. But then praying is not the end: praising is the end of praying. Prayer is the stalk of the wheat, but praise is the ear of the wheat: it is the harvest itself. When God is praised, we have come to the ultimatum. This is the thing for which all other things are designed. We are to be saved for this end, "To the praise of the glory of His grace, wherein He hath made us accepted in the Beloved."

Come, what are you doing to-night? Have you been during this day murmuring and complaining and grumbling? End that, and begin praising. Some of you are farmers, and I have no doubt you have grumbled because of the weather. I do not wonder, but I hope that you will not do it any more, but rather believe that God knows better about skies and clods and clouds and crops than you do. If we had the management of the weather, I have no doubt we think we should do it very splendidly, but I question whether we should not ruin all creation. Our great Lord and Master knows how to manage every thing. Let us cease from all criticism of what He does, and say, "My soul does not grumble. My soul does not complain; I have taken up a better business than that. 'My soul doth magnify the Lord.' That is her one engagement from which she will never cease."

II. Secondly, if you look at the text from another point of view, it provides for us for self-congratulation.

A REMEDY

If any one of us had been favored, as the Virgin was, with the promise that we should become the parent of the Saviour, do you not think that we should have felt exceedingly lifted up? It was natural that she should be proud, but it was gracious on her part that she was humble. Instead of magnifying herself she magnified the Lord. It was a great thing, and somebody must be magnified for it. Nature would have said, "Mary, magnify thyself;" but grace said, "Mary, magnify the Lord."

If the Lord has been very gracious to any one of us, our only way to escape from vainglorious pride, which will be exceedingly wicked if we indulge in it, is by giving vent to our feelings in quite another direction. Do you notice how she sets off the greatness of God by her own insignificance? "He that is mighty hath done to me great things." "To me," she says. "They are great things, and He is mighty, but they are to me. He hath regarded the low estate of His handmaiden."

Over against the greatness of God's goodness to you be sure to set in contrast your own meanness and unworthiness. Has the Lord redeemed you, called you, justified you, sanctified you, set you in His church, and given you a name and a place among His people? When you are inclined to run up the topgallants, and to hang ou all the flags, and to glory in your flesh, recollec who you are and what you are, and the hole o the pit whence you were drawn, and the roc out of which you were hewn, and say, "Wh me, Lord? Why me?" Begin to magnify th name of the Lord, and that will be a death-blo to the temptation to pride.

Mary knew also that she was to be famou "All generations shall call me blessed." Bu do notice how she balances her fame with a other fame. She says, "Holy is His name, an His mercy is on them that fear Him." Sh magnifies the name of the Lord. If He h given her a measure of honor, she lays it at H feet. Mind you do the same. Be not so vain to be lifted up with a little success. We ha all passed through this test of character, and the fining-pot how few of us have borne the f without loss! Perhaps you have preached sermon and God has blessed it; the congreg tion is increased, and crowds are gathering; t probability is that the devil whispers, "You a capital preacher. Well done! You put yo point admirably: God is blessing you. Th must be something admirable in your charac and abilities." Away, away, thou fiend of pit! This is ruinous pride! But suppose, d brother, that the fiend will not go away while finds you musing upon your success, what you to do? Try him with this—"My soul d magnify the Lord." Praise the name of Lord that ever He should make use of suc poor, unsuitable instrument as yourself. G Him all the honor and all the glory, if honor glory there be, and see if the arch-enemy d not take to flight, for God's praises are abl rent to the devil.

In whatever capacity you are serving the L if He puts any honor upon you, mind you gi all back to Him. Sedulously and carefully deavor to do this, for robbery here will be fa He will not give His glory to another. I begin to pilfer even a little of the praise, shall find that our Master will reckon us t unfaithful stewards, and give us a discharge we glory in our strength, we have to go out shake ourselves like Samson when his hair lost, because the Lord has taken our stre away from us. A heart that is lifted up self-esteem will soon be cast down in the m

If grace be come to thee, my brothe is a wanton waste of it to pride thyself it. Like the manna in the Israelite's h when kept till the morning, it will worms and stink: no worm ever brought s decay than pride. Bear the shield of honor as an armor-bearer for thy Lord. that thou hast nothing but what belon him. Use all for him, and glorify him for al in all; and so wilt thou do well. I recom the text, then, as a cure for pride: "My soul doth magnify the Lord."

II. Thirdly, and I will be brief on each point, the text is for holy feelings. "My soul doth magnify the Lord" is evidently the overflow of a full soul.

A FRUITFUL UTTERANCE

There must have been great mixture of feeling in the heart of this holy woman; but these few words furnished expression for every variety of holy emotions. Those feelings were of an opposite character, and yet they all spoke by this one sentence. It is clear that she was filled with wonder. Her thoughtful spirit asked, how can so great a thing be true to me? Shall the Son of the Highest be born of Mary, the village maiden? Oh, miracle of condescension!

With the amazement there was mingled, not the unbelief which too often comes of wonder, but an expectation of the promised marvel. She believed that the things which were spoken to her would be performed by the Lord, and she looked that God should keep His word to her. How sweetly those two feelings, wonder and expectation, are blended, hidden away and yet expressed, in these few words, "My soul doth magnify the Lord!"

I think I perceive in these words a singular mixture of admiration and calm thought: a wonder in which there is no surprise. The blessed Virgin is evidently, as I have said before, wonder-struck that such a thing should come to her, and yet there is about that wonder no startling of amazement, but a marvelling which is the result of previous careful thought. She had considered the prophecies and promises, and saw them about to be fulfilled in her seed. She sang in the fifty-fourth and fifth-fifth verses, "He hath holpen His servant Israel, in remembrance of His mercy; as He spake to our fathers, to Abraham, and to his seed for ever." She had turned over the subject in her mind, and she came to the conclusion, "He has said He will do this. It is as He spake."

So, oftentimes, when you get a mercy given to you you will be surprised at it at first, but afterwards you will say, "This is even as the Lord promised to me. He doeth no new thing to His servant. It is only my forgetfulness that has made me to be astonished. Did He not promise that He would help me—that He would deliver me—that He would give me all that I needed. And inasmuch as He has done it in this surprising way, my soul doth magnify Him twice over for the wonderful mercy, and for the faithfulness of His covenant love which kept the ancient promise which He made to be yea and amen in Christ Jesus." Again, I say, I commend the text as an expression of your feelings. How sweet are the words, "My soul doth magnify the Lord!" They are full, many-sided, and natural, and yet most spiritual.

IV. Fourthly, I think my text may be used as A REASON FOR HOPEFULNESS.

It would be well to be wrapped up in this spirit with regard to every thing. The mood which bids us sing "My soul doth magnify the Lord" is full of hope which will be useful in a thousand ways. For instance, concerning our own providential condition, let us magnify the Lord. Surrounded with difficulties, let us walk on with confidence, because our great God is equal to every emergency, and can both level the mountains and fill up the valleys. Burdened with labors and straitened by necessities, let us maintain an unchanging cheerfulness, because we magnify the might and the bounty of the eternal Jehovah, whose name is God All-sufficient. When dangers magnified by fear, let God be magnified by faith. When the troubles of our heart are enlarged, let our expectations be enlarged also.

The same God-magnifiying spirit should attend our glances into futurity, if we indulge in any, and we are all too apt to do so. Ah! we would like to know, some of us, what is going to happen to us. Fain would we steal a glance behind the screen, and each one see "What gloomy lines are writ for me,

Or what dark scenes arise."

There is a desire in most persons' minds to draw away the curtain which God has so wisely placed over the future. This is very wrong of us, and yet it is as common as it is blamable. We all turn prophets every now and then, and when we do we prophesy evil, and therefore it would be well if we would catch the spirit of Mary with regard to our forecasts of the future, and say, "My soul doth magnify the Lord."

Why do we set our blear-eyed anxieties to watch the signs of heaven? If we must pry, and guess, and speculate, why not employ our brighter powers, and let blue-eyed hope scan the ensigns of the sky? When we meddle with the future how dare we foretell that which would dishonor the Lord? If we must needs write bitter things against ourselves, yet we ought not to write untruthful things against Him. When we do forecast the future at all, let us do it in the spirit wherewith we sing, "My soul doth magnify the Lord." Let us be certain that we shall find Him to be a great God in the future, greatly good, wondrously gracious, magnifying his mercy. We shall have troubles, but our soul doth magnify the Lord, for she foresees that we shall ride out all storms with Jesus at the helm, and come safe into port.

Our anxious eye foresees necessities, but our soul doth magnify the Lord, for she sees him with a golden key opening the treasures of David, and supplying all her wants. Our troubled ear can hear the wolf, but our soul doth magnify the Lord, for she sings, "The Lord is my Shepherd, and He will preserve me." In this spirit you may look forward to the swellings of Jordan, magnifying the living God while you yourself lie down to die.

Judge in the same manner with regard to the salvation of your fellow-men. Never say, "It is of no use inducing such a man to attend the means of grace. He is a blaspheming wretch. All that he would do if he heard a sermon would be to make sport of it for the next week. I have no faith in taking such a man to hear a ministry which he would be sure to ridicule." Such unbelieving talk is making little of God. Is is not so? Is it not dishonoring God to think that His Gospel cannot reach the most depraved hearts? Why, if I knew that a man had seven thousand devils in him I believe the Gospel could drive them all out.

